See with what light and gallant spirit, yet with how little of the "bounce" of the modern "portrait of a gentleman," the Marquis of Hastings stands with his finger on his chin. See, in one of the ordinary run of his portraits, with what inquisitive ease John Gawler, Esquire, looks out of the kit-cat canvas; with what negligent grace Captain Pownall leans on his anchor-fluke. How elegantly Lady Sondes sits on her garden seat, attractive and not a dowdy in spite of the black and white machinery on her head, that at first glance make us somehow think irresistibly of earthquakes and tornadoes. And what for sumptuous naturalness and winning home-loveliness can exceed the long stately picture of Mrs. Wynne, and the children wrestling in each other's embraces. His intense sense of life broke in among the preposterous costumes of his time. "Never mind," said he, "they have all light and shade." And even with such head-dresses, hat and feather, frizzy locks and fly-away ribbons, as we see in the portrait of Lady Lade, life triumphs, and constructions, puzzling for their immensity and complexity, are so broken with tender clouds and breezy trees and flitting shades, that all looks agreeable and natural.

The men who are everlastingly playing at backgammon and cards in the French Exhibition, in the restored costumes of the Reynolds period, look dull, and tiresome, and heavy, if better drawn than by Reynolds. But Reynolds does not make them dull and tiresome, and it shows his power. He "always looked on his picture as a whole," — and how wonderful are the occult relations of line, colour, and effect which go to make up a whole picture. There seem to be in them hidden powers that baffle all analysis. It is not mere mass or extent that gives sublimity. Perhaps there is no picture more solemn in general effect than the "Peter Martyr" of Titian; none which, among other elements, gives so impressive a suggestion of forest grandeur; yet it is not accomplished by representing great masses of forest scenery. Let the spectator compare the size of the trees with the size of the figures, and he will find that all the materials of the scene, with the exception of the sky and the piece of distant mountain, might be contained inside a room. The nearest tree is not thicker than the thigh of the assassin, and not more than fourteen feet high. Both trees might any day be passed in a hedgerow, with a sense of their insignificance, and the foreground is not more than ten feet wide. It is the bend, the sway, the subservience, the collocation, the mystery of relation to the human and divine interest of the scene, that makes them what they are. Man, as seen by the painter's eye, is seen in certain compressed conditions. The men we see apart from the framings and contrivances, and limitations of art, are puzzlingly little. Across a street we can just recognise a face and figure. Seen against the great backgrounds of nature, man is nothing. The generalissimo ruling among thunder clouds, and making the mountains bow on the canvas of Reynolds, is a speck out of doors. The greatest battle seen from the hill-brow is but the waving of "thin red lines" in a smoky field. Take the man as he could be made to fit against the cloud or the rock, and his importance dwindles — he has no "relief." There was smoke and roar at Gibraltar; the roar only terrific within a league. No one saw General Elliott's head as we see it in the picture in the National Gallery, standing out, with its triangular obstinate eyebrows, against the twisting clouds and the down-pointing gun. Man has to dignify himself, and to the great painter who can do it for him as Reynolds could, he will willingly accord "ceremonies of bravery even in the infamy of his nature." This vast desire of man Reynolds was able to gratify. He rendered with equal perception and ease the politician in his robes of office; the mighty noble in velvet and ermine; the wit, with his jest simmering on his features; the student poring over his book, with near and piercing regard, as Baretta and Johnson, or looking afar with contemplative serenity like Zachary Mudge; the country gentleman with his favourite dog, enjoying the repose of a rustic seat in the shade of his ancestral beech-tree, in the grey afternoon, like Sir John Lade; the dilettante fingering his gem or his gem-like glass of wine; the man of pleasure taking it with easy grace; the fashionable beauty pillowed in state, with her grey towers of curl and plaster and plume, or tripping under narrow trees that bend to make her bending more graceful; the actress in tragic state, like Mrs. Yates or Mrs. Siddons; in saucy surprises, like Mrs. Abington; or in the mere lazy luxury of living, like Kitty Fisher, or "my Lady O'Brien;" or, sweetest of all, the little children! It was in these that Reynolds reaches farthest into the heart. We melt before the picture of "Innocence," with her dimpled hands on her bosom. We are hushed before the infant Samuel, who yet is only a modern child, "called of the Lord" — sacred enough as such. There is a throng of these little ones peering at us from canvas and canvas, calling us back to our childhood with winning smiles and wondering eyes. In doing these his power seemed to rise with age. Let any one look well, who has not already often looked, at those cherub heads, all done from little Lady Mary Gordon, and painted not long before "the drop serene" brought him to a final pause: praised by Leslie for its exquisite evanescent touch and pure colour, but rising far beyond all technical grace. If we search anywhere among "the figures of the true" for an illustration of the words, "for of such is the kingdom of heaven," let us see it there. It is as much sermon as art can yield, simply to bring together before the mind's eye this picture and the Kitty Fishers and Nelly O'Briens, and make no further comment.

The greatest of all Reynolds' achievements in portraiture was the portrait of Mrs. Siddons, as Tragedy, on her cloudy throne. In this instance, the strange and ugly fashion in which the hair at that period was dressed, rather aids than impedes the sentiment. The whole mass moves horrent from the brow as if standing on end; the dark eyebrows rise under it in slight corrugation, and the springs of imagination are moved. "Scaffolds, still sheets of water, divers woes," the collapse of power, the eclipse of nations, terror, and the immensity of human sorrow, pass in twilight procession as we look, and haunt us when we turn away.

On the force, and dignity, and life, and naturalness of his portraits, there was, as his most peculiar distinction, the crown of grace. He was, as Ruskin happily calls him, "lily-sceptred." Taken by itself, and apart from science, we might almost say that Raphael himself had no higher sense of grace. We pardon even his incorrectness in the bewitching fluency of this element in his female portraits. It reached to the disposition of a curl and the flow of a fold. That and the sense of life and motion which pervades his pictures carries us away, and does not even suffer us long to weary of his works. And it was just that exquisitely balanced mixture of outward practical sense and spirit, with the amenity of a graceful soul, that made him so beloved in society, so able to please, without flattery or loss of independence. We can see for ourselves the refutation of Allan Cunningham's insinuations; he had no need of the smooth tongue of the courtier to secure his success. He had a happy mixture of wisdom and gentleness —

"Still born to improve us in every part;
His pencil our faces, his manners our heart."

Where Reynolds fell into the unhappy classic vein of his time, it is impossible to relish many of his works; they become oppressive. Compare the dress of Mrs. Braddyl, its lively accidental "set," or the attire of the Ladies Waldegrave, in that lovely group where two are winding silk, and one is embroidering at a real table, with a drawer and a key, and think of their being exchanged for "The Graces adorning a bust of the Duchess as Magna Mater" — the Graces with great têtes pomatumed and powdered, the Graces in stays, the Graces without hoops, but with dresses lashed about their legs as only the wettest and thinnest muslin could cling in the wildest storms, yet doing it, defiant of law, in the profoundest calm! "What," says Uncle Toby, "has a man who believes in God to do with these things?" Let the Graces wander in Ionia as Praxiteles saw them, and teach what they could to a world that "by wisdom knew not God." Our great-grandmothers, playing at Graces, and cooking sacrifices to perished divinities, "swearing by the sin of Samaria, and saying, Thy god, O Dan, liveth, and the manner of Beersheba liveth," were too much for even Reynolds to render tolerable to a Christian age. One of the best of these we can examine at our leisure in the National Gallery. Three celebrated beauties are "adorning the altar of Hymen," but, O that they had been winding silk, or shooting at targets, or even, as it is said, one fine lady who sat to him did, "eating beefsteaks and playing at cricket on the Steyne, at Brighton!"

Burke says that Reynolds seemed to descend to portraiture from a higher sphere. It was from the mount of philosophy that he descended, and not from "the highest heaven of invention." There was one thing he had not, — the perception of the unseen, of the something beyond. "Great and graceful as he paints," he is "a man of the earth," seeing, it is true, all that is noblest and best on "this visible diurnal sphere," but never quitting it. In one instance — the portrait of Mrs. Siddons — we just feel the inflation of the balloon. It strains, and rocks, but it does not leave the ground. It was Mrs. Siddons more than Sir Joshua who gave the spiritual element to it. Other men of his time had the gift. Fuseli had it. In spite of Horace Walpole, with his lace ruffles and his two strokes of catalogue-disdain, Fuseli makes us feel the Gothic thrill at ghostly evanescence, the grey gliding mysteries of Hercynian forests, the stalk of mailed phantoms —

"By thy wild and stormy steep, Elsinore."

If he saw no gods descend from heaven, he saw them in the caverns of Endor "rising out of the earth." If he could not soar and blaze with Uriel, he could sink by thought into the profound of Hades, and see the cloudy gates of Chaos and the pit, and the key that was "forged by no earthly smith." We feel his spell creeping in the roots of the hair. "Nature put him out," but he saw what he tried to paint if he could not perfectly paint all that he saw.

And Romney, too, had the great gift. But it was the Greek gift, and not the Scandinavian. He beheld the Oread on her mountain heath, the Naiad by her ferny wells, the wild prevision of Cassandra, the stony horror of Cedipus waiting for his doom. And Gainsborough had it, but it was the true British imagination that possessed him. It was that swelling, glowing, heavenly-solemn faculty, that dwelt in the author of "The Seasons,"

"For ever rising with the rising mind," to which the cultured Englishman most readily responds, as he hears the sweep of autumnal gales in his own island, or through glades whose leafage is yellowing to the fall looks westward at his misty sunsets, exalted by the pleasing Miltonic melancholy with which he would "choose to live."

Reynolds had it not. He fished for such ideas as did not walk in the daylight. They never rose spontaneous from the deep, and the genii, caught by guile, sulk and are uneasy on his canvas. There is a touch of the terrible in the picture of Cardinal Beaufort, and we wish the anecdote of the grinning coal-heaver who sat for it had been suppressed. Yet the anecdote only proves that Shakespeare himself in his awfully-minute delineation could not quicken the sterile fancy of Reynolds without the help of the coal-heaver.

In the highest subjects of all, his failure was the most signal. Of the Oxford window, our only intuition is that it is abominable in theory, in conception, in style. The lubberly angel above, the smirking faces below, the rapid rows of Virtues between the mullions, scarcely higher in invention than those blindfold white women with scales, and idiotic Hopes with anchors, which support the dignity of a "Perpetual Grand Master" of the Order of Odd Fellows, on his engraved diploma, — are all bad together. It is a wonder that Reynolds should be so anxious to have his name "hitched in" in connection with so aimless, tasteless, and absurd an attempt. There were ten pictures under the great historic "Infant Hercules," "some better, some worse," he said, and there is something grand about the work, but not enough to kindle the mind. The "Macbeth" was a curious réchauffé of Verrio, Michael Angelo, and Sir Joshua Reynolds. Many of his purely fancy pictures are charming — his Shepherd Boys, Cupids in Disguise, Muscipulas, Strawberry Girls, Contemplative Boys, Fortune Tellers. Whatever he could reach by vision and taste he could do, but the gates of imagination were closed and sealed to him. It was his calling to pourtray, and the allowance of his gifts was large enough.

The chief praise which Mr. Taylor awards to Reynolds' writings on art is, that "their tendency is upwards." He had a strong conviction of the high claims of art on the attention of thinking men, and does not so much enforce this as assume it. This is, after all, one of the chief uses of the pen in the region of art. The medium of pictorial art is not words. It would be possible to render the most exact account in words of what a picture ought to be, without having the least perception of what it is, or the least power to judge it aright. The most valuable practical utterances are the simple dicta of great painters as to the relative status and qualities of pictures. The moment verbal analysis is attempted, the utter poverty of language in that sphere is made apparent. The finest criticisms are mere finger-posts to mark the road on which they do not travel. Where a painter takes the pen, however, he is amenable to the pen. Reynolds was a pioneer in the direction of statements on art. The laws which govern art — and here is one of its charms to those who pursue it — are those common to all the great pursuits of life. "So close," writes Erskine, "is the analogy between all the operations of genius, that your Discourse is the best dissertation upon the art of public eloquence that ever was or ever will be written." But, when these laws are discovered and laid down, the materials amongst which they work, the phenomena of aspect, line, form, colour, light, shade, effect, have all to be learnt and understood before a man can become a good critic of painting; and the full meaning of Reynolds' discourses, inaccurate as they may be in some of their reasonings, may be misunderstood if the painter and the literary critic do not intend the same thing. The true painter reasons with his brush, and can afford but little leisure to help forward that correct statement of the functions and laws of art which, in a verbal form, enter little into his meditations, but which yet are so much to be desired as a common platform between the artist and the man of general culture. "The eye has its own poetry," says Sir Charles Eastlake.

Reynolds' methods of painting were chiefly useful to our school in the way of warning. Many of his finest pictures are already blurred and blighted beyond hope of recovery. His aims as to colour and texture were not always satisfactory. He used wax compounds, that now and then go far to suggest Madame Tussaud or Mrs. Jarley, in their confectionary surface. It was his practice, to lay in the likeness, in what is called "dead colour," with little more than black and white: over this, when dry, he passed transparent varnishes and mixtures, charged with the tints required to complete the colour. These colours, — carmines, lakes, and other vegetable hues, — were often fleeting. They “sparkled and exhaled” under the power of sunshine. Sometimes the varnish would turn brown or green, and ruin the complexion. Sometimes a thick-headed cleaner would fetch it all off, and find the caput mortuum below. A still more fatal practice was to lay one coat on another, with materials that had no blood relationship, and then there were constant feuds and insurrections among the pigments, and the picture was rent asunder. “Oh, heavens! Murder! Murder!” says the ranting Haydon, as he spells out the comical occult recipes, partly broken English and partly Italian, in which Sir Joshua recorded these experiments. “Murder! — it would crack under the brush!” His pictures have often a very special charm, arising from what Haydon calls “his glorious gemmy surface.” This was in part owing to the reflex influence of his want of facility. There were ten pictures under “the Infant Hercules,” and many of his best pictures, before he had done with them, had been so loaded with coat on coat of rich pigments, rough and intermingled with all the tints of the palette, that they were ready for the final and magical “surface” that enchanted Haydon. When the full idea was seized, then came the “lily-sceptred” hand, and the light brush in its graceful sweeps catching the upper surfaces of the many-coloured granules, permits the eye to see, through the liberated airy stroke, the sparkle of the buried wealth beneath. Romney struck in his forms with masterly ease at once, even at the first sitting; and if in him we miss this jewelled richness, it is abundantly compensated by the breathing sense of power which plays around his works of imagination.

Reynolds’ personal character is fascinating. If we are to judge of a man’s worth by the rank and style of his friends, what shall we say of the man who secured such invariable and decided testimonials from Samuel Johnson — of him whom the author of the “Vicar of Wakefield” loved like a brother? Let us first read Burke’s eulogies on Dunning and Keppel, and then reflect that Burke, Dunning, and Keppel were among Sir Joshua’s most intimate friends. The terms used by all who knew him in describing his manners are all of one order. Calm, simple, unaffected, placid, genial, gentle, are words of constant occurrence on all sides in any attempt to characterise him.

In his mental organization, the most prominent faculty pointed at by all is the power of generalisation. “To be such a painter he was a profound and penetrating philosopher.” Mr. Taylor watches closely his habit of “condensing” in conversation. Then came that precious virtue of taste — the guard of his rapid observation and intense sense of character. His surprising vitality, which palsy could only threaten, which age could not lower, is to be very especially noticed. It was this that permitted his life, “so full of labour that tongue cannot utter it.” His fruitfulness was not less than prodigious.

We may pry too curiously into the moral of a life, but no truly thoughtful person can omit all consideration of it from his final judgment. This consideration is especially provoked when the subject of it has been eminently fortunate and happy, and it is invited in the case of Sir Joshua Reynolds, by the generalised conception he entertained of life as a whole. Did all the elements of calculation enter into his arrangement of “the great game he had to play?” He was convicted of nothing usually accounted a vice. In manners, in temper, he was all that could be wished or expected. He was, — Dr. Johnson said — “invulnerable” as a member of civil society. He had respect for religion, as appears in various incidental ways. We are not informed if he were a church-goer. We are told that he painted on Sunday, and that Johnson urged him to abandon the practice. His sister, Mrs. Palmer, was much concerned, and expostulated with him on the same subject. Johnson exhorted him to read the Bible daily, and to consider his latter end.

It is well that we are not called on to look to the life of a man for a standard of virtue and religion. That is found outside a man. But it is permitted to us, it is enjoined upon us, for our own improvement, encouragement, or warning, to judge of a man’s conformity to that standard, and thus know him by his “fruits.” In the case of those individual acts, which do not clearly contradict any known moral or divine law, the moral significance is indeed as hard to ascertain as it would be to pick out and protest against those parts of Reynolds’ pictures which were painted on Sunday. We look with high respect on the religious spirit of Johnson, and we see him occasionally doing pretty much the same things that Reynolds did. At the theatre, the masquerade, at Ranelagh, at Vauxhall, in the company of wits and men of fashion, we find him by the side of Reynolds. We have much information as to the creed and religious habits of Johnson. We have none as to those of Sir Joshua, and we can only ponder.

OUR FATHERS; ON WHICH SIDE?

YESTERDAY was the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans, when the flag of our country waved unmolested for the first time since 1861 from the Gulf of Mexico to the falls of Saint Anthony, from Boston to San Francisco, in honor of the victory over British aggression. It is a day now more than ever remembered, because Andrew Jackson, a native of South Carolina, but at the time a citizen of Tennessee, and the general who then led our troops, when subsequently President of the United States, rebuked Calhoun and other secessionists by giving, at a public festival, a sentiment that has become the watchword of loyalty, "THE UNION, IT MUST AND SHALL BE PRESERVED;" and which epitomizes the views of a native of North Carolina, also a citizen of Tennessee, and now the President of the United States, Andrew Johnson.

To thoughtful patriots and statesmen, now that the laws of the land have been maintained by the force of arms, and the smoke of horrid civil war is fast disappearing, it is interesting to inquire what would have been the opinions of Washington and others of our fathers relative to the great rebellion had they lived.

We can only ascertain this by examining the sentiments advanced by them when they were busy actors in public affairs. History records how Washington stirred up the bitterest opposition of "States rights" men in Virginia and North Carolina by advocating a more perfect union than that under the Articles of the Confederation, and that he was cursed because he acted as president of the convention that framed the Constitution.

A brother of Judge Iredell, of the Supreme Court of the United States, writes on May 12, 1788, from Edenton, North Carolina: "Mr. Allen this morning read to me part of a letter he received from a gentleman of his acquaintance, who mentions a conversation he had with General Parsons, the substance of which was that General Washington was a damned rascal and traitor to his country for putting his hand to such an infamous paper as the new Constitution."

Washington, from the day of the adoption of the Constitution by the people of the United States, never had a doubt as to the propriety of coercing those who would defy its provisions. The prompt measures against the insurgents of Pennsylvania convinced every mind that he knew the rights of the General Government, and dared to maintain them.

Virginia, under the leadership of Jefferson and other minds, did not cordially sustain the measures of his administration, but he was not swerved thereby, and he knew no Government superior to the United States. He felt that, although the theory of secession was advocated by some great and honest men, that nevertheless, if it ever became the belief of the masses, it would lead the nation to the brink of destruction. This theory, at the breaking out of the rebellion, was no new thing. Henry Lee, the "Light Horse Harry" of the Revolution, and subsequently Governor of Virginia, writes, on January 12, 1795, from Richmond to a friend, in these words:

"The impressions which many artful, designing individuals have made by their representations on the minds of the people of this State could readily be removed, were they not confirmed in a manner by the part which Mr. Madison takes.

"The virtue and ability of this gentleman deservedly give to him the confidence of his countrymen; and, with respect to political affairs, this confidence derives additional influence from the zeal and decision with which he supported the adoption of the Constitution.

"It is not possible to suppose so good and so enlightened a citizen could be brought to act with the known enemies of the Constitution as to its administration without positive and ample cause, therefore they credit the aspersions with which the measures of Government are charged; and, crediting the allegations, it is not surprising they should act with jealousy, distrust, and occasional enmity toward Government.

"Better would it have been for the harmony and happiness of the United States if Mr. Madison, governed as he is at present, had originally been an opposer of the Constitution.

"I had reckoned on very auspicious effects to the general good from the wise and vigorous measures adopted by the President in crushing the late wicked insurrection.  Truth must at last prevail, and the enlightened freemen of America, though slow to discover the real views of the different parties, will in time perceive with accuracy the distinction which marks them, and will be sure to encircle, with their best affections, the steady and determined friends to order and good government.

"In Kentucky the people are beginning to act after some years' credulous submission, and from the last account from that quartér, the friends to law and the Constitution, as administered, begin to lead in public councils. So it must be here and with you in a few years."

Could there possibly be a wider contrast than the above manly letter, and the sentimental effusion of his son, Robert Lee, the military leader of the slaveholders' rebellion, written to his sister on April 20, 1861, of which the following is a portion :

"The whole South is in a state of revolution, into which Virginia after a long struggle has been drawn, and though I recognize no necessity for this state of things, and would have forborne and pleaded to the end for the redress of real or supposed grievances, yet in my own person I had to meet the question whether I should take arms against my native State. With all my devotion to the Union, and the feeling of loyalty and duty of an American citizen, I have not been able to raise my hand against my relatives, my children, my home."

We return from this digression to the sentiments of the Fathers. The very year of Washington's death the Virginia malcontents loudly grumbled, and then marked out the pathway for Calhoun of the past, and Davis and his followers of the present generation.

The eloquent jurist, Davie, an officer of the Revolution, then a framer of the Constitution, and later in life an ambassador to France, wrote on June 17, 1799 :

"Virginia is the only State of which I despair. My opinions, collected from some gentlemen who have been lately travelling in that State, and others who were at the Petersburg races, present a melancholy picture of that country. These gentlemen returned with a firm conviction that the leaders were determined upon the overthrow of the General Government, and if no other measure would affect it, they would risk it upon the chance of war.

"I understand that some of them talk of 'seceding from the Union;' while others boldly asserted the policy and practicability of 'severing the Union,' alleging that Pennsylvania will join them ; that Maryland will be compelled to change her politics with her situation ; that the submission and assistance of North Carolina was counted on as a matter of course, and that the two Southern States would follow. * * *

"The death of Patrick Henry at this critical period is much to be lamented. Had he lived, I am persuaded he would have convinced the people of Virginia that it was the conduct of the Legislature, not any change in his opinions, that was the proper subject of regret, and over which the patriot would wish to drop a tear that might blot out its memory for ever. Thus the Jacobins affect now to treat his last political opinions."

Why add more? Sufficient has been quoted to show that Washington, Henry Lee, John Marshall, and Patrick Henry believed that allegiance to the United States was supreme, and that incipient treason was prevalent.

But some one may ask, while it may be true that they were in favor of strongly supporting the Government, would they have sympathized with the distinctive act of our late President, the emancipation of slaves in the rebellious States?

We think that to this measure they would have given a cordial support. They knew full well that slavery was an incubus on their prosperity; that it made many improvident negroes and more poor whites, and a few pampered and bloated men, falsely styled aristocrats. They felt the more speedily the system was abrogated the better for all concerned. Hence, to put an end to the slave trade, and at the same time accommodate the prejudices of South Carolina and Georgia, it was provided in the Constitution that slave importations should cease after twenty years.

Mason, the distinguished ancestor of the degenerate descendant, and notorious associate of Slidell in a late rebel embassy at Paris, in his objections to the Constitution of the United States, published in 1787, complained that "the general Legislature is restrained from prohibiting the further importation of slaves for twenty odd years, though such importations render the United States weaker, more vulnerable, and less capable of defence."

Washington not only specially enjoined in his will that all of his slaves should be free, but while living was always ready to aid in effort for their emancipation. Coke, a graduate of Oxford, a doctor of civil law, a presbyter of the Church of England, the associate of Wesley, and first bishop in the United States, thus describes a visit to Mount Vernon in 1785 :

"He received us very politely and was very open to access. He is quite our plain country gentleman. After dinner we desired a private interview, and opened to him the grand business on which we came, presenting to him our petition for the emancipation of the negroes, and entreating his signature if the eminence of his situation did not render it inexpedient.

"He informed us that he was of our senti- ments, and had signified his thoughts on the subject to most of the great men of the State; that he did not see it proper to sign the petition, but if the Assembly took it into consideration would signify his sentiments to the Assembly by letter."

With such opinions, who can doubt that our Fathers, who framed the Constitution, would have been willing not only to fight treason hand to hand, but also to kill slavery for the sake of preserving the Union? If the views of the early patriots of the South had not been carefully concealed, or artfully distorted by ambitious partisan leaders, the world would never have witnessed the terrible delusion which has brought sorrow and crying and penury into so many households.

Believing that they erred from the good old ways of our Fathers, that they were suffering from political insanity, we wrestled with the insurgents as a man with a maniacal brother. The nation did not in Pharisaic pride gloat over their defeat. The words of one, formerly the wife of the owner of a South Carolina slave plantation—a woman who had there learned that slavery was an accursed thing—expressed the feelings of the army and citizens of the United States:

Not with Te Deums loud and wild hosannas

Greet we the awful victory we have won!

But with our arms reversed and lowered banners

We stand—our work is done.

Bleeding and writhing underneath our sword

Prostrate our brethren lie—Thy fallen foe Struck down by Thee, through us, avenging

Lord—

By Thy dread hand laid low.

For our own guilt have we been doomed to smite

These our own kindred, Thy great laws defying;

These our own flesh and blood, who did unite
In one thing only with us, bravely dying.

Dying, how bravely, yet how bitterly!

Not for the better side, but for the worse;

Blindly and madly striving against Thee

For the bad cause, where Thou hast set Thy course.

At whose defeat we may not raise our voice,

Save in the deep thanksgiving of our prayers.

"Lord, we have fought the fight!" but to rejoice

Is ours no more than theirs.

Believing that the mass of the Southern people are now penitent, we continue to bear the palms of victory wrapped in olive leaves; and we are ready in every fair, and regular, and constitutional method to admit them to the privileges purchased by the blood, toil, and treasure of our common ancestors. We hope the day is not far distant when the representatives of the South, recognising the sentiment of the Declaration of Independence, that "all men are free and equal," shall be clothed in their right minds, and sit in Congress with those from the East, and West, and North; when they shall adopt the memorable language of the martyr for the Union, whom they have already learned to honor and will yet learn to love:

"With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace."

From the Spectator.

WOMEN'S TACT.

THE reappearance of Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures in an edition de luxe, with embossed binding, and tinted paper, and illustrations by Mr. Charles Keene, is a curious literary incident. Messrs. Bradbury and Evans seldom make mistakes in their estimate of popular taste, or we should have argued à priori that such a book was certain not to sell. Unmarried men would not buy it, as having small interest for them, and married men would feel a delicate hesitation lest its purchase should be taken as a gentle reproof to their wives. A priori arguments about literature, however, are of very little value, and as a fact, the lectures are among the very few fugitive papers in Punch which have lived for many years. They were published so long ago that few people under thirty-five have seen them, but the tradition of their humour lingers, and will secure their success even in this luxurious form. Women will purchase them as well as men, and the fact that they will, that they can enjoy the humour without feeling it a reproach, explains much of their popularity. Every woman thinks she has tact, and sees, what men often do not, that Mrs. Caudle's defect was not temper, or meanness, or jealousy, or any one of the bad qualities which Mr. Jerrold made so broadly comic, but simply want of tact. Mrs. Caudle is in the right nine times out of ten. It is a great deal better for a decent tradesman to avoid card clubs, and little extravagancies, and flirtations, and over much brandy and water, nor is it very unreasonable to warn him not to neglect wealthy relatives, or to ask him not to forget the children's need of a trip to the sea. That is all Mrs. Caudle does, and women who read it think they could do it all, and yet avoid making themselves as ludicrous as Mr. Jerrold's heroine. She nagged, and nagging is universally useful only with maids. She lost her temper occasionally, and the "suffering-angel dodge" is a very much more effective as well as Christian resource. She chose her time badly, and a very little watchfulness will always prevent that mistake, while she was oh! so vulgar. Her absurdity lay in her want of tact, and how easy, think her feminine readers, to display tact! Is it? That is precisely the point upon which we are not clear. Men, and particularly authors, are very fond of conceding tact to women, and almost all women claim it for themselves, till between the consensus and the assumption a very doubtful assertion has become almost an established fact. Half womankind are doubtful of their ability to govern, but no woman at heart disbelieves her ability to "manage," to rule husbands, and children, and servants, without recourse to authority or lapse into fretful bickering. Sometimes the belief is well founded. In the cases where an able woman marries an able husband it is almost always so, for they choose separate domains, and little frictions can be avoided by that self-restraint which is not strictly tact, but has all its value. In cases where the husband knows his inferiority, or thinks he knows it — a wonderfully common alternative, though repudiated by both sexes — the conviction is also well founded. There is but one authority in the end, and the consciousness that there is but one gives the woman the calm which is the very essence of tact. But apart from those two cases, in each of which the woman is assumed to be able, we question whether the palm of tact belongs to the weaker sex. Average women are quicker to perceive than men, but the quickness is compensated by many disadvantages fatal to the development of tact. Few women, especially in England, are quite as good-tempered as men. They are constitutionally more irritable, lead unhealthier lives, and from a paucity of interests exaggerate more the importance of domestic topics. The loss of an umbrella, about which Mrs. Caudle in one lecture makes such a fuss, really seemed to her something, whereas her husband had his ledger to think of, could even suggest the new purchase which his wife so indignantly repudiates as unheard-of extravagance. The little meannesses of women which men so dislike — though without them every house would be an annexe to the Bankruptcy Court — all spring from a want of perspective very injurious to tact. Women are not really mean, but the household allowance is to them the income, and they think on a false scale. The little thing is treated in such a large way, so often, and at such length, that the man is irritated by the visible disproportion. He will stand being told that he has acted "so like a man" in losing his umbrella, or playing whist a little too high, or taking a second tumbler, and will think the implied rebuke has its justification, but a whole lecture irritates. Men rarely make this mistake, their habitual blunder being to undertone everything, to make too light of Julia's new frock, and Johnnie's symptoms of measles, and the way they waste things down stairs. That is aggravating enough, and shows want of tact on their part also, but it is easier to bear than household exaggeration. For the same reason, too, they seldom lose temper so quickly, the thing not seeming important enough to be out of temper about. Women, again, watch more closely than men, and watching can speak better, hit the sore places when they want to hit them much harder, and they place less restraint on their power. There are men with this dangerous faculty in perfection, nervous men, sympathetic men, who know exactly what each word will do, but then they are seldom cruel, still seldomer forget the unwritten code which among men, but not among women, saves repartee from degenerating into insult, and the majority cannot hit at all. They laugh at their wives' ignorance, who at heart are a little proud to be ignorant compared with them, or accuse them of jealousy, which unless very bitterly done is but a rough caress, or say they are mean, which good women who never think themselves mean enough receive almost as praise. Then men never by any chance try to play suffering angels, the one device which strikes almost all women as so clever, and the use of which of itself proves their deficiency in tact. It yields victory sometimes, but then every such victory is a victory of injustice, and makes the husband think of Mrs. Caudle and nerves him to ultimate rebellion. Somebody, we suppose Mr. Shirley Brooks, has shown that very well in Punch, in the more refined series of Caudle lectures called the "Naggletons." Mrs. Naggleton hits very hard with her tongue, but Mr. Naggleton, who oddly enough is made, by an unconscious exercise of dramatic power, a real rather than a typical "character" — can hit back, and does not mind, and only gets into a rage when his wife resigns herself to her fate. All men get into rages when their womenkind resign themselves, and the fact that women nevertheless continue to resign themselves seems to us to suggest at least a doubt of their superior tact.

The main doubt, however, is this. Almost all women think it indispensable, nay more, even morally right, nay more, an absolute Christian duty, to "manage" the men about them. Sometimes, though very rarely, husband and wife arrive at a real comprehension of each other, which makes all efforts at "management" superfluous, and occasionally, though much more rarely, a mother contrives by aid of her mysterious instinct the necessary rapprochement with her son on most of the relations of life. Not all, for no mother on earth ever escaped the delusion that her son needed "management" about his love affairs and his relations to womenkind generally. Left to himself, without gentle pulls at the curb, and touches of the reins and chirrupings, he would, the mother thinks, be sure to do something silly. But with these exceptions, there is probably in the United Kingdom no woman who in some capacity or other, as wife, or daughter, or betrothed, or housekeeper, or friend, or servant, is not trying consciously to manage some one man. Sometimes the management is very slight and addressed to trivialities, but more frequently it is elaborate, and touches every affair of every day. Many women have a definite theory that in small things men are fools, that to yield or even to compromise on such a point as the arrangement of a party or the distribution of new furniture is simply to allow the male person to do something silly, or extravagant, or in bad taste. There never was a great female artist, but there also was never a wife who did not believe she had a better eye for colour than her husband. Out of the studio Rubens' wife would have laughed to herself at his choice of hangings for her dais. Many more really desire, very reasonably, to have in the little things of life the "way" which is refused in greater things, and think "management" the easiest way to obtain it. But the main cause of all this waste of power is a want of comprehension, leading to a deficiency of tact. Average women very often indeed do not comprehend average men. You will see a couple live together for thirty years, and the wife during all that time never comprehend why her husband does this or that, why he wants cards, why he likes that oppressive friend, what is his inducement to occasional whimsies, why he cannot, as Mrs. Caudle puts it, be content "with his comfortable fireside," why, above all, he things the little Evangelicalisms or Puseyisms which seem to her almost divine so very mean and petty. Why is he, for example, so impatient under that sweet vicar, who seems to her to be uttering such melodious truth? It is not one woman in a hundred who can comprehend a theological proposition — just ask a knot of she-curates what they mean by baptismal regeneration or prevenient grace — but in the English middle class there is scarcely a woman who does not accuse her husband, who has probably worked out his theology as thoroughly as his politics, of thoughtlessness or inconsiderateness as to religious observance. No woman, for example, has the faintest notion of Scriptural teaching about oaths, or can comprehend why her husband pshawes when she tells him it is a crime to damn some stupid blunderer. Thousands of married women really think that the club is a device for getting away from them. Thousands more, particularly of women brought up without fathers or brothers, fail all their lives to catch the special points in the idiosyncrasy of the men they love, on which if they want happiness they must be tolerant, rage against petty habits such as smoking, fret at small lawlessnesses such as late hours, and think in their hearts that safety for both depends on their own shrewd tact and gentle management. They think it by some strange faculty peculiar to themselves, even while they think the victim all the while first of his sex, defer to him, and love him hard. The woman who will implicitly trust her husband in a bold stroke for fortune or ruin will watch, and plan, and wheedle, and pout to avoid his giving a guinea too much for a toy she deems a caprice. When she is a lady, she cautions, and plans, and hints, when a Mrs. Caudle, she lectures, and in either case shows deplorable want of tact. For men, in all else thicker-witted than women, are in this keener of appreciation, and perceive and resent "management" as they do not resent counsel. Let any woman who doubts it mark how her husband receives an unpleasing remark from a friend and from herself, and then cogitate whether his reasonableness in one case and unreasonableness in the other might not be due to tact.

Suppose Mr. Prettyman had wished to advise Caudle not to bail a friend, he would have done it in five "chaffy" words; Mrs. Caudle does it in a lecture; but which is the more effective, the more full of tact?

NATURE AND PRAYER.

BY THE REV. J. LEWELYN DAVIES.

THE prayer appointed for use in our churches with reference to the cattle plague and the cholera, appears to have fallen upon a susceptible state of the public mind like a spark upon tinder. It is evident that many thoughtful persons have been much exercised in mind by questions relating to prayer. Not unwilling to pray, they have shrunk from praying blindly. They have wished to feel assured that they could pray reasonably, and without stultifying convictions upon which a main part of their life is built up. Old difficulties and perplexities about prayer have revived, and have assumed what has appeared for the time a more formidable aspect. And whilst these anxieties have been stirring in the minds of the thoughtful, that portion of the religious world which is not troubled by doubts has been disposed to push the use of prayer with a certain importunity, and in a spirit of latent, if not professed, antagonism. There are always people ready to seize with eagerness what they regard as an opportunity "to rebuke the infidel notions of the day." Most likely a strong and early pressure was brought to bear upon the Archbishop and the Ministry to induce them to appoint a public prayer against the cattle plague. "What are the clergy and the authorities doing," I was asked, "that we have no prayer issued for deliverance from the cattle plague?" I expressed a doubt whether the calamity had reached a magnitude which called for so special an act. "Oh, but," the answer was, "it is so important to take these things in time!" The appointment of a prayer which was to be looked to as a kind of a mechanical prophylactic did not seem to me a thing much to be desired; and probably a similar distaste was similarly excited in others. When the prayer came, it certainly was not peculiarly felicitous, but it was not unlike other prayers of the same kind. It was welcome, I fully believe, to a large number of pious persons, who had been very much alarmed by the reports of the disease, and who thought it right that we should publicly deprecate the terrible visitation which had begun to afflict us. But, on the other hand, it excited an almost angry outburst of protest and criticism. Fault was found with details of the prayer, in a tone which shewed plainly that those who found it disliked the whole before they quarrelled with the parts. Then followed reflection and questioning. "If this prayer is wrong, what kind of prayer is right?" Objections have been gravely and even reverently raised; attempts have been made to meet those objections. Laymen have come forward to say that, while they felt that some ordinary kinds of prayer could not be defended in the face of science, and must be abandoned, they yet could not consent to give up prayer altogether. Reasons have been given for discriminating between one kind of prayer and another; and it has also been seen, as is common in similar cases, that those who have given up certain beliefs in deference to argument, think they have thereby purchased right to live unmolested by argument in what they retain.

Every one is aware of the ground upon which prayer is commonly objected to at the present time. The uniformity of nature, it is said, makes it impossible that any prayers having for their object a variation in the course of nature should be effectual. The laws of nature, according to all true observation, are constant. There is no greater or less in the matter. To ask that a single drop of rain may fall, is as contradictory to science as to ask that the law of gravitation may be suspended. Prayer, therefore, having reference to anything which comes within the domain of natural laws, is forbidden by modern science.

It would be the rashness of mere ignorance and folly to enter the lists against science, or against that principle of the uniformity of nature which is at once the foundation and the crowning discovery of science. Science has been so victorious of late years, and has been adding so constantly to the strength of its main positions, that it is scarcely safe to doubt anything which is affirmed by cautious and scientific men as a fact within their own domain. But when, from the proper and recognised conclusions of science, inferences are drawn which affect the spiritual life, and threaten destruction to what we have been accustomed to regard as most precious, it cannot be complained of if we scrutinize those inferences carefully. If there is a region of genuine mystery, into which the science of phenomena is pushing forward its methods too confidently, it may be forced to retire, not indeed by spiritual intimidation, but by the opposition of realities to which it is self-compelled to pay respect.

Now the affirmation of the uniformity of nature, when pressed logically against the utility of prayer, seems to me either to prove too much or to prove nothing. We may be permitted to ask this question, Does the constancy of the laws of nature imply that the course of nature is absolutely fixed, or not?

It is surely conceivable that the negative answer might be given to this question. For the experience of every hour, of every minute, seems to show, that the actual course of nature may be altered without the slightest interference with any law of nature. Shall I blow out the candle before me, or not? It seems to me that I may do it or refrain from doing it as I please. In either case, no law of nature is violated. In either case, interminable consequences follow my choice. The whole course of nature will be different if I do it from what it would be if I did not do it. The voyage of discovery of Christopher Columbus was at one time apparently within the domain of human choice. He might not have sailed; he did sail; and what prodigious results have followed, in the ordinary course of nature, as we say, from his enterprise! If this variableness of the course of nature be admitted, it is clear that the constancy of natural laws interposes no obstacle to an efficacy of prayer without limit. There may be other reasons why human prayer should not avail to change the course of nature, but the absolute inviolability of law will not be a reason. For, in the first place, prayer may be conceived as taking effect through human wills. In a vast proportion of cases, the objects for which we have prayed might be accomplished through human agency. The cattle plague might be neutralized by the discovery of a remedy, by the adoption of hitherto neglected sanitary precautions, and by other means which ingenuity might imagine as operating through the minds of men. If any persons have a conviction that our praying could not lead to any quickening of human intelligence, or to any invigoration of human effort, they would hardly express that conviction by saying that the laws of external nature are too constant to allow it. With regard to all that may be done through human volition, the existence of fixed laws of nature is manifestly no hindrance to its being done.

The interference of mind and will with the course of nature is no doubt more intelligible to us as taking place through human action, than if we transcend human action. But we are now speaking of possibility, in a strict logical sense. And, although we are entirely ignorant how the Creator can change the course of nature otherwise than through man, it seems clearly unreasonable to affirm that such other interference is impossible, because we know nothing about it. If there are invisible beings in the universe, why should they not have some power of acting upon the course of nature? So far as analogy is any guide, the fact that we, by our volitions, can alter the course of things without violating laws, would suggest a presumption that the same thing can be done in other ways of which science simply knows nothing, and about which imagination cannot with much advantage exercise its power of conjecture. It is conceivable therefore that prayer relating to definite physical ends might be answered, without the appearance of the slightest departure from the ordinary course of nature.

If, then, the constancy of natural laws be so interpreted as to admit of indefinite variations, through free volition, of the course of nature, that constancy proves nothing against prayer.

If, however, it be interpreted to mean that by the operation of cause and effect the course of nature is so fixed that no change in accordance with human thought or desire can possibly take place in it, the argument proves too much. If the tremendous doctrine of necessity be called in at all, it is unscientific to apply it partially. If in the face of a fixed and necessary course of things prayer becomes an absurdity, how much else becomes absurd also! Everything properly human ceases to be rational, till we are reduced to the deadeast fatalism. If a philosopher says to me, "How can you think that by your prayers you can divert universal nature from its preordained course?" I think I reply rationally by asking, "How can I suppose that by any acts of mine, any more than by any prayers, I can alter the unalterable?" If the assertion, "It is of no use to pray against the cattle-disease or the cholera," be based upon the fact that effect follows cause with unvarying uniformity, the same reason would lead us on to the further assertion, "It is of no use to do anything against the cattle-disease or the cholera."

Let us consider what will have to be given up, if prayer for physical benefits be condemned on the ground of the uniformity of nature. Prayer for spiritual blessings can hardly be retained. Are not spiritual things mixed up inextricably with physical? Spirit acts upon outward things; outward things act upon the spirit. Fever is raging in a swampy district. The owner, feeling it to be his duty to try and subdue it, and learning that he might probably do so by draining it, cuts a drain. The place becomes wholesome. Then the moral tone of the population also rises. The children become brighter, more intelligent, more moral. A great spiritual gain is secured, by the enlightenment of one man acting through a physical improvement. Can it be said that visible things are subject to law, spiritual things to no law? Neither the philosopher nor the Christian could acquiesce for a moment in such a distinction. If, then, a mother is forbidden, by reason, to pray for the restoration to health of her child, can she reasonably pray that it may grow up wise and virtuous? Again, thanksgiving appears to be correlative to prayer. If we are to regard everything that happens as fixed by a predetermined order, we shall be bound to repress all special promptings to gratitude. There may remain perhaps a certain sense of admiration of the course of things as a whole, — modified, one would expect, by a good deal of dissatisfaction, — but what we commonly mean by thanksgiving must disappear. Again, deliberate effort to accomplish any end is stultified. If a man were betrayed into it by the singular instinct which haunts us, the recollection of the true philosophy would make him smile at himself as a fool. And lastly, he would learn to be ashamed of desire and hope. Only those who have not been taught the unalterableness of the course of things can be weak enough to indulge a wish or a hope concerning the future. What will be will be: and there is an end of it. Motives, aims, hopes, may be included as blind instincts in the great scheme, but they cannot be properly rational; they cannot justify themselves to the enlightened understanding. They must share the fate of prayer. They are instinctive — so is prayer. Prayer is not rational — no more are they.

It would seem, then, that the unalterableness of nature, if it is allowed to condemn prayer, must go on to extinguish everything that we call human. And this argument, if it is sound, would no doubt be generally accepted as a reductio ad absurdum, conclusive for refutation. A reductio ad absurdum, however, is always more annoying to an opponent, than really satisfying or instructive. It ought hardly to be used except where strict logic is professed on the other side. That is so in the present case. And we might desire to meet as summarily as possible an assumption which holds up to contempt a large part of all the utterances which human souls in their earnestness and their anguish have offered up, and still offer up, at that Throne of Grace before which they have been invited to prostrate themselves. But the most important bearing of this argument is that it leads us to lay stress upon the affinity between Prayer and rational Desire.

"Prayer is the soul's sincere desire, uttered or unexpressed." All Christians have been ready to accept this as a principle of devotion. But may we not find, in the definition, that prayer is desire looking upwards, a useful guide as to the conditions of reasonable prayer? If desire, by looking upwards, becomes prayer, then we have a real basis for prayer before we come to consider its efficacy. We have it even before we have provided ourselves with any solution of the mystery of God's providence. What we do require, as an antecedent condition of prayer, is the confession of a living God, whose creatures we are, and in whose presence we stand. Then the simple affection of desire for this or that, by being the affection of a man who remembers God, and knows his relation of dependence and subjection to God, grows into a prayer. A man who desires, in his true consciousness as a creature and child of God, also prays. Supposing this ideal condition to be realized, whatever modifies the desire will modify the prayer; and whatever modifies the prayer will modify the desire.

This view of the nature of prayer would have two important negative effects: — 1. It shuts out the use of prayer as a kind of spiritual machinery. The plausible representations of what has been gained by praying, which are often made use of to stimulate the devotions of religious persons, have a tendency to become thoroughly offensive to a reverent mind. We cannot pray rightly, if we resort to prayer simply as an expedient for obtaining what we want. 2. It protests against the divorce of prayer from exertion. Instead of being a substitute for effort, or a supplement to it, prayer is seen to be a kind of natural breath of effort. And the man whose energies are most simply roused in pursuit of any object, will be the man to pray most earnestly.

But how does this view, that prayer is the Godward aspect of desire, bear upon the question, What boons may we reasonably ask for from God? It suggests, I think, the following principles.

1. We cannot reasonably either desire or ask for anything, except subordinately to the greater desire that God's will, and not ours, may be done. We are sometimes afraid, I suspect, that the full statement of this principle may damp the ardour of prayer. We apprehend the easy objection, "What is the sense of asking God to do His own will?" But let us bear in mind that the same principle applies to wishing. Can I deliberately desire that God should give up His will for mine? Suppose I earnestly desire, — say that my church should be crowded by reverent and teachable hearers. And suppose a Divine voice to ask, "Do you wish this, whether it be in accordance with my will or not?" How monstrous and shocking an idea it would be that I could wish it apart from its being God's will! There is no difference, then, in this respect between praying and wishing. Eager importunate entreaties and desires will no doubt be checked by the habitual consciousness of the perfection and power of the Divine will. So far as reasoning goes, we might probably expect that such a consciousness would tend to the extinction of desire and prayer altogether. But experience seems to prove that a constant remembrance and worship of God's will does not quench desire, but rather keeps it alive. Whatever be the effect of it, we must take the consequences without reservation. If we can only say other prayers heartily on condition of not saying always, "Thy will be done," we must keep to this prayer and give up the rest. On this point no doubt or compromise can be admissible.

2. A second principle will be, that we should yield without resistance to the instinct of modesty in making particular requests. It is here that our increased knowledge of the laws of nature and the interdependence of all phenomena should tell upon us. Occurrences which primitive ignorance never dreamed of as being other than partial and limited, are known to us as having the widest bearings and connections. To wish that this or that phenomenon should occur to suit our convenience, when we know that it must have other and far more important consequences than those which concern us, would seem ridiculously arrogant. We ought not to shut our eyes to the influence which this consideration may exert upon the character of our prayers. That influence will vary with the knowledge and with the habit of mind of different persons, and is sure to be increasingly great. But, whilst our prayers go hand in hand with our wishes, I think we need not fear for our prayers. We must be content to trust our human nature in the hands of its Maker. If it be His will that we should arrive in a state in which desires for particular things have become extinct, it is not for us to try to arrest our progress towards that state. But, on this point, it would be rash to speak confidently as to the future. At the present time, I imagine it cannot be doubted that cultivated minds, and especially those which are familiar with the study of the complicated and orderly processes of nature, instinctively shrink from allowing themselves in deliberate desires for external occurrences, which are not within the apparent scope of human effort. There is indeed a less scrupulous kind of feeling, somewhat different from desire, of which the natural expression is, "I should be glad if such or such a thing were to happen." Of this I am not speaking as being co-ordinate with prayer, but of that which would lead a man to say, "I long for this or that to come to pass." A philosopher's desires of this nature (though I believe he will not be without them), will certainly be different from a child's; and it seems reasonable to apply to the growth thus to be observed the words of St. Paul, "When I was a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things."

3. Besides this growth in what I have called modesty — the philosopher's modesty in the presence of the outward world — there is another kind of growth, more properly belonging to the Christian, which will tend towards the same result: I mean the increasing spirituality which should characterize our desires and our prayers. Every one would concur in the statement, that, as a Christian advances in godliness, his mind will be set less on outward things, and more on the things pertaining to the kingdom of God. In all records of the aspirations of devout men, we observe that their genuine longings have been spiritual, and that physical good things have seemed hardly worthy of their prayers. And this answers to the teaching of our Lord — as in the Sermon on the Mount, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you;" and "If ye, being evil, give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him!"

It is not enough to say that the spiritual Christian will not pray earnestly for temporal good things for himself, but will think more of being enlightened, purified, and brought into fellowship with God. His feeling will be similar when he thinks of those in whom he is interested. For them, also, he will not be careful to ask physical blessings; he will most earnestly desire their spiritual good. Nor will the case be different when it is a community — a Church or a nation — which prays, and not an individual. In proportion as we know what is best, and understand the dependence of inferior blessings upon the higher gifts of spiritual life, we shall pray that light may be given us, and righteousness, and mutual harmony, and self-control, and power to aid other nations and Churches, more earnestly and with more satisfaction than we shall pray for an abundant harvest or for a new development of trade.

It doubtless has occurred to the recollection of the reader that, in thus exalting spiritual objects as the proper objects of our prayers, we are but following the example which our Saviour expressly gave us to follow, when He said, "After this manner pray ye," and then recited the prayer in which we ask the Heavenly Father of all to cause His name to be hallowed, His kingdom to come, and His will to be done, before we speak of ourselves at all; and then only pray that our daily bread may be given us — this bread itself including unquestionably spiritual food — and pass on to petitions for forgiveness and for deliverance from the dominion of the evil one.

If our prayers be in their nature strictly co-ordinate with our desires, and if both our prayers and our desires should be governed by these principles, — that in all we wish for or ask we should be careful (1) to cherish a willing submission to the Divine will, (2) to bear in mind our own insignificance in relation to the natural order, and (3) to lift up our aspirations to spiritual objects, it will assuredly follow that petitions for physical objects of desire will become less and less acceptable to us, and will tend to disappear from our habitual prayers. Our feeling about them will probably be that they belong to an early stage of spiritual and intellectual growth, in which they are natural and wholesome; but that they are scarcely suitable to adult age. But we shall continue to pay deference to instincts and necessities of nature; and, when the pressure of suffering and alarm extorts a longing and an appeal, we shall not pronounce in the name of either reason or religion that the appeal shall not take form in words of prayer addressed to the Father or the Saviour. If we are to cry out at all, it is in every way best that we should cry to God. An earthly parent might desire that the wishes and requests of his little child should gradually be disciplined by knowledge; but he would not repulse the child, and bid him carry elsewhere than to him his childish petitions. Unless our relation to God in heaven be altogether a fiction and a delusion, it is impossible that He should not desire that our deepest feelings should be turned in trust towards Him. And, to those who contend that laws of nature make such appeals unreasonable, we have a right to say, "You, who tell a mother that it is useless for her to pray for the recovery of her sick child, tell her also that the longing she cannot suppress is an illogical anomaly: you, who say that a nation, in the agony of a struggle, should not ask God to bless its arms, say also that all the yearning sentiment which is roused into life by the struggle is futile and irrational."

It is right to state plainly the conclusion, from which some perhaps might shrink, but which seems to follow from the above considerations, that the forms which prayer may take, as they must be unimportant in the eyes of God, are also comparatively of little importance for us. The spirit of prayer is that which is really acceptable to God, and therefore really efficacious. That spirit may find expression only in unspoken groanings. It may address petitions to God as unreasonably as when a child asks for the moon. "We know not what we should pray for as we ought." But the prayer will be weighed and estimated, not by its form, but by its essence. There is some danger, let it be admitted, in what may be called the laxity of such a view concerning the utterances of prayer. But we cannot avoid danger, though we may in some degree guard against it. And, in the deeper matters of faith and worship, the true view generally seems to be that which is not unreasonably suspected of being dangerous.

And, though it is right to speak decidedly of the comparative unimportance of forms of prayer, it does not by any means follow that they are entirely unimportant; still less that we can dispense with them. It should be regarded as a solemn duty — and it is one which easily commends itself to the conscience and the judgment — to throw the spirit of supplication into the most rational forms which our knowledge enables us to create. It is surely a mistake to force ourselves to pray for things which do not impress us as fit objects of deliberate desire. Liberty in this respect should be allowed to individual consciences; and at the same time it might be hoped that tolerance, a reverent tolerance unmixed with contempt, should be shown by more cultivated and philosophical minds towards the humbler prayers of the more ignorant.

For they who recognise in any degree the nature and relation of man as a son of God can scarcely fail to admit, that it is well for a man to bring all his thoughts, whatever they are, into the presence of his unseen Father. It is better, a thousand times better, that he should put the most foolish and irrational desires into prayer, than that he should throw himself into the same desires without remembering God. Not that no praying can be bad. Prayer may be bad, it can hardly be good, when it is addressed to a capricious being, to a tyrant who may be coaxed or soothed or bribed, in order to obtain some private advantage. And there is room for earnest thought and endeavour in the effort to keep the image of the Fatherly will of God pure and clear before the mind. But, if it be remembered who and what God is, then, I think, it may be said without limit, it is good for a man to bring all his desires to God and to turn them into prayers, that God Himself may teach him what desires are worthy of a child of His, and from what he needs to be purged.

After all, I may seem to have evaded the question as to the efficacy of prayer. Can we expect that God will do what we ask any the more for our asking? Are we ready to bring this question to the practical test of experiment? I confess to a shrinking from such an inquiry, as from one which it is neither reverent nor useful to prosecute. But that this feeling may not be reasonably attributed to the consciousness of a bad case, we are bound to try to justify it. Let due consideration, then, be given to the fact, that prayer, when it comes to be regarded as efficacious — that is, as a machinery for securing results — is beginning to pass into a hurtful and irreverent superstition. No doubt we here confront a paradox. We are taught to believe in the efficacy of prayer; we may be satisfied that prayers have brought down definite blessings from heaven: but, the moment we begin to act in a business-like manner upon a theory of the efficacy of prayer, we cease to pray acceptably. This, let it be borne in mind, is not a mere makeshift of an argument, introduced to cover a weak point; it is a first principle in the doctrine of prayer. If, therefore, specific fulfilments were fixedly or even abundantly assigned to human prayers, a great evil would almost inevitably be created. Prayer would cease to be, in the deepest and truest sense, the prayer of faith, and would become the prayer of cal-culatation; and the spirit of it would evaporate. I should be sorry to say that no good is done by appeals to instances of prayers answered by direct gifts; we have some such appeals in Scripture. But I think a reverent mind must experience some shock to its delicacy from a contact with such appeals; I can almost imagine that it would rather hear nothing of such answers. It scarcely raises our idea of the character of God, to be told that He has caused some little thing to come to pass just because So-and-so asked Him. What we want to feel assured of is, that God hears our prayers; that if we pour out our hearts before Him in childlike hope, He is pleased, and helps forward the cause into which we have thrown our sympathies. In this way, we may thankfully believe that our prayers are always efficacious. And, inasmuch as very little matters enter into the scheme of God's Providence, and are to be deemed worthy of the Infinite Being because He is infinite, we may also venture to take comfort from any incidents which come to us like signs that God has heard us, and to read answers to our prayers in the most ordinary occurrences of life.

POSTSCRIPT. — The following sentences occur at the end of an essay by Professor Tyndall, on the Constitution of the Universe, in the Fortnightly Review for December 1st, which has appeared since the above pages were written: — "Prayer, while it is thus impotent in external nature, may react with beneficent power upon the human mind. That prayer produces its effect, benign or otherwise, upon him who prays, is not only as indubitable as the law of conservation itself, but it will probably be found to illustrate that law in its ultimate expansions. And if our spiritual authorities could only devise a form in which the heart might express itself without putting the intellect to shame, they might utilise a power which they now waste, and make prayer, instead of a butt to the scorner, the potent inner supplement of noble outward life." This unspeakable gain, then, which we should all alike desire, is made dependent by Professor Tyndall upon the devising of some new form of prayer, — whether by our spiritual authorities or by others would not, I presume, be of any consequence. I wish he had given us at least some hint which might help us to conceive what the nature of such prayer, satisfying both to the heart and the intellect, would be. It seems natural to suppose that he had in his mind some idea, — if only a vague, undefined idea, — of a possible prayer. But, as his words now stand, he ascribes an extremely high value to prayer, condemns the prayers hitherto devised, and gives no help towards discovering the right kind of prayer. If he is satisfied with any, existing type — say with that of the Lord's Prayer, which has been largely imitated in the Christian Church — it would have been more natural to ask our spiritual authorities to abstain from devising new forms, than to represent so vast a good as depending upon their power to devise another form. And the whole passage suggests a doubt whether "the man of science" would consider a prayer for moral or spiritual good consistent with science. Mr. Tyndall does not contrast "external nature" with the realm of the spirit. He knows that the two cannot be severed: indeed, he intimates that the reflex effect of prayer upon the mind — as spiritual a process as we can imagine — will probably be found to illustrate that law of the conservation of energy which makes prayer impotent in external nature; and therefore it is clear that he would include spiritual relations within "the economy of nature."

I gladly recognise however that Professor Tyndall does not teach that we must pray for the sake of the benefit we derive from the act of praying. He would admit, I am sure, that the only prayer which can possibly produce a "benign" effect upon him who prays is the lifting of a voice "as unto One that hears." He desiderates a genuine prayer, but one that will not aim at affecting the course of nature.

The question I would again ask is this: Whether, in using the unchangeable economy of nature to condemn prayers for physical objects, philosophers are not really assuming a system of fatalism, and binding down the free action of spirit under a fixed mechanical necessity? If this is so, the controversy might as well ascend at once from the discussion of forms of prayer to a still higher region.

MY DERVISH LIFE.

IN the evening of the 27th March, 1863, my noble patron, the Turkish ambassador in Teheran, received me at his table for the last time before my departure. It was said (but this, of course, was only to frighten and dissuade me from my adventurous scheme) that I was, on this occasion, for the last time in my life to partake of European fare, served up in European fashion. The elegant dining-room at the hotel of the Embassy was brilliantly illuminated, the best dishes were placed before the guests, the best wines were passed round; they wanted, in short, to send me forth on my arduous journey haunted by recollections of European comforts. My friends sought all that evening to trace in my features some traitorous indications of the excitement within. They were, however, greatly out in their anticipations. In a state of ecstatic enjoyment I lay buried in my silk-velvet arm-chair.

Twenty-four hours afterwards, in the evening of the 28th March, I was in the middle of my mendicant associates, on my journey to Sari. We had taken refuge in a half-ruined mud hut, named Dagarn. The rain fell in torrents. Tolerably well soaked, we hastened, all of us, to shelter ourselves under the dry roof. The space was small, and it was my destiny this very first evening to find myself in the closest contact with my travelling companions, whose tattered clothes, giving out at no time any very fragrant odours, in their present wet condition emitted a vaporous steam really curious to observe! It was not, then, surprising under such circumstances, that I had little desire to assail the large wooden dish from which the famished Hadjis extracted and devoured their supper, splashing about as they did so with their hands in the common receptacle. Besides, I was at the moment less tormented by the pangs of hunger than exhausted with fatigue and uneasy in my wet dress of rags, to which habit had not yet made me familiar. Huddled together in a ball on the ground, I sought to abandon myself to sleep; but sleep in such confined space was impossible. Now I felt my neighbour's hand, now his head, whirled over me; at another time it was the foot of a vis-à-vis which was extended to scratch me behind my ear. With the patience of a Job I had to defend myself against all these offices of questionable amiability. I might even then have contrived to snatch some moments of slumber, had it not been for the snoring dialogue kept up by the Tartars, and more especially for the loud cries of suffering that a Persian mule-driver, afflicted with rheumatism, emitted in his agony.

Finding all attempts to close my eyes fruitless, I extricated myself from the midst of the heap of human beings spread around in chaotic confusion, and set myself upon my legs. The rain continued to fall, and looking out into the deep and troubled obscurity I thought of where I had been twenty-four hours previously, and of the sumptuous parting entertainment at the splendid hotel of the Turkish Embassy. All seemed to me like a dramatic representation of the "King and the Beggar," in which I was myself playing the principal part. The sentiment of reality produced, however, upon me not so bitter an impression, for was I not master of the position? was I not he who had worked this sudden metamorphosis? had not I myself imposed my fate upon myself?

The task of conquering my own feelings, however hard, did not occupy me more than a few days. With respect to externals, I soon made myself familiar with all the attributes, movable and immovable, of the state of Dervish — its filth and other etceteras. The best garment that I had brought with me from Teheran, I presented as a gift to a poor infirm sick Hadji, and this act of beneficence won me the hearts of all. My new uniform consisted of a felt jacket, worn by me without any shirt, close to my skin, and a Djubbe (upper garment)* tied round my loins by a cord. I had enveloped my feet in rags, and covered my head with an immense turban; the latter served me as a parasol by day, and as a bolster by night. Like the rest of the Hadjis, I slung around me a sack by way of cartouche-box, containing a voluminous Koran; and then contemplating myself thus accoutred for grand parade, I felt authorized to cry out proudly, "Verily, I am a beggar born."

The external, the material part of my "disguise," was easy. The moral, the inner part, presented more difficulty than I had contemplated. For many a long year I had had occasion to study the contrast between European and Asiatic modes of existence; the critical position in which I was forced me to be on my guard, and yet I could not help committing many gross blunders. It is not merely in language, features, and dress that essential differences exist between the two races. We Europeans eat, drink, sleep, sit, and stand otherwise than the Orientals, — nay, I might even say, we laugh, cry, and wink differently. These are little points, evident at once to the senses, and still difficult enough of imitation: and yet what is the difficulty of surmounting them, in comparison with the trouble that it costs to metamorphose sentiments and feelings! One is always more excited and observant, and more disposed to play the critic, during journeys than on other occasions of everyday life; it requires an unspeakable effort for an European to conceal the curiosity, wonder, and other emotions which the contemplation of the all-indifferent, the energiless Oriental excites in his mind. The object, however, of the journey of my friends was to reach their homes; my object was simply the journey itself. The peculiarity of my character interested them only in the first moment of approach, theirs on the other hand was an object of continual study to me; certainly the idea never could have occurred to any one amongst them, that my mind was employed upon a twofold task, even when we were jesting and chattering in the most familiar terms of companionship.

Any one who has the smallest practical or theoretical experience of the East will understand how hard it is to adapt oneself to these remarkable idiosyncrasies. The happy result that attended my "disguise" may appear surprising, but still not a subject of extraordinary astonishment, when I lay before the reader the key to the secret in the following observations.

First. Only one of my travelling companions had ever seen Europe or had to do with Europeans: this was Hadji Bilal, who may perhaps have known a few Greeks or Armenians passing for French. Even Stambul, and the mode of living amongst the Stambuli, were but imperfectly known to them. My transgressions against custom and usage did not pass unobserved, but met with the ready excuse: "Stambul kaidesi sundeik iken." "It is the custom at Constantinople." They regarded, therefore, the particular offence as a mere solecism.

Secondly. The consciousness of the imminent danger that threatened me when once beyond the circle of my companions, disposed me to make the greatest sacrifices. I soon was aware of the high value of their friendship, and did everything I could to win it. In spite of my admitted superiority to them from being a Mollah, no one in the Karavan, in purse, clothes, or food, was poorer or worse off than myself. I submitted to all, and was ever ready to render a service or do an obliging act; and as they really all were at bottom straightforward and honest men, I saw at once that they

Thirdly. And this perhaps may be regarded as the main cause: my poverty and my bodily infirmity beyond dispute were my principal safeguards. Amongst the Turkomans, and especially in Etnek, the Hadjis not being in much respect, I ran considerable risk; but at the current market rate for slaves of inferior class, I was hardly worth more than three ducats—not so valuable, in fact, as a stout ass. I could only be used by private individuals to turn a millstone or take charge of camels: trivial services these, hardly on the one side worth the cost of my maintenance, and on the other not possessing sufficient force of attraction to tempt the superstitious Nomad to commit a sin. Again, in Bokhara the emptiness of my purse was of more help to me than all the learning of Islamism. My character of Mollah and Devotee made me certainly safe from any public attack, but had I been in the possession of visible property, it would not have secured me from the underhand proceedings of secret enemies. Strangers in Bokhara, objects of suspicion, have in other cases excited cupidity by being known to be possessors of money and other articles of value; whereas I was not only a beggar, but an urgent one, from whose importunities all men carefully sought to escape.

Such were the causes which prevented my disguise from having any evil consequences, and made it happily contribute to the ends I had in view. But every one will understand that whilst I was actually occupied with my journey, I was only half conscious of the efficacy of these causes, and so could not place any entire confidence in them. Habit too enables us to endure a life subject even to constant perils: still it is remarkable how long and violent the struggle is which the soul, in its recklessness and its callousness, maintains with the hope of an existence beyond this world. To guard against every event, it was long before I ventured to make a hearty meal at my supper: for I dreaded lest an overloaded stomach should lead to dreams, and dreams to the utterance of foreign European phrases. I laughed at my pusillanimity, and blamed myself, but still I persisted, particularly in the first months, in my ceaseless measures of precaution.

What pain these phantom terrors occasioned me! how they persecuted me, when I sat alone in the immense desert away from the Karavan devouring my unleavened bread, mixed with ashes and charcoal, and washed down with a few mouthfuls of foul-smelling water,—a refreshment that those thoughts would not even allow me to partake of in repose! “All slumber, no eye beholds thee,” I said to myself. Yet no: the hills of sand in the distance seemed to me to be spies on the watch to catch me omitting the Bismillah, or breaking or eating my bread in other than right Mohammedan fashion.

Often did it happen, and the remark applies particularly to Khiva, that when I was lying all alone in the dark and closed tent, the cry to prayers reached my ears, and made me spring hurriedly up from my couch, and apply myself to the fatiguing operation of the thirteen Rikaat (genuflexions). At the sixth, seventh, eighth, I said to myself, “Surely it is enough, for no eye beholds thee.” Not at all, for I could not divest myself of the idea that prying eyes were regarding me through the crevices, and so I continued until I had conscientiously completed the prescribed number.

Perhaps the expression, “measures of precaution,” may be regarded as inappropriate, and my whole proceedings be ascribed to want of courage. Now I will not deny that, seeing with what suspicion I was at first regarded, and in how wild and anarchical a state Central Asia was, I did not feel in any great spirits for my adventure. But this discouragement did not extend beyond the first month of my disguise. In the others, from the moment when I had turned my back upon Bokhara, I was really metamorphosed into a poverty-stricken Dervish, who, as he himself gradually forgot the assumed part that he was playing, ceased to excite suspicion in the minds of others. When I now, in the centre of European civilisation, reflect upon my position at that time, I cannot refrain from laughing at what habit and necessity were capable of making of me in so short a time. That life of Dervish began even to have charms, it procured me many a moment of great enjoyment. Without feeling any especial aptitude to play the part of the Russian Count who, weary of a life spent in saloons, retreated to one of the valleys of Cashmere, I felt often an inner sensation of satisfaction as I warmed myself to my heart's content in some ruin or other sequestered spot by the temperate beams of the autumn sun. And then it is beyond expression sweet to know that one can, without money, position, or business—and yet free from all care, agitation, and exciting impulse — rock oneself to repose in the soft cradle of Oriental indifference and tranquillity!

Of course for us Europeans such enjoyment must be of brief duration; for let but our thoughts flee away towards that remote West that is ever active and ever moving, and the great contrast of the two presents itself to us in the clearest light. European enterprise and Oriental repose are the two problems that occupy the mind: need we do more than glance at those ruins lying everywhere scattered in the East, to see on which side is the true philosophy? Here everything tends to destruction and slavery; there, to prosperity and world-wide dominion!

But these enjoyments of the "state of Dervish" were in my case prevented, by my strong European temperament, from being more than short-lived and transitory. My disguise, however, furnished me with another of a far more elevated description — the enjoyment, I mean, derived by me from being able, as an accomplished Dervish, to hold free and unconstrained intercourse with those strange nations. Was it an innate talent, or a particular predilection for the status, which enabled me soon to outstrip in Fakirship even my preceptor in the art? I know not. When in the cities or amongst the Nomads I undertook the part of levying contributions, my friends felt at once assured that I would return with my bags well crammed. Of the tribes of Central Asia the Ozbegs, from their straightforward and honest natures, possess hearts most accessible and most easily won. At one house in the vicinity of Khiva, where I spent several days, they tried even forcibly to detain me; nay, even to marry me — at least, the head of the family, representing his daughter, had already made me a declaration of love. The honest, unsuspicious people saw, as they thought, in me a poor Garib (stranger) whom his passion (arman) impelled forth into the wide world, and so they took a real interest in my fortunes. In their opinion the travelling Dervish is a sort of wandering Jew in miniature, in whose ear some spirit abiding within keeps whispering those ominous words, "On, on!" and who can never rest until he has reached the goal prescribed by fate.

This childish simplicity, these characters and manners, which have remained in stereotype there for so many years, one might even say for thousands, have left upon my soul ineffaceable impressions. After being with the Nomads some hours, they often began to converse with me in the most confidential tone of the rearing of cattle or some other subject of domestic economy. A husband would speak of the peculiar qualities that distinguished one of his horses, of the sons of the famous chieftain N. N., of the failure of a predatory expedition undertaken by this or that tribe, &c. The wife would question me whether in my country this year the Rugar (a sort of red root) had a similarly pale colour, whether the camel's hair was there as bad, and so on. How little likely such people were to have any notion of the meaning of an academical mission the reader must easily see, and will as easily divine what was the nature of my answers to each particular question!

However incredible the avowal may appear, I will nevertheless make it openly, that the very extraordinary condition in which I found myself during my time of disguise was far from being attended by as much hardship and fatigue as many Europeans may fancy. At this moment, it is true, I find my health somewhat impaired, and my former acquaintances do not affect to conceal from me that I seem grown much older; but during the journey itself I did not experience the slightest sensation of exhaustion or uneasiness, excepting of course when I was suffering from the torments of thirst. Was it the continued state of excitement that lightened the burden which I had to endure; or was it the ever-fresh, free air of the desert that imparted a giant energy to my stomach, enabling it to assimilate and digest such dough kneaded with sand and ashes as even my camel found too bad to touch? This still remains a riddle to me.

Certain, however, it is, that at this moment, in the midst of the civilised life of Europe, I seem somewhat to miss those active movements of body and soul; and who knows if I shall not in my later years dwell often upon that time when, although covered with rags and having no roof to cover me, I tramped sturdily and of good heart through the steppes of Central Asia!

ON THE ENFORCED PAUSES OF LIFE.

It seems that in old Scandinavia there were trolls, or lubber dwarfs, who were always busy; who never knew what it was to repose. A country fellow — as I remember the story, which I quote upon the strength of a child's recollection — employed one of these trolls to assist him in stealing a quantity of wheat from another countryman's barn. "Take a little more, Mr. Troll, take a little more," says the thief, "by-and-by you shall have some rest." So the troll takes a little more, saying, however, "Rest, rest! What is rest?" Off they go, the pair of them, carrying heavy loads of the stolen goods. When they are at a safe distance from the scene of their theft, they sit down for a rest. "Oh," says the troll, "if I had only known how good rest is, I would have brought away the entire barn!"

Most of us know how good rest is, and are ready enough to take it, though not always when we need it: on the other hand, it is sometimes forced upon us in a way that teaches more than one lesson. We find, in the compelled pauses of our lives, that the world can do without us, and that it is a good thing to be occasionally cut off from it. How nice it is to let alone; how nice to be let alone!

Nearly all forms of travelling give us some degree of this kind of feeling. Not, of course, riding in an omnibus, for there is no telling whom you may meet in it; but in some degree riding in a cab, and in a considerable degree, riding on the railway for any distance. In a cab you may lean back so that nobody can see you; and you may shut your eyes upon the hard faces, and squalid dresses, and filthy gutters, and frowzy corners of the streets. Nobody is likely to stop the carriage, — and nobody can stop a train! So that, unless you have unpleasant fellow-travellers, you are comfortably shut up from the rest of the world, with a delicious sensation that there is no drawbridge. It is an old remark that, from a similar point of view, a sea-voyage is delightful. Nobody can knock at the door. If you are ill, nobody can look in, to condole; and how delightful that is sometimes — to escape being reminded that you are not well! On the other hand, you have your own delicious incapacities. You cannot knock at anybody else's door. If something nasty occurs to you, you cannot write it, and post it to a friend — who would be vexed by it. A masterly inactivity is forced upon you. Your whole being lies fallow. Ceasing to plague and to be plagued; knowing that the great world gets on without your fretting and fuming about it; and yet retaining a keen sense of your own vitality, — oh, it must be a pleasant situation. A keen sense of your own vitality you must have, for the mind puts forth an immense fresh elasticity of power in the presence of vast suggestive spaces, and magnificent sights and sounds, such as are round it on the great deep: and yet there is rest, and a triumphant immunity.

The forced repose which accompanies very severe illness, or confinement to the house on a wet day, or the recovery from a swoon, brings with it something of the same soothing effect. In the midst of a heavy personal trouble, or a serious enterprise, which seems to demand the most strenuous effort on your own part, you are suddenly stricken with illness. The oars drop from your hands, and the boat — does it stop? No, thank God, it pulls through, it gets safely past the rapids, and you have to reflect, amid the fretfulness of returning health, what a useless, unimportant fellow you are. Or again. For days past you have been earnestly working your affairs up to a certain point for a certain day, "sharp." Perhaps you have even fixed the hour at which a particular iron shall be hot, and shall be struck by your energetic hand. On that day it comes on to rain, thunder, and lighten so furiously that all the world stays indoors, and you, not being quite well, feel that you must. The next day, you go out with the intention of taking up the broken thread and working it into your scheme, but find that the course of events has superseded your ingenious activity, and your efforts are not required. Not unfrequently the new turn which things have taken is felicitous, but let it be clearly understood that this does not condemn your activity, or show that it could have been spared. It may not appear to have any connection with the result, but you and I do not know quite everything, and there may be a real though invisible connection between things the most remote.

Taking care not to draw the false moral from anything of this kind that happens in our lives, we may yet draw the right one. How much have we all suffered, as some French epigrammatist says, in rhyme, from evils that never occurred! How exaggerated are some of our strivings! Napoleon, as we have all read, used to leave his letters unopened for days, and then find with cynical joy, on breaking their seals at last, that the majority had answered themselves. Of course this might and would happen in more ways than one. For instance, the poor sick man's letter, begging the loan of a sovereign to buy food with, has clearly answered itself, if at the end of a week you find the sick man is dead and are quite sure the widow will not come to ask you for a sovereign towards the funeral expenses. But, in the majority of the instances in which the letters no longer want answering, it is pretty certainly because the writers were over-urgent about things which have arranged themselves without interference. The fact is, we get upon inclined planes in our little affairs, and become heated with the "wind of our own speed," and then of course we exaggerate the consequence of our own efforts, and of what others can do for us. But we must not allow this sort of reflection upon life to suggest the foolish and wicked paradox that indifference stands as good a chance as energy. Nobody who loves the truth ever pushes this suggestion beyond a joke. Drunkards and fools do escape strange pitfalls, and do fall into the laps of easy fortunes: but the very surprise the thing occasions is enough to indicate its place in the classification of events.

Scarcely anything in life is so sweet to me as the repose of Sunday — the soothing suggestions of its devouter offices, its silence, its calm, its immunities. Defoe, when he was in difficulties, was called the Sunday gentleman, because he only went abroad upon the day on which bailiffs had no power; but others, not in difficulties, may be permitted to rejoice in the certainty of being let alone on Sundays. For my part, I have never, since I can recollect at all, awoke on a Sunday morning without a sense of triumph in the quiet hours that were before me. Sunday was always the day on which I rose early, in order to have as much as possible of its peace and sweetness. It is still the same with me. No postman comes to-day, with his double knock. No butcher rings the bell for orders. No carts go clattering through the streets. Even the doctor seems to find less to do. And now, in these soft, unfretted moments, causes of irritation seem less than they did yesterday; we pause upon the momentous step: the bent bow of half-angry energy is relaxed: the mist of passion has time to thin away a little: we come to the end of the gentle day with a pang, and go to bed with a regretful thought that to-morrow is Monday. I say we, feeling sure that my own experience cannot be solitary — but it is mine, and much more keenly mine than the pen can tell you. The influence of an enforced pause in clearing the mind may be great. How often does it happen that we fail to see because we look too hard. We look at the picture, or the landscape; we attack it, so to speak, with our eyes; and we miss the beauty of it. But another day, when we are a little relaxed in our will, the landscape or the picture is permitted to look at us, and the calm receptivity of a languor, enforced it may be by illness, takes in the loveliness we missed when we were at pains to see.

These things are commonplaces of human experience, and to speak of them is not to teach, but to recite what is known. Not less familiar, and not less interesting as a topic of meditation, is the importance of placing a solid block of oblivion, if possible, between any great shock of pain or disappointment, and our next effort. True or not, that is a good story which relates how some one, suddenly overthrown and baffled in his career, told his valet to give him forty drops of laudanum, and let him sleep till he awoke of his own accord. That sounds very like suicide; but the truth is, if short enforced pauses could always be secured, the temptation to suicide would be removed. Believe it who please, I do not believe that the science of anesthetics is even in its infancy, as yet. Not opium nor chloroform, not poppies nor mandragora, not drowsy syrups; but something, something has yet to be won from the secrets of the borderland upon which Psychology and Physiology knock their heads together in the twilight. It is, doubtless, a most shy and recondite something. The mesmerist, the hypnotist, and the magician have not hit it. Nor did that celebrated gentleman, an Indian officer I think, who had acquired the knack of stopping the beating of his own heart, and at last performed the experiment once too often. But when, upon my pronouncing the exquisite word anodyne, some rude fellow speaks of ether on lump-sugar, or an opium pill, I own I feel a little insulted. I did once begin a recipe — Take equal quantities of rippling water, true love, falling rose-leaves, firm faith, sweet music, swan's down — ah! I shall never finish it till some enforced pause in my affairs gives me the requisite leisure. But that so beautiful a word as anodyne must have an equivalent in fact and nature, is so highly probable that one cannot easily relinquish all hope of finding it. Can it lie concealed in the crypt which hides the squared circle, the philosopher's stone, and the elixir of life? There was a charm — but Merlin told it to Vivien in Broceliande! There was a charm — but it was a charm to waken, and not to soothe; so she awoke, and went across the hills with him, leaving the story of her slumber to fascinate the sweet poet: —

“ Well, were it not a pleasant thing
To fall asleep with all one's friends;
To pass with all our social ties
To silence from the paths of men;
And every hundred years to rise,
And leave the world, and sleep again,
To sleep thro' terms of mighty wars,
And wake on science grown to more,
On secrets of the brain, the stars,
As wild as aught of fairy lore;
And all that else the years will show,
The Poet-forms of stronger hours,
The vast Republics that may grow,
The Federations and the Powers; . . .
So sleeping, so aroused from sleep
Thro' sunny decades new and strange,
Or gay quinquennials, we would reap
The flower and quintessence of change.”

There is a too-daring luxury in all this! There is an excess of certainty about it; and yet a terror of uncertainty. As for me, I should never sleep if I knew I was wound up, like an alarm, to wake at a given time. On the other hand, there might be a mistake: the prince might never find his way to the palace. No: my anodyne must be something far simpler. It must be uncertain in the duration of its effects, but it must not last longer than while one might stay in an easy-chair, or in bed, with decency, and without exciting the coroner to hold an inquest. As for sleeping a century, or five centuries — a “gay quinquenniad” — it seems absurd to go to bed for that: one ought to have a proper vault in a cemetery. Let us, as Sydney Smith said, take short views. Nathaniel Hawthorne maintained that what the world at present needed was a nap; and that moderate expression just hits off the purpose for which I want somebody to discover an anodyne. In the meanwhile, I am not always thankful to those who, in their anxiety to “save time,” are skilful in shortening the enforced pauses of life. I am by no means always desirous to make a journey short; on the contrary, I often wish it to last as long as possible; and as for Sunday — if anybody could succeed in turning the one which will dawn to-morrow into a sabbatic year, I should thank him with every pulse of my being.

English Travellers and Italian Brigands. A Narrative of Capture and Captivity. By W. J. C. Moens. In two vols. Hurst and Blackett.

MR. MOENS tells, in this book, of his life among the brigands in the mountains near Salerno, as their prisoner until the payment of the heavy ransom asked for himself and his friend, Mr. Aynsley. The captors having abated of their first demands, the ransom finally paid, in equal shares by himself and Mr. Aynsley, was 5100*l*. Mr. Aynsley, as everybody knows, was the one released to find the gold, for payment of which to the banditti, Mr. Moens was retained as hostage. Here then is a man with a good story to tell. It does not follow as a common law of nature that he happens to know how to tell it; but for the comfort of all who would like to make an honest story about robbers, full of adventure, recent and quite true, part of their Christmas reading, be it known that Mr. Moens does know how to tell his tale. He tells it faithfully and simply.

His preface wins the reader by a reality of tone free from all fanfaronnade of the bookmaker. He disclaims literary pretensions of every sort, only he has something to tell, and has endeavoured, he says, to tell it “as simply as possible.” But he has also friends to thank for sympathy and aid, and these he thanks in his preface genially, adding naturally: “When I calmly reflect upon the truly noble and unselfish acts that have been done in my behalf by so many persons, I feel inclined to rejoice in my past sufferings and misfortunes.” The sufferings were at the time often sore and perilous, but Mr. Moens tells his story without any feeble self-commiseration. His account has the fulness necessary to the giving of a true impression, but there is not a line in the book of fine writing. He has something to say, and says it without waste of energy upon digression into irrelevant facts or far-fetched ideas; and that is the only way to make a good book, whether one do, or whether one don't, lay claim to special literary skill.

Mr. Moens is joined in the telling of his story by the wife, who in her suspense during his days of peril, shared his suffering, and was at the centre of the efforts made for his release.

First, then, it is Mrs. Moens, who tells in a chapter or two how their Italian travel was begun in Sicily. She records what she had heard in Palermo, of the audacity of the Sicilian Banditti, and tells how on the very day after their trip to Monte Pellegrino, a Sicilian gentleman driving with a friend on the same road, was carried off by brigands. From Palermo the travellers went to Messina, Mr. Moens amusing himself with photographing. While they were at Messina there was an eruption of Etna, and Mr. Moens becomes now the diarist of two ascents of Etna. On the second ascent while taking, from Monte Crisimo, an old crater, some photographic views of the two craters that were belching steam and smoke, Mr. and Mrs. Moens were accosted by Sicilian bandits. Seven or eight of them armed with guns, says Mr. Moens, "came and stood close behind me as I had my head under the black cloth, while developing the view of the lava I had just taken; and I do not think a photograph was ever taken under more disturbing influences." However, they preferred learning the travellers' route, and catching them when they had more profitable luggage than a photographic box. Warned next day of the ambush prepared for them, Mr. and Mrs. Moens changed their route, carefully concealing until the last moment the fact that they designed to do so.

Now it is Mr. Moens who tells how they went to Catania, and thence by steamer to Syracuse, where they first met the Rev. J.C. Murray Aynsley and his wife. From Syracuse, by the weekly boat, Mr. and Mrs. Moens and Mr. and Mrs. Aynsley went together to Girgenti. Soon afterwards they left Sicily for Naples, and thence on the 14th of May went by rail to Salerno, for a visit to the ruins of Pæstum, Mr. and Mrs. Murray Aynsley being still in their company. It was between Salerno and Pæstum in a carriage with three horses and jingling bells, and on a road traversed daily by parties visiting the temples, that Mr. Moens and Mr. Aynsley fell among brigands. Two Italian gentlemen had been captured on the same road only a week before, and on the way to Pæstum some Italian soldiers, without giving any warning of a special danger, joined the carriage and rode by its side. One of the soldiers remained with them during the day while Mr. Moens amused himself in taking photographs of the temples. The carriage came, nearly two hours later than it had been ordered, to take the party back to Salerno, and by that time the soldiers were all gone. So they drove homeward, jesting about brigands, and affecting terror at all gloomy corners of the road till they were weary of the subject. Then Mrs. Moens, who is journalist here, fell asleep, and was roused by Mrs. Aynsley's exclamation, "Here really are the brigands at last!" A band of thirty of them pointing their guns, were closing round the carriage from the fields on both sides of the road. They required the two gentlemen in the carriage to come down, and when they had done so gathered about them and marched off with them. Then we read of the anguish of the wives. The brigands had promised to restore their husbands to them in a quarter of an hour. Sometimes, having extorted promises of money, they had liberated captives. The carriage remained on the spot. At the end of a quarter of an hour, there came up a troop of thirty mounted soldiers, to whom the forlorn wives cried, "The Brigands have taken our husbands!" Having learnt which way to go, the soldiers galloped off in hot pursuit. Time passed and the ladies took refuge in a room over the stables of a wretched house, from the curious crowd of excited peasantry; among whom was the village doctor — true Galen of Italy — vehement in his desire that they should let him bleed them.

The diary of Mr. Moens is continued then to the deadly disappointment of seeing Mr. Aynsley return unaccompanied. What story he had to tell is told in the first pages of the diary of Mr. Moens, which now follows, and which begins the very interesting tale of life among Italian banditti. The captain of the band was Gaetano Manzo, and it was not till next day, when he had marched his prisoners, with two others caught in the fields almost at the same time, far from the place of their capture that there was a council held upon the subject of ransom. Says Mr. Moens —

When we heard the sum demanded, we looked at each other with horror — 100,000 ducats, equal to 17,000*l.* After a few minutes' conversation with Sentonio, a tall clumsy ruffian with black eyes, hair, and beard, Manzo reduced it to 50,000 ducats, or 8,500*l.* This sum, we said, was ridiculous, out of the question; but we were told, in spite of our protestations to the contrary, that we had 2,000,000 ducats each, and that we were great lords. We declared it was no use to trust to our wives to raise the money, as they did not speak the language, and that there were few English people at Naples, and no one would trust them as foreigners.

They then agreed to let one of us go for the money, and wanted us to decide which it should be; but we, knowing that whichever offered himself would be kept back, were silent. At last we proposed to draw lots, so I took a small twig and broke it in two pieces, a short and a long piece, and we arranged that the holder of the short one was to remain with the band, and the holder of the longer piece was to go and get the money for both. I took the pieces of wood, and holding out my hand before me, I said to Mr. Aynsley, "Draw." He drew one, and left the other (which was the shorter of the two) in my hand. I must confess I felt as if I had been drawing for my life, and I had lost.

I had to make up my mind to my fate at once. Mr. Aynsley told me he did not know whether he could pay so much. I told him that I could, and that I would advance his half for him till arrangements could be made. I told him to apply to a friend whom I named, a member of the Stock Exchange, for 2,500*l.*, which I had left in his hands. I gave him other little directions, and told him to do all he could for my wife, placing her under his care. Our conversation was interrupted by the captain being called by the sentinel to come and look at about 100 soldiers walking along the road below. After a few minutes Mr. Aynsley and two men, to whom the letters of Luzzo and the other captive were given, were hurried away, Mr. Aynsley having to write to Luzzo's house.

I was put under the charge of four or five men, and ordered off to the rear. I turned round and saw Mr. Aynsley and his two guides walking down the hill. It was a trying moment. I was now driven on at a fast pace, and in a minute heard the report of a gun, the bullet whizzing over my head. This was from the soldiers whom Mr. Aynsley met almost immediately after leaving us. The brigands answered this, and there was a brisk fire. I tried to go off to the right, thinking an escape possible, but was turned immediately; my foot slipped, and I fell down some depth, for the mountain was very steep, and all the stones loose. I was very much shaken, and I thought my arm was broken. I could hardly move it, but I was made to get up, and to the cry "Corre, corre," on we went.

The hill was very high, the base of it covered with fir-trees. I looked up, and saw the rest of the band lining the top of the hill in skirmishing order, firing as fast as they could. The shots of the soldiers now came rattling round us as we passed from bush to bush one by one; and for a quarter of an hour we had to run the gauntlet. At last we got to the bottom of the mountain, where we found a rushing torrent ten yards wide; the fire was too hot for hesitation, so one by one the brigands waded over. I had to follow; on I went, the water up to my waist, rushing, foaming over the stones, and the bullets splashing into it on all sides of me. I do believe the soldiers took special aim at me, the tallest of the party. My death would no doubt have saved them considerable trouble. Had it not been for my stick, I should have been carried away by the force of the stream; as it was, I had to cross in an oblique direction, landing on the other side only two yards above a waterfall of some height. The brigand who followed me was washed down, and went head over heels over the fall, but he was not much hurt, and scrambled out below. The others passed over safely, and we hurried up the steep ascent over the other side for some considerable distance till we were concealed among the trees, and safe from the fire of the troops. I thanked God for my escape from my rescuers, and felt anything but charitably disposed towards their rulers, who ought years ago to have cleared their country from these ruffians, instead of leaving them alone till they carried off an Englishman.

We rested among the trees until nightfall. At sunset we saw about two hundred soldiers in a body ascending the opposite bank by a path from the stream. They cheered as they marched along. I turned to the brigands and said, "You have lost some comrades." They did not choose to admit this. After dark some more shots were heard, and the band was surprised again. The other prisoners managed to escape — lucky fellows — they were but small fry, and were forgotten in the excitement of the fight; but the greatest care was taken of me. I was never allowed a chance for a moment.

We shall not spoil the interest of the book by telling the adventures and experiences it relates so well. One illustration we may give of the degree of hardship endured.

The first week we were supplied at intervals of two or three days with a small quantity of meat half cooked. I came in for the under-done portions, for nothing an Italian dislikes so much as crudely cooked meat. No bread was procurable, with the exception of a very small piece of rye bread. This tasted to me most delicious, for with the exception of two mouthfuls of maize bread, we had had none for a fortnight. There was great grumbling at the diet, for we only had enough just to keep us from starving. I thought that here I might manage to wash a little, and commenced by taking off my boots in order to begin with my feet. I had washed one and was doing the same to the other, when that wretched Scope rushed at me and began hitting me with a stick he picked up, because I did not immediately put my sock on to my wet foot. I did not pay the slightest attention to him, and wiped my foot dry, and then put on my sock and boot, he continuing to strike me all the time. I told him that it did not hurt me, and I supposed it amused him (remembering an anecdote told once by a noble earl in the House of Lords with excellent effect), and I recommended him to take care what he did or I should complain to the captain. The others took my part, and though he did not repeat the offence he often threatened me, and I really was frequently in fear of my life by reason of his brutal disposition. One blow raised the skin on my forefinger, and I suppose the stick must have been in contact with some decayed matter. The wound became troublesome, and did not heal for three weeks, when I got some bread and made a poultice for it. The captain did not return at the end of the week, as he had promised; all the money was gone, and no food came for three days. I was so hungry that I begged for some of the raw fat, three weeks old, that they had kept for the purpose of greasing their boots! This I forced down my throat, after masticating for a quarter-of-an-hour, but at the end of that time it was just as clammy as at first. I three times ate a little of this fearfully rancid stuff. At last one night, half a sheep was sent up to me, which four of the men took down again to cook, for Pavone, who stopped with me, would not have a fire made where we were. The greedy wretches cooked and ate nearly all of it, putting a quantity away in their pockets, and brought up a little to Pavone, but only gave to me a scraped legbone which Scope threw in my face, hurting me a good deal, it was perfectly raw, and had but very few signs of meat about it. I gnawed at this in the dark like a dog, eating as much of the sinewy appendages as I could manage to find and to bite; I then put it by also after the manner of dogs, till the morning, being too famished to lose so precious a morsel; but that dear brute Scope seeing it, took it away to see if he could make anything of it, though he had plenty of meat in his pocket, and finding nothing on it threw it at my head again. Not a morsel would the others give me; for two more days I had to go without food, or to take the raw and stinking fat again! Each day I had been getting weaker, and weaker, till at last my voice failed me, and I could only speak in the lowest whisper, as at last I lay stretched on the ground praying for death. On the morning of the 30th July Malone and Vicenzio were sent to get food at all hazards, for they saw I was in a bad state, and they all (particularly Pavone) were getting very queer for want of something to eat, but no one was so ill as I was. At about ten o'clock we heard a low whistle above us, and I saw Antonio coming down with something in his handkerchief slung on his gun. When he came to where Pavone was sitting he turned two loaves and a number of pears out of his pocket. I was so excited at the sight of this that I burst into tears at the goodness of God in sending food when I had quite given up hopes of life. I was too weak to go to the bread, and Antonio brought me three pears. I tried to say "pane," but I could not manage it, so pointed at the bread, which they gave me immediately; and by eating a small quantity at a time I soon felt better, and by the evening recovered my voice.

And here is an account of the passing of the prisoner out of the hands of his captors:

Though I had been promised that the guides would come at daybreak to take me away, five, six, seven o'clock came without their appearance, and I was in despair. Guange and Caltane were with me, the former asking me not to speak of him at Naples, for he was well known there. I told him he need not fear my saying anything that would hurt him, for the authorities knew much more of him than I did, as I did not know whether he was called by a nickname or not.

All at once, at about half-past seven, to my intense joy, Tedesco, Visconti's old shepherd, walked up from the place where Manzo and the others were. He was so pleased to see me that he would kiss me, and I had not the heart to refuse him. My first question was to inquire all about my wife, and I was deeply thankful to learn that she was quite well and had escaped all malaria fever, which is so prevalent in Naples in summer. He told me that he had been hunting everywhere for the band since the night of Sunday, the 20th, when the 3,000*l.* were paid. He had a companion to help him to carry the money, which weighed nearly forty pounds, and was as much as they could carry up the mountains; and that it was a most dangerous task, although they had been promised the protection of both the Italian and English Governments. They had run the greatest danger from the troops, who would certainly, he said, have shot them had they caught them carrying money to the brigands. He told me that he was worn out with the fatigue and hunger he had undergone during the last six days, not having slept once in a house all that time; and that he would have given up the search for the band had he not fallen in with them this morning, though he had vowed not to return without me. Last night he had slept on the other side of the mountain opposite us, not having the slightest idea that we were so close to him.

He now went back to Manzo, and sent an old woman, who proved to be Manzo's mother, to me; she had brought a small loaf of white bread and a little omelette for me, which luxuries seemed to be most delicious after the coarse fare I had been subjected to lately. It seemed very curious seeing any one in woman's dress, to which I had been a stranger for so long a time.

When the old lady went away, Manzo came to me, and sitting down, asked me what I should say to the Prefect when he questioned me about his band. I told him that I should tell him that he and his band of about thirty men had been a match for an army of 10,000 men, and that he had proved himself the cleverer of the two. This pleased him immensely, and he quite rubbed his hands with glee, and immediately gave me two rings, which I put on my fingers in brigand fashion. Contrary to his usual practice, he did not caution me against telling about the band and their proceedings, which greatly surprised me, for the Viscontis had been cautioned and threatened in the most violent manner should they say a word.

He now returned to his men, and I heard the chinking sound of their counting money, which I suppose was the sum he was to receive, which I heard mentioned the day before. At about eleven o'clock Manzo asked me if I should like to go; so I threw away all the warm clothing I had been carrying about with me so long, tied up in a handkerchief, and which had served me as a pillow at night since the 19th June. In answer to my inquiries, Manzo informed me that he was well satisfied with the amount we had paid him. My macintosh coat I put in my pocket, and refusing the proffered kisses, shook hands all around with them, they parting with me in the most friendly way possible. Generoso added another to my stock of rings, making the number five. I recommended Manzo, for the future, not to take foreigners, but to confine his attention to his own countrymen, which would prove far better for him; for when a foreigner was taken it was in all the papers in the world and it compelled the Government to send so many soldiers that the brigands had very little chance of escaping capture.

I now stepped forward, accompanied by Tedesco and the mother of Manzo, all the brigands wishing me a pleasant journey, waving their arms to me while in sight. They were soon lost to view in the wood, and I walked on a free man, having been a captive in their hands 102 days, all which time I never entered any description of house, sleeping always in the open air on the hard ground!

It was one of those fearfully hot days, when, in a southern clime, everything looks copper-coloured, and when the slightest motion requires great exertion; but we had a long journey before us, and it was desirable to get to Giffone before dark, so on we went in the broiling sun. I felt this very much, for when I was with the band I had never walked once in the sun. Walking in the daytime was only attempted when in a dense forest, where it was impossible for the rays of the sun to penetrate. Up hill and down dale we walked; it seemed so curious to be able to walk in so open a manner, and from habit I kept looking round to see if any one were watching our motions. Tedesco gave me a piece of chocolate, which my late brother captive, Visconti, had kindly sent to me. He had often done so before, but the brigands had always eaten it, and never told me anything about it. Shirts, too, were sent up two or three times; but these in the same way had never reached me, but were worn by the lucky men who fell in with the guides.

I was in a desperate plight as regards dress; and though I cared little about my appearance when in the woods, I did not quite like showing myself at Giffone. I had, however, to put on a good face, and make the best of it. My trousers were all in tatters from catching in the brambles and bushes, and hanging in ribbons at the feet. My coat was covered with the fat and grease of the meat that I had had to carry in the pocket; and all the lining of the skirts was torn to shreds; while constantly sleeping and lying on the dirty ground had quite changed the original colour and pattern of the cloth. My wide-awake was dirty and torn. My shirt I had worn day and night since the 19th June; and my boots were all broken, and many of the seams unstitched. I am quite certain that none of my friends would have been able to recognize me; but I cheered myself [with the news that a large warm bath would be ready for me on my appearance at Signor Visconti's house, where my friends had sent everything that I might require in the shape of dress.

It is almost unnecessary to describe the state of my body. I was covered with sores from the effect of the vermin, through the brigands having steadily refused to allow me to remove my clothing for washing purposes, and never allowing me to stop at a stream, for fear of the troops coming upon us before I could rearrange my dress.

From the Saturday Review.

ALPINE TRAVELLING IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

NOTHING is more common in the upper valley of the Rhone than to pick up English money of all dates. It is, indeed, not English money alone that is picked up, as no country supplies a richer field for the numismatist who is curious in the coinage of any European country. The reason is plain; the Simplon was one main road for pilgrims going to Rome, and, as usual, they left coins of their several ages and countries on the way. Now in these days we look upon the passage of the Alps as quite a holiday business; we climb over them or drive over them; we expect soon to be whirled through them by an express train. It was not so in past times. Doubtless the business was then a much more serious one. That there was no passable road could be no matter of just complaint, when there was probably nothing that we should call a passable road between any two towns of England, France, or Germany. But, whether just ground of complaint or not, certainly the lack of roads must have made all travelling a more formidable business than it is now, and must have made Alpine travelling the most formidable of all. But this is not all. The taste for such travelling had not arisen; nobody crossed or climbed the Alps for pleasure; those who did it, did it as a hard necessity; the affairs of their nation or their community, or the welfare of their own souls, led them to the effort, but, as far as any pleasure was concerned, they would much rather have stayed at home. Here lies the main difference between modern and mediæval travelling; the one is a matter of pleasure, the other was a matter of business. The nations of Europe had, in those days, in one way less, and in another more, intercourse with one another than they have now. Setting aside mercantile travellers in both periods, there can be no doubt that the number of persons who travelled then because they had real business to travel about was much larger than it is now. Diplomacy then required much more moving about than it does now. Much that can be done now by a single messenger carrying a bag by railway, sometimes even by a single flash of the telegraph wires, then involved tedious journeys to and fro on the part of diplomatic agents themselves. Kings too, at least in England and Germany, never stayed long in one place, and ambassadors had sometimes to hunt them from one corner of their kingdoms to another. Again, when the King of England was sovereign of nearly half France, when the King of Germany was also Roman Emperor, a vast deal of going to and fro followed between people who, though in a manner fellow-subjects, were not, any the more for that, fellow-countrymen. But the main causes for going about in those days arose out of the ecclesiastical condition of the times. The doctrine of pilgrimages did a great deal. The belief that it was a good work to go to Jerusalem or Rome or Canterbury or Compostella took a great many people to all those places who now would not travel at all, and caused a great many others to travel, as a matter of the gravest business, who would now travel only as a matter of amusement. But even more was done by the dependence of all the churchmen of Western Europe on the See of Rome. It was the policy of the Popes to draw the ecclesiastics of all nations as much as possible to the common centre. Archbishops, for instance, were made to go in person to receive the pallium. All sorts of suits and appeals came before the Pope and the Papal Courts, and involved a prodigious amount of going to and fro. The great principle of Papal government — one perhaps not peculiar to Papal Government — seems to have been to be always inquiring into everything and never to settle anything. The unlucky disputants had to send deputies after deputies, the Popes themselves sent legates after legates, till half Europe had been traversed a score of times in some dispute between this and that monastery, or between this Bishop and his Chapter. When we remember how the the ecclesiastical corporations of those days were always quarrelling, and how every quarrel involved running backwards and forwards from Rome to Scotland or Norway or Portugal, we shall easily see that the amount of travelling with real business in view was incomparably greater than it is now. The men sent on such errands were very often shrewd and observant persons who made the most of their opportunity. They did not travel, as men do now, for amusement or because it was the fashion; they did not travel, as men did in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, with the set purpose of improving and enlarging their minds; but there can be no doubt that their minds were greatly enlarged and improved by the process. It was then impossible to scamper through a country, and the very tediousness of the journey rendered it more profitable. The churchmen of Western Europe formed one great brotherhood, and the English monk or canon who had business at Rome was entertained by, or fell in with, numbers of his brethren in France, Burgundy, and Lombardy. The most intelligent classes in each country were brought far more into contact with one another than they are now; and the common use of the Latin language made them hardly strangers to one another. There was more mutual ignorance among the mass of each nation than there is now; but there was far more mutual knowledge among those who mainly engrossed the learning and transacted the public business of the age.

But of pure taste for the picturesque, at any rate of taste for mountain scenery, we find not a trace. Indeed this whole class of feeling is very modern. Lord Macaulay has some remarks upon the subject which are true as far as they go, but which do not touch the root of the matter. He graphically contrasts the horror with which people looked at the Scotch mountains a hundred and fifty years back, and the delight with which people look at them now. People could not admire them as long as, besides the risk of breaking one's neck, there was the further risk of being robbed and murdered by Highland marauders. No doubt this is perfectly true as regards a large class. But it is not the whole truth. First of all, there is now, and there was not then, a class to whom the risk of a broken neck is positively attractive, and whom the risk, in some parts of the world, of being robbed and murdered, does not wholly deter. Secondly, in cases where mountain scenery could always be admired without danger, people used not to care about it, and now they do. Save when the French armies were there in 1798, there has not been for ages any risk of being robbed or murdered on the Minster Terrace at Bern. People of all classes and all nations stand there and admire the Alps. But the old Bernese patricians did not care to look at them. They made their windows look into the street, and turned the less honourable parts of their houses towards the Jungfrau and her companions.

Alpine travelling then, in old times, was in no way a pleasure, but pre-eminently a toil. A mountain was a thing which it took a great deal of trouble to get up and down, and where, when you had got to the top, you were frightfully cold. One need not pick out an exceptional case like the terrible passage of Mount Cenis over the snow of January by the Emperor Henry the Fourth, his Queen, and her new-born child. He would be a hardy mountaineer even now who would undertake such a journey, unless a soul or an Empire were at stake. Take more ordinary cases. In 959, Ælfsige, Archbishop of Canterbury, set out for Rome to seek for his pallium. Our best historian tells us, in a matter-of-fact way, that he died of the ice and snow among the Alps. There is some American story in which "another Judge has been lost by bees" is recorded as the most commonplace event in the world. Perhaps in the tenth century, "another Bishop has been lost in the snow" struck people as not a whit more wonderful. To be sure, later and more romantic writers make a miracle of it. The Archbishop had trodden irreverently on the tomb of a tainted predecessor; so his feet got so cold that nothing could warm them except being plunged into the bowels of newly-slain horses, and even that could not save him. But let us take the feelings of an Alpine traveller in the twelfth century as recorded by himself. John of Bremble, Monk of Christ Church, a clever man of business, a shrewd observer, and a humorous describer, goes to Rome, and that not once or twice merely, in the course of the interminable quarrel between Archbishop Baldwin and his monks about the foundation of the College at Hackington. Brother John writes to the Subprior, and sets forth how he felt at the top of "Mons Jovis" or the Great Saint Bernard. He looked up indeed to the heavens of the mountains, and looked down on the hell of the valleys, and so far felt himself nearer heaven, and thought that his prayers were more sure to be heard. But let no one fancy that Brother John looked on the mountains as heavenly, or like heaven, in any sense but that of physical elevation. Not at all; when he begins to pray, he uses the exactly opposite comparison. He prays that he may be restored to his brethren that he may warn them never to come to this place of torment. "For I may well," he goes on, "call it a place of torment, where the marble of ice makes a pavement of the stony earth, where you cannot plant your foot firmly, where you cannot set it down at all without danger, and in a wonderful way, you cannot stand on the slippery surface, and you fall down on certain death if you slip." John of Bremble, though an Alpine traveller, had certainly no claim to a place among the members of the Alpine club. He was a man of business, going across the Alps on business, and, even on Mons Jovis, he wanted to write home to his brethren at Canterbury. So he put his hand in his bag to take out his inkstand; but his ink was all frozen, and his hand was too benumbed to write. His beard was thick with ice; his very breath was turned into ice as it came out of his mouth. So he got away from the place of torment as fast as he could, and his spirits seem not to have come back to him till, after going, as he says, through a thousand deaths, he found himself at Rome.

Now it must in fairness be added that John of Bremble's journey, like the Emperor Henry's, was made in the winter; but there is surely here enough to show that he would not have greatly enjoyed an Alpine ascent, even in the midst of summer. But then Kings of the Romans and Monks of Christ Church, travelling with serious objects in view, could not choose their time like holiday travellers, and had to cross in winter or summer as might happen. Frederick Barbarossa crossed, in quite another part, and in an opposite direction from either Henry or John of Bremble, in the beginning of September, on his return from his coronation at Rome. In this case Lord Macaulay's view is fully realized. We do not know what Frederick or his historian Bishop Otto might have thought of the Alps if they could have contemplated them in safety; they clearly looked on them with simple horror when they were set upon by robbers or patriots, as we please to call them, in a narrow pass not far from Verona. The mountains are to Otto in such a case something very dreadful indeed. We hear of the "fauces montium, saxumque fortissimum prope in declivo rupis inaccessibilem servans viam;" of a "rupes, eminentia sua terribilis, et fragosis locis saxorumque asperitate quasi inaccessibilis." The same rock again is held to be "cunctis mortalibus impermeabilis, solis avibus pervia" — "tanta fuit saxi eminentia, tanta fuit hispidæ rupis scabrosa malitia." No doubt all this was very awkward when military operations had to be carried on in such places, and when Caesar and his fortunes depended on the result of those operations. Bishop Otto does not seem, like Brother John, even to have felt for his inkstand; the Alps were to him simply a place from which it was a great matter to get away alive.

Yet these men were the very opposite to stupid or unobservant. The wideness and keenness of Otto's view of things is wonderful in his age, and would be honourable in any age. And, if any man ever went through the world with his eyes wide open, it was John of Bremble. He may be said to be the hero of Mr. Stubbs's second volume of documents of the reign of Richard the First. He is one of those writers who, by their fierce denunciations of the iniquities of the Roman Court, make us sometimes wonder that the Reformation did not come sooner. As with every other honest Englishman or German, as with St. Thomas of Canterbury among the foremost, the name of Roman is, as in the days of Liudprand, a synonym for everything that was bad. Exeter Hall itself might learn new flowers of anti-Papal rhetoric from many a devout monk or priest of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. But the truth is that this vehemence of language proves nothing, or rather it proves the intense faith with which they believed in the ideal Papal supremacy. They took the divine authority of the See of Rome so thoroughly for granted, it so little occurred to them that it was a thing which could possibly be spoken against, that any amount of reviling of the concrete Pope, and still more of his concrete ministers, in no way affected their devotion to the ideal Papacy. It is the old story of Papirius offering Jupiter the cup of mulled wine; irreverence, whether in a Papirius, a John of Bremble, or a Spurgeon, by no means implying unbelief, but rather the most undoubting faith. They are all so sure of their position that they may take liberties. For it is not only with the Pope that John of Bremble takes liberties. He was undoubtedly a devout man, but he jokes on the subject of his very prayers, and brings in a Scriptural allusion on a very solemn subject in a way which many people would now think highly irreverent. He did not really think that he was nearer heaven, or that his prayers were more likely to be heard, on the top of the Great St. Bernard than on the level ground of Canterbury. Our modern notion is to treat religion and all that concerns it with a kind of distant respect. To a mediæval monk religion and all that concerned it were his profession, the daily business of his life, something that was anything but distant to him. If a good man, he believed fervently and practised conscientiously; but his religious belief and religious practice had nothing mysterious about them; they were everyday matters of which he was always thinking and talking, and on which he could therefore venture a joke without danger to his soul's health or the possibility of scandal among his brethren.

LITTLE FEET.

LITTLE feet, so glad and gay,
Making music all the day;
Tripping merrily along,
Filling all my heart with song;
Well I love your music sweet;
Patter, patter, little feet.

Sometimes anxious, I would know
Just what way these feet must go;
Praying oft that all be fair,
No thorns, no roughness anywhere;
That flow'rs may spring their steps to greet
Patter, patter, little feet.

But then I think that some have trod
Through thorns and briars the nearer God;
Though weak in faith, still I would dare
To offer up the earnest prayer
That CHRIST would choose whate'er is meet;
Patter, patter, little feet.

I press them in my hands to-night,
And kiss them with a new delight,
Believing that where'er they go,
My tender LORD will lead them so,
They'll walk, at length, the golden street,
Patter, patter, little feet.

MR. AND MISS SEWELL.

AUTHORS OF HAWKESTONE, MARY HERBERT, ETC.

THOROUGHLY to appreciate the influence which has been exercised upon religious creeds by works of fiction, it is necessary to go back about one quarter of a century, when a party was flourishing in the Church of England peculiarly adapted to receive aid from the hands of the imagination. We mean the Anglo-Catholic party; which, based on a solid substratum of historical truth in the teaching of men of sense and learning, was nothing more than a society for the promotion of classical tableaux vivants and ecclesiastical masquerades among empty-headed young vicars and sentimental or designing young ladies. The whole of this section — the dressy section of the High Church party, as it may be called — dwelt with fervour upon the piety and poetry of the middle ages; and filled their minds with images of knightly saints and holy abbots; of consecrated maids and pale young priests; of picturesque monasteries, deep hidden among woods and waters, and wave-washed convents, on the rocks "of Holy Isle or Lindisfarne." As auxiliaries to this wing of the Anglican host, uprose on every side a multitude of ecclesiastical novels: like the minstrels, the jugglers, and the fortune-tellers, who followed in the wake of a great feudal army. Foremost among the writers whose amusing and interesting stories were dedicated to the surplice and the altar, were the lady and gentleman whose name stands at the head of this article. But before we proceed to give an account of their contributions to the cause, we may be permitted to pay a passing tribute to the genius of that celebrated man the Rev. William Sewell, formerly senior Tutor of Exeter College, Oxford, subsequently the Principal of Radley College, an institution which he himself founded, and now, with blighted hopes and broken fortunes, gazing sadly upon the wreck of that noble vessel, of whose crew he was so zealous a member.

We remember Mr. Sewell well. Twenty years ago he occupied as influential a position in the University of Oxford as any man then living. He was senior Tutor and virtually Dictator of one of its largest colleges. His undoubted eloquence, his unerring logic, which would not be denied, and his general intellectual powers, more than justified the admiration entertained for him by a host of undergraduate disciples. His conciliating manners, when he chose to assume them; his native humour, which was considerable; and a reputation for austerity, which was never proved to be groundless, added greatly to the strength of his position, and caused certain minor deficiencies in both his scholarship and his judgment to be generally overlooked. In philosophy he was a staunch Platonist, and from his favourite author had derived, not only the foundations of his own religious creed, but even a manner of speaking, and, we might almost add, a peculiar intonation, which all who knew him must remember. When he laid his hand upon the shoulder of some favourite pupil, and spoke to him in that appealing and persuasive voice which he could command at will, none who heard him could fail to be reminded of the well-known ἀλλ' ὁ φίλος Πλάτων in which Socrates so often addresses his disciple in the dialogue "De Republica." In theology, Mr. Sewell was the champion — perhaps the greatest champion it has ever had — of that via media, the history whereof has lately been written by Dr. Newman. Far more than either Pusey, or Palmer, or Wilberforce, or Keble, or Williams, did Sewell for the cause he loved. But it was no use. The stone was doomed to be rolled down the hill again, as often as it was rolled up. The Anglican idea, after struggling manfully to take root in this inclement climate, confessed itself a practical failure. The fact is, it was too true to work. There was not sufficient alloy in it to make it a current sovereign. It was so narrow a path that only ecclesiastical bricklayers could walk along it without becoming giddy. And it has now given place to a debased but more useful working form of High Churchism, which it is greatly to its credit to have made possible, and to have prepared men's minds for accepting. It was, however, at the moment when this via media seemed upon the point of triumphing, that Mr. Sewell did that which alone entitles him to a place in this article — he wrote the novel of "Hawkestone."

This work was published anonymously; and it is a curious circumstance — curious, at least, when we think of this gentleman as he now is — that it was generally attributed to Mr. Gladstone. Those were the days when "Gladstone upon Church and State" was still a text-book with the High Church Tory party; and it is, therefore, not surprising that a tale which represented their ideal both in religion and in politics should have been assigned to its author. However, the supposition was an error; and the truth gradually becoming known, added greatly, of course, to Mr. Sewell's reputation among all those persons whose views coincided with his hero's—the pattern Christian gentleman whom “Ernest Villiers” was intended to represent.

If “Hawkestone” was unduly admired at the time as a perfect exposition of the Anglican theory, and of the duties of laymen towards the Church, it has been unduly neglected since, regarded purely as a work of fiction. The plot, indeed, is too intricate, and too imperfectly worked out, to be entitled to the highest praise. But in the course of the story occur passages of as brilliant writing, and scenes of as strong dramatic interest, as are to be found in the best contemporary novelists. The hero is a young English gentleman, heir to an entailed estate, who at the opening of the novel is residing in Italy in close attendance upon his invalid father; General Villiers, a man of irritable and despotic temperament, who tries his son's patience to the utmost. While in this situation, young Villiers falls in love with, and privately marries, the daughter of an Italian market-gardener, who is made a reduced nobleman to accommodate the fastidiousness of Villiers, who could never have cast eyes of affection upon any one but a born lady. It so happened that before Villiers became acquainted with her, she had been beloved by his father's valet, an Englishman, but a Jesuit spy of the worst stamp, who, rendered furious by the loss, swears the most deadly vengeance against his master's son, which he is occupied in carrying out to the last day of his life. He begins well by spiriting away Villiers' infant child, after his mother had died of a decline, and thereby throwing the unfortunate widower into a violent fever, which brought him to the brink of the grave. On his recovery he returned to England, and his father, who had been dead some time, having disinherited him, he took service in the army. But this episode of his life is very briefly hurried over. The disinheriting turns out to be illusory; and the second act of the drama finds Villiers seated on his ancestral acres at Hawkestone Priory.

During Villiers' sojourn in Italy, he had been exposed to all the artifices which the Roman Church knows how to employ for the sake of gaining converts. But he had stood firm against them all, and was only the more penetrated with a profound sense of the dishonesty and wickedness which Popery in its worst forms encourages and uses. At the same time, there is a certain Lady Eleanor, a beautiful cousin, residing not far from Hawkestone, and still a member of the Roman Church, between whom and Villiers some love passages would seem to have passed, before he fell in with the fair Pauline, and who, now that the latter is dead, appears to be in a fair way of resuming her sway over his heart. She, however, will not marry a heretic, nor be a Romanist. It is on Villiers' supposed attachment to her, that the emissaries of the Church of Rome still rely for effecting his conversation.

The town of Hawkestone is described as a prosperous manufacturing place, in which all things most hateful to the Anglo-Catholic and Tory mind, do flourish and abound: Dissent, Evangelicism, Romanism, commercial speculation, radicalism, Peelite conservatism, and Mechanics' Institutes. Nor far from the town lies “the Forest,” formerly what the name implies, but now given up to iron-foundries and other works; inhabited by a race of men little better than savages, churchless, gulleys, and lawless. Such is the neighbourhood which Villiers is to reform and regenerate. All these elements of evil are sketched by Mr. Sewell with a master's hand. His sarcasms upon popular Protestantism are perhaps too bitter. His invectives against the Church of Rome are perhaps too violent. But it is impossible to deny the wit, the power, and the general fidelity of the whole picture. The rector of Hawkestone is a paralytic. The curate is a Low Churchman, one Bentley, a well meaning but weak man, who is the innocent cause of Villiers becoming mixed up with an outbreak in the forest aforesaid, where he is besieged by a furious mob for five hours, and is ultimately rescued by a troop of dragons, just as the floor of the room in which the little garrison is assembled is burning under their feet. The whole of this scene—the events in the forest which led to it; the meetings of the rioters; the attack and defence of the inn; and the escape from fire which concludes it—are, we make bold to say, equal to anything of the kind in the English language. We are sure our readers will thank us for giving them a few extracts in confirmation of this eulogy. We are to suppose the mob—not indeed a mere mob, but to some extent drilled and disciplined—drawn up in front of the hotel and demanding the surrender of certain obnoxious persons sheltered within it. Villiers has spoken to them, at first with some little effect, but finally to bring upon himself only a tempest of stones and hisses.

“‘Now then,’ he said to Brown, ‘all of you to your posts!’ He drew his head within the window, closed down the sash, and begged Bevan to put up the mattresses against it again, so as to leave a space from which, with his own pistols, he could command the entrance. It was the only window in the house where this was possible. 'Now go to the side walls. Charge the men to keep their fire as I have ordered, and on no account to fire promiscuously, where they may hurt women or children. Ask Mrs. Bonnor to come to me: it will initiate her in her duties to put a little lint on this hurt, which is a mere trifle.' It was done chiefly to relieve her mind by giving her some occupation; and the poor woman was aroused from the stupor of terror into which she had fallen, and began to bustle about, with Mary, for lint and rags, pleased with the thought of being useful, and relieved from much of her apprehension for the future by finding that the wound was of so little moment. Meanwhile, the firing of the pistol was the signal for the first attack. Twelve huge savage foundrymen, each wielding an enormous crowbar, with which they break open their furnaces, detached themselves from the front of the mob, and advanced to the door. Two blows were levelled on it, but failed to demolish it, but as the third man was poising his bar, and levelling against the lock, eight tongues of flame leaped out of the side walls, amidst a volume of smoke and discharge of musketry. The smoke cleared off. Six of the ringleaders were dead upon the ground: two others had been wounded; and amidst a yell, partly of terror and surprise, and partly of fury, the whole mass of assailants had recoiled, and left the space in front of the inn quite clear.

"I will make one more effort," said Villiers, gazing from the window on the sad sight beneath him. 'They have obeyed me well — have singled out the ringleaders, and marked them. It may be that Heaven will still touch their hearts, and we may be spared more of this frightful bloodshed.' He threw up the window again, and endeavoured to make himself heard. But the moment he appeared the uproar became terrific; several shots were fired at him, amidst a volley of stones; and Bevan dragged him back into the room.

"It is hopeless," he said. 'When blood has once been shed, a mob becomes a monster of ferocity. The battle must be fought out. Bear me witness that I have done all in my power to spare life.'

"He had no time, however, to say more. The assailants had consulted together, and gathering themselves in a dense column, they rushed, with a hideous cry, up to the front of the house. Once more the fire from the flanking walls opened upon them, and every shot told. Villiers himself, from his post at the window, fixed upon the most conspicuous of the assailants, and his aim rarely missed. From the attics the boys hurled down their paving-stones upon a mass of heads on which every missile did execution. The women themselves, kindled with the excitement, now joined in the defence; and arming themselves with kettles of boiling water, and pails of scalding liquor from the brewhouse, poured them upon the eyes and faces of the pitmen, till they shrieked with agony. Body after body fell, and was trampled on by the advancing column, who, untouched as yet by the fire of the musketry, were not aware of the danger of approaching till they were close to the house, and there, excluded from retreat, aimed their ineffectual blows at the doors and windows, and then sank and were trodden down in a mass of carnage. Pressed and jammed together, they were unable to use their arms or to receive orders. In vain Wheeler, and others in command, endeavoured to make the advancing body recede, that there might be scope for a more regular attack. Everything was confusion and uproar; howlings of the wounded and dying; shriekings and horrible imprecations, as the torrents of boiling stuff were poured suddenly on their upturned faces; blasphemous outcries, which none but demons would have uttered; and rising above all, threats of the most horrible vengeance against Villiers, and all around him. At last their efforts succeeded. The panels of the door were smashed to atoms; the windows, the shutters, framework — all were demolished. A breach, it seemed, was made into the house; but to the disappointment of the attackers, both the passage and the rooms had been so filled with mattresses, drawers, and chests, and light chairs piled up to the ceiling, over which it was impossible to climb, that they were as far removed from their object as at first. Wheeler himself, furious when he found himself thus baffled, at last succeeded in forcing his men back from an unavailing attempt, in which life after life was sacrificed without their being able to touch the defenders of the little fortress. Once more the mass recoiled; the space before the house was cleared; and as Villiers looked down upon it again, now piled with corpses and heaps of mutilated and wounded bodies, groaning with pain, the clock struck four. Two hours were past of the four on which he had calculated to hold out. There was a pause — a silence as awful as the dead, breathless calm between the bursts of a hurricane. And Villiers sank into a chair, and burst into a flood of tears."

After the rioters have drawn off, Villiers and his party are left in the upper rooms of the burning house, from which there is no escape but by the windows, and there is nobody to set up a ladder for them.

"A few minutes more must bring the troops to them, but the delay of a minute might be fatal, and it might be some time before they could be discerned; and Villiers rose to go to another window, and endeavour to enlarge the opening to give more air. As he looked out from it he observed the leaden cistern. It was a considerable distance beneath him; but he resolved to venture. The cords of the bed were taken out, knots were tied in them, one end was made fast round a bedstead, and in the midst of the inexpressible anxiety of all who gathered to watch his descent, he climbed through the window and slid down the rope. It swung fearfully as it received the weight; but he had been accustomed in youth to gymnastic exercises, and, setting his feet against the wall, he contrived to land himself safely on the brickwork edge of the cistern. But his foot had no sooner touched it than he endeavoured to spring up again, and hold by the rope. His ankle had touched the brick, and was blistered with the heat, for the store of wood and coal which were deposited in the place underneath had been set fire to, and had acted as a furnace. He clung to the rope with all his strength, as it swung backwards and forwards violently over the cistern; and as his eyes turned down they saw a sight enough to appal the stoutest heart, for the bottom over which he was swinging was full of melted lead. Even now his presence of mind did not forsake him. As the rope swung over the edge he arrested it with his foot, landed on the narrow brink, all but lost his balance, and fell backwards into the cistern; but with a desperate plunge he recovered himself, and the next moment threw himself on the ground. He fell upon his face, half-stunned, shattered and bruised, but with his senses still awake. As he rose upon his feet, he heard the dragoons galloping into the street, and a shout from the window over his head told him there was not a moment to lose. In an instant he was in front of the house. Some dragoons had dismounted. Together they rushed into the yard, and the ladder was raised to the window from which he had himself descended; it was the only one accessible. He would himself have mounted, but was conscious that his wounded arm and bruised frame rendered him less serviceable than others. The sergeant, therefore, ascended the ladder. The women were placed on it and reached the ground safely. Bonsor and Brown were preparing to lower Bentley from the window next, but just then a part of the floor began to give way. Bentley entreated them to save themselves; he was prepared for his fate. He would wait till the last. He entreated them not to think of him: and had nearly persuaded them to let the boys escape next, when, from the corner of the room in which he had been crouching, Wheeler sprang forward and thrust them aside. He leaped upon the window like a maniac escaped from his keeper. A prospect of saving his life was once more opened, and he threw himself upon the ladder — his foot missed — he strove to recover himself, but in vain. He tottered — staggered — clung to it, but in vain; and Villiers saw him fall headlong into the cistern. There was a cry such as no one then present had ever heard before — one of such unutterable horror that for years afterwards Villiers would wake up in the night, as he fancied he heard it in his dreams, and the cold sweat would stand upon his forehead. Villiers sprang upon the ladder. The miserable being had fallen upon his hands and knees in the pool of molten lead! He saw Villiers, and shrieked to him to save him. He called him by his name; but it was hopeless. He offered worlds to save him! 'Take me out! take me out! It is a hell. I will tell all; I can tell you all. Oh, Mr. Villiers, help me! I can tell you what you would give worlds to know. I have seen your papers; I know where your child is. Help me, help me!' And as Villiers, struck to the heart, was almost plunging in to rescue him, the poor wretch fell upon his face. It was all over. Bentley, Brown, all of them, descended the ladder. They were saved — saved as by a miracle. They gathered round Villiers, who had saved them; but he had fallen against a wall like one petrified. 'I have seen your papers.' 'I know where your child is.' The words rang in his ears — 'I know where your child is.' Once more he sprang upon the ladder, in the vain thought that all might not be lost; but he was dragged back by Brown and Bevan. There was a crash — a shock — the roof fell in — and all was over.

"I always thought," said Bonsor to his wife the next day, 'that that leaden cistern had been built for some purpose.'"

After these specimens the reader, we should think, will agree with us that Mr. Sewell's powers as a "sensational" writer have hardly met with due recognition.

Villiers now settles down at Hawkestone, intent only on the discharge of the duties which belong to him as the chief landed proprietor of the neighborhood. To elevate the condition of the poor, to extirpate Dissent and Popery, and to exhibit "the true image of the Church in all its beauty to the poor as well as to the rich, not only by an individual, but by a body," are his three objects. And to this end he restores to the church whatever lands his ancestors had received out of her spoils at the Reformation, and builds near Hawkestone an institution which is neither a monastery, nor a college, nor an hospital, but partakes of the character of all three, where a small body of clergy reside permanently, conducting daily choral service in the adjoining village, and of course in the college itself, and doing all which the circumstances of modern life permit of to realize the ideal of Laud, and to make the Anglican theory a reality. His efforts in this direction are crowned with success. All opposition gradually dies away before his perseverance, and he is left at the end in the full enjoyment of all that satisfaction which is due to disinterested virtue, and sacrifices founded upon principle. He has, however, one more severe trial to undergo before he is finally at rest. The Jesuit valet, Pearce, who was, of course, at the bottom of all the Hawkestone riots, has brought up Villiers' son a rank Papist, and ready brawler and rioter. In a fresh outbreak, he is wounded and taken prisoner by Villiers himself, and is left lying in the county gaol under sentence of death. Just at such an hour in the morning as he calculates will make it impossible for Villiers to reach the county town in time to see his son alive, Pearce, a prisoner at the Beguinage, reveals the secret to Villiers, who reaches the fatal spot — too late indeed to have stayed the execution, but to find that his son has taken poison, and that, though not dead, he is too ill to be hanged. Some affecting scenes follow between father and son, who, however, dies ultimately in a state of penitence, while a most horrible fate has overtaken Pearce, the villain of the story, who, in trying to escape from his confinement through an underground passage, is devoured by a tribe of rats.

The reader may now form some idea of the kind of frame in which Mr. Sewell's controversial work is set — a frame more valuable than the picture. Not but that the controversial writing in "Hawkestone" is extremely able; but the writer was in our eyes defending an untenable position. Villiers' arguments with Macarthy, the priest, at Rome, and his subsequent conversation with clergymen in England, bring out in the clearest and most advantageous light in which they are capable of being placed, the salient points of the Anglo-Catholic scheme, as revived by Newman, Keble, and Faber. But the book was so unswervingly and mercilessly just to the follies, weaknesses, and crimes of all parties alike that it made enemies in every direction. Of course the Evangelicals and the Romanists winced beneath the lash that was applied to them. But the High Churchmen also felt that Mr. Sewell was too hard on the amiable extravagances and youthful indiscretions of the weaker brethren; and on the whole, we should say that the great mass of his readers, if convinced by his reasoning, were repelled by his severity. In truth, as we have already said, Anglicanism "pure and simple" is a hard saying. Bearing all the odium of being Popish, without the compensating attractions of costume, candles, and genuflections; sacrificing much for the real liberty of the Church and for individual freedom, yet for ever being taunted as the sworn foe of both; devoid of the popular charms of either Popery or Dissent, it had from the first a desperate fight to maintain single-handed against a multiplicity of foes, till at last it was compelled, as it were, tacitly to make terms, to abate somewhat of its pretensions, and to admit within its pale men by no means warm sympathizers with the hopes of its first founders. "Hawkestone" was a great blow struck upon the losing side; but on the whole the losing side it was. And if we commend the polemical portion of it to our readers at the present day, it is because they may therein study for themselves more agreeably than in any other work with which we are acquainted, exactly what it was that the men of 1833 proposed to themselves to accomplish, may see it set before them in a living dramatic shape, and carry away an impression of it not likely to be forgotten hereafter.

Miss Sewell's novels were not, as may be supposed, of so directly controversial a nature as her brother's. They sought rather to insinuate than to inculcate what were called Church principles; and we use the word insinuate not in any offensive sense, but simply to denote the indirect as distinguished from the direct method of instruction. In "Amy Herbert," in "Gertrude," in the "Experience of Life," and in most of her other well-known tales, the authoress always takes care that the exemplary heroine shall be a sound Church-woman, and shall at proper intervals throw out hints of the comfort and support which she derives from the Church services. But beyond this she does not generally go, though there is one exception, to be noticed hereafter, in which she does plunge into the thick of the controversy. Generally her advocacy is negative, rather than positive. Her characters, when in trouble, do not console themselves, as Low Church people would do. Their talk is not so much of faith, of election, and reprobation, as of high principle, of duty, and of the blessings which are in store for those people who use "the appointed means of grace," who seek for no irregular spiritual gratifications, but are contented to bathe in the waters which Providence has clearly designed for them — the Established Church, to wit, of England and Ireland. The sin of presumption is the deadliest sin of all in Miss Sewell's catalogue.

Her stories enjoyed at one time a very extensive popularity; and, as tales for "young people," are, without doubt, highly to be commended, irrespective of their religious bias. They show great knowledge of life, and more knowledge of human nature than is to be found in "Hawkestone." They do not as a rule rest on artfully-constructed plots or ingenious problems of psychology. Such would, in fact, be somewhat inconsistent with her main object; but they narrate, in a simple and engaging style, the fortunes of some ordinary people, of whom a few are good, a few bad, and the rest indifferent, alternating between the other two extremes according to the preponderating influence of the moment. They are not works of profound wisdom or sagacity; they have none of the humour of Mr. Sewell, nor do they display any of that intellectual power which is possessed by several of our leading lady novelists. But they are thoroughly lady-like, refined, and pure; books, in a word, of which it may be said, with absolute truth, that if it is unlikely they should do any good, it is impossible they should do any harm. They are stories which the youth of both sexes, between sixteen and three-and-twenty, might be much better employed in reading than in imbibing the depraved atmosphere which surrounds "Lady Audley's Secret," "Guy Livingstone," and "Recommended to Mercy."

Of their effect, from an ecclesiastical point of view, we should say that it was widespread and lasting, if it did not cut so deep as "Hawkestone." Miss Sewell, we should say, exercised a sounder "moral influence" than her brother, and thereby strengthened and steadied the theological ideas which she hatched in her readers' minds. Mr. Sewell was all history, philosophy, and logic. A resident fellow and tutor to the age of fifty, he broke down upon domestic life. Here his sister went ahead. She could bring to bear upon her favourite religious notions all the subtle influence which emanates from well-drawn pictures of home life, from love, courtship, marriage, and the daily joys and sorrows of a household. There are certain medicines which are efficacious in proportion to the thoroughness with which they can be got to amalgamate with our ordinary food, and it is the same with political or religious "views." Get them inextricably associated with persons and scenes which have warmly affected the imagination, and dwell agreeably on the memory, and the battle is more than half won. Scott, it is said, made many more Tories than either Pitt, or Alison, or Eldon, or the "Quarterly Review," or the "John Bull." And novels undoubtedly will make more converts to particular kinds of opinions than set essays. But then they must be novels. And herein is Miss Sewell's special excellence; in her tales the story is never overlaid by the purpose. They are novels: whereas in "Hawkestone" the good that would be done to the High Church cause would be rather in spite of than because of the fiction. In spite, also, of the splendid writing that we have quoted and referred to, Mr. Sewell hardly interests us in his characters as human beings. We can hardly fancy any young man wishing to be a High Churchman because Villiers was a High Churchman; but we can fancy young ladies wishing to think as Amy Herbert and Gertrude thought, simply for the sake of being like them. So that, although Miss Sewell did not, with the exception presently to be noticed, lead her readers into the controversy between Dissent, Anglicanism, and Popery, she yet contrived to leave a well-marked impression on their minds that the Church was the right thing, and that all people who were "nice" were Church people.

"Margaret Percival" is the exception to which we have referred. The heroine of this story is represented under the influence of temptations which would try the strongest natures. She contracts a warm attachment for a young lady who had married an Italian nobleman, and on his death had returned to her native country, and settled on the estates which she possessed near Margaret's home. She is, of course, a Roman Catholic, and is accompanied by the regular Roman Catholic confessor of this school of fiction—learned, devout, zealous, sincere, and in a general way high-minded, but where the interests of his Church are at stake, unscrupulous. Father Andrea and the Countess Novara between them shake to its foundations Margaret's allegiance to her own Church. The society of the Countess becomes in time her sole pleasure, and her only refuge from the petty cares and troubles of a somewhat uncomfortable home. The Church of England is not represented to advantage in the parish of Dering; and the one frail tie which still holds Margaret within her pale is the respect with which she looks up to Mr. Sutherland, her uncle, an English Churchman of the model Anglican type. He it is who at last determines her wavering footsteps in the right course, and gives to his own creed a logical and a moral triumph over its rival. Margaret is convinced by his reasoning that Romanism in England is schismatic, and is likewise brought to see that she herself has been guilty of that dreadful sin of "presumption."

The arguments by which the various participators in the controversy sustain their parts are the same as in the pages of "Hawkestone." The following extract will convey a fair idea to our readers of Miss Sewell's mode of viewing the Romish method of proselytism:—

"Italy was now become a familiar land to Margaret, and by degrees she learnt to regard it in the same light with the Countess, not merely as the focal centre of historical associations, but as the seal and fountain-head of Christianity; for if it were enjoyment to enter into the Countess's feelings when she spoke of human acts and institutions, still more delightful was it to share the spirit of her devotion when she spoke of the Romish Church. Upon that subject, above all others, Beatrice loved to expatiate, yet not without prudence and forethought. She did not enter into argument, but she took pains to open Margaret's eyes to many of the exaggerations which hitherto had warped her judgment when thinking of Romanists. Instructed by Father Andrea, the Countess was careful to set forth the theory rather than the practice of her Church, and this in its mildest form. Margaret learned that indulgences were a remission of temporal canonical punishments, and supposing this to mean simply the remission of ecclesiastical penances, she inquired no further. Nothing was said to her of such inscriptions as that in the church of 'S. Pietro in Carcere,' at Rome, which grants every day to each one who shall visit it one thousand two hundred years of indulgence, doubled on Sundays and festivals, and moreover every day the remission of the third part of sins. She was taught to regard the titles of 'Ark of the Covenant,' 'Gate of Heaven,' 'Refuge of Sinners,' by which the blessed Virgin is addressed by Romanists, as founded entirely on the worship of Him who condescended to be born of a woman; and she did not seek to know whether such titles were sanctioned by the Primitive Church, and whether they do not presuppose a knowledge — only to be obtained by revelation — of what the present state of the mother of our Lord now is, together with her possession of that attribute of omnipresence which shall enable her to hear the prayers of all at all times. So again Margaret was informed that the Romish Church was infallible; but she did not ask that which nobody has yet been able to determine, where the infallibility lay. She heard it asserted that the early heresies were denounced by the Catholic Church, without pausing to doubt whether Catholic and Roman Catholic were synonymous terms, or whether the Bishop of Rome was at that time the head of the Christian Church. She heard the Council of Trent placed on the same footing with the first General Councils, and it did not enter into her head to study its constitution, or to question how it could be a general council when so large a portion of the Christian world as the Greek Church was excluded from it. She was told that Romanism was identically the same with primitive Christianity, and knowing little of either she took the assertion for granted; while at the same time she was unconsciously guilty of the gross unfairness of judging Rome by her theory, the English Church by her practice."

It would be a departure from the precise object of these articles were we to take up these several positions one by one, and examine them in detail. But we may express an opinion on the fairness and practical utility of this general estimate of Romish controversy. There is no doubt that the oversight described in the last of this long list of charges is one of which many persons in the English Church are guilty, while in the same frame of mind as was Margaret Percival. They judge the Roman Church by its theory, and the English Church by its practice. And more than this, they will not believe facts unfavourable to Romish practice, however public and notorious. Mr. Sewell himself has not exaggerated this foolish incredulity. "No," said Pearce, "this would not do in England. But they may do what they like in Ireland. People here believe nothing they hear of it." "No," replied O'Fogarty, "I heard some one in Oxford mention this very fact in the set with whom I was staying, and they turned up their noses, and declared that it was false; it must be false though the reporter saw it with his own eyes." Every delinquency and short-coming of the Anglican Church is seized upon by minds in this diseased state, and greedily accepted as evidence against her catholicity. Every apparent excess, extravagance, or imposition of the Romish Church is either explained away, or remonstrants are told that there is a good explanation and justification of it if we only knew what it was. To contend with reasoning of this kind is like fighting with the wind. Such persons have for the time being made up their minds; and all are foregone conclusions with them. They have determined to take the word of Roman Catholic clergymen for whatever seems objectionable in their system, and to reject the word of Anglican clergymen for whatever seems objectionable in theirs. Still of course it is only fair to them to ask by what means they have brought themselves or been brought into this state of mind. And we do not think it is always done by the means here described by Miss Sewell. That many of the dogmas and assumptions of the Romish Church may be thus glossed over, or misrepresented, to the ears of willing hearers, we readily allow; but something more than this is needed in many cases to create the willingness. There are persons with stronger minds than Margaret's, who tell you that they acknowledge what is bad in Rome, and appreciate what is good in England. But they regard the latter somewhat in the same light as that in which the Thirteenth Article regards "works done before justification." The errors of Rome are the exceptional frailties of a person in a state of grace. The virtues of Anglicanism are the sour and unprofitable fruits of an unregenerate nature. In other words, they contend that the Church of Rome has about her all the marks of a true church; and that such a church, though she may be mistaken as to means, can never go wrong as to ends; that the Church of England, on the other hand, has not these marks; and, consequently, that it is safer to err with the former than to be right on any special point with the latter. The depository of truth in the world must, they argue, have authority to proclaim and protect that truth. Any other supposition is repugnant to common sense. The Church of Rome has that authority. The Church of England has not. If she ever had it, she has now lost it. Consequently they are compelled on this à priori ground alone to accept Rome, and to swallow at one comprehensive gulp whatever may be wrapped up within the ample theory of development. There can, we fear, be little doubt that recent events within the English Church have terribly strengthened their position. The best mode of assailing it is to point out first that in spite of the want of discipline, and the silence of authority within the Anglican pale at present, no Catholic doctrine has yet been lost; no essential article of faith, or even practice, been dropped out of her creeds or formularies; and, to urge in the second place, that half a century or so is nothing in the life of the Church; that it is a short time even as a period of trial and purgation; and that if we can be satisfied on other grounds of the integrity of the Anglican title, we ought not to believe on this alone, that she has been permitted to lapse irrevocably out of the Catholic system. To the particular state of mind on which these topics are intended to operate, neither Miss Sewell nor her brother have addressed themselves. In their day, no doubt, the difficulty was one of a different kind. The movement of 1833 had created a taste for greater splendour of ceremonial, a thirst for greater formal demonstrations of ecclesiastical power and prerogative — had, in a word, kindled the imaginings of the rising generation of Church people. Rome took advantage of that state of mind then, as she takes advantage of the dissatisfaction felt with the helpless state of the English Church now. But of course the two kinds of danger arising from these two different sources must be met by two distinct modes of treatment. What we had to fear then was a vague and roving sentimentalism which affected great numbers of the young, but which was in itself a comparatively mild complaint, and under judicious treatment did not often end fatally. What we have to fear now is a prejudice which has its roots in the reason; a disease which drives its fangs into the logical powers, and which as it comes home only to fewer and older persons, is deeper and deadlier in proportion. "Hawkestone" and "Margaret Percival" are as powerless over this disorder as magnesia is to cure the cholera. But we cannot blame their authors for not providing medicines for a future and as yet unforeseen development of the Romish fever, besides devising remedies for that which raged before their eyes.

The change which has come about in the relative positions of Rome and England since 1840, is, indeed, extremely curious and interesting. We do not participate the absurd expectations entertained by Rome herself of the work that she is to accomplish in England. But we fear that, just at the present moment, she is in a better position than she was twenty years ago. The causes of the change are some of them obvious, and some only to be seen upon reflection. Among the first is, of course, the temporary weakness inflicted on the Church of England by the loss of so many able men as accompanied Newman in his secession. A still more influential one is the knowledge which Rome in turn derived from her converts; a knowledge we mean of England and the English character which she never possessed before. She has turned this knowledge to marvellously good account. She now keeps much more in the background than she used to do the more offensive elements of her system. She consults to some extent the simplicity and severity of English taste. She has been warned of the acuteness of English common sense, and has renounced, in great measure, that palaver of liberalism which once used to render her so hateful. These are two of the causes to which Rome is indebted for the more favourable position which she now occupies. A third, and more deeply cutting one than either, lies in the extraordinary and rapid evolutions of English theology within the same period of time. Shut our eyes to the fact as we will, the tendency of these movements has been to mark men off more and more into two distinct camps, with a natural tendency on both sides to espouse the extreme view. There is the side of authority and the side of freedom. The first feeling itself driven more and more every day to look out for some visible depository of the trust committed to the Church, some rock amid the waters on which it may repose with safety; the other losing faith every moment in all theological dogmatism, and all ecclesiastical government, and drifting rapidly to the conclusion that the gospel is nothing more than a slight improvement on the "Ethics," and that Christianity was not so much a revelation as the infusion into the world of what is called "a better spirit." People are growing impatient of compromise, and of that view of things according to which the greater the compromise the greater the truth. Men's passions are embittered, and the exhortations of Anglicanism are now as powerless to restrain them as were those of Latinus to restrain his countrymen from war.

And in this situation of affairs Rome has a great advantage. We cannot pursue the subject at present. It is sufficient for us to have sketched the gulf that intervenes between the ecclesiastical "situation" in the days of "Hawkestone," and that which exists now.

ABIGAIL.

CHAPTER I.

THE MURDERER.

THE distinction of the Howes' drawing-room was its old fashioned rosiness: wreaths of rose-buds, with a border of tiny roseleaves on a white ground for the paper on the walls; little groups of roses in imitation moss for the design of the carpet; rose-coloured damask, and rosewood furniture, and dried rose leaves in pink china bowls on the card-tables.

A drawing-room where 'I'd be a butterfly' might have been sung appropriately, as like our grand-mother's pretty hacknied idea of a rose bower as possible.

There was a little reflection of the rosiness, full-blown and of the cabbage-rose variety (but the rose by the name of cabbage does not fail to smell sweet, in fact smells sweetest of all), on Mrs. Howe's matron cheeks; and the olive moire gown which she wore on the occasion of a dinner-party, given by the first attorney in Ashley to a newly-married couple, stood for the green leaves.

There was no rosiness about Mr. Howe, displayed on the hearth-rug — like the carpet, a mass of roses — composing his mind to his fate as host, except that he was just the bald, bent-headed, pale-complexioned business man in irreproachable black broadcloth, watered silk vest, neat pearl pin, and large white cornelian seal at his watch-guard, to own a rosy drawing-room.

The girl in the black lace dress, one of those happy dresses which have a simple, graceful character in all ranks, with the little refined, intelligent face, delicate nostrils, sensitive mouth, fine low brow, and brightly bronzed hair (the one thing bright about her), a more refined and intelligent than blooming face, was also the girl, by several steps more advanced in cultivation than her father and mother, likely to be the daughter of a rosy drawing-room.

One might as soon have expected to find a grave in a flower-garden as the trace of a tragedy on the stage of the rosy drawing-room, among the dramatis persone of a harmless, respectable family group. But there are social tragedies performed in honest circles, from the queen's court to the cook's kitchen. A poor little woman's happiness had been murdered in the rosy drawing-room as certainly as ever hapless elderly gentleman was knocked on the head in a railway carriage. More than that, the breathless corpse was buried in the familiar haunt; and the three persons present were treating what was no secret according to their natural instinct. Mrs. Howe was covering the grave and pretending it had never been, as a daisy will perk up its head on the turf by a path no longer trodden, and a kettle sing by a hearth when other songs are silent. Mr. Howe, whom Mrs. Howe had lived with in the nearest relation for five-and-twenty years, and knew no better at the end of them than to declare of him that Mr. Howe, like all other married, middle-aged men of business, had not a particle of sentiment (it is to be conjectured that Mrs. Howe associated sentiment with down on the upper lip, fancy straw hats, shooting and yachting jackets, and mutinous assertions of 'I won't go home till morning'), planted his square-toed, glossy black feet, doggedly on the trampled down, withered spot. He had never praised his daughter to her face in his life, hardly ever behind her back; but he had rated his girl so highly in the shrine of his thoughts, that he would have had it an honour for the first man in the country to win her regard. He would have had her stand so far above every man that she should have shown favour to none except upon a humble and assiduous suit. He had been in his gruffness silently, austere, chivalrous on the points of women and love affairs; and he had not wished his only child, for whom he had provided, and who was the light of his eyes, married away from him. But the customs of society and women were against him. Now he stood there prepared to shake the hand, and share his bread and salt with the man who had wronged him in the tenderest quarter, and not with any feeling of forgiveness, but in self-defence and to prevent scandal, like the coarse handling of a wound. He had never mentioned the subject to his daughter, hardly ever to his wife, to his mind there was degradation in the idea; but as he stood there in his plain quiet pride and bitterness, he whom Mrs. Howe would no more have suspected of match-making than the judge on the circuit, or the bishop come for a confirmation, he was turning over impatiently in his thoughts whether there was any young fellow about Ashley who had ever shown incipient symptoms of admiration for Abigail, which might be fostered and developed, if the young fellow were only manly and upright, though his wordly position was but tolerable, into a grand passion and a declaration of marriage. A speedy marriage with a man who would love and cherish her, was the thing the most to be desired for Abigail and them all, and he had lived long enough to welcome it.

For Abigail Howe, the girl in the black lace dress, with the little refined face, she sat and listened to her mother remarking how well she was looking, and running over the names of the young people who were expected along with the married couples, and foretelling how much they would enjoy themselves, ignored the grave which concerned her so nearly, but sat and looked at it nevertheless, with a keen intensity of vision, like an additional sense, while she was professing to draw on her gloves; and at the same time felt inconsistently as if the corpse that grave contained were again led out alive to be shot and stabbed.

The first ring at the door-bell brought not the Bingham from the Hanger, Humphrey used to be first, but Humphrey Bingham's partner in the factory. Tom Prior was a man thirty-three years by the register, but much younger-looking, the son of an old confidential clerk of the Bingham, with a great, honest admiration for Humphrey. He had frank and genial qualities of his own when he was quite at his ease; but he was seldom at his ease in company, otherwise he was a quiet gentlemanlike fellow where his shyness did not get the better of him, and he made a desperate, unsuccessful, unbecoming effort to conceal it by being noisy, doing his mind an injustice as he habitually did his body, tall and swinging, by dressing half in a shabby, half in an outré fashion, and by wearing a tremendous black beard and whiskers—one of these hairy adornments being more than sufficient for his dark, thin, persistently boyish face, with its gentle mouth and pair of earnest, eager eyes. After paying his respects incoherently to Mr. and Mrs. Howe, Tom Prior drifted rather wildly towards Abigail and settled beside her, giving her the trouble of making conversation for him, while she saw him already putting forth his restless, uncanonical hand and disarranging the dahlias and ferns she had grouped in the flower-glass. He answered her in monosyllables, till all at once he dashed into extravagant encomiums on Mrs. Humphrey Bingham, and called on Abigail to second his admiration and confirm his opinion that Mrs. Humphrey was the very wife for Humphrey, worthy of Humphrey, and Humphrey worthy of her.

Abigail did not attribute her companion's talk to malice; she was aware, with all Ashley, that Tom Prior was the greatest blunderer as well as the cleverest fellow in the town; extraordinarily obtuse on some points, exceedingly simple on others, liable to obstinate delusions and odd vagaries. She did not take it ill in Tom Prior that he should thus taunt her. She knew that he saw nothing wrong that Humphrey did, that Tom was content to be the working partner in the factory, and had a genuine pride in the country-gentleman pursuits and accomplishments which came as naturally to Humphrey Bingham, as if he had been born to them. 'Have you seen Humphrey's bay horse, Miss Howe?' Tom used to ask, breathlessly, before Humphrey had a wife to be praised; 'well, did you ever see such an animal? Steps as high as my head, and Humphrey manages it as if it were a donkey.' Abigail was not angry; she answered Tom in a soft, gracious manner, which brought a dusky flush into all that was seen of Tom's cheek, caused him to champ the ends of his whiskers and beard fiercely, sent his wistful eyes to the toes of his worn boots, that had a trick of protruding in an ungainly manner from his dress trousers. These trousers, with his coat, had been so ingeniously ill-folded, they were creased from wrist to heel; he might have been sleeping in them for a week; they might as well have been out at the elbows and frayed at the feet, for any effect, either of a fine income or a careful toilette, they were calculated to produce on the public. At last Tom brought the conversation to an abrupt full stop as impulsive-ly as he had begun it.

The next ring ushered in the three Miss Mainwarings — old friends of Mrs. Howe's — ladies of a certain, or rather an uncertain, age, — who had been kind to Abigail from childhood, and were without reservation excellent women, for it was not their fault that the established costume of the day would not suffer them to cover their poor, bald, and grey heads decently, and that their single state and narrow income forced them to have many masculine cares and small worries, and shut them out from wide interests, bright, breezy, crowded prospects in life; so that their voices had now a sharp, now a thin tone, and their chat was of Ashley — mostly what could be seen of it from the Miss Mainwarings' windows, — dribbles of chronicles local and domestic, such as that Mrs. Leech's sister had arrived by the train that afternoon after all, and not put off her visit another week as Mrs. Leech had feared; and it was to be apprehended old Mr. Reeve's cough was worse, for his little boy was heard ringing Dr. Lewis's surgery-bell as early as seven o'clock that morning. Blameless, contented woman! yet it recurred to Abigail's mind with invincible repugnance that one of the Miss Mainwarings was said to have met with a 'disappointment' in her youth; and leaping to a conclusion, Abigail speculated in the intervals of her halting conversation with Tom Prior, whether she too would draw down and drag in her upper lip, or put up her handkerchief to her mouth every time that she laughed to hide her two false teeth, like Miss Bella Mainwaring; or stiffen her front fingers past the second joints with the hereditary rings of the Mainwarings, and feel as confident that they compensated for, and cast a distinguished lustre over, a second-rate, ill-made, drab poplin gown, as Miss Mainwaring.

The Miss Mainwarings were followed in quick succession by Mr. and Mrs. Porteous — a rich, retired couple, who had come to Ashley Lodge, and grumbled loudly because they had more money than they could spend and no children to spend it. Little Mrs. Dudgeon and her husband, who occupied Ashley Cottage until old Mr. Dudgeon should die and vacate the Bank House, and groaned deeply because they had not enough money to live upon and no end of children to make away with it, but did not think of presenting any of the olive-branches to the Porteouses, as the world sardonically suggested. Mr. Bellairs, the scrupulous vicar, thin-lipped, weak-eyed, white-cyclashed — so engrossed with the anise and cumin of minor forms and creeds that it was morally impossible, reckoning by the average age of man, and not by the centuries of the patriarchs, that he could, in the course of one life, arrive at the weightier matters of the law. Mrs. Vallance, the rich widow without an encumbrance, whom everybody in Ashley barefacedly and unblushingly courted by a kind of superstitious idolatry, expecting no gain from her spare cash (and these most attentive who needed her money least), since she was neither hospitable, handsome, witty, nor amiable, but oppressively pompous and dreadfully slow both in body and mind. The two Lewis girls, Abigail's companions, whose father, the old plodding doctor, was called to the country as usual.

Abigail felt most uncomfortable with respect to the Mainwarings and the Lewises. When Miss Margery Mainwaring, the fat sympathetic sister of the spinsters, sat close to Mrs. Howe and whispered confidentially to her, glancing significantly at Abigail, how could Abigail tell that Miss Margery was only observing that dear Abigail was looking lovely to-night — that black lace dress never got a bit worse, and hinting, with preventive caution, that Mr. Tom Prior seemed much struck by her; he would not get up from his seat by the young lady of the house; he had not offered to relinquish his chair to any of them, and if Mr. and Mrs. Howe did not approve of attentions in that quarter — though Miss Margery was disposed to regard Mr. Tom with favour as a very fair rising fish, particularly now that other fish were out of the sea — the present was the time to nip them in the bud. Abigail was terrified lest Miss Margery should be taking advantage of old friendship to presume to pity her and dare to abuse him with, 'How well she is keeping up, poor dear!' and, 'I wonder what the fellow will think?'

Then the Lewises were in reality principally taken up with the bride — what she would wear; it was said she had brought over the most recherché gowns from Paris, but perhaps she would think them too good for an Ashley dinner; whether she would be frank and good-natured as well as beautiful, and a fortune, and have people at the Hanger, and chaperon Ashley girls occasionally to assize balls and breakfasts? If Abigail had been able to call all her wits about her, she might have judged that the story of Humphrey Bingham and Abigail Howe was already out of date to girls who had their own destinies to settle, and their own fortunes hanging in the balance. If they had been jilted they would either have refused to meet the jilter, fallen ill and had the diversion of being ordered away from Ashley for change of air and scene, or they would have paraded their carelessness and made a dead set with their hearts on the rebound, as indeed they were doing without their hearts having been bent, at Humphrey Bingham's partner. But though Tom Prior was unheroically fond of being made up to, drawn out, met half way, it saved him such laborious exertion and agonies of nervousness, and was in danger of being boisterous with accommodating girls in Swiss bodices and Jenny Lind curls, like the Lewises, he did not respond to their advances to-night, but hung back, and, as the Miss Mainwarings expressed it, would not give up his seat by the young lady of the house, and his opportunity, if Mr. Howe did not name another man, of taking her down to dinner.

If Abigail, for her self-respect, had but been able to forget how the Lewises had been given to teasing her about Humphrey Bingham — to coming in with intelligence that they had met Humphrey Bingham with his skates over his shoulder, or his cricket-bat in his hand, and he had stopped them to inquire whether there would be any ladies on the pond or in the field, and they had replied they were going to Church-street and they would speak of it to Miss Howe, and he had charged them to do so, and he would be on the look-out to take them on the ice or into the Gate, — sure that the news would be acceptable, and it had been acceptable. Abigail had been angry at first, and she had never felt inclined to tell the Lewises her secrets, but she had ended by liking nothing better than such idle, half-jesting communications. She had been so foolishly fond of Humphrey Bingham that the mere sound of his name, and she could detect it across the hum of a crowded room, had been welcome; it had been pleasant, however idiotically pleasant — pleasanter than anything would ever be in the world again, — to hear Criss or Sophy Lewis so much as wind up their rambling descriptions of places they had been at with, 'and your friend Humphrey Bingham was there.' And in the end it would have been a blessing if Abigail's memory had been as short as Humphrey's and the Lewises.

At last came the carriage from the Hanger, and the couple were half-way up the staircase, while Criss Lewis was commenting that new masters — or mistresses in this case — made new laws; Tom Prior was springing up to do honour to Mr. and Mrs. Humphrey Bingham, as if their host and hostess were not sufficient; Mr. and Mrs. Howe were coming forward — Mr. Howe ceremoniously, Mrs. Howe really cordially — she could not be anything but cordial, as the cabbage-rose could not do anything but smell sweet; and Abigail was rising, with her head swimming, her hands growing cold as ice, her very lips feeling cold as they whitened. But it was a wise, stanch head, which she must hold high and carry bravely, though the Spartan boy's wolf was in her woman's breast, under the folds of the black lace; and there were two mocking voices, one at each ear, telling her in different tones, 'Oh fie, Abigail, to fear to meet a married man!' and 'he never said in so many words, "Abigail, will you be my wife?"'

Humphrey, with his wife on his arm, unchanged, only blushing a little as he caught Abigail's eye; big, broad-shouldered Humphrey, who made Tom Prior look like a lath beside him; Humphrey, with his masses of tawny hair and beard, sunlit like Abigail's, which had set the fashion to Tom Prior, but which caused Tom's facial forest to look grim by comparison — a great blue-eyed fellow with a presence full of strength, frankness, and kindness, and the inconsiderateness of a child, owning plenty of sense and an intellect not without a heavy trenchant power, but reflection, talent, and penetration, except by instinct, null. There was the murderer with his murder sitting lightly upon him, as may be the case with most murderers, remorse being probably a popular fiction like poetic justice; and certainly if no evil intent could bring down the accusation against him to manslaughter, Humphrey was entitled to the commutation. It was trying — the first shaking hands with Abigail Howe: when the last time he had clasped the cold fingers he had detained them in his broad palm, in that rosy drawing-room too, under the impression that he would hold them thus, figuratively, through life, and he was sure Abigail had known what was in his mind. But if so, why had she not done anything to detain him? A straw would have kept him by her side then, a word caused him to commit himself; or why had she not gone on that visit he had wished her to pay to the Southcotes—friends of both of them—when he would have joined her, and almost to a certainty declared himself, beyond recall, before following his mother and sisters into Green-shire? Instead of that she allowed him to go away among influences confessedly hostile to her, well aware all the time that he was an easy-going fellow, who would do anything for peace: some women were so cold and prudish, and they must take the consequences. Then he met Alice, his beautiful high-spirited Alice, who made no bones of bringing him to her feet, and there was the end of it. He supposed most men found it awkward to meet some girls after their marriages; for his part there were other girls in different parts of the country he would not care to see, for an interval, any more than Abigail Howe; though he was thankful there was no one else who could somehow cut him up in the middle of his happiness, and cost him a horrid disagreeable incomprehensible feeling as if he regretted what he had done, and yearned for something different, when he had been very proud and glad to win Alice, and she suited him perfectly, enabled him to quit the Factory any day too, and go in for no end of improvements on the dear old Hanger. He was a fool for his pains. Abigail Howe was far too strait-laced, too delicate-minded, too good and guileless, poor soul, to waste regrets upon a married man; she had never cared much for him, or she might have had him, that was the fact; he was willing to acknowledge it, mortifying as it was to his vanity. She had been too good for him—not that Alice was not good, but Alice's goodness was more like his own, more in the way of the world.

There was Humphrey's manly, comely figure and face lighting up Abigail's eyes, and his ringing voice making music in her ears, as they had ever done; and Abigail's crown of sorrow was that they could not darken to her gaze and make discord of sound, or cause her to hate him. For what? There had been no deliberate treachery. It had been in the essence of Humphrey's constitution to be light and fickle, to forget and amuse himself, to desert and replace her by another. He was the same Humphrey whom Abigail had all along known and loved; it was her own fault if she had loved him, being unworthy; and how could she begin hating him now simply because the defects of his character had been directed against her and had reduced her to despair? In place of hating him, it gave her exquisite pain, as a consideration by itself, that Humphrey should be vexed and abashed to come to Church-street, that he should keep away from her, dislike to encounter her; that he should begin to hate her, when she would do anything in the world at this moment to spare him pain, to save his little finger from aching.

Neither could one little ceremony, however sacred or fatal, reverse the tide in which her nature had been flowing for many months, and efface all accumulated influences and associations. He would have been Humphrey Bingham to Abigail all the same though he had become Turk, and been privileged to appear with a hundred wives—the man Abigail had thought of and dreamt of, and been foolishly glad to meet with, and foolishly sad to part from, during two of her twenty years of life. There was Humphrey, and there on his strong caressing arm was the woman who had supplanted Abigail, she who filled the proud and happy place from which Abigail was shut out, to continue the much-thought-of daughter in the dull, stifling house in Church-street, and grow in time old, narrow, and loveless, a great deal worse than the Miss Mainwarings—for there were three of them.

Mrs. Humphrey had thought it worth while to dress well. She wore a pink silk trimmed with black velvet, and a set of topazes on her neck and arms. The soft pink, so much more delicate than the rosiness of Mrs. Howe's drawing-room, and the black velvet, became her beauty admirably. She was a beautiful woman of one and twenty, with the silkiest black hair, large, well-opened, dark-grey eyes, and a rich creamy white and pure pale pink complexion. She had a tall, elegant figure, rounded and undulating in its slenderness, and was a handsome creature, even to the daintiest tapering hands and most arched and fairy feet. She was lively; the waiting company could hear her voice chattering and laughing with Humphrey before the door was opened, and she soon showed a habit of arching and depressing her somewhat marked black brows, and shrugging her sloping shoulders, which the Ashley people in their primitiveness called French-looking. But there was no affectation about her; there might be a little air of self-satisfaction, an anticipation of the sensation she would create when she entered the room, as if she claimed it as a right—nothing more. She was very self-possessed for so young a married woman, more so than Humphrey for a married man—but then there were drawbacks where Humphrey was concerned.—and very affable for a beauty, an heiress, and well born as she was wealthy. There was no haughtiness about Mrs. Humphrey, and she intended to make herself agreeable: perhaps the intention was a shade too apparent, but that was an amiable weakness; and all the eyes upon her noted that she was particularly friendly to her husband's partner, Tom Prior, as he made reverent salaams to her, and betrayed an ardent desire to kiss the ground she and Humphrey trod upon. In short young Mrs. Humphrey Bingham came, saw, and conquered the little circle she chose, like an acute young woman, to conquer. Abigail Howe was ready to gratify Tom Prior by assenting with quiet conviction to his fervent and exulting protestations that Mrs. Humphrey, take her all in all, was the most charming woman he had ever come across, and Mrs. Humphrey was Humphrey's.

Mrs. Humphrey had no objection to being Humphrey's. In her conversation—and she talked a great deal in return for Mr. Howe's polite monosyllables on the one side of her, and Miss Mainwaring's little speeches on the beauty of the neighbourhood, the convenience of the markets, and Dr. Lewis's disinclination to be questioned about his patients, on the other—there were incessant allusions to Humphrey, or “my husband,” or the Hanger. She appealed more than once to Humphrey as to an authority at her command. “Humphrey, please tell Mr. Howe how they dredge for oysters on the French coast.” “Humphrey, you remember the name of the gentleman connected with Ashley, who crossed the Simpson along with us?” Abigail had it dinned into her ears that Humphrey belonged to another; but it was the strangest of all to hear the favoured stranger alluding to persons and things about Ashley of which Humphrey had told her, and making garbled statements of the events of the past year which Abigail knew a thousand times better than she knew them. “That Aberwich road where Mr. Bingham met his fall following the hounds.” Pooh! it was not the Aberwich but the Haverton road which it had turned Abigail sick to pass weeks after the accident. “The week my sister Millicent spent at the Hanger last winter,”—when it was not Humphrey's sister Millicent, but Fanny, who had stayed ten days at Bachelor's Hall, as Humphrey had called it, and begged Abigail to keep her company part of the time, and professed to like Abigail very much as her friend, though she opposed her with all her might when there was a chance of Abigail being her sister. Not that she and the women of the family were in any way dependent on Humphrey, but because the match with Abigail Howe was not one projected by Humphrey's sisters, Fanny and Co., and because he might do a great deal better—and he had done a great deal better they would reflect triumphantly. Abigail wondered with a vague wonder whether she would thus have publicly asserted her possession of Humphrey, and if by any chance she could have as glibly mangled similar carelessly picked-up details.

There were two particulars Abigail discovered of Mrs. Humphrey before the company rose from the dinner table. First, that the young wife had a great deal to say which was not very much worth hearing, unless because it was the generally inoffensive and occasionally airy gossip of a pretty, pleasant, cultivated woman; and second, that although her dialect was refined and her articulation correct, there was something slightly harsh in the tones of her voice, bass like a man's, which might form a good second in a song, but were a little startling and not without a strain of coarseness in the beautiful, elegant young woman, who was so insensible to her own gifts except as means to an end, yet who enjoyed with a keen appreciation being a bride,—Humphrey Bingham, the handsome, hearty young squire of the Hanger's envied bride.

As the dinner wore on, the constraint of the principal persons in the party lessened. Even Abigail felt as if she had grown accustomed to the scene, as if it were not only a necessity, but the natural order of things, that she should be sitting there answering intelligibly, now and then to Tom Prior's eccentric spurts of conversation on factories, Shakspeare, fieldfares; attending as far as she could manage to the entertainment of the guests; venturing a smiling word up the table to draw Miss Bella Mainwaring and the scrupulous curate into a nearer approach to social intercourse; gently arousing Tom Prior to the knowledge that he was turning his back on Sophy Lewis, pouting and eating her pheasant behind that section of him, sufficient to throw her into the shade.

Abigail felt that she ought to be flattered when Mrs. Humphrey selected her as her companion in the drawing-room and poured into Abigail's ears all her good-humoured, well-pleased, half-girlish, half-womanly stories. If Abigail was not angry with Humphrey, far less was she angry with Mrs. Humphrey. She had even a pitiful sense of Mrs. Humphrey's ignorance of the pain she was inflicting, at the very moment that Abigail was experiencing that there are worse deaths than those of shooting and stabbing, namely, those of being pricked and probed by inches, or tickled into convulsions, as Mrs. Humphrey ran on about her home at the Hanger, with which Abigail's imagination was familiar as with Paradise, the gate of which was shut on the first woman. — (But she had a great compensation, Adam went out with Eve).

Mrs. Humphrey questioned Abigail about the capabilities of Ashley for gaiety, and then followed rapidly, "Humphrey told me he gave a ball last year. Oh, you must have been at it; tell me all about it."

What a vivid comprehension Abigail had of the impossibility of the request and of the astounding endless information she would have had to give! It was then she had been staying with Fanny Bingham, to help her with the preparations; and Humphrey, too, had helped so zealously, that Fanny was constantly scolding him away from departments in which he could have had no experience, and where his presence could be of no possible use. Even after the company were ready to assemble, he would not let the ladies away to dress, or get up himself from what Fanny described as a gipsy tea in the library, until she employed sisterly diligence on him; and after that he came and knocked at Abigail's door with her bouquet. (Was it wrong for her to keep some of the American primroses pressed and dried yet?)

"It was a very successful ball," Abigail answered, discreetly; "Miss Pierrepont was the beauty."

"And Humphrey danced a great deal with her? I know he has a weakness for beauties," exclaimed Mrs. Humphrey, with a little conscious laugh. "He was always admiring the pretty women we met; but I would not pay him the compliment of being jealous."

No, Humphrey had not shown his weakness on the night in question. In spite of his duties as a host, he had danced oftenest with a girl who was better than a beauty to those who could read her little delicate face, but who was not an acknowledged beauty amongst girls.

Mrs. Humphrey's chat went off upon her wedding tour in foreign countries, which Abigail had craved to visit when her heart was a living, craving heart, of which Humphrey had told her much; for he had been fond of making rushes to the Continent as Tom Prior had afforded him the leisure to do. How familiar the name sounded! — the Louvre, Versailles, Straburg, the Drachenfels, the Castle of Heidelberg, Lausanne, Geneva. How familiar, yet with what an altered signification, since Humphrey had spoken of them with a decided implication that they would one day visit them together! Never, now, never!

Mrs. Humphrey travelled back — with words in which there was a weary murmur of other times — not so distant in space, but so wide apart in sensation, arrived at length at the great event of her life, her wedding, and was proceeding on more and more dangerous ground, with Abigail quite incapable of stopping her, when Humphrey and the other gentlemen came into the drawing-room. Even the most independent young wives of the most gallant husbands look a little put out when they are caught in their favourite narrative within three months of the event. It was an unspeakable relief to Abigail when Mrs. Humphrey said hastily, "I'll tell you it all another time, Miss Howe," blushed, and was actually silent for three minutes, turning over a book of engravings.

Humphrey had got up his spirits. It is only the first step which pains, and to him the first step was taken. All the torments of reminiscences were done and over for him, when they commenced afresh, with redoubled force, for Abigail. For it was in the rosy drawing-room — when the rosiest now so artificial seemed natural, but was neither of earth nor sky, and certainly not of the mock-pastoral sort, as displayed in antiquated upholstery (there was as great a difference between the two as that between fading roses fresh with dew, and unfading roses sticky with gum) — he spent most time when he was courting her. There he had leant against the work-table, and looked at her making believe to work for an hour at a time. Some of the books were on the tray which he had so often turned over as an excuse to detain him a little longer; but Humphrey was not a book-man, and had doubtless forgotten their names and covers. Among the flowers in the stand was the very wavy-leaved fern he had sought and brought for her all the way from the Irish lakes. What a happy evening that had been, when he had gone straight to Church-street, brown and travel-soiled, in place of going home to the Hanger; and the two had planted the fern, and he had stayed to supper and returned to his own house and his house-keeper, after his three weeks' absence, at twelve o'clock at night! Well, the poor wavy-leaved fern was not to blame, and Abigail had never found it in her heart to cast it from her stand. Mrs. Humphrey had everything: might not Abigail have a fern and a few withered primroses?

But Humphrey remembered none of these things. He was frank and accessible by nature; and, a rolling stone going about the world, he was constantly making friends and constantly making use of their friendship. Good-hearted as Humphrey was, perhaps the bloom of his heart had been rubbed off in the friction of many slight ties—perhaps it had never really had any bloom so fine as to be rubbed off. Without doubt he had passed through a crowd of impressions. The only perfectly fresh ones which he had received since he grew up first, and which were inevitably of greater depth and importance than any he had received for a long time, had been made between that date and the last year.

So there Humphrey was addressing Abigail and his wife in the same breath, forbidding Mrs. Humphrey to sing any more because her chest had not been strong since she caught a bad cold at Munich. 'You know, Alice, I can't have you ill again.' 'Nonsense, Humphrey,' Alice protested, in comical indignation, 'it was the merest touch of bronchitis; why, auntie herself would not have been frightened. Could you have guessed that a great big fellow like him would have got nervous, and plagued three people, himself, the doctor, and me, for six coughs?'

Humphrey was too much of a gentleman and a man of sense to make a fool of himself and his wife, and affront the company by a display of matrimonial felicity. But straws show how the wind blows, and he showed his feelings naturally to demonstrativeness. It might have been patent to the most indifferent observer that Mrs. Humphrey's fortune had been the least of her attractions in her husband's eyes. He was both proud and fond of his wife, and triumphant in his success. Abigail, who said to herself she had a hundred ears and eyes to-night, noticed that he applied with his eyes to his wife some of the songs which Tom Prior insisted on Abigail singing, standing by her and neglecting to turn over the pages of her music, while Humphrey lounged against the piano, his side to Abigail, his face to his wife. Mrs. Humphrey put a stop to the proceedings by instituting a parallel between herself and Abigail. She took up the sheets of music.

'My name begins with A too, Miss Howe, and I write it short also, "A. Bingham," as Humphrey writes "H. Bingham." I don't see why I should be at the trouble of writing "Alice," when he does not put "Humphrey," although he says it as if the A stood for Alick or Antony, and I were his brother; and he scolded me before we were married for not signing my full name at the end of my notes—do you remember Humphrey? I see you write "A. Howe" in the same way.'

Not in the same way. Alice and Abigail were very different names (to Abigail it seemed the difference was significant), and she had learned to make Abigail A., not in merry mischief or to copy a cherished example, not even to save trouble, but when as a foolish girl she had been a little ashamed of David's wife's name, appropriated by Mrs. Masham and the entire class of waiting-maids. She felt as if her very name had been against her, yet it had not sounded amiss—not in its Americanism when Humphrey had audaciously shortened it to Miss Abby, and she had fancied it would have a redeeming glory as A. Bingham. Alice had robbed her of her very name.

The last glimpse Abigail had of Humphrey was bending forward to the laughing face, so lovely in its scarlet hood, while he wrapped Mrs. Humphrey in her rugs as the carriage drove off and disappeared in the dusky darkness of the September night. Paradise vanished with them to Abigail. The Miss Mainwarings walked home under the wing of Tom Prior, their little maid walking demurely behind them. The Lewises pulled each an arm of their patient father,—turned up from his last country call. Mrs. Vallance deliberately composed her share of the one solemn sentence she was to exchange with the Vicar in two streets' length. Mrs. Porteous and Mrs. Dudgeon strove in vain to enlighten darkened minds (each working on her friend's husband) on the respective burdens of childless ease and many-childed struggles, and entered the lodge and the cottage, Mrs. Porteous to discover that the evening post had brought her the overwhelming disappointment of an apology from the friends whose visit she had counted on for helping her and Porteous to get rid of the burden of their autumn; and little Mrs. Dudgeon, that her absence had put the head sheaf on her stack of worries—so disproportioned to the size of the woman; since her fourth boy, Algernon, had taken the liberty of falling down a flight of stairs, and little Charlotte had been so lost to propriety as to swallow a pin.

Abigail's strength failed her in an instant, and she crept with slow, lagging steps, without saying a word, to her room for the night. - The terrible ordeal of forming the target to be shot at by the flights of arrows of common curiosity, commiseration, and a little contempt, and the silent, single, more deadly darts of retrospection, longing, despair, was over. But Abigail had lived long enough to know that the worst was to come. Woman's griefs are like ghosts, which wait for the dark night or the grey morning to troop round her soul. They drove Abigail from her sleepless pillow, compelled her to pace up and down restlessly but stealthily, for fear of disturbing her father and mother, first huddling on her dressing-gown and slippers, because she must not on any account be ill at this period of her life, and then, 'walking up and pacing down,' living all the purgatory of the evening over again with a tenfold life. She, the pure, tender girl, reproaching herself, hating herself because of her human nature, praying to God to forgive her, rocking herself wearily, wringing her hands in anguish, writhing with shame, crying dumbly, 'Oh! Humphrey, Humphrey; neither in this world, nor beyond the stars. Given up by you, of your own free will, another woman your love, your wife; and I loved and love you, Humphrey,—how much—your mother, who hated me without a cause, might, no other woman, not the happy woman you love, could fathom.'

And Humphrey was sleeping the sound sleep of health, content, and an easy conscience.

While Tom Prior was walking up and down before his lodging door, puffing smoke into the early morning air, recklessly risking his character as an unexceptionable young man, by staying abroad till his footsteps might be heard contemporaneously with the cock-crow, restless like Abigail Howe, but restless not with misery but bliss, such as had not yet exalted and humbled his fervid soul.

CHAPTER II.

THE VICTIM BROUGHT TO LIFE AGAIN.

THE rosy drawing-room was rosier than ever on a long day in June; but the tables and chairs were literally loaded with drapers' parcels, milliners' band-boxes, ornamental pieces of china, and small pieces of silver plate, with bits of strings entangling the hands and feet everywhere. Abigail Howe stood in the centre in profound calculation, with long streamers of white ribbon on one arm, and her hands full of little sprigs of artificial flowers, white flowers, jessamine. Her dress was in contrast to her occupation. She wore a faded muslin gown, two summers old, ready to be laid aside, like the worn-out garments of her maiden life, and her bronzed hair tucked tightly out of the way, back from her little thin face, as if she had dressed it in the pre-occupation of much to do, with no thought but to dispose of it so as to lighten the temples and give the least trouble to preserve the glory in order. But she did not fail to have the lace at her throat gathered together by a little cluster of leaves in dead and glittering gold, and to wear on one of her fingers a changing coloured opal ring, both indicating the taste of a man whose untutored artistic fancy went beyond his means; and his appreciation of the money value of ornaments.

Mrs. Howe entered the room, her bluff, cabbage-rose face beaming with delight; and though it was evening, a white apron over her gown, white cuffs drawn up to her elbows, and the strings of her cap pinned carefully over her shoulders, to hang behind her. She never trusted any one but herself with her jellies, and this was an epoch for the most anxious experiments with her confectionery.

'My love, I have been making a trial of a few of these moulds, as there must be some additions to the dinner to-morrow, on your aunts' and uncles' account at any rate. I think, let cook say what she will about pyramids being newer, I prefer my old turtle-dove. She has come out to the life, only her beak broken, which will never be observed, and I am just going to supply the cloves for eyes. I declare, when the jelly shakes, you would think she was shaking her wings to rise and fly off.'

'I don't think that would be a desirable effect, mamma.'

'No. But you will know better what the weight of jellies is on one's mind, when you come to give your first dinner. To be sure you will have me to apply to for many a long year, I hope; and I dare say you will take in a jobbing cook, as so many of the young housekeepers do now. But I trust you will never put your dinners into the hands of the hotel-keepers, or confectioners—such disgracefully extravagant, lazy, and indifferent behaviour, I could never countenance it, Abigail.'

'I wish you would wait, till I give a dinner, mamma.'

'Of course you will give dinners, child. Where would be the use of your best dinner china, if you did not give dinners? I warrant he will care for such things, then; all married men do.'

'I must have faith in my good stars that he will not.'

'And if he do not care for dinners, which is not to be thought of, you will put your pride in them.'

'My pride in dinners!' ejaculated the bride, in half-amused incredulity.

'You might put your pride in worse. You will not go gadding about to dancing parties and picnics after you are a married woman. Not that you ever were a gadder,' taking back her words penitently, 'but as good and quiet a girl as ever I saw. But where would your bit of pleasure be then, Abigail?'

'I am sure I don't know,' answered Abigail in a staid, tired tone.

'Don't stay any longer poking about here, my pet,' her mother enjoined her hastily. 'Brides should leave all trouble to ordinary mortals; it is not lucky to do otherwise. Go and be happy and admired and adored while your day lasts. He will be here presently, I suppose, and you will be too late to dress for him. We are going to have an early tea in the dining-room to-night, that Sarah may clear out this room, the last tea papa and you and I will take together, before your uncles and aunts arrive. There, I ought not to have said that, to tempt you to break down.'

However, Abigail did not break down. She merely said, with a wistfulness which took away the ungraciousness of the words, 'Then I wish he would keep away when it is to be our last tea. He would have done it, if I had only asked him.'

'No, we could not expect that,' Mrs. Howe warned her daughter. 'Were you looking out for him?'

'No. I never look out for him,' confessed Abigail, candidly, 'because he comes at all times; so that looking out for him would be no sinecure. And I am dressed already if you please, mamma. I am not going to do any more in the way of dressing to-night.'

'It is not as I please,' hesitated Mrs. Howe, a troubled expression stealing over the bright roundness of her face, 'but as he pleases.'

'Oh, I need not dress for him,' Abigail assured her mother, with a little nervous laugh, the first she had given. 'I am certain he never sees what I wear; I might put a helmet on my head, like Minerva, or a coal-scuttle, it would be all the same to him if it were I who wore it. Queer, is it not, mamma?'

An event was about to happen in the domestic economy of the Howes which was sufficient to overturn even the simpering, decorous, rosy affectation of the drawing-room. Abigail Howe was to be married in a few days to Tom Prior. Everything in the household was exceedingly uncomfortable, and everybody much put about; but from Mr. Howe, to the under kitchen-maid, who was given to pounding sand to apply to her floors and tables at all hours, as an apothecary's boy pounds his drugs, and was hurt in her feelings (as an apothecary's boy rarely is) when she was stopped and taken away to less serious and urgent occupations; everybody was mild and complacent in the chaos, under the reflected honour of a marriage in the family.

The gain to Mr. Howe was very small and entirely honorary, and counterbalanced by the loss of his only child, the paying down of half of her portion (with the precaution of setting it on herself), the liberal furnishing of his grateful son-in-law's house — the old house in Mill-street which the elder Bingham had occupied in the good old days of cotton-spinning before they grew grand and went out to the Hanger. The old house had always been thought a good family house, though it was venerable and shady, and stood alone in its grade in old-fashioned dignity and usefulness near its factory; and it was, as Mr. Howe was furnishing it, a handsome house for a young couple, the head of whom was only the junior partner in the factory.

Mr. Howe gave his full consent to the marriage; and Mrs. Howe, kind woman, was infinitely more elated than the bride herself at having her daughter married as she deserved to be before the Lewises, and not long after Mrs. Leech's sister — that lady had come to Ashley for a fortnight's visit and snapped up the scrupulous Vicar, who either laid aside his scruples under the pressure of circumstances, or found he had so much to do in controlling the outer courts of men's consciences, that he was obliged to slur over the important step, to himself, of his own marriage. But Mrs. Howe did not blame Mr. Bellairs, it was Mrs. Leech's sister whom she, generally the most indulgent of women, could not forgive for being so grasping. As if marrying men were as abundant as acorns in an oak coppice at Ashley, and Mrs. Leech's sister had not come from a large town where she might have had a choice of men ten years younger and alittle better off than the Vicar; but she had a mind, like the old Romans, to abandon the palaces of Rome for the huts of Britain out of sheer fickleness and love of conquest. Mrs. Howe went so far as to liken the benighted Vicar — benighted where the interests of his parish were concerned — to the ewe lamb, and Mrs. Leech's sister to the rich man of the same parable. And the aggressor would repent at leisure and be punished for her unprincipled poaching in her neighbours' preserves. Mrs. Howe reflected with acrimony, not that she had ever entertained an idea of the Vicar for Abigail, but she was a true Ashley woman, and Mrs. Leech's sister, an interloper, had no business to marry Mrs. Howe's Vicar.

Of course Abigail's marriage would have been a far more splendid affair had Humphrey Bingham been the bridegroom, and the Hanger the bride's destination, as Mrs. Howe had once had good reason to expect; but it was a wise fisher's adage 'better small fish than none;' and a girl was so liable to go off in her looks and in the public estimation after she had been jilted as poor Abigail had been by that half-innocent, spoilt scamp, Humphrey Bingham; though Mrs. Howe dared not make the most distant allusion to the fact, not even to Mr. Howe, so that the other partner (Mrs. Howe always called Tom Prior 'the other partner' now, as if there was equality between the two, though Tom Prior would have been the last man to acknowledge such a thing) coming on promptly was a stroke of compensation and good fortune of which Abigail was well worthy. And Mr. Prior was passionately in love with Abigail — there was no mistake there; and Abigail had uniformly expressed a great esteem for Mr. Prior, and insisted that he would get on in the world, sly puss! Then there was the great pleasure of having her daughter settled near her. Altogether Mrs. Howe was very happy herself, and convinced that the young couple had a fair prospect of happiness.

Abigail was very still about her marriage. She knew she was not over wise, though she had been counted a clever girl, nor over strong, though she had a woman's power of endurance. She had longed for any change after the violence of the blow she had received had subsided into a dull ache, any interlude on the monotony of a life which was crushed and deprived of colour and fragrance; something different from the small gaieties of Ashley, over which, whenever they were of a lively description, the Bingham's of the Hanger presided. She had felt her wounded pride soothed by Tom Prior's blind passion; she thought it was blind in Tom. She would rather he had not been Humphrey's partner, but Humphrey was nothing to her except in the past, and he would be less than nothing when she was Tom Prior's wife; neither need she see any more of him in Tom Prior's house than in her father's: the men met when Humphrey went to the factory, in their counting-house, their wives would be at the head of very different establishments.

Humphrey had sent his partner's bride a goodly wedding gift (the silver tea vase on which Mrs. Howe set such store), but he was not to be at the wedding — he and his wife were up in London.

It might be weak in Abigail, but marrying Tom Prior seemed less hard than being a lonely old woman like the Miss Mainwings, or sought after for her poor little fortune like Mrs. Vallance. These terminations might be far in the distance; but the principal chapter of her life written, read, and closed, it seemed to Abigail as if the rest of the volume must be compressed into small bulk and speedy accomplishment. It was like a certain chapter in Genesis, in which the old man Jacob sums up his life to his favourite son into the two events — God met him at Bethel; and he buried Rachel on the way to Bethlehem. Abigail had buried her Rachel; and the rest, be it short or long, would be easily summed up and was at hand. Her father and mother were pleased, and she thought she could make Tom Prior happy.

To do Abigail justice, her greatest doubt had been for Tom's sake. But he was an unexact, single-hearted, generous fellow, who regarded her with romantic devotion, and was enchanted at her accepting the offer of his life. Poor Tom! but she really liked him. She had always liked his clever impulsive sayings and doings, though she had laughed at their drollness; and since they were engaged, she had been more interested and amused by him than ever — it was something now to be interested and amused.

At the same time Abigail had a strong suspicion that she had always looked forward to being married and having a home of her own, and receiving her father and mother there as honoured guests, without continuing in leading-strings to them to ripe middle age. And so far she had not been wrong to look forward to the white moiré and floating lace of her marriage dress, and the twenty or thirty guinea shawl in her trousseau to be worn on occasions for the rest of her life — such a shawl as few girls, however well off, wear. It was not the dress or shawl, but what they represented, that Abigail cared for. She would have minded little though the moiré had been muslin, and the shawl dwindled to plaid; but she wanted to gather the blossoms and fruit of a complete life, to claim the spotless robe of her virgin innocence, and the matronly dignity of a man's honour and happiness, and a family's well-being in her trusted and safe keeping.

Abigail did not question herself whether it was right or wrong to stretch out her hand to what was left her of these gifts, and whether she was not more grasping than Mrs. Leech's sister. The question was a hard one, but may resolve itself into the problem — Abigail had been badly hurt, and all who loved her suffered from her hurt. How many had a right to suffer, and was she at liberty to give the right to any one who begged and pleaded for it?

Abigail had tried to say to Tom Prior, 'Tom, do you know I once cared for Humphrey Bingham when I had reason to think Humphrey cared for me?'

And Tom had stopped her with the eager assurance, 'Yes, dear, and it was natural — he is a fine fellow, Humphrey. It was very natural in Humphrey; but then his mother and sisters came over him; he was always a great family man, with all his spirit; and their groundless opposition would have been disagreeable for you: besides, he was too generous to take everything. You care for me a little, and trust me — it is better as it is, Abigail, a world better for me.'

There was a confusion in Tom's mind whether he seriously believed that Humphrey had resigned Abigail with an ulterior view to his — Tom's — benefit, at least he managed to preserve his allegiance both to his mistress and his friend, because it would have been great pain, in some respects hardly possible, to him to give either up. He continued to combine the contradictory dogmas, that Abigail was perfect, and that Humphrey had not sinned beyond forgiveness.

The man who paid his visits so pertinaciously, and would not have heeded though his mistress had hid her head in a coal-scuttle, came this evening, and laughed with almost childish glee at the disorder of the house, laid himself out to bestow excellent advice in the arrangements for the collation and the packing; to Mrs. Howe's mingled edification and scandal, lifted some of the heavy articles of furniture with his own hands, and took down and re-hung the Howes' family pictures to make room for the large photograph of Abigail, which she was to leave a shadow on the wall, above her empty place, as the house's daughter, doing it with a hundred times the neatness of an upholsterer's man, Abigail smiling quietly at him the while. He was entitled to rest and be thankful, and be waited on afterwards; but he scarcely took time to drink tea, though he could have come triumphantly through the ordeal of sceptical matrons. He only failed on one point, he let his cups be cold. He would toss off as many as Mrs. Howe could conscientiously fill out; more, indeed, for she had held back the last till she had made a little deprecating, defensive speech.

'I am afraid, Mr Prior, it is a little pale in the colour, not quite so good as the first. The — ahem — third rarely is.'

But Tom put aside the objection in the politest, best-tempered manner.

'Don't speak of it, Mrs. Howe,' and plunged afresh into the milk-and-water stream, and into the conversation, while Mrs. Howe folded her hands behind the teapot, and assured herself, 'What a treasure that man is! what will he not be content with on a washing-day, — boiled rice and cold pie (now Humphrey Bingham was nice in his eating); but Tom Prior will spoil Abigail, that is certain.'

Tom was speaking of the Scotch Highlands, which Abigail and he were to see during their fortnight's holiday, dwelling with boyish spirit on the northern routes, the unpronounceable Gaelic names, the purple mountains to be climbed, the golden oat-fields to be strolled through, the blue lochs to be rowed upon, his keen face flushed, his very hands full of action, until the details were rich and luminous with a young fellow's genius, and his gladness.

Mr. Howe, under his stoical bearing, was impressed and a little uneasy.

'He is wonderful, after all, that lad Prior — I hope he is not going to turn out anything miraculous — an inventor, an author in the bud, with an awful development before him. No, he is crazed, as happy as a king. I wish he would take his happiness quietly, though. Does the young fool never think no one ever married his first desperate fancy before, and never repented it when he did?'

However, Mr. Howe did not glance at the sweet cabbage-rose, Mrs. Howe, as if she had been his first fancy, at the same time he had never repented his choice.

But the women were touched without reservation by Tom's happiness — all good women are touched by the sight of great happiness, and the happiness of a bridegroom is a special compliment to themselves. Mrs. Howe and Abigail could have petted Tom Prior with all the experimental dainties of the marriage collation, if he had cared for them, or patted him on the back and stroked his messed mass of sombre hair, through which he thrust whole hands and did not draw single fingers, after the careful, elaborate fashion of the 'Roman generalissimo and emperor Cæsar,' if it had been permissible to do so. As it was, they were flatteringly and sympathetically affected by his eloquence; and laughed and prattled, even Abigail, however much of her heart was reduced to ashes. Tom's inspired speech kindled some sparks on the cold altar; and the briefest sojourn in the Scotch Highlands had been a favourite vision with Abigail as a girl, when many a time she had exhausted all her girlish weapons on her father to procure its realization. Even Mrs. Howe wished she could have laid aside thirty years of her life, with their corresponding weight and stiffness, and run away to scramble among scenes of which she had read in her youth, when Ashley had heard of the poems of Mr. Scott, and the novels of the Great Unknown.

If Tom were to write his business letters at all that night (Tom, like all fellows fertile in resource, was desultory in his habits) he must go. He lingered to the last, alone with Abigail, after the two had subsided into stillness in the twilight of the long June day, as if they also felt that 'rest is sweet' at the very height of their jubilee.

Abigail had been carried away in spirit by her willing bridegroom, but now she was relapsing into the dreaminess of the last week — not the sunny mist of the most ordinary young bride, loving and loved, who is standing with her foot on so radiant a threshold that she looks round amazed and uncertain, to ask can the old world of sin and sorrow go on creaking and groaning in its old irreparable ruts, when she is to be married to her lover in three days? but the bewildered breaking up of apathy, the smarting of old wounds, the tardy gathering of clouds of doubt and dismay.

Tom Prior spoke at that moment with the pathetic mingling of humility and vanity which is so intensely human. He had asked no profession of regard from her before, he had been satisfied with her simple 'yes' to the generous ardour of his wooing, her simplest declaration of good-will. His eyes had sparkled and his heart had leaped on the faintest suspicion that she admired him, and was drawn to him. But now, on the spur of the moment, impelled by an irresistible longing, he put it to her, 'You like me better than you liked him, fine fellow as he is, now, to-night, Abigail?'

Abigail shrank back, and her voice was low and trembled when she answered him.

'I was never going to be married to him in three days, Tom. He never stood with his arm round me as you are standing. He once clasped me in his arms, when we neither of us thought what he was about, but it was only for a moment, never again. I am to be your wife in three days, by my own free will, with — yes — with all my heart. But I warn you, Tom, I don't think I have so much heart as you have. The only thing that frightens me about you, sir, is your big, noble, warm heart, which I don't half deserve.' She cried for a moment on his breast, after she had been laughing just before. 'Of course I could never feel in the same way to Humphrey Bingham that I feel to my dear, good, clever lover and bridegroom, Tom.'

Such was the gentle answer for which the manly, gentle fellow was grateful; but was he satisfied? He had the unerring intuition of love, could he be satisfied?

CHAPTER III.

'TEN YEARS AFTER.'

IN Tom Prior's drawing-room, surrounded by the modern chaste elegance of white watered walls, ebony-wood, and sea-green damask, like a marine cave than a rose bower, Mrs. Prior, a ten years' old wife, sat in a low chair reading by the fire, which competed successfully with the April sunshine and spring wind without.

Her hankering after matronly shawls had been rewarded, or punished, by having a shawl to wear for a perpetuity — at her hearth as well as in the streets or on the roads round Ashley. Mrs. Prior was an invalid, and was enveloped in a soft, warm shawl, — white, from a lurking, lingering, womanly inclination to what was most becoming. Her face had still the nameless sweetness and charm which remains in some faces when the beauty of form and colour is gone or going; but it was a worn, slightly pinched face for a woman of thirty, and the effect was increased by the old bright adornment of her hair being put quite away under a half handkerchief of lace, as if the hands were too weary to dress it and had done with the vanities of life. Something curious and subtle might be written on the connexion between the health and sickness of a woman's mind and her treatment of what St. Paul calls her glory. It was not as a mere phrase that the maidens of old tragic ballads so often sang —

Nae mair I'll kaim my yellow hair.

About Mrs. Prior's invalidism her native town of Ashley was comfortably agreed. Mrs. Prior had sunk into a poor, selfish, sickly creature. Tom Prior was a lost man; a poor young-looking — in spite of his grey hairs — slim fellow, who slaved for his family, put a good face on his fate before the world, always assuring his acquaintances that Mrs. Prior was getting stronger, walked to and from the factory with his great boys hanging upon him as if he were the mother, while the mother dawdled and nursed herself at home with her two idle and spoiled servants, when everybody knew that Tom Prior could not afford to keep even two servants. And it might be all very well for Humphrey Bingham to speak of the Factory as a bagatelle, and to propose throwing it up, but badly paying as it was it must be a matter of life and death to Tom Prior, who was too manly to live dependent on his wife's small fortune, and who had nothing else between him and a manager's situation, or a situation of any kind, which he might have to go abroad to seek.

At the same time the Ashley public was in a great hurry to kill off Mrs. Prior, and had even appointed her successor. Not a second wife with a great deal more money or a great deal more energy, — but Mrs. Prior's mother, Mrs. Howe, whose husband was dead, and who had already removed with all the rosiness she could carry with her from Church-street, to a small snug house nearer her daughter, and who was so much attached, not only to her two grandchildren, but to Tom Prior — more like his own mother than his mother-in-law — a cheerful, hale old lady who would count it no sacrifice to keep her son-in-law's house, and then her independent income would be a windfall to poor Tom Prior.

Tom Prior had never contemplated the advantages of his wife's death, neither was there any reason why Mrs. Tom should die just yet, except her general air of fading and wearing away. Nevertheless, the Ashley public showed sound judgment, as it generally did when it was not dealing with the numerous cases of exceptions, in drawing the conclusion that though there was no violent disorder there must be great poverty of system in the young woman who caught every influenza which passed over the place, and had soon to shut herself up for the depth of winter and the sharpness of spring, and adopted shawls and caps like a grandmother (grandmothers had a vast deal more spirit), and that the poverty tended as surely, though it might be more gradually, to decay.

Without being troubled either by Ashley's verdict on her character or its future arrangements for her family, Abigail stayed by the fire and read, worked, and thought. She was reading one of those excellent brooding classifying books, slightly unwholesome, on silver hairs and evening clouds — more acceptable than invigorating to their subjects, and whose estimation of middle life in women is singularly opposed to the rich fruitfulness and mellow brilliance of autumn in the natural world. They are addressed for the most part to single women, but some married women appropriate them. She was working at an embroidery of a jacket for herself, now that Jack and Joe were too big for tunics, and she was feeling an old woman, — twice as old as Mrs. Howe, and that might be the reason age, which sat so lightly on grandma, depressed her daughter. She was thinking of the journey into Lancashire which Tom had left her that morning to take. He had parted from her in the most off-hand manner; he was engrossed with the new machinery he desired to introduce into the Factory; he was more and more wedded to his trade: worldliness must be inseparable from elderly married Englishmen, when it had so crept and encroached on Tom that he was the most zealous business man in Ashley. She was thinking of the boys; and glancing round, she saw for the first time they had left a litter of chips of wood and bits of string (what did boys always find to do with string?), since morning, on the carpet, and rung for Dorothy — Dorothy taking her own time to answer the bell, to remove it. Since Jack and Joe had gone to the grammar-school they had grown rough and rude; and though they came to her yet with all their grievances, they seemed to consider, justly, their enjoyments out of her way. They carried the eager chronicles of their games and exploits to their harassed, busy father; and she knew that this would increase year by year till she should sit apart from her sons, unless God sent them suffering and weakness, which, might He in his mercy forbid! It was altogether natural, innocent, inevitable that they should go amongst boys and grow like boys, but she could have wished they had continued longer babies. They were so much her own then, and such pretty, attractive little darlings. Their walks, their frocks, their diet, their play, had been such thorough occupations. She had been happier and busier then, and not so often ailing. But, of course, their babyhood could not last for ever — their progress could not be delayed; she was not so miserable a mother as to have sought it really, though the lads now belonged so much more to their papa and the Rector, to cook and Dorothy for the nursery dinners and the toilette, and in the last instance also to the best Ashley tutor. But if the boys had been girls their influence and companionship would have endured a lifetime. Mrs. Humphrey Bingham had girls as well as boys — a wise, arch little woman, who already sat with precocious demureness and restrained vivacity by her mother in the carriage, tripped out with messages to shops, delivering them far more intelligently than the footman, and would soon save her mother a wonderful proportion of the burden of a great house and the entertainment of guests — though a great house and guests were no burden to Mrs. Humphrey. And there was another little girl at the Hanger, one of those gentle, guileless, fair little children, likest angels, who would long follow her mother's footsteps, look up to her, lean upon her, with a faith and devotion which create what they believe in.

Abigail read, worked, and thought, and occasionally coughed, so that had Tom Prior been as sensitive as Humphrey Bingham to a cough, and had he not been accustomed to the sound, that cough, unformed as it was yet, would have spoilt his ease.

Abigail was surprised to hear Mr. Prior's knock at the door, followed by his voice in the hall, when he had left her in the morning with the intention of taking the down train to Lancashire. There was no need for her rising and going to the door to investigate the reason of his return, when she had an incipient cold on her, by a succession of premonitory shivers, one of her very bad colds, probably bronchitis or pleurisy. Some trifle might have made him change his mind and come back; he was always forgetful and slightly Bohemian in his ways, though a steady, hard-working fellow after his kind. Presently, he turned the door-handle and looked in without entering immediately.

'Please, Tom, come in at once, and don't keep me in the draught,' said Abigail plaintively. 'I have been sneezing all the morning.'

Tom came in directly, and shut the door.

'I did not feel very well myself, Abigail. As you are sneezing perhaps the weather has something to do with it,' he added, with an involuntary shiver; 'but I thought I had better put off the journey for a day. You see there is very little the matter with me, for I have walked back and carried my bag from the station.'

Abigail got up instantly, it was strange news to hear Tom Prior say he did not feel very well, and there he was white and weary, through his screen of hair, leaning against the door. She had no reason to suppose there was anything far wrong with him, though he tacitly admitted that he was not fit for business, and allowed her to send for Dr. Winkworth to put him to rights, while he was explaining away his illness, as if he were apologising for disturbing her with it; but it struck her curiously that she would repent all her life the small matter of how she had received him.

Before night Tom Prior lay flushed, panting, and rambling in his talk, in a high fever.

Abigail, in her thirty years of life, had never nursed a patient in serious illness; it happens so with some women. Her boys had been healthy, her father had died just after the younger child was born, and his case had been such as to preclude the alternations of hope and fear. Mr. Howe had been struck down speechless, and after a few hours' struggle against the deadly torpor, he had been mercifully spared farther suffering. Abigail might be thankful that her husband's illness was of a different character; but as she sat and gazed in blank consternation at the active, independent figure suddenly stopped in its activity and laid down in the humiliation of helplessness, and heard first with the pang, which the pang of no other calamity but that of death itself can surpass, the reasonable voice unreasonably disclosing to the idlest ears its jealously-guarded secrets, she did not know how to be thankful for anything.

Mrs. Howe arrived, hurrying to be of use, and to ascertain the extent of the evil. She was taken aback by the spectacle she met, and as Tom was dozing and did not see her, the tears poured down her cheeks.

'Poor fellow, he has worked so hard and been so worried. I would give every shilling I have in the world to relieve him and see him well again. Yes, Abigail, your Tom has been a good son to me.'

'What did you mean, mamma, about Tom having been worried, and about giving every shilling you had in the world to relieve him?' Abigail roused herself and questioned her mother in the course of the long night. 'I had my own pocket-money, and the supplies for the house never failed; he was always ready with them. What did you mean ?

Mrs. Howe only comprehended in part, and wanted to repair what she considered her mistake. When Abigail was likely to have an anxious time with her husband's illness was not the season to fret her with worldly cares.

'Oh, my dear,' I meant nothing particular, except that no doubt poor Tom has business trials like other men, which men like our Tom bear on their own broad backs—not that his back was ever very broad, poor fellow—and don't shift on their wives' weak shoulders, especially if they are ailing shoulders.'

'Do they not ? Is that right ?' inquired Abigail, with sharp pain, awakened out of a dream.

'Oh, my dear, don't distress yourself. I did not mean that he had run into debt, nothing of the kind. I never heard of such a thing.'

'Never mind, mamma ; I have more to distress myself about.'

Abigail had got the sum of the information she had expected, and it served to make her husband's unconscious speech plain to her. He spoke incessantly of his business, working away at his accounts, going over and over again the accustomed ground in the Factory with an earnestness and eagerness which contrasted broadly with his incapacity and inertness. His raving was as pure as the prattle of a child, he never said a word which could hurt a human being except when he broke her heart by running up accounts, comparing invoices, weighing bales, examining frames, arranging that a place should be kept for an old woman who had been a worker in her young days ; and Bill Cobb should have his full wages, a man's child must be buried ; the scapegrace was in real trouble this time, well, it might sober him. Sometimes he referred to his father's experience in the office, and established a hereditary connexion with the Factory. He said it all in a matter of fact, cheerful voice, only waxing hoarse and husky with much speaking and failing strength. He never alluded to disappointment or anxiety, smothering and strangling them to the last. He had his work to do, and he did it, lying there, as busily as ever he had done it in the counting-house or the Factory. If he were to die, Abigail would say of him, he had died as truly at his post as a sailor at the helm, or a soldier on the breach. For sitting there, watching Tom Prior's looks and words, the knowledge came irresistibly to Abigail, that they contained the reflection of a devoted career, the essence of manliness. He did not say one directly religious word, though Abigail knew him to be a reverent, believing man ; but the whole tenor of his business talk was religious, the evidence of a life spent in aiming at duty, a commentary on the text, 'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might.'

Tom Prior was not always unconscious, he would recognise Abigail, Mrs. Howe, the nurse provided for him. On these occasions he announced he was better, they were only making a fuss about him ; were they looking after the children ? bid Abigail lie down. Bad as it was to hear this when he was no better, and Abigail could no more have rested than she could have danced, it was not so bad as to have him toiling manfully and self-forgetfully on his sick-bed, perhaps death-bed. The very little boys felt this ; and Joe confided to his mother, with a girl's burst of tears which smeared his bold, chubby face almost as black as his hands, he wished papa would only cry, oh dear, and say he could not bear it, and roar as he and Jack did when they had chilblains and nurse put the bottle on them, or they had gum-boil, and not go on working for them and the Factory people when he was lying so sick in bed. Could mamma not stop him, and tell him that Jack and Joe had made up their minds to spend all the Saturday afternoon in the Factory, and were prepared to help the manager to pay the hands if he would allow them ?

'We must let papa alone just now, my dears ; he cannot bear to be meddled with.' Abigail tried to comfort the children and herself. 'When he is well again, as Jack and Joe pray to God to make him, we will do all we can to get papa to let us share his work.'

Dr. Winkworth, and the other doctors who saw Tom at the worst—and were the signal to Ashley that poor Tom Prior, with his wife and young family, was dangerously ill, and to the Miss Mainwaring's to send her little maid to the back area gate, with their compliments, and please how was Mr. Prior ? twice a day—were hopeful of his recovery, though the symptoms were formidable. But Dr. Winkworth, not like cautious old Dr. Lewis, but an uncompromising man, told all whom it might concern, flatly, 'Mr. Prior has not been using himself well ; he has been overdoing himself, and he has not been taking sufficient rest and refreshment ; the consequence is, he has made our office ten times more difficult and doubtful.'

Abigail looked back, that aching looking back, to ascertain all the recklessness of which he and she had been guilty. Tom had been absorbed in business, she had known that, but she had always thought it the love of business which comes to a man with years, when he has done with the fancies and follies of youth; and some envy of Humphrey Bingham's prosperity, with the fact that it rendered Humphrey more of a sleeping partner. Lately Tom had gone to the office after dinner, thus certainly curtailing his rest and refreshment, and sometimes worked by himself far on into the night. When he was very busy he did not come home to dinner, near as his house was, but had a sandwich sent to the office. Abigail had never prevented it. If Tom chose to give himself up to business it was his own affair. She had never dreamt of injury to his health, certainly (as if she held a monopoly of illness). Mrs. Howe had occasionally remonstrated, but Abigail had joined Tom in saying the remonstrance was stuff, and laughing at it.

Very likely, though Abigail had resisted Tom's malpractices, Tom, with his horror of milkops, and his doggedness where his own ease and comfort were concerned, would have resisted and overcome her; but Abigail had not resisted him, she had aided and abetted him in his great carelessness. Abigail had not had any conception of such sudden and terrible disorder of functions and faculties as had punished Tom for his ignorance and imprudence, well-informed, sensible fellow as he was. Her own illnesses had all consisted of weakness and irritation of the chest, prostrating and ominous in their way, but so bearable, above all to a retiring, languid woman, that now and then, when she was taking herself to task, she had accused herself of making pets of her illnesses. Now she witnessed in grief and terror an illness which struck root and branch, and clutched its victim — the head of the family, its natural star and crown — of whom no prophet had foreboded the remote decay far less of the crashing fall.

'If Tom die, I have helped to dig the grave of the only man who would have killed himself, and who has killed himself for me,' Abigail told herself in her despair, dealing to herself the hard lines that noble natures take as their portion, when their eyes are opened and they have come to their right minds.

At last the fever slackened and the disorder yielded. Dr. Winkworth pronounced that Mr. Prior had turned over a new leaf, and he expected would be sensible when he awoke next morning.

'But you must be very careful, Mrs. Prior; you are not to expect that he is to come out of this attack a strong man, and you are not to encourage him to make exertions. He will begin to worry about his business presently — men are bad patients in that respect. If you can tell him anything that will set his mind at ease, do so; but nothing that can vex him. Say that I distinctly forbid that.' And the Doctor, exceedingly shrewd in his physical line, walked off with as silly a speech, morally, as if he had forbidden the tides to obey the moon; but as he observed to himself shortly, 'It is not my business but hers to find a way to keep her husband quiet.'

Abigail stood and looked at her husband before he awoke next morning. The little solid flesh he had possessed had melted away like the wax of the figures which witches placed before slow fires. All his tangled hair and growth of beard, fast growing grey, could not conceal the hollows in his face. But Abigail for the first time in her life thought Tom Prior very handsome — all coarseness refined away from the haggard face, a certain sternness lent by its sparseness to its pleasantness, but the most manly, the truest of faces.

'What holes papa has got in his cheeks,' remarked a boy with something like awe, stealing on tiptoe into the room after his mother.

'Papa had always holes in his cheeks, boy, only they used to look more like dimples,' his mamma explained softly. 'We must make them look like dimples again.'

She went and chatted cheerfully to the boys when Mrs. Howe had gone to sit with Mr. Prior. The boys had taken to their mother since they were scared by the atmosphere of pain and fear in the house; and now that she made them parties to her reviving hopes, and was merry with them, they were enchanted with her as a new acquisition, and were loth to part from her.

'Don't go, mamma; it is so nice to hear you laugh — almost as jolly as having papa downstairs again. Why do you laugh so seldom?'

'You don't know what you are saying, child. I laugh as often as my neighbours — my grown-up neighbours, I mean. I must go now; don't detain me, you two rogues, I am going out. I have not been out since poor papa was ill.'

They were so perverse, they wanted to walk with her, though a fortnight ago they would have resented it as an approach to the insult of walking with their nurse.

'This is a wonderful accession of gallantry. I see if I am not to pestered by the attentions of two young men, I must exert a little lawful authority. So off with you to school, Jack and Joe, and be sure you take a message from me to the Rector, that I hope the usher canes you when you are late.'

Mrs. Howe was delighted that Abigail should think of breathing the fresh air, and quite certain she could keep Mr. Prior from fretting while his wife was out.

'But though Tom is amazingly better, don't stay away long, dear, on your own account, for this is a most deceitful day; there is a great deal of May sun, but the wind is right in the east, and you know this is the time of the year when you are particularly liable to your influenzas.'

Abigail smiled and sighed, and begged her mother not to weary for her. But she did not say she was going to stay away two or three hours at the shortest computation. She was going to take a drive of six miles and back. She was going to hire a Cab from the Royal Hotel, and drive to the Hanger to see Humphrey Bingham. He had sent regularly, and had even come personally to the house more than once to inquire for his partner, but he had never asked to go up to Tom; kind-hearted as Humphrey was, he was not fond of witnessing scenes of distress, and the feeling was growing upon him; but his old mistress was going out to the Hanger to see him.

Abigail had been very seldom, and for mere short ceremonious visits, at the Hanger since Humphrey's marriage and her own; so that in thinking of it at any time, and seeing it again now, her mind recurred to the time when she had known it best — the days she had spent there with Fanny Bingham, in the year when she had regarded it as her future home. It was what its name implied, a prettily-situated country-house, on the slope of a wooded hill now green and fragrant in early summer. Humphrey had added to it; until what with its colonnade, which carried off the monotony of the long line of the billiard-room; what with its clock-tower, which contained only a smoking-room, it was an imposing mansion: it was in keeping with Humphrey's fortune, which had increased, as wealth begets wealth, by the death of Mrs. Humphrey's sister and coheir, and by a rich old uncle of Humphrey's appointing Humphrey his chief heir and residuary legatee.

Abigail thought less of the extensive building than of the hyacinths which made the sides of the avenue blue, the crimson tassels which tipped the feathery foliage of the larch, the chorus of birds' songs almost overpowering her with their gaiety and sweetness, after the old shady house in Mill-street, to which children would only return for meals and bed if they had their will; and Tom's dark sick-room, with its smell of vinegar and its muffled foot-falls.

The servant who opened the door was not an Ashley man, and did not know Mrs. Prior, so that when she asked to speak with Mr. Bingham he showed her into the library, which his master used as a business room, and told her that the family were at luncheon in the dining-room, but as soon as they had finished he would tell the Squire. The library was the room in which Humphrey, his sister, and the young lady staying in the house had taken the gipsy tea on the night of the ball; but what was of more consequence now, it formed a suit with the dining-room, and there was a door between them standing a little ajar, so that Abigail sitting down in the first study chair, had but to turn her head to catch a glimpse of the party at luncheon and hear as much of their conversation as she cared to listen to, while they were too well employed, and making too much noise with plates, glasses, and conversation to notice her entrance.

They were a large party, including not only Humphrey, his wife, and their elder children, with their governess, but a specimen of the constant succession of visitors who stayed with the Bingham when they were at the Hanger.

The Binghams had been absorbed into the county set, for which their means and manners had qualified them. But Ashley people blamed Mrs. Humphrey for Humphrey's desertion of the town. Affable as she had shown herself on her introduction to it, she found no difficulty in giving up her Ashley acquaintances when it suited her, not with offensive slights and cuts, but with sufficient decision. Mrs. Humphrey was so led by the gentry that she assumed their very failings. She had an eye-glass fixed to the end of her driving-whip, like Lady Metcalfe, though Mrs. Humphrey's short-sightedness had not been heard of at an earlier date; and, as the Miss Mainwaring observed, while old age did not come alone, nobody sported it, at the end of a driving-whip, and it was absurd to mention old age in the same breath with a young creature like Mrs. Humphrey, notwithstanding Mrs. Humphrey's memory had failed her where the Miss Mainwaring were concerned. Mrs. Humphrey made greater concessions to rank than losing her full power of vision, — she dropped her girlish, well-bred periods of speech, and adopted whatever expressions were slangy and horsey, though her ears had not been early trained to the language of blacklegs and grooms, like those of poor Lady Antonia Vesey. The Vicar had spoken to Mr. Bingham on the racket which was suffered at the Hanger on Sundays, yet Mrs. Bingham, in place of being educated in a foreign convent like the young countess at Oakdale, was brought up by an aunt who was Low Church and Evangelical.

There was a report that Humphrey would stand for the county at the end of the present session; when it was expected that the old member would retire; and it was understood Mrs. Humphrey was so zealous for her husband's election that the motive would induce her, if anything could, to renew her connection, with Ashley, though no doubt on a different footing. But Mrs. Humphrey was a good wife to Humphrey Bingham in her own way, and though she did not remain at home from the county races to nurse her children through measles, saying audaciously that she had no fear of them — she was sure they had inherited good constitutions and would recover splendidly, she did remain at home and nurse Humphrey affectionately when he stood hours with wet feet duck shooting, and had an aggravated quinsy afterwards.

Some excursion for which there was little time was in prospect for the family and the visitors at the Hanger, and the ladies were luncheon without ceremony in their spring bonnets and hats, while the gentlemen attended to them with the little stir and glee of a cause for despatch, and a whet for wit as well as appetite.

Mrs. Humphrey was conspicuous among her children and her guests — a beautiful woman still, her tall slender figure grown a little too large, and her delicate complexion lost; perhaps her deep voice not sounding softer and lower, and with not more repose though with more style in her gestures; but a handsome, brilliant matron, on whom Humphrey had never ceased to cast his eye in admiration and fondness as she sat opposite him, the ample folds of her cashmere falling about her fine shoulders and bust, a youthful — not too youthful — looking — velvet hat, with its curling white feather turned up above her plump, bonnie, blithe face.

Humphrey's back — and it had grown a very broad back — was towards Abigail, but she could hear the old ringing familiar tones of his voice rising over and giving cheer to every other.

'No, no, Eddy, lobster salad is not for a puss like you.'

'Just one bit, papa.'

'Let it be but one then, you little gourmand.'

Abigail could fancy the group: Humphrey's far-forward, arch, demure little daughter — dark-haired, like her mother — perched on one side of him, and on the other his fair daughter, with a dash of her father's tawiness, which insured a balsam complexion and sapphire eyes. Humphrey named the little girls Rouge et Noir teasingly, and then consoled them by bidding them fly and find their hats, and he would beg Miss Bertram to grant them a half-holiday, and mamma to stuff them under the seats of the wagonette. But what would become of Humpty Dumpty, the last baby brother, in their absence? Was he to sit on a wall till they all returned, and if he got a great fall should they bargain that he was to break no bones?

'Now get along Humphrey, and don't chaff the children when you know that they don't understand it. You'll have Minnie crying and not able to say whether she will go or stay, if she thinks baby is to come to grief in her absence, though, indeed, there is no occasion for the little girls going with us; they will be too late for the school-room tea, and Miss Bertram, now that she is out of the room, don't like kicking her heels, though I never mind it. It is high time you were up in town sitting in Parliament, or anywhere else, and not spoiling your family here.'

'Are you to keep up two establishments, Bingham?' asked one of the men — the poor representative of one of King Charles's baronets.

'Two or three or half-a-dozen, Sir Charles, if Mrs. Bingham is to go to Brighton in autumn, Paris or Vienna in winter, and Rome in spring, as she obligingly suggests.'

'Of course I shall,' Mrs. Humphrey affirmed lightly and coolly. 'All the world goes to grass sometime or other.'

'I think I had better try coining the blessed coin of the realm here at the Hanger, rather than the used-up device of spinning cotton over at Ashley.'

'I think that big boy of mine had better look after the traps,' Mrs. Humphrey appealed to the company generally; she did not encourage allusions to the Factory, though she had the nous to see that Humphrey's nonchalance on his origin spared him a few aristocratic sneers.

Abigail had been obliged to overhear these scraps of the conversation and to wait in patience till the party rose from the table, and then she could distinguish the sound of the carriages coming round to the door and taking the place of her cab; the very horses throwing up their heads at their hack brother and his hired vehicle.

At last Humphrey was told that some person wanted him in the library, and remained behind, after the rest of the company had trooped to the front door; even then, when he had taken some steps towards the library, he stopped and turned back to speak to the servant who was preparing to clear the table.

'Tell cook her hunter's stew to-day was a masterpiece. It is one of her best dishes. She may send up more of it for breakfast to-morrow.' No need to tell whence Miss Edith got her gourmand propensities.

At last Humphrey came into the library, filling up the doorway, for his stately figure was becoming portly. He was still what in the west of Scotland is emphatically termed 'a braw man.' But a certain unwieldiness was creeping over him, and his face was considerably fuller and redder than when it smiled brightly on Abigail that far a way night of the ball. It was the effect which even gentlemanlike and respectable self-indulgence, including the pursuit of field sports, will produce on a man; and the portliness and floridness were not unbecoming in their present stage, though they foreshadowed heavier and coarser traits.

The contrast between Humphrey Bingham and his partner's wife, the delicate pinched woman, in the winter gown and jacket of grey woollen stuff and the Ashley every-day bonnet of black chip, was striking — but not so extreme as the difference between Humphrey and the wan, hollow-checked, silver-headed man at home, working, in dreams, of whom Abigail thought intently, as she gazed into Humphrey Bingham's face.

He was so much surprised that he said her maiden name out loud, 'Abigail Howe!' but he recovered himself immediately, and shook hands with a cordial running fire.

"How do you do, Mrs. Prior? Glad to see you, trust Prior is no worse; shall fetch back Alice — come into the dining-room, Have some luncheon, a glass of wine at least. Why did they show you in here?" When he found that Abigail would not have Mrs. Bingham recalled, or consent to eat and drink, his good nature helped her instantly. He assured her his going with the others was of no consequence. He was to ride, and he could easily make up to them; if she would permit him to send to the party to set out without him he should be at her service. He sent his request, made Abigail sit down again, and took a seat opposite her. 'You are sure Prior is no worse?'

'Oh no, he is a great deal better; the Doctor is very well pleased with him this morning, if he can keep him from meddling with business. That is what I came here to speak to you about.'

'Does Prior know you are here?' asked

Humphrey, with an inadvertent dryness getting into his voice. 'Odd enough,' he thought, clasping his knee, 'if Prior try to come over me with his wife. By-the-by, how faded the poor little woman is: I am shocked to see her.'

'No, he was asleep when I left. It was entirely my own idea.'

'You do me honour, Mrs. Prior,' declared Humphrey, with his old gallantry. 'May I ask, have you heard that I propose, I think' — he hesitated slightly, and played with the tassel of the bell rope, though he felt he must plunge into his communication, 'to give up the Factory, as I have not time to look near it, and it is too much for Mr. Prior.'

'I do not think so,' interposed Abigail eagerly. 'I am sure his heart is in it; if you had only listened to him for the last fortnight, you would think so too.'

'It is not worth his pains,' protested Humphrey, abruptly dropping the tassel; 'he is wasting his time and my means — along with his own, of course.'

'I am aware he has very little of his own,' said Abigail, in her quiet ingenuous voice. 'But as far as I could follow him, he wishes to try an improvement on the machinery, which would insure the work being more quickly and cheaply done.'

'Not to any extent,' exclaimed Humphrey, impatiently. Then he checked himself, and took the trouble to explain to her gravely, 'I repeat I believe it would only be the waste of more time and means; but of course you ought not to speak of it to him at present. I thought it right to anticipate any proposal you might make, and it can be broken to him by degrees when he is stronger.'

Abigail's heart sank. The Factory had waned into an irksome trifle to Humphrey Bingham, while it had waxed into a matter of life and death to Tom Prior. But she would not be balked of her proposal, the drift of which was beyond Humphrey Bingham's liveliest imagination, though he had a guess that women were, at once, the meanest, and the most generous of created beings.

'Mr. Bingham, when you say the improvement expected from the new machinery would not be to any extent, you mean relatively in connection with the cost and your income, don't you?'

'I admit that I do, Mrs. Prior. It might pay Prior, but only in a small way, and I really consider that he might do better. Pray remember I do not reflect on him in the least,' he added, kindly. 'I should know Tom Prior, old Tom; and I say a more honourable, devoted mechanical genius, if he had the tools to work with, does not exist.'

'I am sure you are right.' Abigail set her seal to the statement, never thinking of deprecating a compliment. 'And he has been brought up a manufacturer, as the Ashley people have been brought up to the Factory. No doubt they could get other work, or go elsewhere for work, and it would be kinder to let them do so, hard as it would be for them at first, than to keep on the Factory if it could not be made to pay. I understand all that, but Tom does not think it cannot pay. Will you tell me, Mr. Bingham, what the improvement would cost?'

'Certainly. To introduce the change properly, which would be the only chance, might cost five or six thousand pounds. But you do not think I would grudge the sum if I saw my way clearly?' he asked, patting his hands into his pockets, unable to help appearing nettled.

'No,' answered Abigail slowly, as if she were reflecting. 'Papa left me four thousand pounds; will you take that as Tom's share? You know business so much better than I, you will be able to tell exactly what I have only a vague notion of—I mean that though I have not the money entirely my own disposal, I believe I can borrow upon it or sell my life rent in it, you know.'

He was leaning back in his chair more astonished than when he had seen her there first.

'Borrow upon your fortune! sell your life-rent in it! What are you thinking of, Abigail? Excuse me, but you are speaking arrant treason—shocking nonsense,' he repeated, with his eyes still opened wide but a smile playing about his mouth. 'Your fortune is the only thing you have to depend upon should the firm be dissolved to-morrow, and Prior not get into another, or be able to procure a subordinate situation. If he were so left to himself as to consent to so rash and reckless a venture, it could not be allowed for a moment in your interest and that of your children.'

'If Tom had the money of his own, do you think he would not risk it?'

'I cannot say that he would not, because the man is possessed by the spirit of improvement; but that would alter the case entirely.'

'I do not think so. Supposing I had happened to have no money, and he were spending all our worldly goods, would it not have come to much the same thing? for what is mine is Tom's, to use according to his judgment, whether you and he think so or no. I desire you to take the money, Mr. Bingham,' she urged, with a dawning of indignation.

'I will not, Mrs. Prior. I beg your pardon, I could not without his knowledge or consent: there would be neither law nor honesty in the proceeding.' He had risen and was walking up and down the room. He stopped and looked at the thin, pleading, passionate face. 'But at least you are a good wife to him.'

'No,' denied Abigail, with the tears for the first time starting to her eyes. 'That is not it, but he is my dear husband.'

Humphrey stood gazing upon her, and twirling his watch-guard. She had a very sweet face, though she was not by a long chalk so handsome a woman as Alice; but he did not wonder now at her old attraction for him. Would Alice have done as much for him—Alice, who set so much store on her dignities, and required so many indulgences as her right? Stuff! was he, so well off, jealous lest poor Tom Prior could command more loyal duty, purer affection? Alice had suited him perfectly, made him an excellent wife, and she had never been tried, as he should be thankful. But he would try Tom Prior's wife, Abigail Howe, a grain more, and see if the additional straw would break the camel's back, though he had always known her as an unworldly, enthusiastic woman.

'But, Mrs. Prior, supposing the improvement on the looms should fail, and you have no warrant against it, what would you do then?' And he glanced his eyes involuntarily round the library, with its marble busts, carved oak, and calf-skin, which he was sensible were more in Tom Prior's and Abigail's way than in his and Alice's, but which more than any room in the house indicated the power and the refinement of the affluence of the owners.

'I cannot tell; but we would still have Tom to work for us, as I dared not think we would a week ago,' Abigail maintained, with undaunted courage. 'Mamma would do what she could for us, and take us in, till we were established elsewhere.'

'Mrs. Prior, I see you have made up your mind,' broke in Humphrey, afraid to trust himself to hear anything further; 'you are a dear, good little soul, the most regular brick. You have fairly conquered me. We will say no more about business just now, if you please. Only mind, I authorize the new machinery; you may tell Prior so whenever you like; and who knows, it may be a spoke in my wheel if I try for the county? At least many a smaller cotton spinner and calico printer than Cobden and Bright has sat under the roof of St. Stephen's.'

Tom was well enough to begin and groan over his business.

'If Bingham would look in and let me say a word to him on a change in the looms.'

'Humphrey Bingham has been here often,' said Abigail, in an undertone. 'I saw him yesterday, and by-the-by, Tom, he desired me to tell you he agrees to the improvements you wish.'

Tom drew a long sigh of relief, turned to the wall, and pulled up the bed-clothes to shade his face; perhaps he was overcome at the gaining of his desire. Another chance in the world, for he was weak, poor fellow; perhaps he wanted to thank his Maker for His boundless goodness. When he spoke again, it was to say gently,

'My dear, if you had known what it was to me to hear that word, you would have spoken it at once. Humphrey was always a noble fellow, and see how he has got on. He has prospered as he deserves. I hope I shall be permitted to make this up to him.'

Abigail pondered if Tom, lying there wasted and low, with much upon his mind, drudgery and anxiety before him yet, and a weak pining wife all these years, could think he had got what he had deserved; but she offered no remark, and the next speech of Tom's was in a very cheeful key.

'I should not wonder though you got your green-houses after all, Abigail,' he said, looking up brightly.

'Mrs. Prior,' said Dr. Winkworth, bluntly, turning from his patient to his patient's wife, 'you are in for one of your chest colds; I have been expecting it for some time, and now you are loaded with it. How could you be so imprudent as to sit in a draught yesterday?'

Abigail rebutted the attack with a twinkle in her eyes.

'I assure you, Doctor, I did not sit much on anything. I was out: I was busy yesterday, and I am not going to have a cold; do not say so.'

'I think Mrs. Prior is looking very well,' asserted Tom, from where he was laid on his back, manfully standing up with weak but willing valour for his wife. 'To my mind, nursing a sick man does very well with her.'

'Once on a time, Tom, for a change. After all your bullying of me, it is a treat to have you in my power,' answered Abigail, with a fall in her voice. Abigail had nursed her husband unweariedly, indefatigably, with stores of tenderness, which had not till now been set free in the bosom of the daughter, wife, and mother. What had become of her bronchitis, pleurisy? Vanished in smoke. Not that Abigail was a monomaniac, though something of a val-etudinarian. Most people have seen or heard of the effects of a shock on an invalid: how such a one will rise from a sofa or even a sick bed, and minister to the strong man or woman who has taken her place, to be ministered to instead of to minister; perform the most trying duties; keep the most exhausting watch, while the world looks out for the break-down of the forced strength, till it is compelled to cry 'A miracle!' Sometimes it is great Death which is the shock, and the sufferer who was mourned over as bereft, indeed, when the friend on whom he or she leant, is removed, is restored to life and the world by the stroke — having only one regret — the eyes which would have shone brightest to witness the resuscitation are closed in this world. But what if spirit eyes beam from the stars on the last Lazarus. 'His ways are not as our ways.'

Abigail cast disgrace on Dr. Winkworth, after all his attention to her husband, by not taking his cold; and the strenuous exertions she employed against it, were hardly fair play. She snuffed camphor, she painted herself like a red Indian with iodine, she gargled, she steamed, she had recourse to hot water, she had recourse to cold, she turned out, to the delight of her little boys, in masquerade, and they found mamma made a very pretty guy with a coal-scuttle of an old opera-hood on her head, and a royal fur tippet, like that of the King Edwards', round her shoulders. And when she did not take her cold, Abigail smiled and sighed again.

When Tom was able to go to the Factory again, he came home and took to studying, why his wife gave him so many nervous, furtive, inquisitive glances, whether they were all on account of his health, or had any other origin. It was a luxury for him to study Abigail in a new light.

Notwithstanding her nervousness, her late fatigue and arrested cold, and the important circumstance that, she was a woman over thirty, Abigail was looking prettier than she had done since she was a girl of nineteen, and Humphrey Bingham was in love with her. Tom fancied her ten times prettier than he had ever seen her. It might be because in laying aside the last alternative of the opera-hood and the fur tippet, she had taken the opportunity of discarding her shawl and lace cap along with them, and appeared in her fresh summer gown, with her pulled-out bronze hair. It might be because she had made a great escape, and a new spring was given to her life. Jack and Joe had told their father that first when he had been ill, mamma had been miserable, and then when he grew better she had grown funny, and she had promised to continue funny if they would be good boys, and not tease papa to draw for them, and go down on all fours to be the umpire in their games of marbles—instead mamma had cut out in paper, girls' things—but such jolly rows of dolls dancing arm-in-arm, and flowers in flower-pots.

Abigail had become more interested in housekeeping since she was under the necessity of exerting herself, and walked about cogitating profoundly, with keys in her hands, or sat dipping into housekeeping manuals and cookery-books, in place of wise discussions on silver hairs and evening clouds. With the extravagance and impetuosity of woman, she had tied round her still slim waist a bran new black silk apron, as if there lurked sovereign virtue in that terribly democratical, determinedly middle-class, and unflinchingly practical piece of wearing apparel. It amused Tom immensely, to an extent no superior person could conceive, to note these innocent preparations.

At last Abigail stepped up to him one evening, when he was standing idle by the window, and impressed upon him solemnly that she believed it was true what Ashley said about the housemaid Dorothy, she was getting spoilt with too little work, and Dorothy's mistress had come to the conclusion she ought to part with her domestic.

'But I thought you had a liking, for Dorothy, Abigail,' remonstrated Tom, checking an inclination to cry out, 'You little humbug!'

Abigail was taken aback, and smitten in her conscience. Yes, of course she had a liking for Dorothy, who was an honest, warm-hearted girl, though a little wilful, and had been very attentive and concerned when her master was lying ill. She had cried and declared he had never spoken a rough word to her, and however engrossed, he had always found time for a smile, and a 'Is that you, Dorothy?' when he met her abroad.

'Ah, Tom, you did not know how much you were thought of,' in parentheses.

But it was a losing of Dorothy to keep her there and not give her work to do. There was not sufficient work since the boys were all day at school, and Mrs. Prior was so well she meant to take more management of the house. There was no one like the lady of the house in looking after it: she was persuaded that it would be good for her now that she was strong enough for it. There was a young sister of Dorothy's, who could come and help when they waited, and for the doing up of the boys' clothes. Would he not believe her? Abigail at last besought Tom, getting desperate at the stony look of his face, while he resorted to the old dangerous habit of tugging whiskers, ragged, and as if sprinkled with ashes. She could do like other women with an experienced servant, and a little assistance now and then. Poor Mrs. Leech had to do with less since she had lost poor Captain Leech; so had the new curate's young wife; and she was more highly connected than Abigail: would he not listen to reason?

'No, I won't,' Tom declined stoutly. 'I never heard a more preposterous proposal in my life. It may do for poor Mrs. Leech, who cannot help herself; or the curate's wife, with love in a cottage for the honeymoon; but you have not lost your husband, though you have been near to it, and we are an old married couple, with two great boys. I tell you I will not hear another word of it. I never fancied you penurious before, but this is positively mean. Why, I have a great liking for Dorothy, who, young as she is, has made a good nurse to the boys; but I never thought of displaying it by turning the girl off. You goose! you goose! there is no call for curtailing our extensive establishment and starving ourselves—that would be the next precious move: women have no medium. Your poor little fortune has not been made away with, as you proposed (I heard all about it from Humphrey). Humphrey Bingham advances the money; he can very well afford to do it, and the venture will pay him more or less. He said his eldest boy flattered himself he would die a field-marshal; but, for aught Humphrey himself knew, clothing, not killing the enemy, might be the thing before Wakefield or little Humphrey were ready to leave Rugby, and either of them might have a greater mania for usefulness than ever their father had. Lord Rivers' eldest son was to head a steam-baking company: it seemed the entire population were like to be poisoned by a combination of the bakers, poor fellows, to buy up stufed flour, and be excused from kneading.'

Tom was speaking for speaking's sake, for he was agitated, and he hated to show it; but he had taken her two hands, and was squeezing them tight.

Abigail was agitated also.

'You are not angry with me for interfering, Tom?'

Now, however Abigail had erred; she had not been meddlesome or domineering: so Tom protested her self-condemned whisper was 'the most unkindest cut of all.'

'I am thinking of the first Abigail, who rode out on her ass to meet King David among the palm-trees, with the loaves and the bunches of raisins; but she was in terror of her life; and bound for the captivity of her second husband,—was not that it? My wife, the simpleton, made a present of all she had, like the widow's mite, to a ten years old husband, whom she is not soon to get rid of. We will want your poor little fortune yet, never fear, dear. There is the interest to Humphrey—we must and shall pay that, and the education of the lads—we will have no stinting there—eh? Angry because my wife was good and romantic!' Tom was playing all manner of wild pranks; the fever might have returned and gone to his brain, stroking the bronze hair, even the flap of an apron, blessing his wife.

Yet Abigail felt a spasm of disappointment and a little sense of failure. She was an unworldly enthusiastic woman. Ten years and more before, the moral back-bone of her innocent, happy, hopeful, girlish nature sustained a horrible injury, and although it had been set with splints very soon—perhaps too soon afterwards—it had never recovered its vitality and elasticity until Tom Prior's illness and Tom Prior's wife's knowledge of his silent, self-ignoring cares and toils. To bring back Abigail, like Eurydice, from the brink of Hades, Tom had to play Orpheus and go down himself, without grudging, among the shades. And it was the sound of Tom's footsteps in her life which Abigail dreaded to lose if there were no change in her habits—no obligation on her to do her duty. To be no poorer, but with the prospect of becoming gradually richer, yet never so rich as to compass change of scene, travel, intellectual and cultivated society like the Bingham—Abigail dreaded the old humdrum, moping, sickly feeling would steal over her again and she would not have the strength to resist it.

Abigail was still struggling with the sense of discouragement and with the conviction that she was an ungrateful woman, next day, after Tom had gone to the Factory, when she was roused by her mother nodding joyously to her as she rang the door bell.

'My dear, I cannot stop a moment; I met Mr. Prior at the end of the street looking so much improved since Wednesday; but I took the precaution of hoping he was able to go back and forwards and eat a good dinner after it. "Come and see, grandmamma; we have not dined together since I was on beef tea, and now I eat beef like a grazer, and trot on my beat like a postman." Of course I am delighted to come; I only looked in to tell you I had sent in a pair of spring chickens with asparagus, and a cut of salmon and oysters for the occasion. And I am going home to get my best cap: yes, Abigail, it is a great occasion, the celebration of your dear husband's recovery—twenty times greater than a christening dinner. By the by, Abigail, I passed Jack on the way, and he ran up and whispered to me that he was dux again. Mamma knew, but it was a secret not to be told to papa till he was head of his form for a week. What a scholar the boy is going to turn out! I told him I was proud of him, and gave him a sixpence on the spot. You need not laugh and shake your head, Abigail,—you have two very fine boys, and they have grown quite manly since their papa's illness.'

'I hope, mamma, their manliness will last, and help to keep their hands clean, and their jackets whole (though I sadly fear it will have the opposite result), and that it will progress till they take wives to themselves and daughters to me, and save me further responsibility in their training.'

'Time enough, girl; you will not like to see the day when other women come between you and your boys; the thought of that always reconciled me to my only child being a daughter. But dear! dear! Jack and Joe's marriages are a long look forward, and in the meantime you are well off with your boys and your husband restored to you. And as to another ten years, though I may not live to see it, there will be plenty of women to envy you. Three gentlemen to wait on one lady, and two of them fine, strapping, smart young fellows, as I know my grandsons will be. What a cheerful house they will keep for you! how much they will make of you! Why, Abigail, if you don't take care you will be as full of humours as an heiress with a score of suitors.'

Abigail laughed at her merry old mother, but the light words penetrated to her heart. She was well off—she knew it now; she would not change grey Tom and the rough boys for all the florid Humphrey Bingham and caressing girls in the world.

It was fitter, too, that Tom should go on and win the battle for himself, having the credit and the reward, and only giving Abigail her share. It was far kinder to Humphrey, to let him be generous to his old friend, and retain the consciousness as a cool green spot in the blaze of unmingled prosperity, which is apt to scorch and harden God's garden of man's soul, till it is an arid wilderness. For her she had found that 'He maketh Him families like a flock. He maketh the barren woman to keep house and to be a joyful mother of children.'

THE PENINSULA OF SINAI; NOTES OF TRAVEL THEREIN.

THESE notes of our journey through the Peninsula of Sinai will be better understood by a brief preliminary indication of its general features.

Among the most remarkable of the physical phenomena of our globe are the vast wastes upon its surface,—its extensive tracts of water, steppes, wilderness, desert, and mountain,—not only unreclaimed for habitable uses, but for the most part unclaimable. These are in perfect harmony with the grand economy of nature,—whereby the balance of natural forces is preserved, and the fruitfulness, beauty, and utility of the earth, as a whole, are maintained, but in themselves these are very remarkable. A reference to the map will show that the desert region of which the Peninsula of Sinai forms a part, extends from Cape Blanco on the north-west coast of Africa, to beyond the Indus in Central Asia;—a distance of 5,600 miles—a ‘vast sea of sand,’ as Herodotus calls it;—a desert belt of varying depth, beginning with the Great Sahara, which stretches right across Northern Africa, and is separated from the desert of Suez only by the narrow valley of the Nile. That again is separated by the Gulf of Suez from the broad plateau of Arabia, and the desert of Syria, which extend as far as the Persian Gulf and the rivers of Mesopotamia. Then come the vast wastes of Persia, as far as the Indus, beyond which is the desert of Mooltan;—a huge zone of desert links, vast, sterile, and burning, strung together by diamond rivers or emerald valleys, and hung, as it were, round the neck of the globe. Of this huge chain the little Peninsula of Sinai is nearly the central pendant. It is formed by the bifurcation of the northern end of the Red Sea; the eastern gulf running up to ‘Akabah—the Ezion-geber of Scripture,—its depression being continued in the deep desert valley of ‘Arabah to the Dead Sea, and thence up the valley of the Jordan to the Lebanon; the western gulf terminating just above Suez. Roughly speaking, a line drawn from ‘Akabah to Suez would form the base, about 130 miles long, of a scalene triangle, the Suez Gulf forming the longest side. North of the line so drawn, the desert extends to the Mediterranean Sea; westward to the Pelusiatic branch of the Nile; and eastward as far as the Persian Gulf; wrapping itself round the mountainous slip of Palestine, this same desert waste stretches away to the north nearly to the Black Sea; and to the north-east as far as Bagdad, Mosul, and the Armenian mountains.

The centre of the Peninsula itself consists of an elevated plateau or table land—the well-known et-Tih, or desert of ‘the Wanderings’—a name traditionally derived, probably, from the wanderings of the Israelites 3,000 years ago. This desert plateau, which begins with the shore of the Mediterranean and extends about half-way down the Peninsula, gradually rises, until, at its southern boundary, it attains an elevation of nearly 4,000 feet above the sea. This makes the desert itself pleasant and breezy,—so far, that is, as such an elevation can attemper the fierce heat of an Arabian sun, reflected from an arid and gravelly soil.

This plateau is thrust like a tongue into the peninsula; its boundary is an almost perpendicular mountain wall, averaging between 3,000 and 4,000 feet in height, and extending from nearly opposite Suez to ‘Akabah. On the Suez side it runs parallel with the sea for about sixty miles, at a distance of about fifteen miles from the margin of the latter; then it trends away to the east in a rough kind of semicircle, making way for the highland district of Sinai,—the vast mountain ranges of the Tûr. Mountain ranges, property so called, vary in height and outline; but this huge wall, which is simply the precipitous termination of the desert plateau, is nearly uniform in its level; it varies only with the undulating surface of the desert. The mountains of Moab, on the east of the Jordan, form a similar mountain wall, seen from every part of Palestine. As the traveller to Sinai leaves Suez, he traverses the low belt of desert between the plateau and the sea, having the latter on his right hand at an average distance of four or five miles; and on his left this magnificent wall of limestone, with its magical colours varying with the course of the sun and the condition of the atmosphere, from the dull grey of the morning to the brilliant white of mid-day, and the dolphin hues of evening. Thus far the range is called Jebel er-Râhah, or 'mountain of rest'; — a name singularly corresponding with that of the opposite headland on the Egyptian side — the Jebel 'Atâkah, or 'mountain of deliverance.' Approaching the plateau from Sinai, on the south, it still towers and glitters from every point of elevation — a magnificent and precipitous, almost a perpendicular fortification, to be scaled by only one or two passes. This part of the wall of the plateau bears the same name as the desert — the Jebel et-Tîh, or 'mountain of wandering.' Along the base of it, from 'Akabah nearly to the Gulf of Suez — a distance of perhaps seventy or eighty miles — lies a broad belt of sand, dividing the desert plateau from the mountains of Sinai. This plain of sand is called the 'Debbit-er-Ramleh,' or 'sandy plain,' to indicate its peculiar character. It is almost the only sandy district of that part of Arabia. In the greater part of it the sand is deep, and fatiguing to traverse. We were about four hours in crossing it.

It is a popular misconception that the surface of the desert is sand. Save the 'Debbit-er-Ramleh,' and a little in the Wâdy Ghûrîndel, probably brought from the former by easterly winds, we encountered no sand. The general surface of the desert is hard and gravelly; it consists of broad rolling plains, broken by limestone rocks and mountain ranges upheaved therefrom, which, worn by centuries of storm and heat, are often very fantastic in their forms. I do not remember any spot in our path across the great desert whence several of these low mountain ranges cannot be seen. Deep fissures, also, occur in the desert; it is 'a land of deserts and of pits,' as well as 'a land of drought, and of the shadow of death; a land that no man passed through, and where no man dwelt.' Some of these pits are singularly formed, and are very extensive; they resemble a series of vast chalk pits. Others are simple crevasses, and form natural receptacles for water, of which they furnish a permanent and precious supply. In one extensive system of fissures, just on the edge of the desert plateau, we had a refreshing bath.

Separated from the great plateau by the Debbit-er-Ramleh is the grand tumultuous mountain system of Sinai, — the mountains of Tûr, as they are collectively called, Tûr being the Arabic word for mountain; whence the adjective Towâra, as applied to the Arabs of the district. This is a high-land region of great magnificence and intricacy, rising to a maximum height of 9,300 feet. On the north-west, the mountains are limestone and sandstone; Mount Serbâl, and the mountains south of it are red and grey granite.

This ganglion of mountains again is surrounded by a coast margin of level gravelly ground, called El-Kâ'a, 'the plain,' except at the extreme southern point, where the mountain mass projects a tongue of granite into the sea; and on the east, where, towards 'Akabah, it terminates in cliffs overhanging the sea.

This cluster of mountains, of which Sinai is nearly the centre, is intersected by deep tortuous valleys, and by narrow and rugged passes. Its three principal peaks are Serbâl (6,759 feet) on the north-west; St. Katherine (8,705 feet) in the centre; and Um Shômer (9,300 feet) in the south-east. The Sinai mountains can scarcely be said to form a system. There are no regular ranges, as in the Alps, or in the Highlands of Scotland: all is intricate, tumultuous confusion, as if a vast molten explosion had suddenly congealed in the upper air. 'It is,' says Sir Frederick Henniker,* as if Arabia Petræa were an ocean of lava, which, whilst its waves were running mountains high, had suddenly stood still.

Unlike other mountainous countries, the district of Sinai is utterly barren and desolate. The Alps and the Highlands are clothed with pine forests, and their intersecting valleys are carpeted with greenest grass: but no tree grows upon the granite sides of Sinai; no verdure of any kind relieves their desolateness. A few odoriferous herbs, and here and there a stunted shrub, are found in their recesses; but neither tree nor grass, nor any green herb, appears to the eye: the valleys are simply torrent beds, wreathed with drifts of sand, and strewn with huge boulders, through which, for a few days in the year, the deluge of rain, falling upon the mountains, rushes with a depth and a force that are irresistible and almost incredible. The mountains are Alps without verdure; the valleys are rivers without water. There are but few of the springs that commonly abound in mountain regions, and give rise to great rivers. Hence the desolation of Sinai. In Wâdy Feirân, where there is a spring of water tolerably affluent, there is a luxuriant vegetation. But what the scenery of Sinai lacks in verdure is almost compensated by the gorgeous colours of its mountains. It is almost impossible to conceive, and it is difficult to exaggerate, the magnificence and variety of colouring, in both the limestone and sandstone mountains of the north, and the granite mountains of the south. The sandstone deepens into the rich glowing red which gives its name to the similar formation of Edom; and where it is not a gorgeous green, the granite vies with it, and in the ever-changing light they present infinite varieties of tint and combination. The same effect is never produced twice. Nothing can be more magical than these effects of colouring. We shall often be constrained to speak of them in their local peculiarities. They far surpass the wondrous hues with which the setting sun suffuses the Aiguille Rouge, while the mystic shadows are climbing, and just before they enwrap the summit of the 'great white throne:' they are more gorgeous even than the marvellous 'after-glow' which we so often saw in Egypt.

The lack of geographical magnitude in the Peninsula of Sinai is more than compensated by its geographical position, and its unique associations. In the old world, its position was at the junction of the two great continents of civilization, and closely adjacent to the cradles of the world's chief religions. Indeed, each religion in its turn seems to have regarded Sinai as its holy place. There are reasons for thinking that before the time of Moses Serbâl was a shrine of Egyptian pilgrimage. To the Jew it was associated with the most awful and sacred events of his religious history. The footmark of Mahomet's camel upon Jebel Mousa is still pointed out, as a tradition of the prophet's association with it; while it has ever been a chief resort of Christian Eremites. And yet the moral influence of these traditions is so utterly lost, that, perhaps, no people upon the face of the earth are more destitute of all that constitutes a religion than the Towâra Arabs.

But although Sinai has always lain, and still lies, beside the gateway of nations, it has never been their path. No city has ever stood within its boundaries. No port has ever given commercial life to its shores. Migratory Bedouins, scattered hermits, and passing pilgrims have, from the days of the Amalekites, been its only inhabitants; the little ecclesiastical city of Paran being scarcely an exception, inasmuch as it was only, for a while, a larger aggregate of pilgrims and hermits.

The entire history of the Peninsula is restricted to the eighteen months during which the Israelites sojourned in it. It has formed no nation; it has had no government; it has witnessed no events that the historian might record. In all other countries that have won a record in the annals of the world there has been, first, a local history, generally springing out of legend and myth, and recording invasion, conflict, and conquest—one nation superseding or intermingling with another, until national character is formed and national history achieved. Not so with the Peninsula of Sinai: it has no aborigines; it is identified with no race; it has no autochthonous history; it owes all its renown to the transient passage through it of a foreign people, and the remarkable events that befel them therein. Before their advent, we know only, that it was possessed by the wandering descendants of Esau; and since their advent, we know only, that it is possessed by the wandering descendants of Ishmael. Its history is a great darkness, upon which only the light of the pillar of fire and of the lightnings of Sinai have broken in. But these were so vivid and Divine, that they have filled the world with their awful glory; and Sinai has become one of the world's most sacred places. With the Jew it divides religious reverence with Jerusalem—with the Mahomedan, with Mecca—with the Christian, with Bethlehem. There is, perhaps, no place that gathers so many various sanctities, that inspires so much reverent awe, the associations of which are so thrilling, the power of which is so subduing. In part, this probably arises from the fact that its sacred associations have been preserved so inviolate. Its desert barrenness, its mountain ruggedness, have restricted human habitation to the tent of the Bedouin or the cell of the hermit. It has thus been preserved sacred to the associations of the law-giving. In Jerusalem, the hurrying, irreverent foot of generations of crowded city life, interrupted only by the devastations of war and the solitude caused by exile, have almost obliterated the sacred footsteps of Him who once trod its ways. The debris of its ancient buildings lie twenty feet thick beneath its modern streets. Even Gethsemane has been desecrated into a trim and gravelled garden, with gaudy flowers in partitioned beds, and fancy palings around its venerable olives; the whole enclosed by a lofty wall, within which the cottage of the custodian is built, and at the doorway of which you pay for admission;—a place over which irreverent crowds are irreverently shown. The loneliness that sustains hallowed association; the venerable antiquity that no modern touch profanes, that only hushed and trembling feet approach, are utterly wanting. The Mount of Olives, again, whose paths remain as when trod by

"Those blessed feet
Which eighteen hundred years ago were nailed
For our advantage on the bitter cross,"

is the suburb of a great city, and is daily trodden by hundreds of thoughtless wayfarers. Not so the valleys and mountains of Sinai: rarely is it visited and the traveller conscious of other presence beside his own, save a few monks and servants of the convent, occasional pilgrims, whose reverence is attested by their arduous pilgrimage, and perchance a few Bedouins pasturing their flocks. The holy mount has ever been a desert solitude. It has suffered no effacing power of later events, or of a numerous population. Like a great cathedral in the heart of a city, it has stood sequestered from the world. Its awful peaks are solitary, solemn, and unchanged; they are as when the foot of Jehovah trod them, as when the lightnings of Jehovah enwrapped them, as when the awful trumpet reverberated from summit to summit, and the still more awful thunder made them tremble to their base. Cities change; mountains remain the same. It is, therefore, with a feeling of undisturbed and indescribable awe, that the pilgrim first beholds these solemn peaks, and climbs to their summit. It needs but little imagination to make him feel as if the Divine footstep were still upon them, as if the awful voice that the people could not 'hear any more' were latent in the atmosphere. And yet no solitary ruin remains to help the imagination of the traveller; no record save the mysterious inscriptions here and there upon the rocks—which only fanaticism can associate with the law-giving; no monument save the unchanged and silent face of nature, which, in every feature and with startling minuteness, testifies to the local truthfulness of the historian.

Such is the district traversed by the writer and his friends in March 1865. The preparations for our journey were made in Cairo, and occupied several days. First, a dragoman had to be chosen out of some six or seven, who gave us no peace until our choice was made. They beset our going out and our coming in; we passed them when we went to our bedrooms at night, and found them at our doors when we rose in the morning. Our choice fell upon Hassan Ismael, a Nubian, from Assouân. He was about fifty years of age, and black as a coal; but with a shrewd, good-tempered face, which his character did not belie. He had been a dragoman for upwards of twenty years, and had accumulated considerable property. Although unable to read, he had given his two sons a good education in the school of the American mission, and had himself picked up a considerable amount of miscellaneous information from gentlemen with whom he had travelled. He was tolerably well acquainted with the history of Egypt, and with the general state of things in Europe. Although a Mussulman, he was liberal in his conceptions. He had a great reverence for Isa (Jesus), and even avowed his belief, which, he said, he had heard an Imaum avow from the pulpit, that, one day, Christianity would be the religion of the world. He was inquisitive after knowledge, sensible in judgment, and shrewd in observation. 'You cannot,' said he one day, 'expect all Arabs to be good; angels is seldom.'

Hassan had been strongly recommended to us; and his sensible, business-like way of negotiation predisposed us in his favour. 'Fight,' said he, 'for your bargain, and be good friends ever afterwards.' We had no cause to repent our choice. Hassan served us faithfully and honorably, and provided for us carefully and liberally. Fiery in temper, rapid and vehement in expression, he was also experienced and wise. He managed his Arabs admirably, and proved himself equal to every emergency. At the expiry of our sixty days' contract with him, we parted with, I believe, mutual esteem and regret.

Our contract with Hassan was duly executed at the English consulate. In consideration of a fixed sum per diem, he was to conduct us, as we might direct, from Cairo to Sinai, and through the great desert to Palestine and Syria. He was to provide everything necessary for the journey—camels, horses, tents, bedding, provisions, and servants. He was to pay all bakshish, provide local guides where necessary, and whenever we chose to sleep in convents, or stay at hotels, where such were available, he was to pay the bill. Indeed, so far as the necessary expenses of travel were concerned, we needed no money until our contract expired.

Hassan's first concern was to covenant with a Sheikh of the Towâra Arabs, through whose district we were to pass. They occupy the peninsula of Sinai south of the Jebel Tih; and are said to number between five and six thousand. Sheikhs of the desert always hover about Cairo in the travelling season. Hassan, therefore, had no difficulty: he engaged Sheikh Taima, who undertook to provide twenty-one camels, with sufficient attendants, to take us to Sinai, and thence to Khan Nûkhl, — half-way between Sinai and Hebron, beyond which he had no power to take us. The contract is for so much each camel, per diem, the men being thrown into the bargain. Each Sheikh is the patriarchal head of his family. Taima's family consisted of about eighty persons, including sons and daughters, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law, nephews, nieces, grandchildren, &c. It is not always easy to ascertain the numbers of a family. 'How many children have you?' I asked of an Arab. 'Four, and two girls,' was the reply. Taima was between fifty and sixty years of age, — a simple, unsophisticated, faithful fellow, with a good-natured countenance, always cheerful, willing, and polite; full of solicitude for our safety and comfort, occasionally keeping watch all night round our tents. He was somewhat buckish, occasionally coming out in a sheep-skin, and sandals roughly made of the skin of a fish. He was a true gentleman, and, no doubt, could boast a pedigree beside which that of the Percys is but of yesterday. His saliam was very emphatic and graceful. His son Salama accompanied him, — a bright, laughing boy of fifteen or sixteen, with handsome features, a clear olive complexion, brilliant dark eyes, and a set of teeth that any dentist's door might envy. Taima had also an Abyssinian slave, named Abdallah, intensely black, the blackness being peculiarly lustrous, like velvet, or the bloom of a damson. His mouth was prodigious, and its tusky, disparted teeth unpleasantly suggestive of those of an alligator, of which, as he was in a perpetual grin, we had the full benefit. He was, indeed, the merriest of the party, although any of us might have purchased him for £15 or £20. He was, moreover, a very clever fellow; besides being the best shot of the party, he was an accomplished botanist, and generally well informed.

The camels belonged to different members of Taima's clan, and were accompanied by their owners, — ten genuine Bedouins, sons of the desert, scarcely civilized; all, however, courteous, some of them handsome, and with a natural grace of figure and movement that would not have discredited 'the first gentleman in Europe.'

It was an unfailing interest, out of the recesses of our tents, to watch their movements as they sat around their camp-fire, or stood and gesticulated in animated conversation.

The great weakness of the Arab is tobacco. We, generally, in the morning gave them a supply for the day: they were just like children, always on the look-out for what we might give them, — thankful even for a few crumbs of biscuit or fragments of orange. The difficulty about the supply of the Israelites in the desert is greatly diminished on seeing upon how little an Arab and his camel can live.

Taima did not always maintain his authority. His men would sometimes struggle with him very irreverently. Hassan, too, would settle a dispute by seizing the first huge stick that he could lay hands upon, and thrashing away right and left, — Taima coming in for a full share of the blows. This, indeed, is so much a matter of course, that it is resented no more than a sharp word is with us. Happily we never had occasion to use our sticks, although it was repeatedly urged upon us as the only way of managing Arabs. May not this Oriental readiness to administer blows be the special reason of the Apostle's injunction, so strange and superfluous to our Western notions, that 'a bishop should be no striker'?

The personal staff of Hassan consisted of a cook, — a dreamy, introspective man, with eyes like half-opened oysters, but a capital artiste; and of two servants to attend upon us, — 'Abishai, a Coptic Christian, who was graduating as a dragoman, and Ibrahim, who, Mahometan though he was, got to our canteen and made himself drunk, stole a pair of boots, and had to be ignominiously dismissed at Jerusalem.

We were thus wholly free from responsibility. Hassan was primarily responsible for both our lives and our property. If he failed in any part of his contract, he might be taken before the first pasha we reached: Taima was responsible to him; and through Taima, his whole tribe. If, through them, harm happened to any of us, he would be seized and imprisoned the first town he entered. If any article were lost, he must make it good or find the thief; the Sheikh alone is responsible for the members of his tribe. Thus, an English traveller to whom Hassan was dragoman the previous year, was robbed of his revolver at Shiloh, by a fellow who, in the same place, hung about us for some time. Complaint was made to the Pasha Nablûs, who immediately paid the traveller the estimated value of his pistol, arrested the Sheikh of the village, and imprisoned him, until a fine which he levied upon the inhabitants was paid. It was for the Sheikh to discover and punish the individual offender. This is no doubt a rough kind of justice, but it is the only justice possible among the Bedouins. It has the merit of being very simple and very effective. In most parts of the desert a traveller is as safe from personal injury, and much more safe in his property, than in Cheapside. So far as we had experience of the Towāra Arabs, they are scrupulously honest. If any trifling article was dropped or left behind in the tents, it was invariably brought to us, generally before we had missed it. It is said, that if a camel laden with goods should fall in the desert, its owner may draw a circle round it, and leave it in perfect security, even for days, while he fetches another.

For the sake of such as may be curious about tent life in the desert, I may say that it is very enjoyable. An hour's rest for lunch, in the middle of the day, enabled the camels to reach the camping-ground before us, so that we commonly found our canvas city built. This consisted of two large tents for ourselves, and a third for Hassan and the servants. Culinary rites were performed in the open air by the side of the latter, at a portable stove sheltered from the wind, if there was any, by a bit of canvas. Three or four fowls — on Sundays a turkey — were generally being prepared for sacrifice when we arrived. The camels were permitted, for awhile, to roam in search of the prickly ghurkud. At dark they were picketed close by; their drivers sleeping between their legs. Our chief inconvenience arose from their inconceivable and incessant chattering, sometimes squabbling, which was often prolonged far into the night; and from the guttural grumbling of the camels. Of our twenty-one camels — our party being large — twelve or thirteen were baggage camels, carrying, besides our portmanteaus, almost all conceivable things; — coops of live poultry, casks of water, butchers' meat — always mutton; — cooking necessities, crockery, glasses, &c., — ingeniously packed in two large canteen chests; tents, bedsteads and bedding, camp-stools, and mental wash-basins — all spontaneously provided by Hassan. Nothing was wanting. Our tents were comfortably carpeted; small iron bedsteads, with new bedding, three in each tent, were, with our portmanteaus, arranged around the sides. One table for dinner was adjusted against the tent-pole; another for washing was adjusted outside the door of each tent. We were astonished to find our table laid with home neatness and comfort, — a white tablecloth and napkins, always scrupulously clean; glass, plate, salts, &c. The dinner generally consisted of five courses, viz., soup, mutton, fowls — on Sundays, turkey — fritters or puddings, mishmash or prunes, cheese, with a dessert of dried fruits, oranges, and preserves; the liquid accompaniment being bitter beer, sherry, and, when it was necessary to neutralize the active qualities of doubtful water, cognac. A fragrant cup of café noir, and, about an hour after, a delicious cup of tea — provision for which should always be made in England — followed by a tchibouk, crowned the whole. Indeed, Hassan's care and experience omitted nothing. The only defect of our cuisine was its necessary monotony, mutton and fowls alternating with fowls and mutton. On the whole, the fare of the desert was not to be complained of — it was far in advance of manna and quails.

Reading, journal-writing, or flower-pressing occupied us until about ten o'clock, and then to bed; taking care to tuck in warmly, for nights in the desert are cold, often intensely so. By five in the morning we are shivering at our tent-door, under an al fresco sponge, making the most of a regulation supply of water. Then breakfast — coffee or tea, with three or four hot dishes of some kind or other, eggs, and jam or marmalade; by seven, or half-past, our city of the desert has disappeared, and we are patiently doing our two and a half miles an hour. About twelve o'clock we lunch, either upon the burning sand under our umbrellas, or, if we can find one, 'under the shadow of a great rock;' — cold meat, hard-boiled eggs, bread, biscuit and cheese, an orange each, and a few dates or figs; water limited, and often doubtful, — a curious leathery concoction, out of a kind of leathern boot, called a 'zemzemia,' — generally, therefore, adulterated with a little brandy: only a desert traveller can appreciate the blessing of pure water.

Travellers to Sinai commonly cross in boats from Suez to the 'Ayūn Mousa,' a distance of six or seven miles; the camels being sent round by the head of the gulf. We determined to accompany our camels, that we might get a better conception of the formation of the gulf: this was a day's journey of about seven hours. We left our hotel, however, on the preceding evening, that we might inaugurate the tent life of the next sixty days by an experimental encampment a mile or two in the desert. It was a new and a strange sensation, when the early sunset permitted the night rapidly and silently to gather round us, and when the silvery light of the young moon had dimly lit up the solitary scene, and when, after infinite bustle and chattering on the part of the Arabs, our tent lights were extinguished. So truly and utterly was it desert; Suez might have been a hundred miles away. Our sense of solitude was disturbed only by another encampment of travellers at a short distance from us. I walked a little way from the tents. The Jebel 'Atakah was dimly seen in the distance; the undulating waves of the desert rolled away on every side. In this sky the fiery pillar shone — these sands reflected it — these mountains were lit up by it. Over this ground the terrified Israelites crowded onwards, as they discovered the pursuing Egyptians in the distance. Over this ground the vengeful chariots and horsemen of Pharaoh eagerly rushed, until arrested by the mysterious pillar of cloud. Now these look like common spots and things: they give no sign, they bear no impress of the stupendous miracle; and yet they saw it. One feels as if one fain would question them, or find some memorial inscribed upon them; but they are silent as the sphinx, barren as the commonest part of the earth's surface. The night was intensely cold, although we lunched the next day with the thermometer at 110° under the shade of our umbrellas; even when all our wraps were utilized, we could scarcely obtain adequate warmth. Our Arabs slept comfortably enough among the legs of their camels; neither the drenching dew nor the piercing cold, apparently, affecting these children of the sun. The novelty of our circumstances, and the excitement of so many strange thoughts, rendered sleep impossible.

Our experience of camel-riding was new, and I dare say we were awkward enough. It is very monotonous, but otherwise not very disagreeable; the slow swinging motion being soothing rather than otherwise: relief is obtained by the various postures possible to the rider, who may sit in every conceivable way upon the platform which his wraps make, upon the singular frame of a camel's saddle; progress is very slow, averaging two and a half miles an hour.

I am not enamoured of the camel. It is doubtless one of the most useful of animals; but it is one of the most uninteresting and repulsive, — its odour is not pleasant, — it does not keep clean teeth, — its lustreless eye and heavy eyelid are expressive of stupidity rather than of sagacity, — its pyramidal lip either hangs down in sullenness or is uplifted in menacing anger; the ignoble dissatisfied motion of its ungainly head, its unintelligent melancholy face, the dull obstinacy of its disposition, deprive it of all claims to be a favourite among domesticated animals. It is, among them, a dull plodding slave. The interest that we Occidentals feel in it is that which as post-diluvians we feel in a megatherium: it is the type of another world than ours, — the world of the sun, of primeval antiquity, of romance. It has but little of the patience ordinarily attributed to it. It is stupid rather than patient. It manifests no appreciation of kindness; it has no home affections; it is dissatisfied, cantankerous, repulsive. Its only manifestations of sagacity are discontent when it is loaded, and obstinate refusal to go further when it thinks it has gone far enough. As compared with the quick sensibilities, the intelligent attachment, and the agile beauty of the horse, it is not to be named, even in the estimation of the Arab. It is the pariah of the brute world — fit only to carry burdens and eat ghurkud, and to pace the arid desert at the speed of two and a half miles an hour.

At length we were fairly started, and soon reached the banks of the ancient canal, upon one of which we had to travel northwards for a mile or two, in order to find a passage across the salt marsh which they inclosed. Salt is collected here in considerable quantities. We then crossed the imaginary line which divides Europe from Asia, with the feeling that we had left behind us all the Christianity of the West; a civilization too that was older than Greece, or Rome, or Nineveh; and that we were now in the early footsteps of a dispensation that preceded Christ. Then, turning southwards, we fell into one of the great highways of the desert — the caravan route from Cairo to Tûr, marked by from twenty to twenty-five parallel camel tracks, stretching away, like the lines of a railway, over the undulating desert, when not obliterated by sand-storms. Even were there no such tracks, bleached skeletons of camels occur often enough to suffice for waymarks. We observed here some fine effects of mirage. Suez suddenly assumed the appearance of a vast fortified town, with castellated walls and frowning bastions, having ships in its harbours and roads. Frequently, in after days, like fantastic tricks were played with our deluded vision; blue lakes and shady groves were its most frequent illusions. We began, after a while, to realize the weary monotony of an ever-receding horizon, disappointing our hope of our resting-place, or of some 'shadow of a great rock' that might be a brief protection from the vertical torrent of the sun's fierce rays: but the crown of one swelling eminence only brought into view another; it was unchanging, continuous, endless desert, more vividly impressive, more physically distressing, than on any subsequent day. At length we saw a distant speck of verdure, and after a little while joyfully encamped near the Ayûn Mousa—the Rosherville of Suez. There, about two miles from the sea, are nine brackish fountains, most of them mere holes in the sand; one, however, is a regularly built fountain of ancient masonry. The Arab tradition is, that the Israelites here wanting water, Moses furnished them with a supply by striking the ground with his rod. These wells give life to a little bit of the barren waste, which breaks out in a few palm, and pomegranate, and tamarisk trees, with an undergrowth of shrubs, and vegetables, and flowers. The bud of a monthly rose was offered me as the choicest production of the gardens; it had a pleasant association of home. The whole is contained in two or three enclosures or gardens, in which are rude huts for their keepers. Hither picnic parties come from Suez and Cairo. His Excellency Sir Henry Bulwer had been there but two or three days before.

We were now beyond all doubt on the track of the Israelites. Here, probably, where the shore forms a gentle bay, the desert sons of Ishmael were startled by the strange advent of the descendants of Isaac, and by their exultant song of triumph awakening echoes never awakened before—even those that slumbered in the distant sides of Er-Râhah. Here, probably, for days and weeks, strange spoil would be gathered upon the shell-strewn shore. Near the Ayûn Mousa we kept our first desert Sabbath,—a grateful rest, and a tent service, in which, while our friends at home were gathering around the Lord's table, we held holy communion with them. We sang the hymn, 'Guide me, O thou Great Jehovah,' then strolled along the beach and sat upon the rocks for an hour or two, quietly musing amid these scenes of strange experience and wondrous association. Again the almost sudden darkness fell. It was the Sabbath evening; and, in the translucent atmosphere, the moon and stars seemed to hang down like lamps from the lofty roof of God's great temple; clearly defined as if seen through a telescope, they shone with a brilliancy of which, before visiting the East, we had scarcely conceived.

For two days we traversed the desert of Shur,—the border strip between the mountains and the sea. Passing Ain Howarah and the Wady Ghûrindel—the Marah and Elim of the Exodus—on the third day we entered the highland district of Sinai by a narrow gorge formed by spurs from the Jebel Râhah meeting the Jebel Hûmmâm. Turning suddenly to the right, we descended the valley Tayibeh, or 'the bewildering,' to the sea. This is a perfect labyrinth of grotesque and towering mountain forms—gloomy, desolate, and magnificent, as if scorched and twisted in some great conflagration, which had left upon them the marks of its blended smoke and flame; wonderful amphitheatres, terraces, pyramids, fortifications, castles, columns, quarries, indeed almost every conceivable form and freak of nature, presented themselves in most rapid succession, each at the moment photographing itself upon the memory,—a picture to be distinctly reproduced, when, even in old age, these glorious days of travel are recalled; and yet so intruding upon and effacing each other, that they leave but a confused recollection of a grand pageant of nature. Beneath our feet, ploughed up into channels, heaved into sandbanks, and strewn with huge boulders, bearing everywhere the marks of terrific winter torrents, was a glittering surface of whitish mud baked by the sun, so as to be impervious to the foot of the camel; and reflecting a glare and a heat that were almost intolerable, even when our eyes were protected by coloured spectacles, and we were elevated upon the backs of our camels. Above our heads was a cloudless translucent sky of the deepest purest blue, 'as the body of heaven in its clearness.'

At the foot of this pass is 'the encampment by the sea' where, the provisions brought from Egypt being exhausted, manna and quails were first given to the Israelites.

Then across the rocky headland of Zalimah and the plain of Mûrkah, until we re-enter the mountains by the rocky gorge of the Wady Shellâl, 'the valley of cataracts;' which after two hours terminates in a fine amphitheatre, over the ridge of which—the 'Nûkb-el-Bûdrah,' 'the pass of the sword's point'—the path lies. A rugged camel track made by Major Macdonald makes somewhat easier, what, for thirty centuries, must have been an arduous scramble up a precipitous bank of débris.

We felt the greatest difficulty in conceiving of a mixed host, like that of the Israelites, crossing such a pass as this. It is more probable that they entered the Wādy Feirān by another and much easier route. Dean Stanley suggests two alternatives — 'They may have gone, according to the route of the older travellers, — Shaw, Pococke, and the Prefect of the Franciscan Convent, to Tūr, and thence by the Wādy Hebrān and the Nūkb Hāwy to Jebel Mousa; or they may have gone according to the route of all recent travellers, by the Wādy Shellāl, the Nūkb Būdrāh, and the Wādys Mokatteb, Feirān, and Es-Sheikh, to the same point. The former route is improbable, both because of its detour, and also because the Wādy Hebrān is said to be, and the Nūkb Hāwy certainly is, as difficult, if not more difficult, than any pass on the route of the Wādy Feirān.*

On this it may be remarked — First, that the route by the Wādy Hebrān would not necessarily involve the difficult pass of the Nūkb Hāwy: the people might still have gone round by the Wādy Es-Sheikh. And next, that another alternative is possible. From their encampment at Mūrakah they may have proceeded along the shore until they came to a valley leading into the Wādy Feirān at its junction with the Wādy Mokatteb, thus avoiding the difficult pass of Būdrāh. This was not our route, but we were informed by the Rev. W. Gell, who had just examined it, that it was broad and easy, offering no impediments whatever to the passage of a great multitude. On this supposition, there would be no physical difficulty in the entire route from Suez to Sinai, except the rocky headland of Zaltimah, which no one would affirm to be either insuperable or serious.

There was but a slight descent from the top of the pass of Būdrāh, but the region was a strange one; utterly stern and desolate, it had neither vegetation nor sign of human presence; it was a defile of calcined rocks and huge boulders, burnt and contracted like scoria, with grey molten heaps as of boiling mud, as if it were the débris of a cyclopean iron foundry, or the huge crater of an extinct volcano. The very surface of the ground seemed cindery, as if from subterranean fires. It was a scene of vast and utter desolation, such as the plain of Sodom may have been before the Dead Sea covered the charred ruins of Sodom and Gomorrah. In the larger mountains, the dip and colouring of some of the strata were very remarkable; it was as if huge masses had been exploded upwards, forming peaks and crags of the most daring forms, — ribbed, black, grey, and red, and of almost perpendicular strata. We felt it a relief from its stifling, oven-like heat when, after a weary search, we found the shadow of a rock under which we might rest.

We then descended rapidly. Our direct route lay through the Wādy Mokatteb; but we wished to visit the Wādy Megārah, or 'Valley of the Cave,' which, through a sublime gorge, opens out on the left.

For nearly twenty years Major Macdonald has resided in this valley, working its famous turquoise mines. Its magnificent sandstone peaks rise to a great height on either hand. Among these we wound for about half an hour before we reached Major Macdonald's hermitage. Bright cultured vegetation, and cattle feeding thereon, gladdened our eyes; for by artificial irrigation, especially by the construction of ample cisterns, Major Macdonald, on a small scale, has demonstrated how 'the wilderness might be turned into a fruitful field.'

Some of his people had announced to him the approach of travellers; and, in old patriarchal fashion, he had begun to make hospitable preparations for our reception by killing, not 'a kid of the goats,' but a young capricorn, that he might regale us with mountain venison. He came a little way to meet us, and received us very heartily. His dwelling is a kind of rough highland shieling, a Robinson Crusoe structure, two sides of the apartment in which we dined being formed by the bare rock; thick rough walls constituted the other two, through which small apertures admitted the dim light. Various trunks and boxes containing stores were arranged round the room. The rest of the establishment consisted of a kitchen, and a couple of tents for the accommodation of passing travellers, a little garden, kennels for dogs and pens for goats. All supplies have to be fetched from Suez, four days distant, where also is the nearest post-office. Major Macdonald's Sheikh was just starting with the letter-bag, of which we were glad to avail ourselves. The Major was just recovering from a fever, in which he had been his own doctor, and during which he must have been very lonesome indeed. No wonder that a fit of nostalgia had come upon him, and that he avowed his intention of returning to England. He has acquired great influence over the Arabs, and has secured their warm attachment. He has no civilized neighbours, yet is he a highly educated, intelligent, and most hospitable British gentleman.

* 'Sinai and Palestine,' p. 38.

Laborde is the first traveller whose visit to the Wady Megârah is recorded. He and almost all travellers speak of its copper mines. Mr. Bonar goes so far as to say that he picked up here some specimens of copper ore. Major Macdonald distinctly affirms that, although copper may be found in the peninsula, — and indications of old copper mines are found near Sûrâbit-el-Khârdim — there is none in the Wady Megârah. The mines produce only turquoise, and are now, according to Major Macdonald, the only turquoise mines, that are wrought, in the world.

Some of the excavations from which the Wady derives its name are very extensive, and very ancient. Among the specimens of turquoise which Major Macdonald showed us, was one, polished, as large as a pigeon's egg — which, had the colour been good, would have been among turquoises what the Koh-i-noor is among diamonds.

Unable, from the effects of his illness, to accompany us himself, Major Macdonald kindly sent his cavass to show us the inscriptions near the mines, said to be antecedent to the time of Moses. We clambered a considerable height up the side of the northern mountain, until we came to the entrance of the principal cavern, which some of our party explored. It is a vast excavation, the roof of which is supported by a series of pillars. The chief inscriptions are near the entrance of this cavern: they consist of hieroglyphics, monograms and sentences, — some in Cufic, some in Greek characters, and of roughly drawn figures and cartoons, apparently relating to mining operations; most of which have been copied and published in Europe. Mr. Bartlett gives drawings and descriptions of three of the principal. According to Lepsius, the hieroglyphics belong to the period of the earliest Egyptian monuments, and represent the triumphs of Pharaoh over his enemies. One of the cartouches is said to be that of Cheops, the builder of the Great Pyramid, 200 years before Abraham.

One reason assigned by Major Macdonald, why the Israelites were not likely to have come by the Nûkb Bûdrah, seemed to have in it some force — viz., that a strong Egyptian guard was always stationed near the mines. Moses, who was minutely familiar with the district, would hardly, therefore, have exposed the Israelites to their possible attack. This reasoning would have almost equal force, applied to the route from the sea to the entrance of the Wady Fôirân, above suggested.

Resisting Major Macdonald's hospitable importunities to remain the night, we started by moonlight for our encampment in the Wady Mokatteb, two hours distant. The ride was very grand, almost solemn in its natural magnificence, its dim solitude, and its manifold associations; its excitement being heightened by just a souppçon of peril from marauding Arabs, of whose camp-fires we occasionally got a glimpse. We reached our encampment in safety, however, where we found our servants wondering what had become of us.

In the morning we retraced our steps some way in order to examine the inscriptions which we had passed without recognition in the dim moonlight. The Wady Mokatteb, or 'Written Valley,' is the chief locality of the Sinaitic inscriptions; they occur in great numbers on the sandstone cliffs, and at no great height. The sides of the valley are low, broken, and irregular, having a background of granite peaks. Many of the cliffs have fallen, and the inscriptions are found upon their fragments. In some parts of the valley, the rocks are thickly covered with them; in others, they occur more scantily. The number of the whole is not so great as we had anticipated. Lord Lindsay and Dr. Robinson speak of 'thousands;' Lepsius of 'immense numbers.' Dean Stanley says that they exist 'at the most by hundreds or fifties.' Our observations confirm the lower estimate. They are almost all written upon the surface of the soft sandstone: very few are found upon the harder granite, and these are but slightly scratched.

These remarkable inscriptions are found in various parts of the Sinaitic peninsula, chiefly about Mount Serbâl, and extend eastwards as far as Petra; they are found on Serbâl itself, but not on Jebel Mousa. They were first mentioned by Cosmas Indicopleustes, who visited Sinai in A. D. 518, who speaks of them as being then ancient. Pococke gave specimens of them. Niebuhr visited the peninsula for the special purpose of examining them, but by the mistake of his guide was taken to Sûrâbit-el-Khârdim. Subsequent travellers have copied and published the principal of them, especially Burckhardt in 1816, Gray in 1820, and Lepsius in 1845. They consist of inscriptions in the Sinaitic character, with some few in Arabic, Greek, and Latin; rude drawings of animals of all kinds, chiefly asses, horses, dogs, and ibexes, many of them in such grotesque forms as to render it impossible that they could have had any serious meaning; crosses of all kinds, chiefly + and standing usually at the beginning of inscriptions. Scarcely any of them require either ladder or scaffolding of any kind; the highest might have been written, as Dean Stanley suggests, by one man standing upon the shoulders of another.

Various theories of their origin and character have been propounded. Cosmas and his fellow-travellers affirmed that they were Hebrew in character, and origin. Professor Beer thought them the passing records of Christian pilgrims;—this is also the opinion of Lepsius. Professor Tuch thinks them the work of Pagans, either pilgrims or residents. Ritter connects them with the idolatrous worship of the Amalekites. Mr. Forster has labored very hard to prove them contemporary records of the Israelites. Dean Stanley, mainly from the occurrence of the numerous crosses, can 'hardly imagine a doubt that they are the work for the most part of Christians, whether travellers or pilgrims.' Chevalier Bunsen thinks that they are of mixed origin,—Pagan, Jewish, and Christian,—which is probably nearest the truth. In 1839, Dr. Beer of Leipzig constructed an alphabet for the interpretation of the Sinaitic character, which is given by Bunsen in his Table of Semitic Alphabets,* and with such success that Professor Tuch could not alter a single letter. He tested the inscriptions on the assumption that the alphabet would resemble the Phœnician, and that the language would be a dialect of the Arabic; and everywhere he found good Arabic, and good sense. After his death, Professor Tuch applied it to above two hundred additional inscriptions, and with equal success. The results of their investigation are—that the dialect is Arabic, with some peculiarities of form; that the inscriptions are Pagan, with some Christian intermixed; that they are the work of pilgrims, and consist chiefly of the greetings and names of travellers.

Leaving the Wady Mokatteb, we entered the Wady Feirân just where it opens westward to the sea. At this point we again struck the route of the Israelites. The entrance to the Wady Feirân is guarded by a singular sandstone cliff, shaped like a huge fortification, round the eastern side of which we wound. The valley is the most fertile, and next to the Wady Sheikh the most extensive, in the peninsula; we were about eight hours in traversing the first section of it. Like all the larger valleys of Sinai, it is very picturesque and grand. The section of it north of Parân is utterly sterile and desolate:

* Philosophy of History, vol. i., p. 255.

dark mountains, on either side, of splintered granite and gneiss, deeply veined with porphyry, as if some Plutonic caldron had boiled over; and so linking the valley as to form long reaches, or inland lakes,—of course waterless, stern, torrid, and impressive in their molten sublimity. Unlike other mountainous countries, the bottoms of the Sinaitic valleys are flat, forming an angle with the sides, like that of water: they are alluvial deposits; that of the Wady Feirân is roughly corrugated by fierce torrents, and occasionally dotted with boulders. Our ride through the endless twistings of this waterless river was hot and wearying, almost distressing: the sun poured down his perpendicular streams of fire, fiercely radiated from the iron granite of the mountains, and the glassy sand of the valley; every breath of cooling breeze was inexorably shut out. The water in our zemzemias was of a very doubtful character, but this did not prevent our having frequent recourse to them.

Here, if Feirân be Rephidim, the poor panting Israelites might well murmur for water: our realization of their distress was very vivid. It is no presumption against this identification that, four or five hours farther on in the valley, abundant water flows through luxuriant groves of palm-trees.

We looked out very eagerly for the palm groves of Feirân. Our hope was long deferred, as one after another only the monotonous links of the huge granite chain presented themselves. At length we came in sight of the little village of Huseiyeh, to which some of our Arabs belonged. The people greeted us kindly, and gave us handfuls of the Liliputian apples of the Nûbk tree, which, to our parched and thirsty palates, were very grateful. The 'black tents of Kedar' now dotted the sides of the valley; we had exchanged the solitude and sterility of the desert for the fertile habitations of men. Half an hour later we reached our encampment at the entrance of the palm grove of Feirân; this extends two or three miles up the valley, and consists of an extensive plantation of three or four thousand palm trees, together with tamarisks, acacias, and other shrubs. It is the 'Bedouin Paradise.' No wonder that the old Amalekites tried to defend it. Its fertility is caused by a stream of water, some three or four feet broad, which flows from a perennial spring at the upper end of the valley, and after traversing the entire length of the grove is lost in a cleft of the rock a short distance below Huseiyeh.

After some days' experience of the desert, where a muddy sandpool and the stunted ghurkud were unusual luxuries, the verdant grass beneath our feet, the thick shrubbery of tamarisk and broom around our tents, the feathery palm gracefully waving some fifty or sixty feet above our heads, and, above all, the gentle music of the bubbling brook at our tent door, grateful as the voice of home, were very delicious. Life was everywhere luxuriant and beautiful. Amid her countless nooks and varieties of beauty, the earth has none perhaps more fascinating and fanciful than this. It is a wilderness of tropical fertility, sequestered by rich and lofty mountains of granite; a Happy Valley, where Rasselas might have hoped for unsophisticated and virtuous dwellers, hardly to be found, however, in the squalid huts and semi-savagery of the Bedouins. To us, it was a place of delicious repose, long and pleasantly to be remembered.

Two other parties of travellers were already encamped in the palm grove. The flickering light of the camp-fires reflected from Oriental foliage, with groups of Arabs and camels reposing round them, and thrown into strong relief; the bright moon calmly shining above; the gurgling brook serenading us with its home music; the grand ranges of mountain on either side, crowned on the western side by the awful domes of Serbâl, which almost overhang the valley, made the scene one of the most impressive and memorable of our journey. Nor were we without Arab music. The minstrel of the grove serenaded us with a most melancholy love ditty, sung to the accompaniment of a still more melancholy violin, of the rudest and most primitive construction.

We did not get much sleep, one noise or another disturbing us all the night. Notwithstanding this, before the morning, a hyæna from Mount Serbâl made free with the foal of a camel three days old, the bereaved mother of which carried me the next day.

At this junction of the sterile and fertile parts of the valley, there are two lateral valleys opening out of it like the transepts of a cathedral, each forming a cul-de-sac: that to the west, the Wâdy 'Aleiyat, is a wild picturesque glen, two or three miles in length, blocked up by the vast mass of Serbâl; it is utterly sterile, and is little more than the rugged bed of mountain torrents. That to the east is shorter; it is simply a deep amphitheatre of mountains, a bellying out of the side of the valley. By the conjunction of these four valleys, an extensive plain is formed, in the centre of which there is a low broken hill, some sixty or seventy feet in height, called the hill Hêrêrât. Upon this hill, according to the tradition, Moses stood while the battle of Rephidim raged around it. Certainly no place could more perfectly correspond to the circumstances of the history. The Amalekites would naturally wish to defend their fertile vale against the invasion of a host like that of Israel. Concealing themselves, therefore, as they easily might, in the sides of the mountains, and behind the hill Hêrêrât, they permitted the Israelites to advance to the centre of the plain, and then, bursting forth from their ambush, attacked them both in front and rear. In this way Moses would be able to ascend the 'little hill,' as in the original it is emphatically called (הַרְרֵרֶאֱת), and thus he would command the entire field of battle. Here then we may picture to ourselves the wondrous rod uplifted, — bâton serving as a standard to Joshua's army, and also a mute appeal to the God of battles; as the arms of the venerable law-giver grow weary, they are upheld by Aaron and Hur, and at length are supported by two stones for pillows. And from morning till evening, according to the firmness of the uplifted rod, the impetuous tide of battle swayed, swelling and breaking, and angrily dashing against the rocky pedestal upon which the sublime figure of Moses stood. After the victory the same rocky eminence would doubtless be an altar in the midst of this grand temple of nature, upon which sacrifices of thanksgiving would be offered in sight of all the people. It is now covered with the ruins of the ancient church and episcopal palace of Feirân, while round its base are ruins of the old ecclesiastical city, — houses, chapels, and tombs. The mountains all round are honeycombed to the very summit with hermits' cells, and tombs.

P and F being cognate and interchangeable letters, Feirân and Parân are identical words. Feirân is the Phara of Ptolemy, from which in his day the entire district was called the Pharanitic Peninsula. It is most probably also the Parân of Scripture history and poetry, the El Parân to which Chedorlaomer and his allies chased 'the Hiorites of Mount Seir,' the 'Mount Parân' from which 'the Holy One came.' In this place Christian altars were once erected, and Christian worship was offered. These mountain echoes, that once reiterated the terrible sounds of battle, also responded to the voice of Christian song. These dark and comfortless cells were once filled with living men, and witnessed all the strange tragedy of anchorite life,—the struggle of human passion, the fervour of wrestling prayer, the unutterable desolateness of human solitariness, the weary weakness of sickness, the dark solitude of death. These hoary walls once felt the touch of human hands, and were sanctified by the holy worship of human hearts. Here lived Theodosius, the Monothelite Bishop of Feirân, who was excommunicated for his heresy. Here, too, the Tyrians once traded: so that all the interests of human life, all the play of human passion, were once vital here. Now all is solitary and desolate; a few Bedouins wander about the place by day, the jackal and the hyæna roam over it at night.

Mount Serbâl is seen from Feirân in all its magnificence. It rises from its base in five great sections, blended together like the clustered columns of a cathedral: some one has happily compared it to a cluster of inverted stalactites, distinguished, but not parted, by deep ravines. The ascent is commonly made from Feirân; it is arduous, but not otherwise difficult. It occupies about four hours. Dean Stanley describes the view from the summit as very magnificent.

A most interesting and important question respects the identity of Serbâl with the mountain of the law-giving. This is very strenuously and elaborately maintained by Lepsius, Mr. Bartlett, Dr. Stewart, and others. Burckhardt, Dean Stanley, Dr. Wilson, and most modern travellers, more successfully contend for the modern Sinai. The Jewish traditions are in favor of Sinai, and we can hardly conceive of these as doubtful. The early Christian traditions of the time of Eusebius and Jerome down to Justinian are in favour of Serbâl. On the other hand, the church of Justinian was built at the foot of Jebel Mousa with the concurrence of the whole Christian world. Even the monks of Serbâl never thought of disputing the claims of Sinai; and these have been admitted by almost all later writers. The inscriptions which are found upon Serbâl, even to its summit, are adduced in its favour; but there is no proof that these are Israelitish in their origin: their strange character is presumption to the contrary. It is, moreover, almost impossible to conceive of the Israelites gravely any inscription upon the holy and awful mount of God; besides, there are inscriptions almost all over the peninsula. Josephus (Ant. iii. c. 5, § 1) speaks of Sinai as 'the highest of all the mountains that are in that country;' but this is quite in accordance with his exaggerating habit: it is more applicable to Jebel Mousa than it is to Serbâl, but is literally true of neither. Importance has been attached to the fact that the episcopal city of Parân existed prior to the time of Justinian; but this proves, not that Serbâl was Sinai, but only that the Wâdy Feirân was the most fertile spot in the neighbourhood of Sinai. Serbâl was undoubtedly a sacred mountain, and a place of religious pilgrimage, even prior to the Exodus. Its name points to the worship of the Phœnician Baal.

Further, it is clear from the narrative of Scripture, and is also implied by Josephus, that Rephidim was some distance from Sinai,—certainly one day's march, probably more. Feirân is as near to Serbâl as the people could come, while it is at the least sixteen or eighteen hours distant from the modern Horeb. It is further urged that the plain Er Râhah, at the foot of Horeb, and the Wâdys round the modern Sinai, are destitute of vegetation, and of the means of supporting a great multitude; and that Moses, who intimately knew the whole district, would naturally select for the place of their prolonged encampment the Wâdy Feirân, which abounds in luxuriant vegetation. To this it may be replied, that while Sinai is not so fertile as Feirân, it is by no means without vegetation and water; that after the victory at Rephidim, the resources of Feirân would be available for the people encamped on Er Râhah, and that, in all his movements, Moses was manifestly under the explicit guidance of Jehovah, and was not left to the simple dictates of his own unassisted judgment. If the history be true at all, the question can hardly be argued on the ground of mere natural probabilities. We are necessarily restricted to such intimations as are furnished by the sacred narrative. The place of the law-giving would doubtless be determined by a comparison of various considerations.

It is conclusive against the claim of Serbâl, that there is no open space near its base where a host like that of Israel could encamp before the mount, and whence its summit could be seen. From the palm grove of Feirân, the nearest possible camping-place, the actual base of the mountain cannot be seen at all. A turn of the Wâdy 'Aleiyat at its entrance completely intercepts it, and, according to Dr. Stewart, it is five miles distant. The Wâdy 'Aleiyat itself is a narrow ravine, little more than a rocky watercourse; it affords no convenience for the encampment of a multitude of people, and no possibility of their retiring afar off, according to the narrative, and at the same time maintaining their connection with the mountain. On the other hand, all the required conditions are fulfilled at Sinai with almost startling exactness.

Our way now lay up the Wady Feirân, and through the entire length of the palm grove, which extends for about three miles, the regal palm gradually giving place to the tamarisk and to the broom.

This fairy grove was thickly peopled with the rude huts and the tents of the Bedouins, their flocks herding near them, and their children — innocent of even a palm leaf, and brown as a chestnut, half curious, half fearful — venturing to the side of the path, or hiding behind the foliage, to get a furtive glimpse of our white faces and wide-awakes, as we passed. We were the strange objects there. The valley is richer as we ascend. A considerable accumulation of soil is fertilized by the living stream that runs through it; and even corn is grown in it; but lower down, around Parân, the conflicting torrents are too violent to permit such accumulation, — all débris from the mountains is entirely swept away. Dr. Lepsius speaks of the traces of an ancient lake in the higher part of the valley: these we did not see; but if his observation be accurate, it is important, as indicating the former fertility of it. Lakes in similar positions are frequent enough in Switzerland, and in the mountain districts of Wales and Yorkshire.

At the head of the Wady Feirân the valley is divided into two branches. The one bending to the east is the Wady Es-Sheikh, the most extensive of the valleys of Sinai. From the head of the Wady Feirân, forming nearly a semicircle, it leads by a broad and easy way to the very foot of Horeb: this, doubtless, would be the route taken by the host of Israel. The valley bending to the west is the Wady Solâf; it is a continuation of the same sweep, but is less circular than the Wady Sheikh; bending round more abruptly, it forms, as it were, the flat side of a circle, which it would complete by opening into the Wady Sheikh near its termination at Horeb, did it not cease by running up into a kind of mountain ravine. The two valleys thus form a kind of irregular circle or ellipse, enclosing a plateau of low hills.

Leaving the Wady Feirân, we turned a little way down the Wady Sheikh, and then turning suddenly to the right struck across the rocky plateau, in a direct line to Horeb. We had thus to cross, first the Wady Solâf on the other side of the plateau, and then a grand range of mountains on the farther side of it, which stands like a vast cathedral screen before the inner sanctuary of Sinai. From the plateau this outer range of mountains is seen to great advantage, and over the lower parts of it glimpses of the summits of the inner mountains are obtained, among them of that of Jebel Mousa. On the right we had very fine distant views of the crown of Serbâl, always grand and imposing, from whatever point it is seen.

The vegetation of the Wady Feirân had given place to the rough sterile desert surface with which we had become familiar. The descent from the plateau into the desolate bed of the Wady Solâf was rough and steep; the valley itself seemed a region of slimepits and limekilns. It contains numerous graves, more numerous than are easily accounted for in such a place. Dr. Stewart * says that he saw here traces of a ruined town, of which this may have been the necropolis.

The pass across this mountain breastwork of Sinai is the Nukb Hawy, or 'Windsaddle,' the most arduous and most magnificent in the peninsula. A rough camel track has been made among the huge boulders and débris of fallen granite, probably by the monks, to facilitate communication between Sinai and Feirân. If, as some suppose, this was the directer route to Sinai, taken by Moses and the elders, their way must have been rough indeed. Doubtless Moses had been long familiar with it.

We were about three hours in crossing, our camels laboriously following us. In some respects it is the grandest mountain pass that I have seen. It has no single spot of overpowering sublimity like some of the passes of the Alps, but it has a sustained magnificence of its own, for which it would be difficult to find a parallel. The path skirts no fathomless abyss, the traveller hangs over no toppling precipices; throughout, his way lies along the saddle of the mountain, and on a level with what in the rainy season must be a terrific torrent, but which now, owing to the long drought, is but a trickling and intermittent stream. The sublimity is above rather than below: wonderful granite peaks, rent, rugged and time-worn; piled-up granite masses, disintegrated, perilously balanced, and grotesque beyond all description, rise a thousand feet on either side, sometimes overhanging and threatening an imminent repetition of the stony avalanche which has filled the bed of the stream with Titanic boulders, and inextricable débris. Among these the pathway winds and climbs as best it can. Here and there a stunted palm tree, or a diminutive acacia, relieves the stony desolateness. An occasional spring refreshes the hot and weary traveller, and preserves the little rill from annihilation. A new plant or flower, or a curious fossil may occasionally be picked up, and a few mysterious inscriptions may be seen. Throughout its length of six or seven miles it is a scene of vast and wild desolation, utterly inconceivable by those who have not seen it, utterly indescribable by those who have.

A short distance beyond the summit of the pass the peaks of Sinai rise into view. We had long been looking for them, with an intensity of feeling that imposed silence upon us all, and that deepened into awe, when we really saw the mountain that God had touched, and from which He had spoken. Photographs had made me acquainted with the face of Horeb, and I at once recognized its pillared peaks with an almost startling familiarity.

We descended from Nûkb Hâwy upon a large plain, which gradually opened before us. It is about two miles in length, and three quarters of a mile in average width. It is grandly framed in lofty mountains; the range which we had just crossed formed its northern end, receding a little, so as to form a large space at its north-north-west corner. Its western side is the Jebel Ghûshah; its eastern the Jebel Fureîa, a mountain plateau lying in the angle formed by the plain and the Wâdy Sheikh; the edge next the plain extending to the point is called the Jebel Sena, probably a tradition of the old name Sinai. The southern end of the plain is formed by the almost perpendicular cliffs of Râs Sûfsâfeh, the Horeb of Scripture, extending right across it, and rising from it to the height of 1500 feet. About the middle of the plain is a watershed, one part of it sloping gently down to the north, the other to the south or south-east. This is the plain Er-Râhah, 'the plain of rest.' And the first view of it strongly excited the feeling that Dr. Robinson describes. We could none of us resist the conviction, that here, sequestered from the world, and as in the mighty nave of a cathedral, — 'a temple not made with hands,' — the host of Israel stood before God, the awful pile of Horeb being the altar upon which the Divine glory rested. Of course this was matter of mere impression, but we could not resist it. Our previous reading had led us to the conclusion, and our observation confirmed it; for nothing can be more perfect than the correspondence between the place and the history. The summit of Horeb can be seen from every part of the plain, so that the cloud which rested upon it would be visible to all the people. At the south-east corner is the broad opening of Wâdy Sheikh, from which also Horeb is visible; we may imagine it, therefore, also covered with the tents of Israel.

The mountain mass of Sinai, of which Râs Sûfsâfeh is only the northern end, corresponds in shape and area to the plain Er-Râhah. Roughly speaking, it is rectangular, its southern end being a little the broader, and having its corners rounded. It is about the same average width as the plain, and perhaps a little longer. It stands a little more to the west, so that the boundary lines of the mountain are not exactly a continuation of the boundary lines of the plain. Thus, on the eastern side of the mountain, the opening of the narrow Wâdy Deir, also called the Wâdy Shu'eib, or Valley of Jethro, in which the Convent of St. Katherine stands, is included within the southern end of the plain, from which the path to the convent leads in a straight line. A similar valley, the Wâdy Lejâ, — a tradition, possibly, of Jethro's daughter, — forms the western boundary of Sinai. This is entered from Er-Râhah by turning a little to the right. The Wâdy Lejâ divides the isolated mass of Sinai from the irregular and more lofty range of Jebel Katherine — Jebel Katherine itself being to the south-west of Sinai. In the Wâdy Lejâ the Convent of El-Arba'in stands, whose gardens of fruit-trees and cypresses relieve the desolateness of the scene and mourn over it. At the southern end of Sinai these two side valleys are connected by a broad, irregular, and rugged valley, the Wâdy Sebâye; and as this valley is commanded by Jebel Mousa, Ritter and others have supposed that this was the place of the encampment, and that Jebel Mousa was the mountain of Divine manifestation. This is not impossible, but for many reasons it is improbable. It is much rougher and more broken than Er-Râhah, and much less convenient for the encampment of a great multitude, who would have to spread out laterally. It is much more difficult of access, only one or two narrow valleys, little more than mountain passes, leading to it; nor is it easy to conceive why the people should have turned away from the broad, level plain Er-Râhah, and the wide opening of the Wādy Sheikh, to reach a camping-ground in every respect inferior, and even less impressive. The top of Jebel Mousa, moreover, where Moses communed with God, would, contrary to the statement of the narrative, have been visible to all the people, and their idolatry and dancing would have been seen by Moses at every step of his descent. Nor is there any possibility of the people 'removing and standing afar off,' nor is there any 'brook that descended out of the mount,' as there is at Sūsāfeh. The mountain itself, moreover, does not overhang the plain, but is protuberant and broken, from the top to the bottom. The only reason for the theory is the gratuitous supposition that Jebel Mousa was the mountain of Divine manifestation to the people, — a supposition which really perplexes and confuses the narrative. To understand the narrative of law-giving, it must be borne in mind that there are two principal summits of Sinai, — Rās es-Sūsāfeh at its northern, and Jebel Mousa at its southern extremity. The former rises like a castellated wall, crowned by three principal turrets or peaks, from the plain Er-Rāhah. The latter is not seen from the plain, 'being upwards of two miles behind Rās Sūsāfeh. All the conditions of the history are fulfilled, if we suppose that it was Jebel Mousa to which Moses ascended to commune with God, out of sight of the people; and that it was Rās Sūsāfeh upon which the Divine glory was manifested to the people, and from which the ten 'words' of Sinai were spoken in their hearing.

The sun was setting as we descended upon the plain from the Nūkb Hāwy, and a flush of wondrous crimson clothed the front of Horeb with fire; this rapidly faded into a dusky twilight brown; then the moon arose on the south-east across the Jebel Fureia, and the whole scene was gradually touched and lighted by its pale radiance, until it ultimately rested in a luminous silver grey, which, by the time that we reached Horeb, suffused the whole mass in solemn splendour. At that moment, singularly enough, some light, fleecy clouds upon its top assumed the form of rays shooting upward, as if some faint lingerings of the olden glory still streamed from it. And thus we rode across the plain, scarcely a single feature altered, where for twelve months the Hebrews were encamped, where they heard the sound of the awful trumpet, and the voice of God, and saw the mountain 'altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire.'

Almost unconsciously we fell apart, that we might surrender ourselves to the thoughts and feelings which the almost awful solitude of this moonlight approach to Sinai inspired. The cleft face of Horeb looked down grandly and majestically, just as 3,000 years ago it did, upon the scene of the people's fear and vows; the scene also of their licentious idolatry. And there down its eastern side Moses, with the tables of the Law in his hands, descended from Jebel Mousa, and heard the riotous shouting and singing.

Proceeding up the Wādy Deir on the east side of Horeb, we at length reached the Convent of St. Katherine, more strictly of the Transfiguration, which is about a mile up the valley, which it fills. The awful buttresses of Jebel Mousa, a thousand feet high, overhang it, and look into every corner of it. The convent itself is 5,000 feet above the level of the sea. We thundered long and loudly at the door, but no one answered: it seemed a dwelling of the dead. At length a monk appeared at a narrow loop-hole, in the upper part of the building, and, after a while, a second, upon the parapet of the roof. It being an hour or more after sunset, we were refused admission; the vociferations of our Arabs, the arguments of our dragoman, and our own loudly-expressed remonstrances notwithstanding. In vain we proffered our letter from the Patriarch at Cairo; in vain we told them that we had made a forced march of some fourteen hours in order to spend Sunday in the convent; in vain we told them that, having sent our tents round by the Wādy Sheikh, they could not arrive before noon the next day, that one of our number was unwell, that we had but little provision, and no bedding. The holy brotherhood were inflexible: they would throw us down coverlids; they would give us bread and olives; they would even admit us into a kind of garden-court, where we might make a fire, and where the stones were not quite so hard, and where, if we preferred it to sleeping, we might have access to the convent garden and walk among its olives and cypress trees: but admission to the convent itself was impossible. We were very angry at first, but soon adjusted ourselves to the situation, and ultimately made ourselves very comfortable; the romance of the circumstance giving a zest to our enjoyment, and an indelibility to the memory of it, which none of us would willingly forego. Our Arabs soon made a fire, and cooked a dinner of such as they had. The coarse brown bread of the monks was very grateful, their olives very nauseous, the tchibouk after dinner very delicious. We then adjusted our wraps upon the stones as we best could, covered ourselves with the thick quilts of the monks, fixed our umbrellas so that the moon might not 'smite us by night;' and there we lay all in a row, like six Templars in the chancel of a church, only somewhat less quiet. The Congregational Union of England and Wales, represented by one of its ex-presidents, its president actual, and its president elect, not only prostrate at the foot of Sinai, but ignobly doomed to the stony courtyard of a few ignorant Greek monks! Like many other trials of life, the hardship was only in anticipation; our night was, on the whole, an enjoyable one. The outlying peaks of Jebel Mousa looking right down upon us, reminded us that probably Moses, and possibly Elijah, and also Paul, had often slept upon this very spot, with only a mantle to wrap round them; and with this thought we fell asleep, our wraps making us rather too warm than otherwise. In that wild region the monks had no doubt sufficient reason for their caution; only their care for their safety was in excess of their hospitality.

About seven in the morning, a low and impregnable iron door was opened, leading from the courtyard, and, through intricate vault-like passages, we were admitted into the convent. We were conducted to a corridor of small rooms — not over clean — for centuries the lodgings of travellers, known and unknown. After hasty ablutions we went into the Greek Church, where one of the eighth daily services was being celebrated, not much however to our edification; for with the inspiration of the place, and of the Sabbath whose law was there given, with the catholic feeling that recognises every form of devotion which travel produces, strong upon us, and with every predisposition to worship, we found worship utterly impossible. In mere ritual form and rapid irreverence, the service of the Greek Church of the Transfiguration was far worse than any service of the Latin Church that I have seen. Anything farther removed from spiritual feeling and devotional significance it is impossible to conceive. There were about a dozen monks present, some of them maintaining their places in the narrow high-backed stalls which are seen in every Greek church, and others of them walking about, doing different things, and joining in the service by snatches of response. One of the ancient Greek liturgies was used: but the literal gabble of the reader, especially in the reiterated 'Kyrie Eleison,' — the hard, perfunctory cracked voice of the officiating priest, — the lugubrious intoning, and the discordant and melancholy mirth of the singing, produced upon us all an impression of most painful incongruity with the place and its associations. And no wonder, when the long service has to be gone through eight times daily; for if this does not destroy all religious sensibility, nothing will. Even upon our stony beds we pitied the poor wretches, when we were awake by the midnight bell summoning them to prayer. The convent and church were built by Justinian in A.D. 549; and although often repaired, a great part of the original structure remains. A more bewildering labyrinth of chapels, cells, and courtyards, staircases, galleries, and passages, interspersed with here and there a cypress or olive tree, can hardly be imagined. It is a strong, rough, square building, 245 ft. by 204, enclosed in massive walls. It was very extensively repaired by the French during the occupation of Egypt, so that some parts of it are modern. The church, a Byzantine building, is in good condition. It consists of a simple nave and two side aisles. The floor is tessellated marble, wrought into various devices. The ceiling is vaulted, and very rich in a grand mosaic of the Transfiguration, with a border of prophets and apostles. The decorations of the church are costly, but, as in most Greek churches, very tawdry; pieces of carpet, silk, and even of cotton, with wretched pictures of mediæval saints, are hung about everywhere. In the nave I counted no fewer than fifty lamps, of all materials and of all shapes, — from costly silver to common glass chandeliers. Over the apex are portraits of the Emperor Justinian and his empress, said to be authentic, and coeval with the church; also a picture of Moses upon his knees before the burning bush. In the chancel behind the altar are carefully preserved the skull and the hand of St. Katherine, who was miraculously carried through the air from Alexandria to the neighbouring mountain that bears her name. In the same place there is also a magnificent portrait of the saint, richly jewelled, and forming the cover of a chest or sarcophagus. Just behind the chancel is the small chapel of the 'Burning Bush,' said to have been erected by the Empress Helena, over the very spot in which the Bush stood. The chapel is very richly decorated; its floor is covered with costly carpets, and the place of the Bush is inlaid with silver. It is still

'holy ground,' and, like Moses, we had to 'put our shoes off our feet,' before we might enter it.

After breakfast we saw the library, which consists chiefly of printed books, some portions of them comparatively modern: amongst them the Lexicon of Suidas, a fine edition of Chrysostom, and editions of the Greek fathers. No doubt the library contains also some very precious MSS., were it possible to secure for some competent scholar a thorough examination of them. In the archbishop's room, which was comfortably furnished and hung with portraits, we inspected the celebrated golden MS. of Theodosius, a minute description of which is given in the Athenæum of Nov. 12, 1864. It is written on vellum in letters of gold, and very beautifully illuminated. We saw also an exquisite microscopic psalter of the same period, said to have been written by a lady: the characters are so small that they cannot be read without a magnifying glass.

From the library we went to the charnel-house in the garden, near which we had unwittingly slept. We crept into it through a low door and came upon a ghastly array of skulls and bones. When a monk dies, his body is put into a separate chamber until it is decomposed. The skeleton is then taken to pieces, and the bones are arrayed in fanciful and horrid symmetry — the skulls in one pile, the thigh bones in another, the ribs in another. In a corner is the grim squatting skeleton of a celebrated anchorite, who was found in his cell with bent head and clenched hands, conquered in his lonely wrestle with death. A crimson gilt cap covered his ghastly head, and an ornamented cloth was thrown over his dried-up bones.

Close to the church, the one wall apparently touching the other, is a Mahometan mosque, erected, according to a MS. found in the library by Burckhardt, in the fourteenth century, the effect probably of fear in the days of Mussulman power. It is now scarcely ever used, and only when some Mahometan of rank visits the convent. It is strange to see the crescent of its minaret glittering within a few feet of the Christian cross. Mahomet is said to have visited the convent when a camel driver, and in the after days of his prophetic power he commended the pious monks to the forbearance and protection of his followers. A mosque and a church are in like conjunction on the top of Jebel Mousa.

As it is approached by daylight from the plain of Er-Râhah, the appearance of the convent in that wild mountain solitude is very striking; its vast, irregular, prison-like buildings filling the entire valley, the dark cypresses of the garden contrasting with the light green of the olive-tree, and with the bright blossom of the almond-tree, where all else is sterility.

We were not sorry, after lunch, to regain possession of our tents, which had been pitched at the foot of Horeb at the entrance to the Wâdy Deir, close by Jethro's well. There we spent the rest of this memorable Sunday, and after a short tent service we enjoyed a quiet and thoughtful evening. It is not often in a lifetime that the religious heart is subjected to such influences.

We had now reached the farthest point of our wanderings; — henceforth every footstep would be homewards.

The next morning we ascended Jebel Mousa, which, according to Dean Stanley, is 7,564 feet above the level of the sea. The ascent commences just above the convent. It is steep, but not difficult, and is facilitated in several places by broken steps, the remains of a rough staircase, said to have been made by the Empress Helena. A monk from the convent was our guide. One or two servants accompanied us, carrying coffee for our refreshment at the top — a provision which we greatly scorned at the outset, but upon which we afterwards looked more favourably. We soon reached the 'Ain-el-Jebel, or mountain spring, — a fresh clear fountain, with maiden's hair fern clustering beautifully round it. A little farther, and we came to a small chapel, where we rested while the monk burned incense. It is dedicated to the Virgin; the legend thereof being, that once upon a time the convent was so infested with fleas that the monks abandoned it. On the place where the chapel stands they were met by the Virgin, who, to induce them to return, promised that henceforth their tormentors should be excluded from the convent. The monks accepted the conditions, and ever since, it is said, the convent has been as free from fleas, as, through the saintly efficacy of St. Patrick, Ireland is free from toads. This chapel was erected in commemoration of the vision and the miracle. Our own experience, however, furnished a dubious corroboration of the latter, — either the miracle is in a condition of damaged efficacy, or it does not extend to travellers.

About half-way up we passed through a cleft of the mountain under two archways, distant from each other about ten minutes' walk. At these, in the good old times, monks used to stand to confess all pilgrims, a process necessary to enable their passage.

Hence it is said that no Jew was ever able to get through. The second archway opens upon a secluded little plain—a singular amphitheatre in the very heart of Sinai, surrounded by magnificent peaks and walls of granite—in the centre of which is a little enclosed garden, with a solitary cypress standing at its entrance, and near it a spring and a pool of water, the latter large enough to supply the refreshment of a bath. A few paces from the cypress is the chapel of Elijah, said to be built over the place of the prophet's abode in Horeb. One compartment of the chapel contains the cave in which he 'lodged'—a hole just large enough to contain the body of a man, and into which, as I ascertained by experiment, he might creep. Here he 'wrapped his face in his mantle, and went out and stood at the entering in of the cave,' when after the storm and the earthquake, which rent the mountains upon which we gazed, the Lord 'passed by' and spake to him in the 'still small voice.' Of course no credence can be given to these monkish traditions beyond the probability that the Divine manifestation took place in some such locality of the mountain, and there is no other so likely as this.

Sinai is a great temple 'not made with hands,' and this is its very 'holy of holies.' It is a place into which, through a stupendous veil of granite which shuts out even the Bedouin world, God's priests may enter to commune with Him. In all probability it is the place to which Joshua and the elders accompanied Moses when he went to the top of Jebel Mousa to commune with God. No other place affords conditions equally likely.

From this little plain we obtained our first view of the summit of Jebel Mousa—yet some thousand feet above us towards the south. On our way we passed the footprint of Mahomet's camel.

At length we stood upon 'the top of the mount'—the most sacred spot upon the earth's surface; Jews, Christians, and Mahometans holding it in a common reverence. A little Christian church, until recently a ruin but now just restored, and a Mahometan mosque, stand side by side on the summit,—either a stroke of not very dignified policy, or an expression of very unwonted liberality. About Mount Sinai the two faiths are at any rate on very amicable terms; but there is no Jewish synagogue. Hated and persecuted by both Mahometans and Christians, the Jews are rarely permitted to consecrate their sacred spots; and yet surely the older and more sacred of the traditions of Sinai pertain to them.

The top of Jebel Mousa is of grey granite. The lower part of it, and the general mass of the mountain, including Râs Süsfâfeh, are of red granite. In the red granite of Jebel Mousa Dendrite stones—i.e., stones marked with fossil trees or ferns—are found. Pococke, Shaw, and the older travellers, speak of them as among the wonders of Sinai; but Dean Stanley speaks of it as curious that they have not been found in later times. We found them very plentifully near a road which the Pasha began to construct, but did not complete; we brought away some specimens.

The testimony of travellers had prepared me for a view from the top of Jebel Mousa much more limited than the reality. Robinson, especially, who refers all the sacred interest of Sinai to Râs Süsfâfeh, unduly disparages it. Jebel Mousa is lower by 1,000 feet than its neighbour, Jebel Katherine, and, of course, the view from it is much more circumscribed: but notwithstanding, it is very magnificent. A large part of the peninsula lies before the traveller,—a scene of tumultuous and intricate confusion, jagged mountain-tops rising from the shadow of deep valleys, and linked together without intervening plains. From different sides of the summit the greater part of the Sinaitic Alps may be seen: Jebel Katherine, streaked with snow, blocks the view on the south-west, and conceals Um Shômer, higher than itself; the peaks of Süsfâfeh conceal the plain of Er-Râhah on the north. In almost every other direction the view is very extensive. On the north-west are seen what Dr. Wilson, Laborde, and Dr. Stewart affirm to be the summits of Serbâl, but what Dr. Robinson and Dean Stanley affirm to be the double peak of El-Banât. We thought it Serbâl; and if, as Mr. Stewart affirms, Jebel Mousa is visible from Serbâl, why not Serbâl from Jebel Mousa? On the north-east Akabah may be seen, and the Arabian mountains beyond the gulf. On the south, Râs Mohammed, the point of the peninsula, is visible; and, a little to the north of it, a glimpse of the gulf, with the little island of Tinieh resting on its bosom, is obtained. The far north is bounded by the indefinite horizon of the Great Desert, with the pass of Nûkb Hâwy in the foreground. A little to the east of this, over Jebel Fureiâ, the mighty mountain-wall of the Jebel Tih is visible. Unfortunately, the atmosphere was not very clear; our prospect, therefore, was more indistinct and limited than otherwise it would have been. Descending the sides of Jebel Mousa a little, three of the valleys that insulate Sinai may be traced, the plain Er-Rāhah being shut out by Rās Sūsāfeh, as also part of Wādī El-Deir. We were chiefly interested in the Wādī Sebāyeh, — the place, as some think, of the encampment of the people while the Law was proclaimed from Jebel Mousa. This we saw in all its extent; but it only deepened our conviction concerning the claims of Er-Rāhah.

Most remarkable of all was the view, northward, of the interior summits of Sinai itself, — a Titanic wilderness of weather-beaten masses of granite, shaping themselves into the most fantastic forms, and overhanging with indescribable sublimity the ravines that separated them. After spending about an hour upon the summit, and reading the sacred history associated with it, we descended to the little plain; but instead of leaving it through the archway leading down to the convent, three of us started for the summit of Rās Sūsāfeh, about two miles distant. Our path wound through narrow valleys and over rugged passes of granite. Never have I been so impressed with huge forms of mountain magnificence and grotesqueness: they are as overwhelming from their own awful grandeur as from their inseparable associations. The bottoms of these internal valleys are covered with odoriferous plants; each, indeed, is a perfect 'garden of herbs,' most of them unknown to me. In one or two places are little chapels — one dedicated to John the Baptist, another dedicated to the 'Virgin of the Zone;' the latter is the most northern, and is at the foot of the precipice of Sūsāfeh. Two willows grow near it, which give it name, 'Mountain of the Willow,' to the peak. From this chapel the ascent of about 500 feet to the summit is very steep and arduous; it is, indeed, a rough scramble up an almost perpendicular ravine, over huge detached blocks of granite. We accomplished it in about twenty minutes; and then we stood upon 'Horeb, the mount of God,' on the very summit of the central peak, once covered with clouds and darkness, and refulgent with the glory of the Lord —

'Where all around, on mountain, sand, and sky,
God's chariot-wheels have left distinctest trace.'

Er-Rāhah in its entirety lies stretched before us; the wide entrance to Wādī Sheikh opens on the right; the boundaries which kept off the people — either an alluvial debris, or the side of a natural valley — are around the base of the mountain; the Hill of Aaron, where he cast the golden calf, is just beyond.

If the view from below was impressive, not the less was the view from above. The seven peaks around us were stern and awful in their grandeur. Could they but have testified what they had seen! Their character is in striking harmony with the associations of the place.

And yet it was not without its discord. On a mountain to the left, over against Rās Sūsāfeh, — the Jebel Tinia is an unfinished modern palace of Abbas Pasha, glittering like the last new house in the Boulevards; a monument of folly and bad taste.

It is impossible to convey mere impressions to others, and of course their subjective value depends upon their recipient: but having traversed the summits of this vast pile of Sinai from one end to the other, having looked down into each of the four valleys which isolate it, having looked up to it from various points below, and having a distinct and vivid conception of it in its entirety, we all felt, first, its unique grandeur — grand in the approaches to it, grand in itself, the adytum of a great temple of Nature consecrated by God to himself; and next, the wonderful harmony between the place and the history, — a harmony to be found nowhere else in equal perfection. We could not doubt that this was the scene of the law-giving, and that the two summits, Jebel Mousa and Rās Sūsāfeh, were the mountains of Divine manifestation to Moses and the people respectively. On this supposition there is not a requirement of the narrative that is not perfectly fulfilled. No place or conditions can be conceived of more suitable for such a manifestation.

For a while we surrendered ourselves to its almost overpowering associations and solemnities. We could almost fancy that the mountains still felt the awe of His presence; that the atmosphere still thrilled with His voice; that all around still bore the impress of His touch.

Every traveller has remarked the distinctness with which, in the region of Sinai, sounds can be heard at an almost incredible distance. The exaggerations of the Arabs — one of whom told Carsten Niebuhr that their shout could be heard from Jebel Mousa to the Gulf of 'Akabah, — as well as the sober testimony of travellers who have made experiments, attest this. According to Mr. Sandie, ordinary conversation on the plain Er-Râhah can be heard nearly half a mile. A thunderstorm, which he heard on Sinai, is described by Dr. Stewart as stupendously grand. This may possibly be attributed in part to the structure of the mountains, and in part to absence of vegetation. This has an interesting bearing upon the utterance of the Law. There is no reason to think that the voice from the holy mount was loud and reverberating like thunder: the impression which the narrative makes is of a voice distinct and clear, rather than overwhelmingly grand. Philo says: 'The Law was uttered with such calmness and distinctness that the people seemed to be seeing rather than hearing it.'

We rapidly descended to our tents by one of the ravines on the eastern side of the mountain,—an almost perpendicular water-course, which it would be well-nigh impossible to climb. The 'descensus' was anything but 'facilis.' It brought us into the valley just by Jethro's well and our tents; the rest of the latter was very welcome.

On the morning of Tuesday we prepared to leave Sinai. It is impossible to avoid a feeling of melancholy at the almost barbarous and utterly irreligious condition of the district. A greater destitution of religious feeling, and even idea, than that which characterises the Towâra Arabs, cannot be imagined: they may be gentle in blood, but we should scarcely do them an injustice were we, in religious respects, to place them on the level of the lowest African savage. In Mussulman cities nothing is more common than to see Arabs pray: we never saw a Towâra pray; nor, as far as we could learn, have they any ordinances of religious worship or instruction. And yet the district of Sinai has been inhabited by as many as 6,000 monks at a time: traces of monasteries and convents are to be found everywhere. Unlike the self-sacrificing monks and missionaries of the Latin Church, the Greek monks of the Convent of the Transfiguration never think of teaching the Arabs either the arts of civilization or the glad tidings of the Gospel. 'It is hard,' says Dean Stanley, 'to recall another institution with such opportunities so signally wasted. It is a colony of Christian pastors planted among heathens, who wait on them for their daily bread, and for their rain from heaven; and hardly a spark of civilization or of Christianity, as far as history records, has been imparted to a single tribe or family in that wide wilderness. It is a colony of Greeks, of Europeans, of ecclesiastics, in one of the most interesting and most sacred regions of the earth; and hardly a fact, from the time of their first foundation to the present time, has been contributed by them to the geography, the geology, or the history of a country which in all its aspects has been submitted to their investigation for thirteen centuries.'

The scene of our departure was strange enough. Some of our camels and men, according to the regulations of the Arabs, had to be exchanged for others. Every Arab in the district who possessed a camel was eager to be employed. As many as fifty or sixty men beset our encampment, and scrambled for our things. The confusion and violence were indescribable. Every little bag was seized by four or five Arabs simultaneously—struggling, vociferating, gesticulating to the utmost of their power. Hassan and his servants were powerless. He and 'Abishai, his chief lieutenant, armed themselves, therefore, with the stoutest sticks that they could find, and with both hands laid about them most lustily, running from one group to another, and belabouring the hands and arms that were struggling at a portmanteau. Finding this ineffectual, Hassan would occasionally dash his fist into the face of an Arab, and by a kind of sustained push, back him out of the mêlée. The clamour of European porters and commissionaires is bad enough, but it is gentleness itself compared with that of the Arabs. Choose your porter, and the rest fall off. You cannot choose your Arab. He has no idea of a verbal engagement; and so long as you are within reach he will attempt to transfer you and your baggage to his own camels. The entire property of an Arab consists of his camel; and all its produce is the very occasional employment for it that he can obtain. Blood is frequently shed on such occasions. Happily it was not so in this instance, although the struggle continued for two hours. We could do nothing but stand by, infinitely amused—compelled to admire the perfect forms, the manly grace, and the picturesque attitudes of many of the vociferating Arabs.

We did not get off until nine o'clock, and for some miles we were escorted by a number of disappointed men with their unemployed camels. It was an irreverent and even painful departure from such a place. I did, however, in the confusion manage to get apart for a short time, and my last look of the Holy Mount was a quiet and silent one. Shortly after, however, two or three Arabs seized my camel, and with the peculiar guttural which brings a camel to his knees, they thrice arrested my progress, vociferating and shouting, trying to induce me to dismount and transfer myself to another beast, until I was in danger of being treated like a portmanteau — my legs and arms pulled in opposite directions. Hassan, according to his custom, had remained behind, to see everything cleared from the encampment, and, except by physical resistance, I had no means of remonstrating. As I had a good camel, I did not choose to part with it; so, as often as it was brought to its knees, I made it rise again; the chief inconvenience being the violent shuttlecock motion caused by a camel's rising, the first pitch of which almost sends you over its head, the second almost breaks your back, the third propels you forward again, and it is not until the fourth that you are fairly up; and all this was aggravated in this instance by the further disturbance of a pull at one leg or the other. I was, however, by this time, a tolerably expert camel rider, and kept my seat. Happily 'Abishai came up, and, seeing my predicament, put a stout stick into my hand, with the wholesome advice, 'If they touch you again, beat them.' I was not again molested; but for some hours the disappointed candidates for the honour of carrying us accompanied our caravan, maintaining a fierce and almost deafening controversy with their more fortunate companions.

Our way lay down the Wady Sheikh; our destination was Gaza, by the Khan Nûhl, which we reached fourteen days afterwards.

SNOWBALLING.

BY JOSIE S. HUNT.

THE soft, loose gold of her tresses
Is straying about her face,
And the wind through its silken meshes
Is running a frolicsome race,
Her violet eyes — how they darken and flash!
Her rose red cheeks — how they glow!
As she stands, ankle-deep in the milk-white drifts!
Pelting me with the snow.

She tosses the soft flakes round her,
In her pretty, hoydenish play,
Till she looks like a sea-nymph rising
Through the billows of foam and spray.
She moulds the balls with her little bare hands;
Do you think she would pout or scold
If I nestled the pink palms down in my breast
To warm them? — they look so cold!

Her white wool mittens are flung on the snow,
Each one in itself a flake,
And her silken scarf beside them lies,
Coiled up like a crimson snake.
All about me the tracks of her soft brown feet
Have printed the downy snow,
And I know by them where, another spring,
The prettiest flowers will grow.

She laughs and scoffs when my snowballs fly
Harmless over her head,
And she flirts her curls in a saucy way,
And crouches in mimic dread;

She calls me a sorry marksman,
An awkward fellow — and still
She, sly little witch, knows well enough
It isn't from lack of skill.

She knows I would sooner think
Of tearing a butterfly's wing,
Or of beating a lily, or throttling
The first sweet robin of spring,
Than of aiming at her in earnest
Or hitting her if I could,
Or harming so much as a tassel
Of her little scarlet hood.

Gay, beautiful Madge! Oh what would she do
If my mouth was half as bold
As the crystals which fall on her lips and her hair,
Like pearls among rubies and gold?
Will her pride and her wilfulness trample my love
As her feet have trampled the snow?
That the missiles she flings, which are ice to my face,
Are fire to my heart, does she know?

Sweet tease! does she guess I am wondering now
Whether she'll ever be,
In the long, long future before us both,
Anything more to me
Than a little hoyden, with wild, gold hair,
And red-rose cheeks in a glow,
Who stands ankle-deep, in the milk-white drifts,
Pelting me with the snow?

From the Sunday Magazine.

THE PASTOR'S WIDOW.

A few years ago our market was daily attended — unless, indeed, the weather was desperate — by an elderly woman, remarkable neither in face, attire, nor anything else. Her dress was always simplicity itself; she was middle-sized, had rather a commonplace face at the first glance, but what drew my attention to her was the regularity of her attendance, for which there seemed no adequate reason, since she had, generally speaking, only a very small basket on her arm, and sometimes none at all. When she had made her purchase she did not go straight home like other people, but regularly made the circuit of the whole market; and when the weather was fine and the stalls full, often visited some of them two or three times over. Unconsciously I took to observing what she was looking for, and what it was she bought; she had never come in my way as a bargainer, never snapped up a pigeon or fowl I happened to want. Indeed, her purchases seemed all on a small scale; belonging not to the animal but vegetable world, and even of vegetables she chose the cheapest and soonest cooked, and with them almost always a little fruit. At times too she would ask the price of flowers, — a little rose-bush or pot of pansies, and I noticed that very often the market-women would give her a few lettuce leaves unasked, whence I concluded that she kept a little bird, and in all probability lived alone. Now, purchases to this amount need not have detained her two minutes; there must have been some other attraction in the market-place, and when once I began fairly to observe her, I soon discovered what it was.

Evidently, she took an infinite delight in the vegetables and fruits themselves, apart from any idea of eating them. But it was orchard-fruit that most fascinated her eyes and heart. Mere bush-fruit she seemed scarcely to notice, but apples and pears were her supreme delight, — there was a new exclamation at every kind she discovered. When the new ones came in, and new and old lay in the basket together, her new year seemed to begin, and she noted and named every fresh appearance, just as a field-marshal reviews his regiment.

I began, too, to notice how well the market-women knew her tastes. They would beckon to her to show her new kinds, and ask their names. There was, in short, a quite peculiar tie between this good woman and the market-wives, and a very friendly one. The interest that she took in their stalls, her admiration of fine fruit, her judicious discrimination of the relative merits of different kinds, and useful hints as to storing them, &c., were all pleasant to the sellers, who evidently liked to see her and to exchange a few good-humoured words, as a variety in the monotony of marketing.

One winter day, when it was bitter cold and slippery, it so happened that she fell down in going out of the market, and hurt her leg and arms very badly. She was soon raised up and set on her feet. No limb was broken. With great suffering she could contrive to walk, but not alone. Although I had very little acquaintance with her, I could not do less than offer her my arm, which she took gratefully, but with all sorts of excuses and apologies, such as were customary in my day, when every silly person had not yet got to believing that the world was created expressly for him, and that his fellow-creatures were in it to wait upon his convenience. It seems to be considered old-fashioned now-a-days for one man to thank another; but what would you have? If people have left off gratitude to God, why not to each other?

I can tell you it was no easy matter to get the poor creature, who was in terrible pain, back to her own part of the town.

Her lowly room was indescribably clean and neat, and as I had rightly surmised, there was a bird in the window, who greeted us with cheerful chirps and twittering.

"You poor dear," she said, "you think you are going to get your salad, and I have none for you to-day."

Quite exhausted, she sank down on a chair.

"My Heavenly Father!" she murmured, "what am I to do now?"

It seemed that she was quite alone in the world. Only a charwoman came in once a day with wood and water. She did everything else for herself. She rented this one little room, but had nothing to do with any one of the other inhabitants of the house, no acquaintanceship with them, except a mutual bow if they chanced to meet in the doorway. Such complete isolation as this may go on pretty well for a time, but earlier or later something is sure to happen, and the question "What next?" often gets forced upon the lonely with a suddenness that takes away their very breath.

On this occasion it was I who put it, and not the half-fainting sufferer. What next, indeed? There I was, all alone; the charwoman would not come till six, — it was only ten now. Had I been at home I could have sent for help; but I was afraid of leaving her alone, and then, whom was I to call in this strange house? There was not even a bell in the room. In the midst of my perplexity, however, there was a knock at the door, and a merry childish face peeped in and said —

"Mamma sent me to see if she could be of any use to the old lady. She heard that she had come back poorly."

Here was an angel in time of need. She came in, and in the most compassionate way began to stroke the poor sufferer, who could not reply for coughing.

"Could your mamma come here herself?" said I, not noticing the shaking of the old lady's head, and the child was off before she could get out a word.

"Dear me!" she said at last, "what can you be thinking of! Such a distinguished lady!"

But the lady herself soon entered, distinguished no doubt, but a sweet-looking creature as well, who approached the invalid in the most sympathising manner, but bowed very stiffly to me. I set it down for pride, and thought to myself, "Ay, ay, they are all alike;" but later I found out it was shyness.

And now, what next? Why, first of all we decided that we must get her to bed, and then I would go and fetch my own doctor. The lady said she would have sent for hers, only he was rather too much run after, and when once he had laid out the order of his day, nothing could get him to depart from it: if they ran after him with the intelligence that his own wife was dying, she believed he was capable of saying, "She must wait, for I have still four patients down on my list." Meanwhile I fully expected the lady to send for her maid; but no, she took the matter in hand herself, to the inexpressible confusion of the worthy widow.

"Impossible — out of the question — the sheriff's lady — Madam, I beg, I entreat — I shall die of shame."

And when we came to her left foot we were nearly the death of her, for as the lady tried to draw off the stocking, she in the intensity of her distress and anxiety to prevent it, lost her balance and nearly fell off the chair. To be sure I caught her and broke the fall, but still the wrench she gave herself made her scream, and brought tears into her eyes. We had the greatest difficulty to get her into bed, but at last it was done, and she might have rested quietly but for her politeness and her scruples.

"And if I only knew what to do, — and she is not put out with me. She can do everything for me that I want."

Upon which the lady explained that the allusion was to the charwoman who came once a day, and that the widow thought that would be attendance enough. But this the doctor would not hear of. The case required far more treatment, and he proposed to have the patient carried at once to the hospital, where all the townspeople had a right to be received gratis. He was physician there, he said, and he could promise that she would be perfectly well cared for. But, to our great astonishment, the pastor's widow positively refused; she could not venture into such a large house, could not endure to be amidst numbers; it was impossible to live in a large room where there was no rest or sleep day or night; a little room was such a comfort in sickness. We all tried to overcome her objections, told her a few hours would reconcile her to the change, and vaunted the comforts of the institution; even Lisette, the lady's maid, taking a lively part in the argument, for she feared her mistress's kindness would give her some trouble.

The good soul knew and felt that this repugnance of hers must strike us all as childish and unreasonable, and therefore her agitation became very great, when all at once the sheriff's lady interposed:

"Never mind, my dear madam, don't distress yourself; there is no necessity for anything of the kind. I can easily understand your liking better to be alone than with a dozen others: when you want to sleep, somebody else is sure to begin coughing. I should feel just the same. We shall be sure to find a good nurse."

The doctor was not one of those who are incapable of placing themselves in another person's situation, and get angry at the least difference of opinion.

"Very well, my good lady," he said, "I have not another word to say. If only we get Mrs. X. (he meant me) to look about for us, depend upon it we shall get a suitable nurse."

"Thank you for your confidence in me," said I; and the thing was settled. I went off to seek a nurse, who was, in the first instance, to call upon the doctor for further instructions, and the lady undertook to sit with the patient in the meantime.

Thus, then, a so-called accident had brought together, and into friendly relations, persons who else would never have known each other; and but for it I should have been poorer in kindly memories and richer in prejudices.

The consequences of the accident were far more serious than the good woman at first anticipated. The human frame is pretty much like a bottle of wine, which will keep clear and beautiful to the eye for years and years if you let it stand undisturbed, but a rude shake or two will so completely change its aspect, you would hardly believe it was the same wine; nor will it soon clear again. And, in the same way, let an elderly person, who has long led a quiet uniform life, meet with any untoward accident that shakes the frame and changes the course of habit, ten to one some latent mischief will develop itself, so that the original accident becomes a secondary thing, and not unfrequently results in death. The widow had hoped to be up and about in the course of the next week, but she was sadly mistaken; she had to put off her hope from week to week, and meekly, though with many a sigh, had to resign it as each week came round. The injuries would not heal properly; the limbs seemed to lose their power, and by degrees a general debility set in. The doctor did what he could, but gradually took to an ominous shake of the head. The nurse was very kind; I had been fortunate in my choice; not only was she skilful in her office, but she got fond of the invalid, who suffered so patiently, never ordered her about, but humbly asked for what she absolutely required, and as much as possible respected her sleep.

The nurse, however, could not give up her whole time to one patient; she had several valuable clients whom she could not afford to lose, and therefore arrangements had to be made to prevent the invalid being left alone. The sheriff's lady and myself, between us, contrived that the solitary intervals should be very short indeed, and I must say that it was this lady who took the greater part of the responsibility, and that not by sending Lisette or any other deputy, but in her own person. Nay, even when she knew that I was there, she would come down with her work; and help to while the time away.

What struck us most of all about our widow was her entire and singular isolation. She asked for no one, sent to summon no one, nor were any inquiries made for her. Her bird seemed her only friend, and he would go on ruthlessly chirping till he got to her; and no lettuce leaves seemed thoroughly to please him but those he pecked from her hand. I must also except the marketwomen, who were greatly surprised at her absence, and expressed much concern when they heard of her accident, and sometimes sent her presents; and here and there one gave me a flower, another an apple, to take to her, saying they had put them aside expressly for her, knowing them to be favourites. The example being once set, so many came to offer me similar tokens of remembrance, that I should have wanted a maid to carry them; but I begged that they would not all give at once, but from time to time send a little present to the poor lady, who would not be among them again, I feared, for a long time, if ever. But, to be sure, the ecstasy of delight to the good soul was to think of being remembered; and then the beauty of the apples!—in short, every time I took her anything she used to cry with sheer happiness. So childish a spirit I never had met with in all my life. And what a precious treasure this childlike spirit is, the world little understands; 'tis one that passes understanding, like the peace of God. The so-called happiness that most of us are chasing, strays beyond the confines of both these, and is nothing but a will-o'-the-wisp or a haunting spectre.

It will be easily understood that we wished to know whether she had any relations or friends whom she would like to apprise of her condition; but we were afraid of asking her abruptly, for fear she might fancy we wanted to get rid of our services to her. To our individual inquiries on this head she replied, that there was no one but the guardian of the Orphans' Institute who knew her at all, and she would gladly let him rest as long as ever she could. Not that he was ill-intentioned, but he was a rough over-bearing man who could not tolerate the least opposition to his will; and would, if put out, run on as though life and death were in his hands. She actually trembled in speaking of him. But what was her consternation and alarm when she found out that this said despotic guardian was my cousin? I had all the work in the world to compose her, and convince her that I was in no way offended. I was fond of my cousin, indeed, but far too well accustomed to his infirmity to mind it being commented on or laughed at.

He was a man of the old-fashioned stamp, honourable and upright at heart, and in private matters gentle and pleasant enough; but once let him get on official ground, and clouds of majesty encompassed him about; contradiction was high treason; he became harsh, haughty, magisterial; in short, I could well understand the impression he had made on the quiet widow, though I wondered how the two had chanced to come in contact.

Everything combined to make me anxious to raise the curtain of her past, and to learn how she could possibly be the lonely creature she was. But it was not I alone who felt this curiosity; the sheriff's lady shared it to the full. One day I met her outside the room, and she began:

"Do tell me whether you really know as little as I do about the history of our good widow; I would give anything to have some insight into it. She never makes the least allusion to it, which increases my wonder."

"Just so with me," replied I.

"Now look here," she went on; "you are a person of courage and resolution; do devote this afternoon to finding out. It is such thoroughly bad weather, that we are sure that no one will disturb us, and 'tis just the time for listening to a story, and she is so kind I don't think she will refuse; and whatever she tells us, she can trust us to keep to ourselves."

So I consented; and as soon as we were both comfortably seated and the knitting going on, I began:

"What would you have said, Mrs. —, if I had brought my cousin in here to see you? I stumbled upon him almost at your door, and had half a mind to tell him he was but a sorry guardian after all, and looked very ill after his ward. What a face to be sure he would have pulled!"

But I soon repented of my mischievous speech, it threw the poor soul into such a state of alarm.

"Oh!" she cried, "if only I may be spared that! I do believe if I were to see him suddenly look in, the shock would kill me. What things he would say to me for not having announced my illness to him, and for refusing to go to the hospital; he would have me carried off there upon the spot."

After we had quieted and comforted her as well as we could, I went on to beg that she would tell us why she had such a dread of the worthy guardian, and also to give us some insight into her past life; we knew nothing about her but her name, and in our town the custom was to get full possession of a person's family history as far back as their grandparents before we could feel acquainted with them. At first she excused herself on the score of having really no history to tell.

"O dear!" she said. "How could such an insignificant creature as I am have met with anything remarkable?"

When we told her that this fact alone, of her knowing no one, and seeming to have dropped down out of the sky, was in itself truly remarkable, she said it was perfectly natural. She did not belong to our town, but to —; and so she suddenly found herself launched upon her history: and once fairly off, she forgot her scruples.

"When I was young," she began, "I little thought of ever becoming a citizen of B—. I belonged to one of the small towns in which, as the proverb says, you may pour out a quart of cream at the higher gate and gather it again at the lower without losing a drop. My father was the gate-keeper, and had besides to look after the town clock, and to see that it kept good time. It was an important post, but a difficult one too, for the clock was old and had a trick of standing; and if my father did not find this out at once, the mayor, or the lawyer's lady, or some other of the first quality in the little town, were sure to be down upon him, and send him flying off with a threat that if the time were not better looked after, a change would have to be made. Just under the gate my father had set up a little shop, both as a source of profit and amusement. There the very best matches were to be had, as well as other things, — tobacco, for instance, and coffee; and in winter, walnuts and chestnuts too. My father was a widower, and had no child but me, nor could he afford to keep a maid. He was not one of those who fuss themselves about time. He ate his dinner when it was ready, and did not expect it to be always to a minute, like the lawyer's lady, with her pointed nose. I often was rather perplexed what to do to make the two ends meet, but I was contented. It never occurred to me that we were badly off, and the Sundays were always beautiful days. There was church in the morning, and time for the most delightful meditations; and when Monday came, I began to look forward to the next Sunday. And so I lived on, quite happy, though quietly so. I had, indeed, very few playfellows, and was generally at home, where there was more than enough to do; but my father was very kind to me, and what better did I want? To be sure, I had my troubles every now and then, — if a flower I was fond of died, or my father gave me a slight reproof. One day — but really I do not know how to tell you this part; I must skip this," said the old lady, positively blushing.

But we were well aware that this would turn out the most interesting part of her story, and therefore we never ceased begging and coaxing till she began again. "One day — one day" — but she stammered over it a good deal, and it was some time before we could get her fairly started.

"One day, then — it was on a Thursday, and getting on to evening — a short gentleman made his appearance in my little shop, and inquired for tinder. I served him as I should any one else. He was a long time in choosing; I gave him my advice, and at length he went off without my thinking more about him than that he was a kind-mannered gentleman, had a lovely voice, and no doubt sang well. I wished I could hear him.

"The next Monday he again appeared suddenly before me, and quite startled me, for I had entirely forgotten him. He was full of praises of the tinder, and inquired whether we had tobacco as well, his being nearly done. I said we had; and he said as he had been so much pleased with the tinder, he might trust us as to tobacco, and I had to put him up a small parcel, which I did in fear and trembling, lest he should not approve it. At last Monday came again, and he too, saying he had never bought any tobacco so good as ours, strange to say; but it was not always the largest shops that had the best things, and in future he should get everything he could from us. I did not know what to say in reply; and but that he spoke so kindly, I should have thought he was surely laughing at us.

"In the evening I told my father that a gentleman had been to the shop, who meant always to buy his tobacco from us, and I should like to know his name. When my father had asked what he was like, and heard that he always appeared on a Monday, he pronounced that it must be the Helmsvale curate, who was in the habit of coming to town on that day, and got laughed at because he always bought a small bottle of some stomachic elixir at the apothecary's. It made me very angry, to think that people should laugh at so kind a gentleman; and next time he came I was the more attentive, because I felt sorry for him. He chatted, too, longer than usual, and when I called him Reverend Sir, seemed pleased at my knowing who he was. He told me that Monday afternoon was the only time he had for recreation; early on Tuesday he had to set to work again studying for the following Sunday.

"Now then I became fonder than ever of the Sunday, because Monday came next. All the week through I used to think, 'Oh, if Monday was but here!' and I was always in great alarm lest my father should send me out on a Monday afternoon, and the curate find no one in the shop, and so buy his tobacco elsewhere.

"On one occasion, just as he had pocketed his purchases, a sudden snow-storm came on. It got quite dark, and the snow blew in at the door, so that I could do nothing but shut it too and ask him to step into our room, for, with the door shut, we could hardly have turned round in the little shop. As it was, he was covered with snow, and I should have liked to have shaken it off, but did not, out of respect.

"From that time we got on more friendly terms, and he used to come, not only into the shop, but the room, to have a look at the rose-tree. My father thought a great deal of him, both because it was an honour to be on familiar terms with the clergy, and because he listened so patiently to my father's droll stories, and would laugh at them heartily, which was a new thing to my dear father, who hardly ever met with anyone who had not heard them before.

"Now people even began to tease me about a love affair. I looked upon it merely as one of their customary jokes, and laughed with them. All I feared was, that the curate might come to hear of it, and get his tobacco elsewhere, which would have been a loss any way, particularly to my father, who so enjoyed a talk with him."

At that we both smiled, and the sheriff's lady said,

"But you, my dear madam, would you not have been grieved, too, if the curate had left off his visits?"

"No doubt I should, afterwards," she replied, "but I was not conscious then of my own real feelings. To be sure, I used to think what a fine position a pastor's wife had: how she could have her own way in house and garden, and go about her parish like a queen amongst the other women, particularly if she had such a good, learned gentleman for her husband as the curate was. But that such good fortune could ever fall to me didn't enter my head, nor did he give me any room for thinking of it. He was not one of the young gentry, who pay compliments to every girl they meet. Nothing of the kind ever passed his lips; he was kind, but grave; always called me Miss Susan; never shook hands with me; never spoke of settling, or of future prospects, or bragged about his sermons; only sighed sometimes over his difficulty in composing them."

"Those men are the most dangerous of all, my dear lady," I broke in; "they only humble themselves that they may be praised by others."

"No, indeed no; that he never did; he was far too sincere for that; he was not like folks now-a-days. And it would have done him no good either. I could not have praised him, nor should I like to have told him what people said; that they were getting rather tired of him at Helmsvale: he had been there so long — not that there was much to find fault with, either, except that he was so short in stature.

"But one Monday came and did not bring him, and waiting and watching were all in vain; the whole week through not a creature came from Helmsvale of whom I might inquire whether the curate was sick. To be sure, he had missed one Monday before, but then he had told me of it beforehand, and taken two packets of tobacco. Ah! it was a long week, indeed, and my father and I did nothing but wonder what had happened to him. The following Monday the weather was so dreadful that we decided he never could come. However, on the mere chance, I thought I would make it twelve o'clock a little earlier than usual, so as to get our dinner well over and things all out of the way, and have time to — well, I will not say dress myself a little, my father would have given me a proper lecture for that — but at all events it could do no harm if I gave my face an extra wash, and chanced to put on the kerchief I wore on Sunday.

"As we were in the middle of our dinner, a knock came to the door, which indeed often happened, for people had a way of leaving things under our care, and my father called out, 'Come in.' And in came — his reverence the curate. Perhaps we had heard that he had been appointed to the living of Garnethill?

"No, indeed; and very kind we took it of the reverend gentleman that he should take the trouble of announcing this to us himself. But there was more to come, which quite overwhelmed both my father and me. He went on to ask me in marriage, and dwelt so beautifully on his being an orphan, and alone in the world, and that he wanted a wife to be father, mother, and all in all to him, that I can't help crying in this very day when I think it over. Then he told how that he thought he had found all he wanted in me, in such a way that my father wept out loud like a child, so did not know whether he was pleased or not. When he ceased speaking, neither of us could answer him a word. And thus I, a poor gate-keeper's daughter, was to become a pastor's wife, and a citizen of B——! It was too much for my head to take in: it did not seem real. I felt as if in a dream.

"My father was the first to get the use of his tongue, and he went on about the honour, and our poverty, and I, in my confusion, murmured something about not leaving my father, for how could the shop be carried on without me?

"Then came the best of all. If that was all the objection Miss Susan had to make, he said, he had anticipated it, and could, he thought, overcome it. He was about to propose that my father should live with us; it would be a great benefit to him if he could make up his mind to do so. There was glebe land with the parsonage that he should not know what to do with; he did not understand country pursuits, and my father did most thoroughly, he knew, and could therefore be of the greatest assistance to him.

"The next morning the news was all over the town, and before noon our own pastor came to tell my father that, having heard such a report, he felt it his duty to come and warn him of it, and he sincerely regretted that his daughter should have been so indiscreet as to carry on a flirtation with a curate. Then my father replied that I had done nothing of the kind, but that the curate had been appointed to a living, and that quite unexpectedly I had become engaged to him yesterday. Our minister would not believe it, and thought we had mistaken jest for earnest; but when he was really convinced, he wished me grace to profit by my good fortune. But I was still, he said, far from being qualified for such a position, and gladly would he lend me all the assistance he could, and I might come to his house whenever I liked. He added that he must say he never should have expected such a thing: but it was true enough that still waters run deep.

"You can easily imagine the noise it made in our little town; but no one seemed to grudge me my happiness, not even those at the parsonage, where there were seven daughters. Everybody was kind to me, and seemed to think that my good fortune was an honour.

"I had to go over to B——, where I had never been before. It was a grand day for me, and I enjoyed it much, only with fear and trembling. He led me everywhere by the hand, else I should never have had courage to walk about, and it was a great relief to me when we left the gates behind us.

"The following day was the most important in my life; it was that on which our banns were given out, and we went to church together. After that we were busy, indeed. My father was resolved to leave none of our poor furniture behind. What we had, he said, we need not buy, and that was money saved at all events; added to which, under his auspices, the curate bought some very nice things; and as to presents, I had so many I was quite ashamed. I never could have believed people had been so fond of us. At first we thought we had better not have all our effects carried to the parsonage at once, but my father decided that the sight of such a load would inspire the parishioners with respect, and went with it a day before, to get all ready for us. The next morning we got quietly married, and that evening arrived at the parsonage.

"Our new pastor's wife is still quite a child," the villagers said; "but she is one of the children who will turn out a good kind of woman; she has no pride." Oh, on, indeed, I was not proud: I only felt that Heaven had opened and taken me in.

"Many laughed at us, no doubt, but we were not aware of it. And then we, especially my husband, had such a genuine goodwill to all men, that the laughter soon died down, and it was allowed that he was one of the right sort, and would help every one if he could. But it was my father who was the most looked up to. He had just the proper self-respect; sat quite at his ease in our mayor's company, and had always plenty to talk of, as well as plenty to do, for our glebe, and especially our orchard, kept his hands full. We lived very much to ourselves. The village was remote: nor had we much intercourse with the other pastors round; my husband was shy, and I still more so. I can quite understand that we were of little value in society; for, if not stupid, we could not prove ourselves the reverse. But we were none the less happy for that. My husband with his flock, my father with his fields, and I with my garden—the narrower our interests, the more engrossing they seemed, and the joy of one was shared by the other two. And our joys were new, day by day; each season brought baskets full, and we were like children in our delight over our crops. My husband often declared that he had never believed any human being could be so blest, and least of all himself.

"Nor was my father less happy than my husband: and moreover he ascribed all our prosperity to his own efforts. We should see, he said, how differently things would go on but for him; we were but a foolish inexperienced pair, and had no idea of management. And we fully believed him. We both felt that we were blest far above our deserts, and indeed I was so childish that I often felt quite ashamed of it, and almost sad in the conviction that it could never last. For small as our income really was, our wants being still less, we always felt ourselves to have all and abound, and I do not believe a happier household could have been found than ours for many, many a year.

"The first blow was my father's sudden death. He had retained his energies so completely that we never thought of losing him. He made a sad gap in our life; we missed him in every way. And then we had no children, and began to feel a conscientious scruple in living so completely to ourselves, while others were oppressed by family cares. We thought God meant us to come to this conclusion, and had sent my father's death to point us to it. Then we were childishly delighted to find a little orphan, to whom we both took—a lovely boy, with light curling hair; and we rejoiced in the thought of bringing him up well—the more so, that he came of a very wild stock. We got inexpressibly fond of the child; he was our little idol; never off the lap of one or the other, and allowed to have his own way in everything. Yes, indeed, we forgot our garden and our orchard in our new treasure; he might pull our best apples, or knock off the heads of our prettiest flowers: we could not make up our minds to thwart him, though we looked on in sorrow and dismay. We thought that he only behaved so ill because he knew no better, and would get more manageable by-and-by.

"But no; on the contrary, he grew worse and worse, ruder, and more defiant. Do what we would we could not elicit a spark of love or a trace of sorrow. He was a tyrant to all other children in the village, and brought down much censure upon us for our bad bringing up of him; in short, he was a heart-break to us every way.

"God knows what would have become of us all at last if our dear Lord had not mercifully taken matters into his own hand. He removed the boy out of our keeping: sent his angel, Death, to bring him away to Himself. We understood at last how gracious God had been in freeing us from a self-imposed responsibility. He gave us no children. He knew our hands were too weak to rule them. Why should we have tried to be wiser than He, and to undertake duties He had not imposed? For all that He would not suffer a soul to be lost through our folly. The boy was not left to grow mature in sin or to die hardened, nor we to the agonizing conviction of his spiritual ruin lying at our door

"This was our season of bitterest trial, and taught us to feel the incompleteness of this world. After it was over, our days again flowed on peacefully and lovingly, each brought some good and most sweet joy. We became very skilful in the cultivation of fruit and vegetables, and our garden supplied half our neighbours.

"And so it was, that a long series of years glided away, and we were already getting old, when my husband suddenly died. This blow I had never thought of. He had not been laid up at all, and scarcely seemed less well than usual. He was always rather given to doctoring himself, probably because he had been delicate from childhood, so that it seemed a thing of course that he should be slightly ailing, and a little more or less was not easily observed. It was a thunderbolt out of a cloudless sky when I so suddenly lost him. Then I discovered the whole extent of my love for him: that I had lived, as it were, in his life for nearly forty years: that he had been my father, my husband, my child—my all! And yet at first I could not estimate all that was buried in his grave. The village had become my world: I knew of none outside it. All my hope and consolation would have been in remaining there, with my dear trees, near my church, near his grave. The smallest room would have been enough for me, and I knew of one that suited perfectly. We had never saved any money; true, we had spent little on ourselves; but that people were aware of, and therefore they required the more, and we both were fond of giving, and so nothing could be put by. But when everything was sold, there was a small sum left; and besides, I had a claim on two widows' funds, and therefore hoped to be able to live on the proceeds. But the gentleman in office would not hear of it. He told me plump and plain that I was a stupid woman, and did not understand the case, and that when I had removed from the parsonage, and had everything to buy, I should have great difficulty in getting on; whereas, if I lived at B—, there were civil rights that I could have the benefit of. But I thought I should have died at the very idea of moving, and therefore had the courage to oppose him. 'Very well, try it,' said he; 'we shall soon see who is right.'

"Alas! he was right; but I will not go over all my sorrowful experience of how much kindness and consideration for me was buried in my husband's grave. I had to write and tell the guardian I could not make the two ends meet; to which he replied, 'of course not,' and he would look me out a lodging in B—. Ah! that was a season of weeping, and the consolations of my neighbours about the firewood gratis, and other perquisites, only made me more wretched. I began to fancy they were tired of me, and were glad I was going away, which distressed me bitterly, yet made my nerves easier. When at length the parting came, my heart nearly broke. The trees were all in full blossom, but many eyes, too, were wet, and many an old woman said to me: 'I shall not know what to do with myself when you are gone. Here we shall never meet again, but please God we shall elsewhere, and perhaps before long. I am breaking every day, and you are dreadfully pulled down of late.'

"And now I found myself in a broad stony street, and knew no one but the guardian of the widow and orphans' fund; and if I chanced to see him, I always felt as if he were the bear out of the pit coming to devour me. It was ungrateful of me, too, for he had cared for me like a father—had taken this room, and put all I wanted into it, and at the same time admonished me sharply not to become a useless gadabout, as most of the pastors' widows who came to B— did. Alas! he meant well, but he little knew how wide of the mark he was. Timid by nature, and made more so by sorrow, I never made an acquaintance—nay, at first I never ventured out of my room, saw no trees, no flowers, heard no song of birds. I learnt then what is meant by dying of depression—of the feeling that you are forsaken by every living being, are nothing to anybody in all the world, made to live on without sympathy and without affection.

"And so for some terrible weeks I did live, and should soon have died, but that God in mercy put it into my head to bring some living thing or other into my room. I ventured as far as the market, and all at once found myself restored to a familiar world. I was acquainted with everything in the stalls, and accustomed to speak to country women. I bought a few flower-pots, and next my little bird, and later took to going daily to the market. That was my life, and when I got accustomed to walking about I soon found other places where I could enjoy trees and flowers, especially the beautiful churchyard and pleasure-gardens outside the town, where no one goes on working-days. And so I gradually got reconciled to the town, but I made no acquaintance except the market-women, who were always kind to me.

"And so I lived a quietly happy life here, such as I did not believe it possible to know again: and if ever I fell into low spirits, my little bird would come and peck at me till I began to play with him. Then, I found my money go much further than in the country, for no one ever asked me for anything, so that sometimes I am ashamed of spending all upon myself, and think anxiously how I shall answer when God asks me what I have done for the poor. I have to confess to the guardian whenever he brings me my money, that I am far better off here than in Helmsvale. He never lets me off. He is a worthy man, but when I see him I never can help thinking of the bear in the pit. Once he invited me to dinner, but I am sure we were all equally glad when it was over. His wife is a smart, talkative lady, and I don't believe I got out ten words; and once back in my little room, I felt exactly as though I had been in the bear's den, and unexpectedly got out alive. I never was so stupid in my life. It is to be hoped they won't judge other pastors' widows by me; it would be wronging them greatly. But I am thankful no other invitations ever came, and I went on living in my quiet way, and very grateful for it to God, till He was pleased to visit me with this trial, and I found out that I could no longer get on alone. And now how grateful to Him ought I not to be for having sent me his good angels in my hour of need."

Such was the widow's tale, but not told in the course of one afternoon, for talking tired her, and yet it did her good. In her intensely quiet life she had garnered up much of thought and feeling, of which she was scarcely conscious. Her heart was over-full: our sympathy unlocked it, and it evidently cheered and refreshed her to tell us what she had experienced.

But she grew more and more feeble. I think hers was naturally a very fragile constitution; healthy so long as day passed after day in the same quiet uniformity, but incapable of sustaining a sudden shock. Perhaps, too, there may have been some latent constitutional disease, which the accident rapidly brought to a crisis.

She lived on a little while, but it seemed as if her life were all spiritual. She expressed herself far more fervently. Her feelings appeared more lively than in the first part of her illness. She spoke much of making a little journey to Helmsvale when she recovered. She had such an intense longing after her beloved husband's grave, and she should like too to see how the trees had grown in the parsonage orchard, and whether there were any persons left who still remembered her. When I brought her home a present from any of the market-women, she still showed all a child's delight, and would almost weep for joy. But gradually, indeed, they ceased to remember her in the market. Everything gets forgotten at last; only to prevent her finding it out, I went on bringing her little gifts, as if from the women themselves, and each of them was a solace to her spirit.

It was the will of the Lord that she should die. One morning, just as the sun began to gild her little room, she gently slipped away, without even one deep-drawn breath; the bird alone, who was sitting on her pillow, witnessed her departure, fluttered wildly about her head, perched on her shoulder, sang as loudly as he could, as though he would waken her, and when he could not waken her drooped his wings and sat dull and listless in the same place without moving. In a few hours all his feathers looked rough, and in the evening when we were going to put him to roost as usual, we found he was gone to roost for ever; he lay dead on her shoulder where in life he had sat so constantly; he had followed his kind mistress; he could not endure to be without her loving care for a single day. It is but seldom man so clings to man. We miss and mourn each other, indeed; but hearts are not often torn to bleeding, to say nothing of their breaking outright.

Well, her loss left a large gap in my life too; a gap such as I seldom experienced, and for which my cousin, the guardian, took me severely to task. He could not, he said, comprehend my grieving thus after her: we were in no way related; not even in the same social circle; our acquaintanceship had not lasted for many months, therefore my depression was not natural, but affected, abnormal, sentimental: all the board of guardians of the orphan institution considered it in that light, and had discussed it with great disapprobation.

As the Pastor's Widow had no relations, no one took any notice of her death but the said board, who exactly filled the mourning-coach that followed her coffin. Thus her departure made no stir on earth; was passed over in utter silence. But so much greater was the joy in heaven of the angels who had long known and loved her, when she came to join them, and with them to bless and praise the Lord, as only they who are pure in heart may.

IS THE CATTLE PLAGUE SMALL-POX ?

THE opinion recently expressed by a physician, Dr. Parsons, that the cattle plague is in fact small-pox, seems to be attracting considerable attention, to say the least, amongst scientific medical observers. Now, whatever may be the result of the investigations Dr. Parsons' suggestion will produce, it is impossible to avoid an expression of disappointment that the English veterinary practitioners have not applied themselves with more purpose than they appear to have done to the examination of the symptoms and indications of the prevalent disease. If they had done so, instead of consigning every animal to slaughter in sheer despair, could they have missed the discovery—if such it be—made by the physician? If the disease be indeed the small-pox, its treatment and the manner in which it is communicated are by no means unknown. From the first appearance of the plague we apprehended panic, and helpless assertions of its incurable character, and our fears have in a great degree been justified by the event. It is imported, it is not amenable to curative treatment, seem to be the sum and substance of veterinary medical testimony on the subject. It is clear, however, that the public, and eventually the terror-stricken agricultural community, will not long remain satisfied with such conclusions.

Now an investigation of the plague with a view to ascertain whether it is or is not the small-pox presents something definite, and cannot fail to prove useful whatever be the result. Dr. Parsons says the animals which have died of the plague show small-pox-like pustules under the skin, and present other symptoms of that disease. He has been followed by Dr. Charles Murchison, a lecturer at the Middlesex hospital, who in a long and elaborate letter to the Lancet, indicates points of resemblance between the cattle plague and small-pox. He says, "The resemblance of rinderpest to small-pox is no new discovery, although latterly it has been lost sight of." Ramazzini, in his account of the cattle plague which pervaded Italy in 1711, suggests such resemblance, as does also Laucisi. Dr. Mortimer and other physicians refer to the cattle plague in this country of the middle of the last century, as exhibiting pustular eruption, and it has generally been referred to by subsequent writers as "an undoubted epizootic variola," and inoculation was recommended and practised by Dr. Layard. Dr. Murchison then describes the eruptions observed in cattle afflicted with the existing plague, and adds, "the cutaneous eruption is not the only character in which rinderpest resembles small-pox. Its close resemblance, if not still more intimate relation to human variola, is borne out by the considerations he enumerates. Amongst these we may select the following:—

 "1. Small-pox is the only acute contagious exanthem in man that assumes a pustular form. The eruption in rinderpest is also pustular. Any difference between the two may readily be accounted for by difference in the skin of man and cattle . . .
 "3. The anatomical lesions of the two diseases are identical . . .
 "4. In both diseases, a peculiar offensive odour is exhaled from the body, both before and after death.
 "5. In both, the duration of the pyrexial stage is about seven or eight days.
 "6. The two diseases resemble one another in their extreme contagiousness, and in the facility with which the poison is transmitted by fomites.
 "7. Both diseases can be propagated by inoculation. This can be said with certainty of no other human malady than small-pox.
 "8. In both diseases there is a period of incubation, which is shorter when the poison has been introduced by inoculation, than when it has been received by infection.
 "9. Vaccinated persons are constantly exposed to small-pox poison with impunity; and with regard to rinderpest, there are numerous instances in which individual cattle, or entire herds, appear to have led charmed lives in the midst of surrounding pestilence." Upon these and other considerations he has stated, Dr. Murchison,—without insisting on the absolute pathological identity of rinderpest and variola,—recommends as tests, "to produce cow-pox in cattle by inoculating them on the one hand with vaccine lymph, and on the other with the matter of human variola, and afterwards to ascertain if they be proof against the prevalent plague, or if the course of rinderpest be thereby modified."

A case which seems to be strongly confirmatory of the above view is stated by Mr. Thomas Chambers, senior, assistant-surgeon to the London Surgical Home, who says:—"A week ago, December 27, I had to pay a professional visit at the house of a London dairyman. Before leaving the house Mr. B. asked if I should like to see his stock of cows, and, without waiting for a reply, he led the way to his sheds—two. They were large roomy buildings, well ventilated, and scrupulously clean. There I found 27 beautiful cows in the most perfect health. Mr. B. has not had a single case of disease of any kind in his sheds, although a neighhour of his, having sheds within a cannon shot of Mr. B.'s, lost 80 cows in a fortnight in October last. I made particular inquiry as to whether he had adopted any prophylactic measures, with a view to protect his stock from an attack of the cattle disease. He replied that for several years past he has been in the habit of vaccinating every fresh cow on entering his sheds—old or young—and that since his adoption of this simple prophylactic measure he has not lost a single cow from any cause whatever. These evidences certainly justify a recommendation to the owners of cattle to have their stock vaccinated without loss of time.

A correspondent of the Birmingham Daily Post says on this subject:—"After more than six months' careful and minute treatment and observation of the rinderpest, the medical faculty of the districts of Crewe and Nantwich, in Cheshire, have come to the unanimous resolution of treating the cattle plague as small-pox. During the week now ending, Mr. Bellyse and Dr. Vaughan, of Nantwich, and Dr. Lord, of Crewe, have vaccinated successfully large stocks, amongst which was that of Mr. D. Broughton, of Wistaston Hall, near Crewe. A very favourable report has just been made to us of their experiments. To this we may add the very important fact that in the very valuable stock of Mr. Trickett, of Rope, Cheshire, not a single case has occurred since the vaccination, whereas previously there had been fatal cases."

To these suggestive notices we may add the following particulars furnished by Mr. Charles P. Christie, the well-known brewer of Hoddesdon, Herts, of the successful treatment of three cases of the cattle plague:—"My stock consists of three young heifers, which lie in a small field about three quarters of a mile from Hoddesdon, and on Tuesday, the 12th of December, it was observed that one of them was unwell, would not feed, and had a slight discharge from the nose, and running from the eyes, together with purging. The following morning, finding the animal much worse, I sent a notice of it to the inspector, whose assistant came very promptly in the afternoon. He pronounced it to be one of the worst cases of rinderpest he had seen, and strongly urged me to slaughter it, and take every preventive measure with regard to the other two, one of which he also told me showed symptoms. I had in the meanwhile administered some gruel, and also provided some doses of chlorate of potash, and as my man had begun to doctor and nurse the animals, I resolved he should go on with it, instead of having any professional help. The inspector then recommended me to give them plenty of old ale. We went on then with old ale warmed up with oatmeal, together with a little ginger, aniseed, treacle, and honey, giving it to them three times a day until two days ago. The first one recovered in about a week. The others sickened in turn, and one of them was for two days in a much worse state than the first one that was attacked; in fact she had such violent purging one day, that we substituted for one dose of the old ale, &c., three eggs and some brandy, and clothed her with an old blanket. However, the result is, that they have all got over it. They seem quite well, only a good deal thinner, and enjoy very much all the food that is given them. They only had chlorate of potash the first two days."

Here probably the symptoms were observed and dealt with in an earlier stage of the disease than is the case in more numerous herds.

SPIRITUALITY WITHOUT GOD.

A REMARKABLE article in the new number of the Westminster Review on the writings of Coleridge, an article evidently from the hand of one of the finest of living critics, and itself full of the flavour of genius, concludes with a suggestion, not made in the mood of profound melancholy which it is calculated to excite, but rather in that of pseudo-classical content, for keeping a religion while dismissing God. A suggestion the same in effect has been recently made by an eminent critic of M. Comte, and it is evident that some of the highest-minded of the modern humanists are beginning to hold and to teach, with this critic, that "religious belief, the craving for objects of belief, may be refined out of our hearts, but they must leave their sacred perfume, their spiritual sweetness, behind." Or, as he says elsewhere, "Longing, a chastened temper, spiritual joy, are precious states of mind, not because they are parts of man's duty or because God has commanded them, still less because they are means of obtaining a reward, but because, like culture itself, they are remote, refined, intense, existing only by the triumph of a few over a dead world of routine, in which there is no lifting of the soul at all. If there is no other world, art in its own interest must cherish such characteristics as beautiful spectacles. Stephen's face, like 'the face of an angel,' has a worth of its own, even if the opened Heaven is but a dream:—"which means, we suppose, that the power to dream of beautiful and unreal visions, to be clad in the glory of a false hope, is one which we ought to desire and cherish for its beauty, even though we know that it is a mere transitory flush of the spirit, which will shortly subside like the crimson from an evening cloud, and reveal the cold leaden colour behind it. Surely nothing can be less like "the Greek spirit, with its engaging naturalness, simple, chastened, debonaire," which this critic describes (very falsely, we hope) as, for us of the present moment, "the Sangraal of an endless pilgrimage," than this attempt to foster artificially states of feeling of which the natural springs and sources are proclaimed to be imaginary or exhausted. To inculcate the culture of a feeling not because there is any proper object worthy of it, but because it is "remote, refined, intense, existing only by the triumph of a few over a dead world of routine in which there is no lifting of the soul at all," is surely the last vanity and infirmity of which human nature is capable, and so far from being a duty, resting, as our critic says, on the same basis as that of intellectual culture itself, it would be of an essentially opposite nature. The value of intellectual culture consists in opening to us all sorts of new and true shades of distinction, which are accessible to all who will travel the same path to find them. But feelings "that just gleam a moment and are gone," and can be defended only as being "remote, refined, intense," not as having any justification in a living object, whatever defence may be set up for them, cannot certainly be defended on the ground of belonging to the same sphere as true intellectual culture. Culture is desirable, for the same reason for which achromatic eyepieces are desirable to the astronomer, namely, as revealing true distinctions which we could not otherwise discriminate, or delicate phenomena which we could not otherwise study at all, and which may help to throw an additional light on the laws of the universe. But to produce for yourself voluntarily rare and delicate and arbitrary phenomena,—flashes of spiritual joy without an object, Auroras of the soul without any gleam of celestial light,—simply because such phenomena raise you above the common herd, and illustrate the triumph of life over dead routine, is a course of conduct which, so far from being analogous to that of intellectual culture, would justify any spiritual attitudinizing, any swoon of solitary vanity, whether of extasy or anguish, of flushing or of pallor, any self-will of glorious but unfounded faith, such as the critic ascribes to St. Stephen, or of glorious but not unfounded despair, such as we may find throbbing through the exposed and quivering nerve of Shelley's passionate verse. If the critic in the Westminster Review be indeed the realist he professes, he will not ground his apology for religious emotion without faith on the essentially unreal plea that all emotions which are "remote, refined, intense," and which express the triumph of a few over "the dead world of routine," are good, and should be fostered for the sake of their rarity, intensity, and distinctiveness. We know of no plea more completely hollow, insincere, and, in a sense, even bad, than this. An aristocracy such as he would encourage, distinguished by rare and delicate blossoms of unreal sentiment, would be fit for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under the foot of man. We should feel even a sort of passion of severely just exultation in seeing the destruction of such an aristocracy of hollow refinement by the strong though coarse tread of the commonalty who are excluded by our critic from these "remote and refined" feelings. A spiritual joy that is not good for the multitude can be worth no more to the spirit, than an intellectual culture which is not good for the multitude can be worth to the intellect. All who have really understood the spiritual joy of which the Westminster critic speaks have claimed it for all men, and not exulted in it as the remote and refined distinction of a few. "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people," is the strain of the greatest prophet of this joy. The critic who claims it as an esoteric gift marking the spiritual rank of a few seems to us to know as little of its essence as he thinks that he or any one else can know of Him who has been discovered by the modern spirit not to be its source.

But the critic suggests, though he does not hold by, another justification for this spiritual emotion and "spiritual joy" for which he contends, which we readily admit to be far nobler than the one of which we have spoken. He says people accept in theology empty arguments which they would accept on no other subject, "because what chains men to a religion is not its claim on their reason, their hopes, or fears, but the glow it affords to the world, its 'beau ideal.' Coleridge thinks that, if we reject the supernatural, the spiritual element in life will evaporate also, that we shall have to accept a life with narrow horizons, without disinterestedness, harshly cut off from the springs of life in the past. But what is this spiritual element? It is the passion for inward perfection, with its sorrows, its aspirations, its joy. These mental states are the delicacies of the higher morality of the few, of Augustine, of the author of the Imitation, of Francis de Sales; in their essence they are only the permanent characteristics of the higher life. . . . The life of those who are capable of a passion of perfection still produces the same mental states; but that religious expression of them is no longer congruous with the culture of the age. Still all inward life works itself out in a few simple forms, and culture cannot go very far before the religious graces reappear in a subtilized intellectual shape." This is nobler and doubtless more tenable than the other theory, for though, with instinctive exclusiveness of feeling rather odd in a Westminster reviewer, the critic still limits the "passion of perfection" to a few, by making it a desire for a higher life, and not for mere distinguishing rarities of feeling, he opens it to the many. And we should be the last to try and convince those who are unhappy enough to be blind to God, that therefore they ought to indulge no "passion of perfection" if they feel it stir within them. Even the Comtist who thinks he sees a law of historic development in human nature towards something nobler, and feels, he knows not why, the ardour of desire towards that nobler future, will not be challenged by any true Christian for believing so much, only because he does not believe more. If he really feels "the passion of perfection," the desire to reach a higher step in inward feeling himself, and to contribute his mite to the attainment of a yet higher level by those who succeed him after he has ceased to exist for ever, then we say that whether the Comtian philosophy explains those states of feeling truly or not, he is at least justified by the positivist theory in assuming these emotions as facts marking out the true direction of the historic law, and in fostering them also, if that seems to him the best kind of conformity to the historic law. Only we entirely deny the reviewer's position that this "passion of perfection" is itself the "spiritual element" of all true faith. The "passion of perfection" in its present form is mere aspiration, and no source of joy, though a rich source of sorrow. The condition of feeling which this passion, taken alone and without faith, would really justify, is the last in the world which, if we understand him rightly, the reviewer seriously wishes to encourage. He admires and envies "the engaging naturalness, simple, chastened, debonair" of the Greek spirit. Now aspiration in its most ardent form, "the passion of perfection," without trust in the love of God and Christ, is a passion of pain. The homo desideriorum whom it tends to make is as far as possible from "the Greek spirit, with its engaging naturalness, simple, chastened debonair." A debonair "passion of perfection" is almost a contradiction in terms. Indeed, however the Westminster critic may talk of the religious graces reappearing in a "subtilized intellectual shape," it is perfectly clear that the joy of perfect trust, the profound self-abasement of conscious alienation from God, are just as little capable of "reappearing in a subtilized intellectual shape," if there be no personal object for such feelings, as is the warmth derived from a real sun, of "reappearing in a subtilized intellectual shape" when the sun is extinguished and shines no more. We do not deny — we earnestly maintain — that men who by no fault of their own have lost sight of God, still draw from Him the life and love which they may, if they choose, ascribe to the "subtilized intellectual" movements of their own intellects. So a blind man may rejoice in the sunlight, and yet maintain that because he is blind the sun does not exist, and that what he feels is the "subtilized intellectual" heat which other and coarser minds falsely attribute to an external object. But those who know that God besets them behind and before, and lays His hand upon them, though they may admit that what he gives to others "in a subtilized intellectual shape" is as much proof of His love as what He gives more openly, and without veiling Himself behind the complexities of a fine organization, will feel great compensation in the revealed personality which bestows the simpler gifts, for the delicacy and subtlety of those which are filtered through a network of refined labyrinthine perceptions that conceals the giver. There seems to us something more natural in turning away from spiritual subjects altogether, when once the natural focus of such subjects, God, disappears from the unhappy thinker's view, than in trying to warm himself still with the heat of feelings of which the intellectual justification has disappeared. A greater mind than the reviewer's, in a state somewhat similar, though not so blank of all faith, wrote —

"It seems His newer will
We should not think at all of Him, but turn,
And of the world that He has given us make What best we may."

Surely that is healthier and more natural than feeding on the "sacred perfume," the "spiritual sweetness" which departed faiths have left behind them, — healthier, and far more likely to restore the vanished faith.

The reviewer has an odd impression that all belief in an absolutely Righteous, an infinitely Holy God, destroys the delicacy of human insight, the finely graduated judgment for human moralities. "The relative spirit," he says, "by dwelling constantly on the more fugitive conditions or circumstances of things, breaking through a thousand rough and brutal classifications, and giving elasticity to inflexible principles, begets an intellectual finesse of which the ethical result is a delicate and tender justness in the criticism of human life." On the other hand, belief in the absolute has a tendency to petrify moral judgments into abstract principles which will not fit individual cases, and into harmony with which therefore individual cases are artificially clipped or bent, to the great injury of true justice; and he illustrates by the deplorable figure which Coleridge's life, judged by abstract morality, itself presents. We admit that what the critic calls the "relative spirit," that is, the spirit which believes in no absolute righteousness, is often lax, but we should certainly not have thought it "elastic." On moral subjects it is loose-fitting enough, but has not belief enough of any sort to care to adapt itself closely to the moral condition of individual natures. Mr. Lewes's life of Goethe may be fairly taken as a very good example of what the critic means by the purely "relative spirit" in its adaptation to the higher criticism. The result is not a "delicate and tender justness in the criticism of human life," but a lax absolution of that great man from almost all his sins, even those sins which "a tender and delicate justness" would be compelled to admit. The truth is that the purely "relative spirit" has no belief in either the free power of man to choose the higher part, or in a higher inspiration than its own to show it the higher part to choose. The spiritual elasticity which is concerned to adapt itself closely to the moral conflicts of man's life, in order to enter as fully as may be into the highest phenomena of his spirit, does not exist for the purely "relative spirit," simply because it does not believe that they are the highest phenomena of his spirit, or indeed characteristic phenomena at all. The purely relative spirit which disbelieves in absolute righteousness disbelieves also in the special sacredness of duty, the special evil of sin.

And while our critic's criticism fails on this side in showing that the "relative spirit" does issue in a "delicate and tender justness," it fails still more conspicuously in showing that faith in an absolute righteousness hardens and petrifies the moral judgment, rendering it inflexible and "brutal" in its classifications. Was it our Lord, — who realized the absolute righteousness living in Him, as no human being before or since could possibly have realized it, and who in criticizing the moral evil in others — the woman taken in adultery for instance, or the woman who was a sinner — acted on His own precept, "Judge not, that ye be not judged," — was it He who failed in a "delicate and tender justness" in the criticism of human life, or rather the "relative spirit" of that day, the Sadduceeism which would have stoned Paul for believing in the resurrection? No doubt belief in a dead dogma may become the cruellest Pharisaism. But faith in a living Lord of absolute righteousness is probably the most softening, the most purifying, and ethereally delicate of the human influences which affect our judgment of others. Even M. Renan, — the great apostle of the "relative spirit," — has attributed this delicacy of moral appreciation in the highest measure to our Lord, and has remarked that his feeling for moral nuances was something quite new to the Oriental genius. And whence did this arise, if not in that infinite love for the Absolute righteousness and beauty which opened His eyes to the most delicate shades of loveliness, whether in the lily of the field or in the heart of man?

HAREM LIFE IN EGYPT.*

THERE is no problem in literature so difficult as to write, on delicate things delicately, and Mrs. Emmeline Lott — if there be such a person — certainly has not solved it. She has tried very hard, with apparently most upright intentions, and she has failed, either because she has allowed some littérateur to write out her own experience in his language, or because she has simply mistaken the easiest mode of conveying the impression she nevertheless desires to convey. It is quite advisable, it is even at this moment necessary, that the inside of the harem life of Mohammedan Asia, the home life of a fourth of mankind, should be faithfully and honestly described, as faithfully and honestly as the interior life of Europe has been by a thousand pens. The world is less fixed in its belief in the superiority of monogamy than it should be, and can derive only benefit from a plain statement of the results of the rival system. A clear and distinct account of the social meaning, the true drift and working, of the Asiatic system, would be a distinct gain not only to ethics, but to the permanent convictions of civilization. It would settle, for instance, one way or the other, the latent doubt of the highest European caste whether monogamy is not an idea, an acceptable idea no doubt, or even an essential idea where pedigree is important, but still an idea, and not a principle, liable to be overridden for the sake of convenience, or even of enjoyment. Unfortunately, for English readers at all events, to describe harem life, i. e. polygamy in its ultimate and indeed necessary form, it is necessary to state certain facts which it is very hard to state in any form which is not, to English ideas, slightly or gravely, according to an infinitely varying opinion, mischievous. The only mode of accomplishing the feat is to be very plain and very simple, making the facts as clear as possible, and also as little suggestive. Lady Duff Gordon has in her letters from Egypt succeeded in doing this, succeeded, that is, in giving the truth of a civilization whose laws upon all sexual subjects differ from our own, though they are laws, without writing an objectionable book. Mrs. Lott — we assume from internal evidence that the "English governess" is married — has not so completely succeeded. Her book is thoroughly honest and upright. There is not in it a sentence which is not of itself well-principled, or is calculated to harm any human being not brought up in the belief that ignorance is innocence. It would strike a French woman, or still more an Italian woman, of the better class, as a slightly realistic but absolutely unobjectionable record of a very unusual and therefore very valuable experience. It is a coarse book nevertheless, one well worth the reading of educated men, but one which we should by no means recommend for households indiscriminately. The authoress, as we have said, is clearly honest, and desirous only to state facts, and has a wish not only to make those facts enticing, but to make them as unsavoury as she well can, but she does not know precisely how to do it. Instead of being very direct and very simple, she is very plain and not very simple, but addicted to shrouding statements quite needful to her objects in language which arouses the very sense of annoyance she wishes to avoid. We wish we could give the best and easiest proof of her mismanagement in this respect, but perhaps a still better proof is that we hesitate. Writing for educated men, and not for girls, we cannot accuse ourselves of over prudery, and with adequate reason to assign would set the conventional laws very distinctly at defiance. And nevertheless, the fact that upon one of the simplest points of manners and hygiene Oriental civilization differs absolutely from Western civilization, is in this book so clumsily stated that we decline to quote the statement as it stands. Upon another question our refusal is more absolute. The whole of the allusions to the "guardians of the harem" have obviously and certainly been written by a man, and are in the very worst possible taste, in one or two passages almost disgusting. The fact of the employment of these men is really important, as displaying the grand secret of Oriental life, that the restrictions upon women do not arise in the faintest degree from the sentiment which in the West is called modesty, but the fact is sufficient without the, to say the least, annoying repetition in this book. Two or three paragraphs besides have a sort of nursery plainness, quite harmless but not usual in English, and on the whole, while availing ourselves of the author's experience, we recommend her book only to those careful to know the bad side of Oriental polygamy. Of the good side she says nothing and saw nothing, nor are we acquainted with any book which really describes it, except perhaps The Camp, the Mission, and the Zenana, and the accomplished authoress of those much abused volumes errs as much upon the side of reticence.

Mrs. Lott was employed for some months by Ismael Pacha as governess to his son, or rather as English teacher, and in that capacity accompanied his household on a visit to Constantinople. Of course she saw the interior of harem life, and her impression of it is what the impression of a nursery governess slightly above the average was sure to be, — that it was very magnificent, very uncivilized, a little disgusting, and unbearably uncomfortable. There were jewels without end and without end jealousies, glorious halls and squalid bedrooms, infinite wealth and nothing fit to eat, luxury of a kind beyond measure and no civilization. This, for instance, is a description of one chamber, or rather appartement — curious that English has no equivalent for that word — in one of the many Viceregal palaces in Egypt.

“As soon as I had joined the little Prince, who waited patiently while I explored the chamber, we opened a door on the right hand, passed through a small marble paved hall in which stood four life-size statues, each holding gilt lamps in their hands, which led us into the Viceregal Bedchamber. It was a noble-looking room, covered with a handsome Brussels carpet, with black ground and thickly studded with bouquets of variegated flowers of almost every hue. The whole was scrupulously clean. The gilt-iron bedstead was surmounted with gilded knobs, as also the foot and head plates. The mosquito curtains were of fine crimson silk gauze bespangled with gold crescents. The washhand-stand was of pure white marble, with ewer, basin, and the other usual appendages, of beautifully painted Sevres china, the bouquets on which were artistically executed, and matched the carpet admirably. A large pier-glass hung down from the ceiling. The divan (which was rather diminutive in comparison to those generally placed in the apartments of Turkish dwellings) and chairs were covered with crimson silk bespangled with gold crescents. The toilet-table, on which were placed His Highness's toilet requisites, all of solid gold, inlaid with most valuable precious stones, was covered with a similar cloth. The ebony cabinet was inlaid with gold, and costly jewels, on each side of which stood two silver branch candelabras holding a dozen transparent coloured wax candles; and in the centre was placed His Highness's jewel casket, a perfect gem of the same material, richly inlaid. The walls were covered with crimson paper, embossed with gold crescents. The ceiling was beautifully painted with Turkish and Egyptian landscapes. The chimney piece was of white marble, and the handsome, elegant bronze stove on the spotless white marble hearth was constructed in the form of a kiosk. Then we proceeded through a door that was left wide open into another chamber similarly fitted up, except that the furniture was of yellow satin bespangled with silver crescents, which was invariably occupied by that Ikbal, ‘favourite,’ whom the Viceroy from time to time delighted to honour. This was the guests' chamber, and the history of its occupants would form a singular addition to the annals of Egyptian history. The beds in both these rooms were encased in richly figured satin, which matched the hangings of each apartment.”

There are twenty or thirty descriptions like this alternated with others of filthy rooms, bad food, and that kind of squalor which seems peculiar to Asiatics, the squalor, namely, which is indulged in as a relief from oppressive splendour. The ladies of the harem, for example, never received their lord except in the richest attire, but they lived by themselves dressed in a medley of morning wrappers and diamonds, and their chief, the first wife, whose rule was absolute, superintended her laundresses, “shoeless, stockingless, with her hair hanging loosely about, and the sleeves of her dirty cotton wrapper tucked up to the shoulders and there tied.”

“One morning, when I returned from the gardens into which I had been strolling for a short time, I entered the Grand Pacha's reception room, and there I beheld one of the most extraordinary scenes imaginable. It was one of those nondescript tableaux to which only a Hogarth could have done justice. My feeble pen-drawing must necessarily fall very short of the original; for there were their Highnesses the Princesses, squatted on the carpet amidst a whole pile of trunks, most of which were much deeper than carriage imperials — a host of portmanteaus and carpet bags of small and large dimensions — jewel cases and immense red leather sacks capable of holding from six to eight mattresses. They were all attired in filthily dirty crumpled muslins, shoeless and stockingless, their trousers were tucked up above their knees, the sleeves of their paretots pinned up above their elbows, their hair hanging loosely about their shoulders, as rough as a badger's back, totally unencumbered with nets or handkerchiefs, but, pardon me, literally swarming with vermin! no Russian peasants could possibly have been more infested with live animals. In short, their tout ensemble was even more untidy than that of hardworking washerwomen at the tubs; nay, almost akin to Billingsgate fishwomen at home, for their conversation in their own vernacular was equally as low. They all swore in Arabic at the slaves most lustily, banged them about right and left with any missile, whether light or heavy, which came within their reach.”

The same lady, however, revelled on State occasions in rings with diamonds in them “almost as large as the Koh-i-noor since it has been cut,” and our fairer readers will thank us for this minute description of the State dress worn by the second wife on her visit to the Sultan's harem: —

most superb thick white moiré-antique silk robe, with a long train, trimmed with handsome point Alençon lace, having rich ruffles of tulle and pink artificial daisies all around it. The body and sleeves were also trimmed with silver ribbon and daisies. The bertha was composed of rich lace, ribbons, and daisies. Her slender waist was encircled with a ceinture composed of sapphires and diamonds. On her arm she wore diamond bracelets. Around her neck was clasped a superb diamond necklace. Her head was adorned with a tiara of diamonds, arranged in the shape of Indian wheat, the weight of which was very great. An immense branch, forming a geranium flower in full blossom, composed of opals, diamonds, emeralds, rubies, amethysts, formed the stomacher of her dress. A pink satin Turkish cloak, with sleeves and cape, was placed on her shoulders. Her face was covered with a rich Brussels lace veil, one end of which was placed over the head, and the other end crossed over the mouth and nose, passed round the back of the neck, and tucked down behind the cloak. Her feet were encased in white silk stockings, white satin shoes, richly embroidered with coloured silks, pearls, and gold and silver thread, with high gold heels, over which she wore a pair of yellow morocco papooches, 'slippers.' In her hand she held a rich pink silk parasol, lined with white satin, trimmed with a deep silver fringe, with a gold handle, inlaid with a great variety of precious stones. On her fingers were a large yellow diamond and a beautiful sapphire ring. Her Grand Eunuch held over her head a handsome large pink silk umbrella."

The odalisques are seldom educated, are in an English woman's opinion fearfully indelicate,—though some of this must be set down to the cardinal rule of Oriental speech—"Nothing natural can be indelicate,"—are incessantly intriguing against each other and the wives, and are, strange to say, hungry for money, of which some of them possess large sums. They were kind enough to the English governess when they understood her, and made her a sort of universal referee upon Frankish customs, and of course the lower women followed their example. Indeed, though Mrs. Lott complains repeatedly of her treatment, she records frankly a little incident which to any one acquainted with the East speaks volumes as to her position. The Hair Apparent's head nurse never took a backshish without compelling her to accept three-fourths, without assigning her, that is, the rank a gouvernante would hold in a European royal family. Her orders seem latterly never to have been disobeyed, yet she was compelled, as she repeatedly complains, to fight for a European chair, bedstead, and commode, and her impressions before and after her frank reception among the ladies of the harem were as unfavourable as those recorded in this extract:—

"There I was, totally unacquainted with either the Turkish or Arabic tongues; unaccustomed to the filthy manners, barbarous customs, and disgusting habits of all around me; deprived of every comfort by which I had always been surrounded; shut out from all rational society; hurried here and there, in the heat of a scorching African sun, at a moment's notice; absolutely living upon nothing else but dry bread and a little pigeon or mutton, barely sufficient to keep body and soul together. Compelled to take all my meals but my scanty breakfast (a dry roll and cup of coffee) in the society of two clownish, disgusting, German peasant servants; lacking the stimulants so essentially necessary for the preservation of health in such a hot climate; stung almost to death with mosquitoes, tormented with flies, and surrounded with beings who were breeders of vermin; a daily witness of manners the most repugnant, nay, revolting, to the delicacy of a European female—for often have I seen, in the presence of my little Prince,

"A lady of the Harem, not more forward than all the rest,
Well versed in Syren's arts, it must be confessed, Shuffle off her garments, and let her figure stand revealed
Like that of Venus, who no charms concealed!"

Surrounded by intriguing Arab nurses, who not only despised me because I was a Howadjii, but hated me in their hearts because, as a European lady, I insisted upon receiving, and most assuredly I did receive, so far as H.H. the Viceroy and their H.H. the Princesses, the three wives, were concerned, proper respect. The bare fact of my being allowed to take precedence of the inmates of the Harem, even of the Ikbals, 'favourites,' galled them to the quick; and there is no doubt but they were at that time inwardly resolved to do their utmost to render my position as painful as possible, nay, even untenable. Then my only companions were the ladies of the Harem, whose appearance I have already described as being totally at variance with that glowing myth-like picture that Tom Moore gives of retired beauty, so erroneously supposed to be caged within the precincts of the Abodes of Bliss, in his exquisite poem of Lalla Rookh; for therein I failed to find

"Oh, what a pure and sacred thing
Is beauty curtained from the sight
Of the gross world, illumining
One only mansion with her light!"

They were composed of the old Ibals, favourites of Ibrahim Pacha, and some of those who had ceased to rank as such, or, as the slaves emphatically termed it, to please the 'Baba Efendimir.'"

She rather liked the little Prince, however, who had the making of a man in him, ruined by early absolutism. No order he gave at six years old was ever resisted. He hung red-hot coals in slaves' faces with the most perfect impunity, and tore out the lips of one of his half-sisters with no consequence save a sudden order from his mother that the sufferer should kiss the hem of his robe. His favourite pursuit was to play at banking and drilling the little slaves, two games curiously illustrative of the unique position occupied by the Pachas of Egypt, the greatest merchant princes on the globe. He and his sisters ate with gold spoons and their fingers out of a tray, which looked afterwards like the tray of remnants carried out of a dirty cook-shop. The badness of her diet ultimately drove Mrs. Lott out of the harem, just as she had become reconciled to a position which was, we imagine, not without considerable pecuniary profit. The impression left by her whole book is that a great Asiatic harem is a microcosm of Asia, splendour and squalor, luxury and discomfort, adventure and monotony, licence and slavery, so inextricably commingled that no account ever reveals more than half the truth.

POETICAL SELECTIONS.*

THE strong impulse which almost all people who love poetry, and are not themselves poets, feel to select their own selection of poems is curious enough. The dislike to using the selections of others, even when they are as indisputably good as the Golden Treasury of Mr. Palgrave, or the Children's Garland of Mr. Coventry Patmore, is not unlike the dislike to wearing another person's coat, or gown, or under-garments. Men's and women's imaginations weave for themselves a sort of poetical vesture that suits their own wants and expresses their own hearts; they search in vain in the collections of others for the poems that strike the most musical chord in their own minds, and not finding it, they fret and are as uncomfortable as is the body in wearing another person's dress. Either it will not fit because it was meant for persons of different figure and height, or if it fits, it will not suit, because the worsted or flannel which keeps one person in a comfortable glow chafes the skin of another into a fever. So it is also with the poetical dress of those who do not, like poets, make their own, as silkworms weave their own cocoons. Teachers cannot bear to use another person's selection of poetry, nor even readers to see pieces they do not care for, or dislike, extracted at great length, while their own private treasures are ignored. But the curious thing is that though they cannot satisfy themselves with other persons' selections, they almost always start with the purpose of making other persons love their own; and in order to do this will even sacrifice to some extent that dominant taste of theirs which led them to prepare a special selection for their separate use. Thus the editor of the beautiful selection of poems called, somewhat artificially we think, Poems of the Inner Life, admits that he has included a number which he would not otherwise have included, and excluded of course in consequence some of his own more special favourites, on the false idea of being catholic. "I have purposely avoided applying any very rigid personal test, that might make the whole contents of the volume too closely conformable to my own especial taste and feeling." In other words, he has purposely avoided applying strictly the only principle of unity that he had to apply. If he were to include all poems to which a cultivated taste could assign a real merit bearing on spiritual thoughts and feelings, his collection would have been made, we suppose, in ten thick volumes instead of one thin one. The only sort of sifting principle he had to apply was the sieve of personal liking,—and he feared to apply it thoroughly, lest it should result in not gaining the wide suffrage for his book which he desired. That is, he included some poems he did not very much care for, as a sort of bait to people who do not care very much for his own favourites to read them and learn to like them. "You shall have this dirge of Felicia Hemans," we can imagine him saying to himself, "which is, however, not really very good, as a tribute to your own private prejudices, in order that it may inspire you with some respect for the editor's taste, and so lead you to admire this one of Henry Vaughan's, which I myself enjoy above everything." We must say we think the editor has made a mistake in a selection of this sort in not applying rigidly the only test he had to apply. It was not as if the volume were meant for use in religious services. Then no doubt a much more external test—the test of general acceptance—would have been legitimate. But such selections as these exist in abundance, and the only raison d'être of a new one, is the existence of a new intensity of personal love for the poems it includes. It is most likely that “R. C. J.” has not only sacrificed his own judgment wherever he has included a poem as a bait to the popular taste which he did not himself particularly admire, but done so without succeeding in netting so many admirers for his book as he would otherwise have had. However, the selection is unquestionably a fine one, and includes many poems that are not familiar to ordinary English readers. As a matter of course, the present reviewer resents the inclusion of some, and feels profoundly how much better the space would have been occupied by others that are neglected; but there are none without some beauty, and a large number, if not most of them, are really fine poems. Here is one little known to the English public, and with a dash of mysticism in it, but which has always struck us as worthy of a poet of the first order. It is by the late Mr. W. C. Roscoe:—

* Poems of the Inner Life. Selected chiefly from Modern Authors. Sampson Low.

“SYMBOLS OF VICTORY.

“Yellow leaves on the ash-tree,
Soft glory in the air,
And the streaming radiance of sunshine,
On the leaden clouds over there.

“At a window a child’s mouth smiling,
Overhung with tearful eyes
At the flying rainy landscape
And the sudden opening skies.

“Angels hanging from heaven,
A whisper in dying ears,
And the promise of great salvation
Shining on mortal fears.

“A dying man on his pillow
Whose white soul fled to his face,
Puts on her garment of joyfulness
And stretches to Death’s embrace.

“Passion, rapture, and blindness,
Yearning, aching, and fears,
And faith and duty gazing
With steadfast eyes upon tears.

“I see, or the glory blinds me
Of a soul divinely fair,
Peace after great tribulation,
And victory hung in the air.”

We should add that the volume is beautifully printed, and that the little ornamental vignettes at the close of the poems are full of grace and spirit.

AMERICAN SYMPATHIES.

WE have lately been favoured with several expositions of the sentiments with which Americans generally regard the nations of the Old World. In the last number of the Fortnightly Review, Mr. Conway has given a curious picture of their view of the relative merits of France and England. The result at which he arrives cannot be called satisfactory. The Americans might, he says, be forced into a war in order to turn the French out of Mexico; but it would be a war to which the whole current of popular sentiment would be opposed. On the other hand, should any circumstances provoke a war with England, they would go into it with enthusiasm. It would gratify the whole body of the nation, with the exception of that class—insignificant in number in all countries—whose policy is dictated rather by reason than by passion. The great majority would snatch, with unmixed pleasure, at any pretext for fighting and, if possible, humiliating England. This amiable temper has of course been aggravated, and in some classes produced, by our attitude in the late contest. Whatever ground they may have had for the belief, Americans undoubtedly did believe that Englishmen all but unanimously rejoiced in the dangers of the great Republic, gloated over their misfortunes, and were generally convinced that those misfortunes were only a righteous punishment for their manifold shortcomings. It might have been more Christian to forgive such feelings, supposing them to have existed, but it was certainly more natural to retaliate them. And, whether right or wrong, we must be prepared for the simple fact, that a good many grudges have been accumulated against this country in the last few years, which our scrupulous neutrality was unable to avert, and which Americans would be only too glad to satisfy before they have had time to die out. At the same time, a similar contrast between France and England had been familiar to the popular mind in America long before the war. There was a certain vein of sentiment, which was worked principally to obtain materials for after-dinner speeches, about Englishmen and Americans being of the same blood, having a common interest in Shakspeare and Bacon, and both enjoying the right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, and other themes of conventional oratory. But this was chiefly confined to the most educated classes; and there was very little cordiality wasted by the masses upon this Transatlantic affections. There are certain very obvious reasons which go to explain this unpleasant tendency to set us down as the least favoured nation, and which are worth notice as illustrating the value of the judgments passed by different countries upon each other.

An American writer has said that when two people are talking together there are really six people concerned in the dialogue. In the first place, there are the true A. and B. who are conversing; then there is the hypothetical A., who exists only in A.'s own imagination, and the very different A., who exists only in the imagination of B. Adding two similar duplicates of B., we get the whole number of six. This, which holds true of individuals, is still more conspicuously true in the relations of different nations. For the imaginary being, who stands for a whole people to the mind either of one of his component units or to one of the other race, has fewer features of the original than our mental picture of another man. The John Bull who stands to many foreigners, and even to some Englishmen, as the concrete embodiment of our peculiarities is derived from an almost extinct variety of a breed which was never numerous; and the mere habit of representing a nation by such an imaginary type is in itself misleading. It is one reason why people constantly forget what a very large number thirty million is, and consequently what a wonderful variety of circumstances and characters are certain to be included in thirty millions of human beings. A whole nation can be thus lumped together, and be made a much more convenient butt for insult and resentment, and can have all sorts of evil motives and passions attributed to it with much more facility, than if one really remembered to what a very complex set of phenomena the word "nation" corresponds. Thus the Americans keep a kind of dummy, which combines all the real and supposed demerits of three generations of Englishmen. When Mr. Quilp wished to give some vent to his dislike of Kit Nubbles, he selected an old figure-head with some vague resemblance to Mr. Nubbles' features, and in his leisure moments belaboured it with a poker, drove nails into its eyes, and otherwise expressed the sentiments with which the original inspired him. Every American stump orator keeps in his repertory some such hideous image, to be assaulted in public as the representative of England. It is easy to discover the materials from which this misshapen doll has been patched up. They are the products of all the passions that have been excited during the last ninety years. Every quarrel has brought its additional touches of ugliness to the picture. England has served of necessity to round every period about military glory or about national independence — two topics which no nation can do without. Perhaps we never oppressed the Americans very badly, and they never beat us very gloriously; but if you have not got a Waterloo and a Duke of Wellington, a New Orleans and a General Jackson must serve the turn; and if there is no Alba to denounce, George III. sounds just as well in a popular oration. Hence a good framework was made for the popular dummy out of a mixture of the brutal oppressor and the defeated enemy. As the efforts of American diplomacy could not often be directed against anybody else, a number of touches were easily supplied from the Continental fancy portraits of perfidious Albion. The effect of the whole was heightened by the contributions of imported Irish artists, whose powers of imagination have been signally exerted in delineations of the Saxon oppressor. And it is not wonderful if, on the whole, the John Bull of English admirers of themselves was represented by a very hideous and appalling scarecrow on the other side of the Atlantic. When a half-educated American spoke of England, he really spoke of the figure projected upon his imagination by the accumulated abuse and irritation of all the quarrels in which his national pride had been concerned. And the constant intercourse and identity of language of the two countries kept its colouring bright. The equally imaginary Frenchman was necessarily depicted in much less lively colours. There had been comparatively no friction between the two countries to produce such an explosion of vituperative eloquence. France stood in the background behind England, and, chiefly in compliance with the necessities of art, was made to serve as a foil to our manifold atrocities. It is always pleasant to talk of national gratitude and traditional alliances, if only as an oratorical relief to a monotony of denunciation; and it is especially pleasant when there is no prospect of the gratitude being severely tested. Gratitude is generally out of place in any question of international policy, because it is generally the duty of a nation to act entirely with a view to its own interests, and because there is a tolerable certainty that its neighbours have done the same. We are apt in this, as in other cases, to be misled by a false analogy with the relations. It is desirable primâ facie to return a good service done by one man to another, because there is at least a presumption of its having been prompted by goodwill. But, as between nations, no such presumption exists. Nothing can be plainer than that France helped America in the War of Independence, exclusively with a view to injuring England. She had not the slightest intention of founding a great republic, and if her statesmen could have foreseen the reaction upon their own system, they would probably have done the colonies no service, even at the price of doing us no harm. It was, therefore absurd to set up any claim for gratitude, as, indeed, Washington very sensibly and emphatically remarked. But there was so much pleasure in dilating on the heroic Lafayette and on generous national sympathies and hereditary alliances, that such a claim was, in fact, very effectually established. The French had such a hold upon the sympathies of the democratic party that, even after acts of warfare had been committed, the two nations contrived to remain at peace; whereas England was forced into the second war, even after the most substantial grounds of quarrel had been removed. There is another rather curious point about this sentiment. Such men as Jefferson continued to the despotism of Napoleon the sympathy which they had originally given to the revolutionists as apostles of popular authority. This seems to imply the existence of an instinct which still contributes to the preference of France over England. The portraits of the "bloated aristocrat" are principally drawn from English society. The democratic sentiment is stimulated more by a hatred of privileged classes than by a dislike to strong central power; and perhaps the English House of Peers may be a greater mystery of iniquity to the popular American mind than even the Napoleonic absolutism. But this is doubtless a secondary consideration; for it comes to much the same thing to a stump orator whether he denounces the people as slaves to a brutal despot or as minions of a corrupt aristocracy. Distinctions of such a refined nature about nations so far off are not worth considering.

The mainspring for the partiality for France is probably, therefore, the reaction from the hatred to England. The popular instinct imitates a Machiavellian policy, in seeking for an ally against its most obnoxious adversary. We have the honour of appearing in the diabolic character, whilst France stands dimly hovering behind us in a semi-angelic attitude. During the late war, indeed, when France and England were for the time partners in villainy, Russia was introduced as the happy contrast, and certain delicate flirtations showed that Americans could swallow a good strong dose of despotism if it intervened on the right side. But the tendency to restore to France its ancient standing is evident. One man may, we know, steal a horse, when another may not look over a gate. And France is allowed for a time to lay a hand upon Mexico, when England would have been very summarily sent to the right-about. If England, as Mr. Conway says, had been the unlukey intruder, we should have been at war before this time. As it is, our cousins are content with carefully storing up all our omissions and commissions, with a view to future possibilities, whilst they are only too anxious to forgive and forget all that our troublesome neighbour may have done, if he will just keep his hands off in future.

That the prevalence of such sentiments is dangerous, and might at any moment become a serious calamity, is undeniable. Meanwhile, there is one comfort. There is a very wide difference between lashing your whipping-post at home, and actually carrying out your benevolent intentions against the nation of which he is the representative. When war becomes a contingency seriously contemplated, instead of a mere threat, a more genuine likeness sometimes comes out behind the conventional caricature. We look a little more carefully at our antagonist, and take his measure with some reference, though often a very vague reference, to facts. It is thus a longer way than we sometimes think from the prejudices of a nation to its expression of those prejudices by actual force of arms. No people is really quite foolish and wicked enough to go to war with another merely because it has taken a dislike to it. On the contrary, the most violent hostility of spirit is far less important than a very trifling cause of jealousy, although it makes much more noise. The fact is, that we exaggerate the space which we occupy in the minds of a foreign nation. Nine out of ten of the statements we hear about them refer to their sentiments about ourselves, and we insensibly come to imagine that nine out of ten of their thoughts have reference to the same subject; whereas the number of people in any country who have even an effectual belief in the existence of other human beings beyond their own frontiers is not great, and the number who possess any vivid conception of them is smaller still. As population increases in the more remote American States which have little contact with the Europeans, there will be a larger proportion of men who simply care nothing for foreign politics. And, if it would be rash to hope that they will ever substitute a less hideous and distorted image for their present ideal Englishman, they will at least become more inclined to let it alone, and grow tired of abusing their plaything. No doubt any wound inflicted upon the national vanity, in its present state, would be more than usually apt to fester; but, if special causes of irritation do not turn up, the danger will probably tend to diminish rapidly.

LUCKY FRIENDS.

IF Rochefoucauld's celebrated maxim, that the misfortunes of our friends are never entirely disagreeable to us, be true, it is an obvious corollary that rare and peculiar good fortune on the part of the same friends is never wholly satisfactory to us. It is of no use complaining of the manifest cynicism of remarks of this kind. They are cynical inasmuch as they draw attention to a very ugly and unamiable side of human nature. The only question worth discussing is whether that ugly side exists. If it is all pure calumny, if the average of men are free from all taint and suspicion of selfishness and meanness, then to concoct terse epigrams which ascribe these qualities generally to mankind is doubtless a very unworthy occupation. It is highly probable that such epigrams would be far less frequent if they were utterly absurd and purposeless. And it is worth considering whether those who are for ever drawing sublime and angelic pictures of human nature, declaring as a great statesman recently did—and with about the same amount of sincerity and point—that they at least are on the side of the angels, are really so usefully and honourably employed as they would have us think. It may be very noble, and to some people very comforting, to dwell in a general way exclusively on the brighter qualities of the human heart; but the man whose wife has just bolted with his bosom friend may be excused if he maintains that there is a time for all things, and that a goody philosophy is not the thing for him at that particular moment. On the contrary, his temporary tastes lie exactly in the opposite direction. He wants a philosophy which, without being palpably untrue, shall represent human nature in a rather odious light. He is immovably convinced that it deserves to be so represented. It is true he is angry, and disposed to generalize, and to call "all" men knaves and traitors when he should have said only "some." But who can wonder at this under the circumstances? The two specimens of the human species with whom he was most nearly related, and in whom he placed most trust, have unscrupulously deceived and betrayed him. Go and talk amiable moonshine to him, and he cannot but think you either a fool or an impostor. He may be very unphilosophical, but so are you. He ignores one set of facts; you ignore another set. He says men are liars and humbugs; you simper out that this sweeping condemnation of mankind is quite dreadful, that no man is so bad as not to have some good in him, and that the good, the noble, the generous is what we should fix our eyes upon. He probably meets your sugary platitudes with a few trenchant epigrams which men of talent have made expressly to be used on occasions of this sort. The enunciation of these biting truths is a delicious relief to him. As Caligula wished for a humanity with one neck which he might luxuriously twist at his leisure, so the furious husband longs to say something that will pierce and slay and scarify all men (and all women, too, for the matter of that) with one fell epigram. Compact cynical remarks like those of Rochefoucauld are exactly what he wants. And when you object to his free use of them, you are likely to be losing your pains unless you can prove that he had no wife, that she did not run away from him, and that his best friend did not take her. That is to say, unless you expunge from existence certain manifest notorious facts known to you and to him and all the world, it is idle to exclaim against that peculiar class of aphorisms which collect and condense these facts into a small compass fit for daily use.

As regards the particular specimen of cynical remark with which we started—namely, that men generally do not like to see very great and, as they think, undeserved good luck befall their friends—we consider it to be, with proper limitations, indisputably true. We say distinctly “good luck,” not honest success in life won by hard meritorious effect. Most men are generous enough not to envy the latter, or wise enough to keep their feelings very quiet if they do. But those rich windfalls which occasionally hoist a rather dull apathetic man several degrees above his hard-working companions are seldom seen without dislike, or mentioned without a sneer. For instance, the inducing an heiress to marry you is always more or less resented—more rather than less. All rivalry and wounded vanity apart, when Jones succeeds in doing this, it is regarded by Smith and Brown and Robinson as a very questionable, not to say shabby, transaction. They may never have seen the girl. She may have been Jones's cousin with whom he played when they were children down in the country. There was never the remotest chance that they could have won her. Still, what was there in Jones that she should go and marry him? He was plucked at College, and had stuck hopelessly fast at the Bar; and now the fellow is putting up for the county, and is safe, through the influence of his wife's property, to get in. It shows—what somebody indeed had remarked before—that Jones was not the easy good fellow he appeared to be, but that at bottom there was something of the sneak in him. It is true that poor Jones all this time is doing his very utmost to conciliate his old friends, and induce them to forgive him his good luck. But they can only half do it even when they try hard, which they do not often do. He declares there shall be no change in his old relations with them, that they must all come down in September for the shooting, and that they will all be jollier than ever. He is a deluded man, and finds it out in time. Shooting, indeed! when Robinson's tailor will not be induced to trust him for another shooting-coat, and Brown would have to appear with his old muzzle-loader among the breech-loading swells he would be sure to meet at Jones's. The latter hinted there were plenty of guns; but that only showed his natural want of delicacy, which wealth had increased. And even if they do manage to get over their sulks, and go down to be introduced to Jones's wife, it is in a grim, defiant humour, and with the set determination not to be pleased. Brown confides to the sympathetic ear of Robinson that, as for Mrs. Jones, he (Brown) would not have her for all her money ten times over. Robinson declares he was just going to say the very same thing. They both agree that Jones has grown detestably conceited and bumptious, and notice that, with all his riches, he was odiously mean. The wine could be drunk by no man who valued his health, and there was not a horse in the stables fit to be ridden. And the company, too; did any one ever see such a set of pompous, empty-headed dullards? The whole place also, it was found, had an air of ceremony and buckram which was very offensive. When it was hinted that Mrs. Jones—who, however, was very meek, and said nothing about it—preferred that pipes and tobacco should be confined as much as possible to the billiard and smoking-rooms, Brown shrugged his shoulders, and hoped something terrible might befall him before he would be henpecked in that way.

Of course, the forms of luck are as various as the men who get shares of it. Perhaps, in the above instance, we have adverted to the most unpopular form of all. The essence of unpopular luck is that it shall be considerable, and apparently all but entirely undeserved. For this reason the hymeneal type is exceptionally odious. Still the popular taste is not any more consistent in this than it is in a number of other cases. Some forms of luck are, as it were, privileged. If you are the son of a bishop or the nephew of a Lord Chancellor, it is considered to be quite in the order of nature that several fat things should sooner or later fall to you. You would be rather pitied than otherwise if they did not. And yet to be a bishop's son, or even to be a bishop yourself, is not much less a freak of good fortune than to succeed in carrying off an heiress. There is a certain flunkiness about both. No man by dint of steady industry and self-denial can make himself a bishop's son, and it is by no means certain that those virtues will always make him a bishop. Certain qualities are doubtless necessary to ensure either matrimonial or episcopal luck. It has been said, as regards the first, that three things are needed, namely, opportunity, importunity, and propinquity; these three, but the greatest of these is opportunity. Opportunity—that is the lucky element which nothing will replace, and which men find it so hard to forgive. Yet it cannot be denied that in the captivation of a mitre, as compared with the captivation of an heiress, opportunity is less, and importunity and the persevering virtues are more. Hence, possibly, the less objectionable character which the former kind of success generally bears.

We by no means wish to maintain that a lucky man's friends are always envious, and that he always bears his honours with due meekness. Such a view would imply ignorance both of the world and of human nature. But we do maintain that the lucky man has very often much harder measure dealt to him than he would have if he were not lucky. His foibles are put under a microscope, and his virtues are ignored or taken for granted without thanks. He must not only come up to, he must exceed, the ordinary standard, to be pardoned at all. If he is inclined to be generous and open-handed, people say "And so he ought to be, he has got plenty." If he is the least bit stingy, he is pronounced to be a Shylock at once. Two things contribute to create this injustice. It is probable that the lucky man, before his luck, was a needy man. His small means had caused his wants to be few, which he prudently and thriftily gratified. A sudden change of circumstances will not always induce a corresponding change of habits. He had been careful and saving all his life, and he finds it hard, even undesirable, to become lavish and careless in a moment. It is true he can now throw away a guinea with less privation than he could before spend a shilling; and his friends know this rather better than he does, and probably, in their own minds, substitute for his disposable guinea a five-pound note. Still, his long intimacy with the value of shillings has made him loth to part with them, not necessarily from niggardliness, but from habit and old association. All this is set down to unmitigated meanness and poverty of soul. The history of commercial success is full of instances of men who found no difficulty in giving thousands to any good and worthy object, and who yet looked after small expenses with the assiduity of a spinster living on an annuity. Again, the needy friends of a rich man are very apt to come to most erroneous and preposterous conclusions respecting the extent of his wealth. Contrasting their few hundreds with the many thousands he is supposed to have, comparing their solitary general servant with his staff of domestics, they regard his pocket as practically bottomless. They forget, or they do not know, that a rise in station very generally brings with it a more than corresponding rise in the demands made upon one. They look only at the big purse; they ignore the numbers who are aspiring to empty it.

Our moral is very high-toned and stoical, just suited to the cold weather. It is, that what is commonly called luck is very often not lucky or desirable at all, and that many a man has had occasion to rue the day (whether he did rue it, or not, is another matter) when an unexpected windfall made him the object of more or less envy. The loss of simplicity and quiet joys and tender unostentatious friendships is ill-replaced by buckram and state and hollow acquaintanceships. Of course these beautiful moral reflections will never make any man refuse a fortune when it comes in his way. But they may perhaps induce him to bear his lot more cheerfully when, as is the general case, a fortune is altogether out of his way.

CURZON'S MONASTERIES OF THE LEVANT.*

WE are glad to see a new edition of Mr. Curzon's very interesting book of travels. It first appeared nearly twenty years ago, and few of the innumerable band of writers who have since given us their impressions of the same regions have at all rivalled its merits. This is partly due to the fact that the East, like other quarters of the globe, is being gradually spoilt. It has lost much of the gloss and freshness which it still retained when Mr. Curzon first travelled there in 1833. Pashas, and dragomans, and chiausoes, and the other dramatis personæ of the Eastern traveller have somehow become vulgarized, whether from actual degeneration on their part, or from the circumstance that they no longer have the charms of novelty to Europeans. They have fallen off as the Red Indian has done, though we cannot say whether the deterioration is due, in his case, to an acquired taste for whiskey, or to a growing familiarity which destroys romance, or simply to earlier historians having lied enormously. But the subject-matter of much of Mr. Curzon's book was tolerably hackneyed, even at the time of his writing. Its success was due much more to the style of the writer than to the out-of-the-way places which he described. The secret of this success is worth notice. Very few travellers have the power of giving dramatic unity to their works. They fancy that mere geographical continuity supplies a sufficient thread upon which to string their remarks. A traveller not unfrequently has the audacity to publish his diary, and expect the public to swallow it raw. The only connecting link between his pages is the fact that he was each morning at the place where he left off the evening before. And when the incidents are extremely similar, without being absolutely identical, the work becomes about as entertaining as a cruiser's log. There is more than one book descriptive of very important travels in Africa which comes under this head. One day, perhaps, you are introduced to a black greasy chief with a pat of butter on his head, and the next to a blacker and greasier chief without a pat of butter; but under the shape of a book there really lurks a mere directory to a particular series of savage tribes. The great art of writing a good book of travels consists in finding such a principle of coherence as may counteract its tendency to run to mere diary. Sometimes the nature of the adventures described is sufficient to do this spontaneously. At others it may be found in the light thrown upon some scientific theory, or upon the manners and customs of the natives, or the natural history of the country: or, as in the case of Eothen, in a study of the effect of the external circumstances upon the traveller's own mind. This amounts to saying that it is an excellent thing for a traveller to have a hobby. It does not matter what his special enthusiasm is; so long at least as it is one which may be gratified in the country, and he is not mad about mediæval architecture in America, or a theorist on glaciers in the Arabian desert. If, however, the journey is, as it should be, undertaken in pursuit of the hobby, there is no danger of this curious infelicity; and a man has only to give himself up to his enthusiasm unreservedly to be pretty sure of infecting his readers for the time. A paper was contributed to one of the numbers of Vacation Tourists by a gentleman whose one passion was for seeing big trees, irrespectively of any ulterior considerations. Probably very few of his readers would sympathise with him at the outset; but it was impossible to avoid falling in with his humour after a few pages, anxiously accompanying an expedition after a reported giant, and being temporarily disappointed when it turned out to be only 300 feet high. Mr. Curzon rode a more intelligible hobby than this, and one with which most educated men to some degree sympathize. The search for old books is known to have a specific power over some minds; and the chase of MSS. is a specially exciting branch of this most absorbing employment. Some cynics might possibly allege that there are already books enough in the world, and that if one had been apparently overwhelmed in oblivion it was a pity to try to resuscitate it. Without troubling ourselves to discover new MSS. we have, they would urge, various readings enough already. For the purposes of this book, however, we may take for granted that it was right that the treasures of the Levantine monasteries should be ransacked; and, at any rate, we are carried away by Mr. Curzon's enthusiasm. Thus, in the monastery of Pantocratoras, he finds "the melancholy remains of a once celebrated library":—

This [he says] was a dismal spectacle for a devout lover of old books—a sort of biblical knight-errant as I then considered myself, who had entered on the perilous adventure of Mount Athos, to rescue from the thralldom of ignorant monks those fair vellum volumes, with their bright illuminations and velvet dresses, and jewelled clasps, which for so many centuries had lain imprisoned in their dark monastic dungeons.

The library in question, including above a hundred ancient manuscripts, was lying on the floor of a room amongst the rubbish that had fallen from the upper story. Some of the books were "fine large folios." Unluckily, the monks told Mr. Curzon that the beams which supported the floor had become quite rotten and unsafe; so that, as he says, a complete trap was laid for a bookish enthusiast. He tried in vain to creep along close to the wall, with the beams cracking audibly beneath his feet. At length he got a long rod, and proceeded to fish for the desired prey. With some toil, he got hold of a fine double-columned folio "of most venerable antiquity." But alas! the rains had washed the outer leaves quite clean, and the pages were consolidated into a concrete, which, on an attempt to open them, broke off short like biscuit. It was merely the mummy of a manuscript. We feel for Mr. Curzon when, as he tells us, he arose and vented his sorrow and indignation in a long oration, the effect of which was weakened by the circumstance that none of his audience understood his language. Still more irritating were his adventures in the great monastery of Meteara. Albania being at this time in a disturbed state, he had no little difficulty in arriving there at all. He got a mandate from a Turkish vizir, ordering him an escort of soldiers, addressed to the commander of troops at a place called Mezzovo. Arrived at Mezzovo, he delivered the document to the most prominent inhabitant he could find, who happened to be the chief of the robbers instead of the soldiers. This gentleman, however, luckily saw the joke, and gave Mr. Curzon a letter to his subordinate robbers, which turned out to be more useful than the other, as robbers were considerably more plentiful than soldiers in those parts. Accompanied by half a dozen thieves, or perhaps it would be fairer to call them guerillas, he reached the monastery, which is situated upon a lofty rock, and which he entered by being made up into a parcel and wound up by a windlass and a long rope. And here he found two manuscripts of the Gospels, the bare recollection of which makes his mouth water. He speaks of them with the raptures which only the assiduous book-hunter can appreciate. They were gorgeous within and without; one was full of miniatures in excellent preservation, with the exception of an initial, which "some ancient slaver" had smeared with a wet finger; the other was bound in silver filigree, which showed that it must have belonged to some royal personage. The head of the monastery agreed to sell them, and Mr. Curzon cheerfully paid down a sum of money which left him just enough to return to Corfu. But the cup was destined to be dashed from his lips. He was just ready to be lowered again to the earth, when a discussion arose as to the distribution of the plunder. The "villain of a librarian swore that he would have half." And the upshot of a long discussion was that, as the monks could not agree how the price was to be shared, they resolved not to sell the volumes. After sadly turning over the leaves for the last time, he was let down by the rope to "his affectionate thieves." So touching was the expression of Mr. Curzon's despair, that the thieves immediately set about storming the monastery, with a view to recovering the MSS.; and Mr. Curzon, with great difficulty, and with "a great exercise of forbearance," managed to call them off. We do not decide the point raised, as to whether the refusal of a set of monks to sell their treasures at a fair price would have justified him in storming the monastery and throwing the librarian over the rocks. Probably it would have been allowable from a high moral point of view, but it might have raised difficulties in negotiating with the next monastery. Against these failures there are to be set a sufficient number of successes to give the impression that Mr. Curzon had, on the whole, very good sport among the books. Later explorers, and especially Tischendorf, have since followed upon Mr. Curzon's traces; and there is probably little left for discovery.

There is, however, something curious and interesting about the lives of the monks whom he describes; and, were it not that travellers in general seem to follow in each other's footsteps, with a scrupulosity almost amounting to religious observance, more people would have made acquaintance with these singular living relics of distant epochs. In Mr. Curzon's pages they form a pleasant and appropriate background to the picture of the enthusiastic book-hunter. They are, amongst men, much what their ancient manuscripts are amongst books. They are dozing quietly in their queer Sleepy Hollow of a Mount Athos, with their manuscripts quietly decaying beside them. One of the most characteristic figures in Mr. Curzon's book is the monk he met at Xeropotamo, whom he describes as a magnificent-looking man of thirty or thirty-five, with large eyes and long black hair and beard. He had been brought to Mount Athos in his infancy, his parents having been massacred in some disturbance, he did not exactly know where. He had never seen a woman, and was particularly anxious to learn what they looked like. He seems to have imagined that they all exactly resembled the stiff, hard-featured pictures of the Holy Virgin which hang in every Greek church, and which were his only available source of information. He was greatly interested to hear that women were not only different from these pictures, but that they even differed considerably from one another in appearance, manners, and understanding. The country where it is possible still to find a specimen of such a singular phase of human nature must be worth visiting; and, although Mr. Curzon's accounts of the monasteries of the Holy Land, of Egypt, and Albania are all interesting, his most finished picture is that of this little backwater which as yet has been undisturbed by any eddies from the main current of the world. Perhaps, however, we may anticipate that before long Mr. Cook's tourists will be taken in trips to Mount Athos, when we fear that the monks will be in danger of sophistication, and, if they don't learn to value manuscripts more highly, will possibly be unable to keep out the obtrusive female sex, which at Mr. Curzon's visit was represented by one cat.

THE nineteenth century will be for ever memorable in the annals of African discovery. The mystery which for ages had hung over the interior of the great continent has been in a great measure dispelled. Equatorial Africa especially no longer appears as a blank in our maps. Many of its countries and political divisions have been laid down with tolerable certainty, and the positions of some of its rivers and mountains partially defined; but the great lake discoveries more than any other have excited the wonder and admiration of Europe. All our preconceived ideas of the interior of the great continent have been reversed; for regions which were supposed to be a scene of everlasting drought, under the perpetual, unclouded blaze of a vertical sun, have been found to be refreshed with constant showers, irrigated by perennial streams, and teeming with inhabitants. The further discovery of stupendous mountains crowned with eternal snow, within a short distance of the equator, added greatly to the surprise of geographers; and as a climax to an unexampled series of brilliant discoveries, the Nile was confidently said to have at last revealed its mysterious fountains, and the secret of ages to be disclosed.

These important geographical discoveries have chiefly been made from the eastern coast. The missionaries Krapf and Rebmann, whose station was at Mombas, a few leagues to the east of Zanzibar, although they did not greatly enlarge our knowledge of the interior, yet were the precursors of Burton and Speke in those more extensive explorations, the results of which have so honourably distinguished their names. Dr. Livingstone, operating in a different region, but on the same side of the continent, has contributed in a very considerable degree to increase our geographical knowledge. Africa was first crossed by him from Mozambique, on the Indian Ocean, to Loanda, a Portuguese settlement on the shores of the Atlantic, in 1855, an achievement which was soon afterwards followed, we might even say surpassed, by the unparalleled march of Captains Speke and Grant, with a small armed escort, from the shores of the Indian Ocean to the Mediterranean Sea. The discoveries of Dr. Livingstone have made known to us an extensive portion of Africa, and their effect may ultimately be to open up to commerce and civilization a country which has few superiors in fertility on the African continent. Dr. Livingstone was the first European who crossed the African Continent from its eastern to its western shore. He found the great river Zambesi far in the interior, where its existence was not known even to the Portuguese, and he was the first who visited its stupendous cataracts, to which he gave the name of the Victoria Falls. He is also the discoverer of the great Nyassa Lake and the Shirwa, in the sense at least of having been the first European to visit them and to fix their geographical positions. He collected an immense amount of information respecting the manners, character and habits of the people of this part of the African continent, formed lasting friendships with several of their chiefs, acquired a knowledge of the languages of the country, and laid the foundation of a more regular intercourse for which it was one of the principal objects of his mission to prepare the way.

Having been deputed by the London Missionary Society to seek for a suitable place for the location of a permanent establishment, he ascertained that the highlands on the borders of the great basin of the Zambesi were comparatively healthy, and that it was desirable to open a regular and speedy communication with them, in order that the Europeans might pass as quickly as possible through the pestilential regions of the coast. The character of the population appeared to be eminently favourable for an experiment being made for the improvement of their social state by means of commerce, and for their ultimate conversion to Christianity. These views received the cordial support of all classes on Dr. Livingstone's return to England; and on the publication of his 'Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa,' his peculiar aptitude for enduring the hardships and perils incidental to African exploration, his tact in dealing with obstructive chiefs, and the heroism of his character, were so clearly but unobtrusively revealed that the Government readily responded to the public feeling, and appointing him Consul for South-eastern Africa gave to his second expedition the prestige of a national enterprise. Its principal objects, as set forth in his instructions, were to extend the knowledge already attained of the geography and the mineral and agricultural resources of Eastern and Central Africa, to improve his acquaintance with the inhabitants, and to encourage them to apply themselves to industrial pursuits and the cultivation of their land, with a view to the production of raw material which might be exported to England in return for British manufactures; and it was hoped that an important step might thus be made towards the extinction of the slave trade, which had been found to be one of the greatest obstacles to improvement.

Although the results of this expedition have not been in all respects commensurate with the sanguine hopes that had been formed of it, it has been the means of extending our geographical knowledge by several important discoveries; and Dr. Livingstone and his fellow-travellers have collected much information on the geology, botany, ornithology, and zoology of the districts which they have leisurely surveyed; they have thrown much light on the hydrography of the south-eastern part of Africa, and obtained a far more complete knowledge of the native tribes, their languages, habits, state of civilization and religion, than was possible in the former expedition.

The primary object having been to explore the Zambesi and its tributaries, with a view of ascertaining their capabilities for commerce, Dr. Livingstone was furnished with a small steam launch, the 'Ma Robert,' which was sent out from England in sections, and put together at the anchorage at the mouth of the Zambesi, but which proved, by the imperfection of its construction, to be rather an impediment than an assistance to his progress up the river.

The delta of the Zambesi seems to mark it as one of the most important rivers in Africa. The whole range of coast, from the Luabo channel to Quillimane, must be considered as belonging to that river, for the Quillimane is in fact only a branch of the Zambesi, which takes a direction due east at about 16° south latitude. Between the most westerly entrance to the Zambesi and Quillimane, not less than seven subsidiary streams pour their waters into the Indian Ocean. This vast delta far surpasses in its dimensions even that of the Nile, and if properly cultivated, would undoubtedly equal it in fertility. The Zambesi itself almost rivals in magnitude the great river of Egypt, and in some respects considerably resembles it. Like the Nile, it has its great annual flood, inundating and fertilizing the surrounding country. It has also its falls, cataracts, and shallows, which present obstacles to continuous navigation. The perpendicular rise of the Zambesi, in a portion of its course where it is compressed between lofty hills, is eighty feet. In the dry season there are portions of its course where it has only eighteen inches of water; and Dr. Livingstone's party was repeatedly obliged to drag the small steamer over the shallows. A vessel of less than eighteen inches draught, therefore, would be required to navigate the Zambesi throughout the year, although steamers of considerable burthen could ply in it when in flood as far as the Victoria Falls, most of the intervening cataracts being obliterated by the great rise of the waters; but a high amount of steam-power would be necessary to steam the rapid current when the river is in flood.

The delta extends from eighty to a hundred miles inland, and the soil is so wonderfully rich that cotton might be raised in any quantity, and an area, eighty miles in length and fifty in breadth, could, Dr. Livingstone says, if properly cultivated, supply all Europe with sugar. Progress up the river was impeded less by sandbanks and rapids than by the miserable performance of the engines of the little steamer. The furnaces consumed an enormous amount of fuel, consisting of blocks of the finest ebony and lignum vitæ, which would have been worth six pounds per ton in England; notwithstanding which, even the heavy-laden native canoes gained upon the asthmatic little craft which puffed and panted after them in vain.

On the banks of the lower course of the river, as is the case in all deltas, the scenery is uninteresting—a dreary uninhabited expanse of grassy plains—the round green tops of the stately palm-trees looking at a distance as if suspended in air.

'The broad river has many low islands, on which are seen various kinds of waterfowl, such as geese, spoonbills, herons, flamingoes; repulsive crocodiles, as with open jaws they sleep and bask in the sun on the low banks, soon catch the sound of the revolving paddles and glide quietly into the stream. The hippopotamus, having selected some still reach of the river to spend the day, rises from the bottom, where he has been enjoying his morning bath after the labours of the night on shore, blows a puff of spray out of his nostrils, shakes the water out of his ears, puts his enormous snout up straight and yawns, sounding a loud alarm to the rest of the herd, with notes as of a monster bassoon.'

The aspect of nature in Southern Africa presents a striking contrast to European scenery. The trees and the plants are new; the beasts, birds, and insects are strange; the sky itself has a different colour, and the heavens at night glitter with novel constellations.

The upper course of the Zambesi, when the hill regions are reached, possesses scenery of a very striking character, made still more so by the variety and beauty of the birds:—

'The birds, from the novelty of their notes and plumage, arrest the attention of a traveller perhaps more than the peculiarities of the scenery. The dark woods resound with the lively and exultant song of the kinghunter (Halcyon striolata), as he sits perched on high among the trees. As the steamer moves on through the winding channel, a pretty little heron or bright kingfisher darts out in alarm from the edge of the bank, flies on ahead a short distance, and settles quietly down to be again frightened off in a few seconds as we approach. The magnificent fishhawk (Haliaetus vocifer) sits on the top of a mangrove tree, digesting his morning meal, and is clearly unwilling to stir until the imminence of the danger compels him at last to spread his great wings for flight. The glossy ibis, acute of ear to a remarkable degree, hears from afar the unwonted sound of the paddles, and, springing from the mud where his family has been quietly feasting, is off, screaming out his loud, harsh, and defiant ha! ha! ha! long before the danger is near.

'The winter birds of passage, such as the yellow wagtail and blue arongo shrikes, have all gone, and other kinds have come; the brown kite with his piping like a boatswain's whistle, the spotted cuckoo with a call like "pula," and the roller and hornbill with their loud high notes, are occasionally distinctly heard, though generally this harsher music is half drowned in the volume of sweet sounds poured forth from many a throbbing throat, which makes an African Christmas seem like an English May. Some birds of the weaver kind have laid aside their winter garments of a sober brown, and appear in a gay summer dress of scarlet and jet black; others have passed from green to bright yellow with patches like black velvet. The brisk little cock whydah-bird with a pink bill, after assuming his summer garb of black and white, has graceful plumes attached to his new coat; his finery, as some believe, is to please at least seven hen birds with which he is said to live. Birds of song are not entirely confined to villages; but they have in Africa so often been observed to congregate around villages, as to produce the impression that song and beauty may have been intended to please the ear and eye of man, for it is only when we approach the haunts of men that we know that the time of the singing of birds is come. A red-throated black weaver bird comes in flocks a little later, wearing a long train of magnificent plumes, which seem to be greatly in his way when working for his dinner among the long grass. A goatsucker or night jar (Cornix vexillarius), only ten inches long from head to tail, also attracts the eye in November by a couple of feathers twenty-six inches long in the middle of each wing, the ninth and tenth from the outside. They give a slow wavy motion to the wings, and evidently retard his flight, for at other times he flies so quick that no boy could hit him with a stone. The natives can kill a hare by throwing a club, and make good running shots, but no one ever struck a night jar in common dress, though in the evening twilight they settle close to one's feet. What may be the object of the flight of the male bird being retarded we cannot tell. The males alone possess these feathers, and only for a time.'

The honey-guide is perhaps the most remarkable for its intelligence of all the African birds:—

'How is it that every member of its family has learned that all men, white or black, are fond of honey! The instant the little fellow gets a glimpse of a man, he hastens to greet him with the hearty invitation to come to a bees'-hive and take some honey. He flies on in the proper direction, perches on a tree, and looks back to see if you are following; then on to another and another, until he guides you to the spot. If you do not accept his first invitation he follows you with pressing importunities, quite as anxious to lure the stranger to the bees'-hive as other birds are to draw him away from their own nests. Except while on the march, our men were sure to accept the invitation, and manifested the same by a peculiar responsive whistle, meaning, as they said, "All right, go ahead; we are coming." The bird never deceived them, but always guided them to a hive of bees, though some had but little honey in store.'

Equally remarkable in its intelligence is the bird that guards the buffalo and rhinoceros:—

'The grass is often so tall and dense that one could go close up to these animals quite unperceived; but the guardian bird, sitting on the beast, sees the approach of danger, flaps its wings and screams, which causes its bulky charge to rush off from a foe he has neither seen nor heard; for his reward the vigilant little watcher has the pick of the parasites of his fat friend.

The Portuguese possess two stations or forts on the Zambesi—one at Senna, the other at Tette; but it appears that they hold both of these positions rather by sufferance than by the prestige of their name or by their power in Africa, for they are said to pay a species of black-mail in the form of presents of beads and brass wire to the neighbouring tribes for permission to reside in the country; nor do the commercial advantages of the Portuguese settlements appear to compensate the cost of their maintenance. The natural resources of the district are nevertheless very great. Indigo grows wild on the banks of the river. The streets of Tette are overgrown with the plant as with a weed. The sugar-cane thrives admirably almost in a wild state. Caoutchouc and columba-root* are found in abundance. Iron ore is extensively worked by the natives, and excellent coal might be obtained in abundance, one seam which was seen cropping out on the banks of the river measuring twenty-five feet in thickness. At one period the produce of the gold-washings on the Zambesi was considerable, but its tributaries have never been 'prospected,' nor has any but the rudest machinery been yet used.

The most interesting portion of Dr. Livingstone's last expedition, after the discovery of the great Nyassa Lake, is the exploration of the river Shirè;† the great northern tributary of the Zambesi, which it joins at about a hundred miles from the sea. The Portuguese are said to have known nothing of this stream, nor, it is believed, was the Shirè ever before ascended by Europeans: certainly the existence of the lake Shirwa, situated not far from the river's bank, had never been even heard of by them. The natives here were entirely ignorant of the existence of white men; and on the first appearance of the exploring party, the men were excessively timid, the women fled into the huts and closed the doors, and even the hens took wing and left their chickens in dismay. After ascending the river for a hundred miles, the further progress of the party was arrested by cataracts, which Dr. Livingstone named after the President of the Royal Geographical Society; but it was not deemed prudent by the exploring party on their first visit to push their explorations beyond the Murchison Cataracts.

A second excursion up the Shirè was made in 1859, when the natives were less alarmed, and Chibisa, the chief of the most important of the tribes, at once entered into friendly negotiations, evincing great intelligence, shrewdness, and good feeling. He was a firm believer in the divine ordination of royalty. He was, he said, but a common man when his father died; but directly after he succeeded to his high office, he was conscious of power passing into his head and down his back; he felt it enter, and then he knew that he was a chief possessed of wisdom and clothed with authority.

Leaving their steamer, Drs. Livingstone and Kirk, with a party of natives, then proceeded on foot to the lake Shirwa, which they found to be a considerable body of bitter and slightly brackish water, abounding in fish, crocodiles, and hippopotami. This lake, surrounded by lofty mountains, has no outlet, although thirty miles in breadth and sixty in length. Its elevation above the sea was found to be about 1800 feet. It is separated from the great lake Nyassa by a spit of land, over which it is probable that the surplus water of the Shirwa runs during floods.

The river Shirè is narrower than the Zambesi, but deeper and more easily navigated, possessing a channel of not less than five feet at all seasons for a distance of two hundred miles from the sea. It drains an exceedingly fertile valley flanked by finely-wooded hills. The stream in some places runs like a mill-race with a water-power sufficient to turn all the mills in Great Britain. Nowhere in his travels did Dr. Livingstone observe so large an extent and so high a degree of cultivation. Maize, yams, hemp, pumpkins, sweet-potatoes, peas, sugar-cane, lemons, ginger, tobacco, and cotton abounded, and the capability of the country for the production of cotton can, he thinks, scarcely be exaggerated. From the samples sent to Manchester it has been pronounced to be of the finest quality, and 300 lbs. of clean cotton-wool were purchased for less than a penny per pound; and it appears that free labour is as easily to be procured as in any country in the world. The discovery of this rich and densely-peopled district, with its fine navigable river, is perhaps the most important of the results of Dr. Livingstone's enterprise. 'We have opened,' he says, in a despatch addressed to the Foreign Office, 'a cotton and sugar district of great and unknown extent, and which really seems to afford reasonable prospect of great commercial benefit to our own country; it presents facilities for commanding a large section of the slave market on the coast, and offers a fair hope of its suppression by lawful commerce.'

* Used extensively as a mordant for colours.

† Pronounced Shirrey.

The basin of the Shirè is characterised by a series of terraces, the first being below the Murchison Falls, the second a plateau two thousand, and the third three thousand feet in altitude, it must therefore possess a considerable variety of climate, but cotton is extensively cultivated on all the terraces, and the population was everywhere observed to be engaged in picking, cleaning, or spinning it. As it is doubtful whether the cotton cultivation of the former Slave States of America will ever revive under a system of free labour, any addition to our knowledge of the districts where a material so essential for maintaining our manufacturing pre-eminence can be easily and cheaply produced becomes of the highest importance. The people have no cattle, but the quantity of wild animals is prodigious, and enormous herds of elephants roam over the marshes and plains.

It was on one of the elevated plateaux of the Shirè valley that the enterprise known as the Universities' Mission had its first station, and here was the residence of England's first missionary Bishop, the lamented Mackenzie. The remains of one of the most devoted of English Churchmen lie buried under the shade of one of the giants of the African forest and within a few yards of the rippling waters of the Shirè. Taking a false estimate of the duties of his position, he unhappily gave an active armed support to a tribe which had been attacked by another for the purpose of reducing it to slavery, and he thus engaged in a native war, converting a religious mission, the object of which was simply to instruct and civilise by Christian precept and example, into an association for the forcible liberation of slaves. The country was, as it afterwards proved, altogether unsuited for a missionary experiment such as that projected by the Universities, being in a chronic state of warfare in consequence of the prevalence of the slave-trade; and the expedition was, after undergoing many privations and much suffering, very properly withdrawn some months after the lamented death of Bishop Mackenzie by fever and the loss of other valuable lives.

The discovery of the great Lake Nyassa would alone place Dr. Livingstone high in the rank of African explorers. It would have been first reached by Captain Burton if he had not been misled by erroneous information; for, having been told by some natives that the lake which he was directed by his instructions to seek was of inconsiderable dimensions, he altered his course from west to north-west, and thus came upon the Lake Tanganyika instead. The journey to the Nyassa was effected by an overland march of twenty days from the Shirè. The southern end of the Nyassa extends to $14^{\circ} 25'$ south latitude. The stay made at the lake on the first visit of the travellers was short; it was found to be in the very centre of a district which supplies the markets of the coast with slaves. A second visit to the lake was made in the following year. The length of the Nyassa was found to be two hundred miles and its breadth about fifty. It is liable to sudden and violent storms, in one of which the travellers were nearly shipwrecked. The difference of its level throughout the year is only three feet, although it receives the waters of five rivers on its western side. The principal affluent is believed to be at its northern extremity.

Never before in Africa had the travellers seen anything like the dense population on the shores of the Nyassa. Towards the southern end there was observed an almost unbroken chain of villages, crowds assembled to gaze at the novel spectacle of a boat under sail, and whenever the party landed they were immediately surrounded by men, women, and children, all anxious to see the 'chirombo,' or wild animals, feed; the arrival of white men in one of the villages of the Nyassa exciting much the same kind of interest as that occasioned by the presence of the hippopotamus on the banks of the Thames. The people were, however, on the whole inoffensive, only lifting slyly the edges of the tent, as boys do the curtains of a travelling-menagerie at home, and exclaiming 'chirombo! chirombo!' i. e. wild beasts fit to be eaten.

The care bestowed on the graves of the dead in the villages on the banks of the Nyassa indicates an amount of sentiment scarcely to be expected in regions so remote from civilisation. The burying-grounds were found well arranged and protected; wide and neat paths were made through them, and grand old fig-trees threw their wide-spreading branches over the last resting-places of the dead. The graves of the sexes were distinguished by the various implements or utensils which their occupants had used in their different employments during life; but they were all broken. A piece of fishing-net or a broken paddle told that a fisherman slept beneath. The graves of women were marked by the wooden mortar and heavy pestle used in pounding corn, or by the basket in which the meal is sifted, and all had placed over them fractured calabashes and pots signifying that the need of daily food was at an end for ever.

The courtesy which we denominate good breeding was conspicuous in some of the chiefs of this district. A black potentate on the banks of the Nyassa, whom the travellers found in his stockade, behaved 'like a gentleman,' not only presenting handsome presents of food, but, pointing to his iron bracelet, richly inlaid with copper, inquired, 'Do they wear such things in your country?' and, on being told that they were unknown, immediately took it from his arm and presented it to Dr. Livingstone, the wife doing the same with hers.

The natives of Africa have not generally been found deficient in the virtue of industry in their own country. In all the districts traversed by the exploring party the cultivation of the land indicated general and careful industry. 'I came out here,' said Bishop Mackenzie, 'to teach these people agriculture, but I find they know far more about it than I do.' The taste for husbandry, indeed, was found to be universal, and men, women, and boys were all eager to work for hire. In illustration of this an incident is related characteristic not only of the disposition of the people to labour, but of their eagerness to obtain European clothing. One of the exploring party, who possessed an old tattered pair of trousers, purchased with one of its legs the services of a man to carry a heavy load for a whole day; on the second day another man was hired for the other leg; and the remainder of the garment, including the buttons, secured the services of another for a third. The fertility of the country renders agricultural toil extremely light, and the task of subsistence is a very easy one.

The manufacture of iron tools is the staple industry of the highlands of the Nyassa. Every village had its smelting-house, charcoal-burners, and blacksmiths, who made the bracelets and anklets in general use. British iron is held in no esteem, and is pronounced 'rotten.' Samples of hoes from the Nyassa district have been pronounced in Birmingham to be nearly equal to the best Swedish iron, and the metal was found to be of so high a quality that an Enfield rifle was made from it. In the villages round the Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa, and in other places, pottery is also manufactured.

The social and political state of the country visited by Dr. Livingstone and his party in those districts where the slave-trade had not penetrated, presented a marked contrast to the western coast of Africa and to the eastern region traversed by Burton and Speke. The Makololo appear to have been the most intelligent of the tribes inhabiting the region of the Zambesi. Polygamy is universal in this part of Africa, and the institution is warmly approved by the women. On being told that a man in England could have but one wife, they always exclaimed that they should not like to live in such a country, nor could they understand how English ladies could tolerate such a custom. Yet its practical effect is to give a monopoly of the youth and beauty of the country to those who can afford to purchase them. The wealthy old men, therefore, marry all the pretty girls, and the young men who have no property must either abstain from matrimony altogether, or be content with such wives as possess no personal attractions. The husbands, however, seem to be considerably henpecked. The travellers, endeavouring to purchase a goat, had nearly concluded the bargain, when a wife came forward and said to her husband, 'You appear as if you were unmarried, selling a goat indeed without consulting your wife! What sort of a man are you?' The party tried to induce the crest-fallen husband to pluck up a little spirit and to conclude the bargain. 'No, no,' he exclaimed, 'it is bad enough as it is; I have already brought a hornet's-nest about my ears!' 'We have known,' say our travellers, 'a wife order a husband not to sell a fowl, merely, as we supposed, to prove to us that she had the upper hand.'

Notwithstanding their scanty clothing, there seems to be a natural sense of propriety both on the part of the women and men, which is not always found in more civilized countries. 'We frequently observed,' say the travellers, 'that the Momgamy women are very particular in avoiding any spot where men are supposed to be bathing, and it is only the chance of the first sight of the white skin that makes them forget their good manners; and when women and children were observed in the distance washing in a stream, the men did not venture to approach until they had first asked leave to pass.'

The Makololo ladies, having maid-servants to wait on them and perform the principal part of the household work, have abundance of leisure which they are at a loss how to employ. The men wickedly aver that their two principal modes of killing time are sipping beer and smoking bang or Indian hemp. The husbands indulge freely in these pastimes, but they do not like their wives to follow their example, and many of the 'monsters' positively forbid it. The women dress well, wearing a species of kilt and mantle and a profusion of bead and brass ornaments. The principal wife of one of the most powerful chiefs wore eighteen heavy brass rings on each leg and three of copper under each knee, nineteen brass rings on her left arm and eight of brass and copper on her right, together with a large ivory ring above each elbow. The weight of the rings seriously impeded her gait; but as they were the 'fashion,' she disregarded it. The tyranny of fashion is, indeed, as irresistible in the high circles of Africa as in those of London and Paris. The most extraordinary device is the pelele—a ring which causes the upper lip to project two inches beyond the tip of the nose, giving to the mouth the elongation and somewhat the appearance of a duck's bill. No woman would think it becoming to appear in public without this strange appendage. If told that it makes her ugly, she will reply, 'really, it is the fashion.' The women will not wear beads, however pretty, that are not of the latest importation. Plumpness is considered essential to beauty, but the obesity required in Uganda, and mentioned by Captain Speke, would be considered vulgar. The caprices of fashion are nowhere more remarkably displayed than in the arrangement of the hair. Some ladies adopt the plan of spreading it out over a hoop, which thus encircles the head, like a nimbus round the head of the Virgin—a fashion which we have not yet adopted in England, but from which our ingenious coiffeurs may take a hint. Others supplement their own by tying behind it bundles of false hair—a fashion with which we are familiar in England. Some plait it into the form of horns, and sometimes the natural hair is drawn tightly up from the forehead in the form of a pyramid. The passion for dyeing the hair red, however, is confined in Africa to the men, who use pigments to give it that fashionable colour. The most respectable chiefs always at first set their faces against these caprices, but in the end are always obliged to give up the attempt in despair, candidly acknowledging that fashion and female obstinacy are too strong for them.

The religion of the Zambesi and Nyassa tribes is that of simple monotheism, combined with a belief in spirits who are supposed to be influenced by incantations to act as mediators. There appears to be a firm belief in the immortality of the soul. 'Their ideas of moral evil,' Dr. Livingstone says, 'differ in no respect from ours; but they consider themselves responsible to inferior beings instead of to the Supreme.' Evil speaking, lying, hatred, and disobedience to and neglect of parents, are said to have been recognised as sins, as well as theft, murder, and adultery, from the earliest times. The only addition which could be made by a missionary to their moral code is the rejection of polygamy. There is a general belief in a future life. 'All the Africans,' say the travellers, 'that we have met with were as firmly persuaded of their future existence as of their present;' but it does not appear that they entertain a belief in any future state of rewards and punishments.

Their superstitions are rather childish than degrading. The belief in magic is so inherent in humanity that it would be strange if it did not prevail in countries where the human intellect may be said to be still in an almost infantine state. There are traces of serpent-worship, and little images are suspended as charms in the huts of the sick and dying. When a man has his hair cut he is careful to burn it, or to bury it secretly, lest falling into the hands of one who has an evil eye, it should be used as a charm to afflict him with headache. There is a singular superstition that if a man plants coffee he will never be happy again, and no native can be induced to plant a mango from a belief that if he did he would speedily die. Rain-doctors are common. The travelling party more than once got into trouble by putting up their rain-gauge which was thought to frighten away the clouds.

That reckless disregard of human life, of which so many revolting incidents are recorded by Captain Speke in his account of Uganda, is unknown in this portion of Africa, nor does the rule of the native chiefs, however despotic, appear to be cruel. The reverence for 'royalty' is universal, and the savage vagaries of King Mtesa would probably have led to his own decapitation but for the belief in the sanctity of kings, which is the pervading sentiment of the people. Divination is freely practised, but fetish worship is unknown. A notion not uncommon among uncivilized people, and somewhat resembling that of the transmigration of souls, appears to prevail. It is believed that the spirits of departed chiefs enter into lions, which are consequently never molested, but, when met with, are saluted by the clapping of hands. The most singular object of superstitious dread is the chameleon, of which the natives entertain an absolute horror. The English sailors left in charge of the 'Pioneer,' during the temporary absence of Dr. Livingstone, made a pet of, one of these harmless little creatures, and turned it to good account. Having ascertained the market-price of provisions, they paid the natives that and no more; if the traders refused to leave the ship unless a larger sum was given, the chameleon was forthwith brought out of the cabin and the deck was instantly cleared. Mechanism of all kinds appears so wonderful that it is naturally attributed to supernatural power. A Portuguese took into the interior an assortment of cheap American clocks to barter for ivory; but on setting them all going in the presence of a chief, he became so alarmed that the unfortunate trader was ordered to instantly quit the country and was heavily fined for his indiscretion.

There is probably no part of the world in which game of all descriptions is so abundant as in the region of the Upper Zambesi and of the Shire, the banks of which absolutely swarm with antelopes, waterbucks, elephants, buffaloes, rhinoceroses, wild pigs, elands, and zebras; the woods are full of guinea fowl, and the rivers abound in hippopotami. Much destruction is occasioned by elephants tearing down trees with their trunks in the wantonness of their strength and for mere amusement. It is no easy task to bring one of these creatures on its knees, the ball of an Enfield rifle usually producing as little impression upon the head as upon an iron target, only making the unwieldy animal flap his huge ears and trot off out of further harm's way. The food which the elephant supplies would not be despised by an African sportsman, and is always acceptable in a country where the hunter must depend chiefly upon his rifle for his daily subsistence. The fore foot, cooked in the native manner, was pronounced by Dr. Livingstone excellent. A hole is dug in the ground, a fire is made in it, and, when the oven is thoroughly heated, the foot is placed in it and covered with hot ashes; a fire is then made above it and kept up during the night, and a dish will be ready for the morning's meal which would satisfy the most fastidious of epicures. Elephant's trunk and tongue are also very good when similarly prepared. 'English sportsmen,' Dr. Livingstone says, 'although first-rate shots at home, are notorious for the number of their misses on first trying to shoot in Africa. Everything is on such a large scale, and there is such a glare of bright sunlight, that some time is required to enable them to judge of distances. "Is it wounded?" inquired a gentleman of his dark attendant, after firing at an antelope. "Yes! the ball went right into his heart." These mortal wounds never proving fatal, he desired a friend, who understood the language, to explain to the man that he preferred the truth in every case. "He is my father," replied the native, "and I thought he would be displeased if I told him that he never hits at all."

The River Shire swarms with crocodiles, and the travellers counted sixty-seven of these hideous reptiles basking on one bank. The corpse of a boy floated past the 'Pioneer,' a monstrous crocodile rushed at it with the speed of a greyhound, caught it and 'shook it as a terrier dog would a rat,' and others immediately dashed at the body, making the water foam by the action of their powerful tails. Women are constantly seized by these creatures while drawing water, and the protection of a fence is required to keep the crocodiles from the river's brink. The attempts of the party to catch any of the reptiles were not very successful; although ready enough to take the bait, they flattened the largest iron hooks with their powerful jaws and got away.

Periodical droughts seem to be the characteristic of every part of Central Africa except the rainy zone of the equatorial region. These visitations prevail over areas of from one to three hundred miles. Dr. Livingstone's inquiries led him to believe that from 10° to 15° south latitude they may be expected once in every ten or fifteen years, and from 15° to 20° south latitude, once in every five years. Their cause is unknown. The hills are generally clothed with trees and verdure to their summits, and the valleys, where uncultivated, are almost choked with a profuse and rank vegetation, when suddenly both hill and valley present the appearance of having been scathed by fire, the grass crumbles into powder, and the leaves drop discoloured from the trees. Dr. Livingstone draws a fearful picture of the effects of one of these periodical droughts on the population of a district affected by it. On his first journey up the Shire to the Nyassa he passed through a populous and well-cultivated country. In the interval between it and his return, eighteen months afterwards, a drought of unusual severity had occurred, the misery occasioned by which was aggravated by a slave-hunting expedition which devastated the country almost as much as the drought. Instead of peaceful villages and a happy population there was scarcely a person to be seen. The inhabitants generally had fled from their human hunters no less than from their blighted fields, and famine had destroyed all that remained; the recently dead lay unburied, innumerable corpses which the gorged crocodiles were unable to devour floated down the rivers, human skeletons obstructed the paths, and the whole country presented a scene of appalling desolation.

The tributaries of the Zambesi are nearly waterless in the dry season. The Zungwe was traced up to the foot of the Batoka highlands, which the travellers ascended to the height of 3000 feet, obtaining a magnificent panoramic view of the great valley of the Zambesi, of which the cultivated portions are so small that the country appeared to be nearly all forest interspersed with a few grassy glades. The great Falls of the Zambesi, to which, on first visiting them in 1855, Dr. Livingstone gave the name of the Victoria Falls, were again visited on his second expedition, and he is thus enabled to give a more complete description of them. They constitute without question the most wonderful waterfall in the world. The native name is Mosio-a-tunya, or 'smoke sounding.' Its fame had been far diffused in Africa, for when Dr. Livingstone was on an excursion in the interior, in 1851, a chief, who resided two hundred miles from the Falls, asked, 'Have you any smoke soundings in your country?' When the river is in flood, the columns of vapour, resplendent in the morning sun with double and sometimes triple rainbows, are visible for a distance of ten miles. They are caused by a sudden compression of the water falling into a narrow wedge-like fissure. The Fall must have originated in an earthquake which produced a deep transverse crack across the river's bed — a mass of hard basaltic rock — and which is prolonged from the left bank for thirty or forty miles. The description of this magnificent cascade, so unique in its character, will be read with interest: —

'It is rather a hopeless task to endeavour to convey an idea of it in words, since as was remarked on the spot, an accomplished painter, even by a number of views, could but impart a faint impression of the glorious scene. The probable mode of its formation may, perhaps, help to the conception of its peculiar shape. Niagara has been formed by a wearing back of the rock over which the river falls; and during a long course of ages, it has gradually receded, and left a broad, deep, and pretty straight trough in front. It goes on wearing back daily, and may yet discharge the lakes from which its river — the St. Lawrence — flows. But the Victoria Falls have been formed by a crack right across the river, in the hard, black basaltic rock which there formed the bed of the Zambesi. The lips of the crack are still quite sharp, save about three feet of the edge over which the river rolls. The walls go sheer down from the lips without any projecting crag, or symptom of stratification or dislocation. When the mighty rift occurred no change of level took place in the two parts of the bed of the river thus rent asunder, consequently in coming down the river to Garden Island, the water suddenly disappears, and we see the opposite side of the cleft, with grass and trees growing where once the river ran, on the same level as that part of its bed on which we sail. The first crack is, in length, a few yards more than the breadth of the Zambesi, which by measurement we found to be a little over 1860 yards, but this number we resolved to retain as indicating the year in which the Fall was for the first time carefully examined. The main stream here runs nearly north and south, and the cleft across it is nearly east and west. The depth of the rift was measured by lowering a line, to the end of which a few bullets and a foot of white cotton cloth were tied; one of us lay with his head over a projecting crag, and watched the descending calico, till, after his companions had paid out 310 feet, the weight rested on a sloping projection, probably fifty feet from the water below, the actual bottom being still further down. The white cloth now appeared the size of a crown piece; on measuring the width of this deep cleft by sextant, it was found at Garden Island, its narrowest part, to be eighty yards, and at its broadest somewhat more. Into this chasm, of twice the depth of Niagara Falls, the river, a full mile wide, rolls with a deafening roar; and this is Mosi-oa-tunya, or the Victoria Falls.

'Looking from Garden Island, down to the bottom of the abyss, nearly half a mile of water, which has fallen over that portion of the Falls to our right, or west of our point of view, is seen collected in a narrow channel twenty or thirty yards wide, and flowing at exactly right angles to its previous course, to our left; while the other half, or that which fell over the eastern portion of the Falls, is seen in the left of the narrow channel below, coming towards our right. Both waters unite midway, in a fearful boiling whirlpool, and find an outlet by a crack situated at right angles to the fissure of the Falls. This outlet is about 1170 yards from the western end of the chasm, and some 600 from its eastern end; the whirlpool is at its commencement. The Zambesi, now apparently not more than twenty or thirty yards wide, rushes and surges south, through the narrow escape channel for 130 yards; then enters a second chasm somewhat deeper and nearly parallel with the first. Abandoning the bottom of the eastern half of this second chasm to the growth of large trees, it turns sharply off to the west, and forms a promontory, with the escape channel at its point of 1170 yards long, and 416 yards broad at the base. After reaching this base, the river runs abruptly round the head of another promontory, and flows away to the east in a third chasm, then glides round a third promontory, much narrower than the rest, and away back to the west in a fourth chasm; and we could see in the distance that it appeared to round still another promontory, and bend once more in another chasm toward the east. In this gigantic zigzag, yet narrow trough, the rocks are all so sharply cut and angular, that the idea at once arises that the hard basaltic trap must have been riven into its present shape by a force acting from beneath, and that this probably took place when the ancient inland seas were let off by similar fissures nearer the ocean.*

There is reason to believe that nearly the whole district now drained by the Zambesi and its tributaries was once a vast fresh-water lake, of which many traces exist over a tract extending from 17° to 21° south latitude. Nearly the whole of this vast area is covered with a bed of tufa more or less soft where it has been exposed to atmospheric influences. The waters of this great inland sea have escaped by means of cracks produced in its surrounding boundaries, at some remote period, by subterranean agency. Thus the fissure of Victoria Falls has probably contributed to drain an enormous valley, leaving only the deepest portion of the original sea which now constitutes the Nyassa Lake. Most of the African lakes are indeed comparatively shallow, being the residua of much larger bodies of water. The African climate is therefore supposed, with reason, to have been once much moister than it is at present, and the great equatorial lake regions are gradually being desiccated by a process of drainage which has been in operation for ages. That the Nyassa Lake has shrunk considerably is proved by the existence of raised beaches on its borders and by the deep clay strata through which several of its affluents run. The character of the rocks in the central part of the continent is generally that of a coarse grey sandstone, lying horizontally, or only very slightly inclined. Within this extensive sandstone deposit is a coal-field of vast but unknown extent, the materials of which were derived from the tropical plants which grew on the low shores of the great inland sea, the basin of which must have undergone several oscillations. Africa is the grand type of a region which has, on the whole, preserved its ancient terrestrial conditions during a period of indefinite duration unaffected by any considerable changes except those which are dependent on atmospheric and meteoric influences.* By far the largest portion of the vast interior has been unaffected by the great cataclysms to which the other continents have been exposed. In no part of it, we believe, has limestone with marine exuvise been discovered; nor has either chalk or flint been met with. Its surface is free from coarse superficial drift. It exhibits no traces of volcanoes; nor has its surface been much disturbed by internal forces, although the primitive rocks have been protruded in one or two places in isolated masses, as on the shores of the Albert Nyanza and the great mountain groups of Kenia and Kilimandjaro.

In the latest exploration of Dr. Livingstone and his companions a discovery is alleged to have been made which has some bearing in the vexed question of the antiquity of man. Dr. Kirk, while botanizing the banks of one of the tributaries of the Zambesi, came upon a bed of gravel in which fossilized bones of nearly all the species of animals now existing in the country, such as hippopotami, wild hogs, buffaloes, antelopes, turtles, crocodiles, and hyenas, were associated with pottery of the same construction, and with the same ornamental designs as that now in use by the existing inhabitants. Utensils, the undoubted workmanship of man, were thus found intermixed with fossil remains unquestionably of the tertiary or even an older geological period. If the evidence of this discovery should be found to be satisfactory, and taking into consideration the time required for the conversion of bones into fossils, we must come to the inevitable conclusion that the civilisation, such as it is, of the black man in Africa has been stationary for an immense period, and that his intellect must consequently be of an inferior order to that of the European or the Asiatic type. The African negro has certainly hitherto shown no capacity for political construction. His governments are pure despotisms, and society has scarcely anywhere advanced its simplest principles and most barbaric forms. He has neither tamed the elephant, nor domesticated the horse, nor discovered the use of the plough, nor learned to spread the sail. He has not acquired even the elements of public economy, and he is as ignorant of the rudiments of science as a child. Although he has acquired a rude skill in the metals, he has not discovered that coal is inflammable; and although his country teems with all the appliances of civilisation, his political and social condition remains one of the enigmas of the world. Notwithstanding the low intellectual development of the black man of Africa, the recent explorations have ascertained the existence of a very large population in the interior neither deficient in the virtue of industry nor incapable of social improvement, and that among their chiefs are men of the most kindly manners, humane dispositions, and generous aspirations, anxious for a higher civilisation than has yet dawned upon that benighted country, or than it can probably ever attain without the guidance of a superior race.

The Rovuma, a river some leagues to the north of the Zambesi, it was thought might afford an easier access to the district of the Nyassa than the Zambesi and the Shirè, and conduct to a healthier region, and one more promising for missionary labour. Dr. Livingstone, accompanied by Bishop Mackenzie, accordingly entered the Rovuma in 1861, with the 'Pioneer,' which, drawing nearly five feet of water, proved too deep for its continued navigation. The river was ascended for five days, when the water began to shallow, the navigation became intricate and unsafe, and the expedition was obliged to return to avoid the risk of being cut off from communication with the sea. The valley of the Rovuma seems to resemble that of the Zambesi, but is on a smaller scale. The result of the exploration was that the river was found to be unfit for navigation during four months in the year, but that like the Zambesi it might be available for commerce for the other eight months. This river possesses little interest in its lower course, where it is a mile wide and from five to six fathoms in depth. Higher up, the scenery is described by Bishop Mackenzie as extremely beautiful, consisting of finely wooded hills two or three hundred feet in height within a short distance of the river. The natives asserted that the Rovuma issued from Lake Nyassa, but none had ascended the stream high enough to prove it. The hopes founded on the appearance of the mouth of the Rovuma, which is without a bar, were thus disappointed.

And after four years of laborious exploration, attended with many unforeseen difficulties, the expedition was withdrawn by the Government in 1862, orders having been transmitted to Dr. Livingstone to return to England. The disappointment experienced in the capabilities both of the Zambesi and the Rovuma for commerce, the prevalence of the slave-trade, the lamentable failure of the Universities' Mission, and the generally unsettled and dangerous state of the country, all contributed to influence the decision of the Government. The expedition, however, has made known a district of boundless capabilities, together with the causes which operate to shut it out from intercourse with the civilised world. We should be glad to avoid adverting to a subject which seriously compromises the character of a Christian Power. Dr. Livingstone accuses the Portuguese Government of a gross neglect of its duty in omitting to put in force the laws which have been enacted for the suppression of the slave-trade in its African possessions, if not of direct complicity with its colonial officers in the iniquitous traffic. It is carried on, he says, in connection with the trade in ivory, and from fifteen to twenty canoes have been seen on the Upper Zambesi freighted with slaves for the Portuguese settlements. Dr. Livingstone asserts that he was not only the first to see slavery in its origin in this part of Africa, but to trace it through all its revolting phases. He had not only seen tribe arrayed against tribe for the capture of slaves, but he had been in places where family was arrayed against family and every house was protected by a stockade. Tribes the highest in intelligence were found morally the most degraded, the men freely selling their own wives and grown-up daughters. On the shores of Lake Nyassa the slave-merchants were at the time of his visit paying two yards of calico, worth one shilling, for a boy, and four yards for a good-looking girl. Barbarism must be the inevitable condition of a land where such practices exist. If the statements which Dr. Livingstone has made in the face of the world are incapable, as we fear they are, of being denied, a heavy responsibility rests upon the Portuguese Government if it should fail to interpose in the most summary manner, call its officers to a strict account, and put an end for ever in Eastern Africa to a system which is a disgrace to the Portuguese name. These decayed settlements on the remote shores of the Indian Ocean — the melancholy relics of a dominion which was once exercised for nobler purposes than the traffic in human flesh and blood — seem now to be kept up only for the maintenance of a few military pensioners. The terrible lesson which the last few years have taught the world has not failed to impress the most impulsive of Powers. Spain, the most inveterate of European offenders, has taken the lesson to heart, and resolved to abandon for ever the abominable traffic in man; and Portugal is now alone branded with the stigma of this atrocious crime. We entertain no doubt, that the development of legitimate trade with the regions in which its African set-lements are situated, would prove of far greater benefit in a material sense than any that can possibly result to it from the slave-trade. The capacity of the eastern coast of Africa for a large and lucrative trade is unquestionable, and it has, notwithstanding many discouragements, made considerable progress within the last thirty years. In 1834 the island of Zanzibar possessed little or no trade; in 1860 the exports of ivory, gum copal, and cloves, had risen to the value of 239,500*l.*, and the total exports and imports amounted to 1,000,577*l.*, employing 25,340 tons of shipping, and this under the rule of a petty Arabian Prince. Although it may be long before the natives can be induced to cultivate extensively cotton and sugar for exportation, there are many valuable natural products the preparation of which for the European market requires but little industry and no skill. The hard woods which grow on the banks of the Zambesi and the Shire are especially valuable; they may be obtained in any quantity at the mere cost of cutting, and they can be transported to the coast at all seasons without difficulty. The lignum vitæ attains a larger size on the banks of the Zambesi than anywhere else. The African ebony, although not botanically the same as the ebony of commerce, also attains immense proportions, and is of a deeper black. It abounds on the Rovuma, within eight miles of the sea, as does likewise the fustic, from which is extracted a strong yellow dye.

The additions which have been made to our geographical knowledge from the two expeditions of Dr. Livingstone are important and interesting. In his latest he entered and partially explored a region the hydrography of which requires to be thoroughly known before the great mystery of the source of the Nile can be considered as solved, for it is in the district of the equatorial lakes that the head-springs of the mighty river undoubtedly exist, and the connexion of all of these great reservoirs with each other is rendered so probable by Mr. Baker's recent discovery of the magnificent lake (the Little Luta Nzige of Speke), which he has appropriately named the Albert Nyanza, that a fresh interest has been imparted to the subject, for if the Albert Nyanza should prove to be connected with the great Tanganyika, the source of the Nile is not the Victoria Nyanza or one of its affluents, but must be sought for in a region many degrees to the south of that lake, or of any of its tributary streams. That such a connexion does exist between the Albert Nyanza and the Tanganyika there is the strongest reason to believe, for a party of Arab traders informed Captain Speke while making a voyage on the Tanganyika, that the river which flows through Egypt issues from that lake; and a respectable Arab merchant, who could have no conceivable motive for misrepresentation, accompanied a statement to the same effect made to Captain Burton with such circumstantial details as tend strongly to establish its probability. A large river, he said, called the Marunga, enters the lake at its southern extremity, but on a visit to its northern end he saw a river which certainly flowed out of it, for he approached so near its termination that he distinctly saw and felt the influence of an outward current. This statement derives considerable support from information received by Dr. Livingstone from Arabs well acquainted with the Tanganyika, and who told him that a river flowed out of its northern end, and they drew on the sand the Nyassa discharging its waters to the south, but the Tanganyika to the north. He was also told, in the course of his first missionary travels, by an Arab who declared that he knew the Tanganyika well, that it was connected with another lake still further north called Garague* (Kazagwè), and King Kamrasi and the natives inhabiting its banks assured Mr. Baker that the Albert Nyanza was known to extend far to the west of Karagwè. We are thus in possession of evidence from four distinct and independent sources that the Tanganyika has its effluent in the north, and is therefore connected with the Albert Nyanza. Nor can we regard the alleged difference of altitude (226 feet) between the two lakes as an objection to this supposition; for when we know that 1° Fahr. represents an altitude of 533 feet, a difference of level which is indicated by the fractional part of a degree may well be attributed either to some imperfection in the instrument or to defective observation.† Dr. Livingstone suggested ten years ago that the parting of the watershed between the Zambesi and the Nile might be somewhere between the latitudes 6° and 12° south, that the two rivers rose in the same region, and that their sources would probably be found at no considerable distance from each other.‡ Should this conception be realised, a remarkable resemblance will exist between the two great rivers of Western Europe and the Zambesi

and the Nile. The Danube and the Rhine have their sources very near to each other, but the streams diverge, the one, like the Zambesi, to the east, the other, like the Nile, to the North, both traversing a vast extent of country before they pour their waters into the sea. This most interesting problem is now, perhaps, nearer its solution than it has ever been, for Dr. Livingstone's instructions for his new journey of exploration are to reach the Tanganyika, and to direct his particular attention to its effluent; and as the distance between the two lakes Tanganyika and Albert Nyanza cannot be considerable, it is to be hoped that he will be able to test the correctness of the information which he formerly received, as well as that given to Captains Burton and Speke. The question afterwards to be determined will be, whether the Albert Nyanza is connected with the Nile, and if so, how connected. The river which flows from the Victoria Nyanza was traced by Captain Speke for only fifty miles, but Mr. Baker has established by personal observation the fact that it flows into the Albert Nyanza, having ascended its banks to the point where Captain Speke left it, namely, the Karuma Falls. Mr. Baker asserts that he saw, or imagined he saw, a river at a distance of twenty miles from the furthest northerly point which he reached on the Albert Nyanza, issuing from the lake and traversing the plain beyond; but nothing can be reasonably affirmed or inferred from such distant observation. The Albert Nyanza may be connected with the Nile by some great but hitherto undiscovered stream communicating with the Bahr el Ghazal (the Nile of Herodotus), and this supposition is rendered highly probable when taken in connexion with the information which Mr. Baker received from the people residing on the shores of the Albert Nyanza, that the lake extends to the north-west for about forty miles, when it suddenly turns to the west, contracting gradually, and that its extent is unknown. That the Bahr el Ghazal may ultimately prove to be the true Nile is thus rendered extremely probable, nor does its mere-like character, so far as it has been explored, militate against such a supposition. The characteristic of the Nile below Khartum, for a considerable part of its course, and for a large portion of the year, is that of a very sluggish stream with gigantic reeds springing out of the stagnant water on each side. In descending the stream from Gondokoro, on passing the Bahr el Ghazal, it is a custom, Captain Grant tells us, for all boats to fire a gun as a salute, possibly a traditiona-ry honour paid to the great source of Egypt's fertility. The river, which flows from Gondokoro at its junction with the Bahr el Ghazal, is only eighty or a hundred yards across, while the Bahr el Ghazal is half a mile in width, and after the junction of the two streams Captain Grant admits that there is an evident increase in breadth and width, that the water thenceforward becomes purer, losing much of its turbid appearance, and that the current is considerably increased.* The river which flows past Gondokoro, and which Captain Speke, in his map, traces from the Victoria Nyanza, is, Dr. Beke informs us, known there not as the Bahr el Abye, or White Nile, but as the Bahr el Djebel, or mountain river.

Should it be eventually found that the Tanganyika is connected with the Albert Nyanza, and the latter by its westerly or any other effluent with the Bahr el Ghazal, it will necessarily follow that the Tanganyika, or rather the river Marunga, which enters that lake at its southern extremity, will form the true head water of the Nile, and the course of the mighty river will then be proved to extend through forty degrees of latitude, and the great lakes Tanganyika and Albert Nyanza will be but the expansion of a majestic river the course of which, from its fountain head to its embouchure, will exceed four thousand miles.

We have, in a former number of the 'Quarterly Review,' expressed our doubts whether the result of Captain Speke's travels could be accepted by geographers as final solution of the great problem which has perplexed the scientific and the curious of all ages, and the important discovery by Mr. Baker of the great Albert Nyanza confirms us in that opinion; for the notion of Captain Speke that the little Luta Nzige ('Albert Victoria') was only a backwater of the 'Nile,' which the river must 'fill' before it could continue its course, has been proved to be completely erroneous. The Albert Nyanza is a lake of vast although unknown dimensions, but certainly inferior neither to the Victoria Nyanza nor the Tanganyika, receiving the drainage of extensive mountain ranges on the west, and of the Utumbi, Uganda, and Unyoro countries to the east. There is even considerable reason to doubt whether the river struck by Captain Speke at Madi is even the same which he left at the Karuma Falls, for no part of its subsequent course, although indicated upon a map for two hundred geographical miles, was ever seen by him: and Dr. Peney, one of the Austrian missionaries, who resided for nine years at Gondokoro, concluded from the results of long observation that the river which flows past that place contributes little or nothing to the flood of the Nile. The sum of Captain Speke's discoveries, therefore, now appears to consist in the fact that he discovered in his first exploratory journey the great lake Victoria Nyanza, and in his second a river issuing from it, which, after a not very lengthened course, has been ascertained to fall, in common, however, with several other rivers probably as large if not larger than itself, into another enormous lake, now denominated the Albert Nyanza; but of the effluent of this lake positively nothing is at present known, however great may be the probability that a connexion between the Nile of Egypt and the lake may be hereafter incontrovertibly proved.

We trust that in the above remarks we shall not be suspected of wishing to detract from the real merits of the gallant explorer, whose untimely death is so generally and justly deplored. Whatever may be the ultimate value assigned to the facts ascertained by him, there can be no difference of opinion either as to the intrepidity of his character or on the magnitude of the exploit of the march across the continent of Africa, which he and his companion Captain Grant accomplished in the face of so many dangers and at the cost of many sufferings and privations.

The complete solution of the great geographical problem may not be given to one explorer, nor perhaps will it be accomplished in one generation, but we certainly appear to be approaching nearer and nearer to its determination. If the lake Tanganyika should prove to be connected with the Albert Nyanza, and the Albert Nyanza by its westerly or other effluent with the great river of Egypt, to Dr. Livingstone may yet be awarded the honour of being the real discoverer of the source of the Nile, the probable region of which he pointed out long before any of the expeditions from the eastern coast of Africa had been undertaken; and he may soon, by a careful survey of the Tanganyika and possibly also of the Albert Nyanza, be on the verge of a discovery which will far surpass in interest any that has hitherto been made within the basin of the Nile.

NEW POETRY.*

WHY should any one, with certain obvious exceptions, go on writing poetry? The answer is plain; that it is a great amusement to the writers, and, on the whole, after making allowance for certain undeniable evils, it is not a very great annoyance to any one else. We exclude, of course, the possible danger of being called upon to listen to an author's recital of his works, or to give him a candid opinion of their merits. But there is the great advantage about a poem that it is generally short. Few men in these days have the courage for writing original epics, though they have a fancy for translating them. Mr. Brodie, indeed, is going to bring out a poem in four cantos. Only one has appeared at present, and persons who like such reading as we are about to describe may get through it very comfortably in half an hour. Taken in these moderate doses, we incline to the opinion that some people may not impossibly finish it. We do not, however, recommend the experiment. Mr. Brodie favours us with a preface, giving an anticipatory defence for having written a poem at all. He says that people will tell him, first, that this is not a poetical age; and, secondly, that he should have chosen a subject more removed from him in time. Instead of describing the cruise of the Erebus and Terror, he should have taken the "Discovery of America," the "Death of Montezuma," the "Fall of Wallenstein," or some similarly lively subject. We certainly are not about to raise either of these objections. Our one recommendation to Mr. Brodie would be next time to leave out the rhymes and the divisions into lines and stanzas. His poem will run into very tolerable prose; but it comes under no definition of poetry that we know of, except that of being in verse. It is mere prose bewitched; and it is really curious that a man should fancy himself to be writing a poem when he is merely torturing Captain Sherard Osborn's book into Spenserian stanzas. The process certainly is free from one objection. There is no affectation of the ordinary kind about his writing. It never becomes turgid or metaphorical or bombastic (except, indeed, that an invocation of the Spirit of Poesy is inserted à propos of nothing particular about half-way through); but then it is at least as necessary for a poet to try to be vigorous as to avoid being overstrained, whereas Mr. Brodie jogs as contentedly along in his Spenserian stanzas as if he was writing an account of the expedition for the newspapers. The whole performance is about on the level of those curious productions which are sometimes sent in for prize poems; in which the author has been so surprised at finding that he can rhyme, that he has quite forgotten to do anything else. It is a really curious psychological phenomenon that any educated man should have written such stuff as Euthanasia, and been deceived by its external form into fancying that it had more in common with Spenser than with a column of the Times.

The so-called poem begins with a statement of the subject, with remarks on the general impulse communicated to science by the peace of 1815, and the special impulse towards Arctic discovery, followed by some observations about the Esquimaux, and "their manners strange, how every gift they lick, needle or saw or looking-glass or knife." Luckily, he passes them over shortly, though "inclined, did time admit, their clean Pure dome of snow to sing and winter's household scene." We are then favoured with a slight sketch of Arctic discovery between the years 1815 and 1845, in such terms as these—"fresh expeditions constantly were made year after year, and winters whole men stayed in forest deserts." After which Sir John Barrow makes a long speech, to no particular audience and in no particular time or place; this being a poetical way of stating that he had written a great many articles in the Quarterly Review, of which these stanzas contain the substance. He tells, for example, how Dease and Simpson

Re-embarked on board,
Mapped two successive years three hundred miles
With patience unexcelled and superhuman toils.

This speech

th' assembled sailor chivalry Drank with one ear;

a somewhat singular performance; which means, metaphorically, that they approved of Sir John's articles. Lord Haddington then remarks to Sir John Franklin that he is sixty years old, and must stay at home; whereupon,

Him with eyes that shine,
Brief answer made the knight, "I am but fifty-nine!"

A good many volunteers join Sir John, and hereupon the Spirit of Poesy is invoked as before mentioned, with some of the customary talk about "Tiber's side and Arno's rill;" after which the progress of the expedition is duly detailed in the style of "Our Own Correspondent." "The ships, we are told, were well found:—

Three years' provisions in each ship are stored,
Three years, 'tis hoped, will bring them safely back;

And all that arts inventive can afford,
Food, implements, ice-saws, crow's-nest, they pack.

We have careful geographical details in this fashion:—

If there too spiteful winter closed the gate, Debarred both routes, still all the South remained,

Thro' Regent Inlet or James Ross's Strait,
By which the continent could be attained.

After this, the poet takes his sailors comfortably down the Thames, introducing a stanza upon Lord Palmerston, which he assures us in a note "is not out of place," because he has just mentioned the heroic nature of Englishmen; and, therefore, "as a true exemplar of an English gentleman, a few lines here are not irrelevant." Gradually we get to Stromness and to the Arctic Seas, where, as the poet pathetically remarks:—

Animal life abounds, the seal serene Basks with his shining orbs, or huge whales shake
The trembling wave, fowl feed, and walrus awake.

If by the seal's "shining orbs" are meant his eyes, we should have preferred calling them fishy. Having got his adventurers safely to Beechey's Island, Mr. Brodie comes home, as he rather mysteriously tells us, "to drop his anchor in the Muse's port, and have his frail bark in strong iron cased, that soon must be by fiercest tempest chased, fronting all winter's utmost rage severe." What Mr. Brodie's bark means, or why it should be iron-cased, we have not the faintest idea. But we hope that the process won't enable him to make many more ventures in the poetical line.

Mr. Chorley's volume, if it does not attain any very high degree of excellence, is at least too good to be put in the same class with Mr. Brodie's. Mr. Chorley is evidently a man of taste, who, if he does not write very excellent poems, knows at any rate what poems ought to be. His verses do not give us the impression of having first been written in prose, then cut up into lengths of ten syllables, and finally twisted about forcibly into rhymes. They have a certain natural swing and harmony about them, which shows that, if the writer had any very poetical ideas, they would not fail of expression for want of due power over language. We may, and in fact do, think them deficient in inspiration; but there is nothing in them grotesque, nor any absence of due polish. Mr. Chorley himself speaks very modestly about them. The chief poem, the "Wife's Litany," had, he says, been laid aside for several years, and when he accidentally found it again he thought it had "a certain character of its own sufficiently genuine to warrant its preservation." We do not dispute this verdict, as it is in fact rather difficult to say what exact degree of merit warrants the preservation of a poem. The most curious thing about it is the method of composition of which Mr. Chorley informs us. He seems, as we judge from other pieces in the volume, to have a decided predilection for ghosts and the supernatural generally. He says himself that the "source of the poem was derived from that unknown region which lies beyond the range of the mind's voluntary excursions—a mysterious province, every glimpse of which I have long been accustomed to regard with attention, not to say with reverence." Accordingly, Mr. Chorley favours us with a ballad, something after the "Ancient Mariner" fashion, where a dead man steers a ship home, all its proper navigators being killed off in a very disagreeable manner. He finds the remains of an old wreck in another ballad, and has a long and interesting conversation with a ghost, who kindly gives him the particulars of the accident by which it was lost, and ends by calling up the spirits of the rest of the crew, much as Admiral Hosier's injured ghost did in a parallel case. Mr. Chorley, then, having these propensities towards the superhuman, had a dream. He saw "a vision of the night," in which the leading incidents of the "Wife's Litany" were presented "with such vivacity and completeness that, on waking, it was little more than an act of memory to retrace the received impression." The dream which thus formed the nucleus of the poem appears, as we infer from the poem itself, to have been on this wise. He saw an old chapel at midnight, in which a villanous knight, assisted by his domestic chaplain and an evil-minded retainer, were burying a victim. This victim would naturally be a gentleman who had been in love with the knight's wife before her marriage, and whom he had taken the opportunity to murder comfortably, with the chaplain's connivance, on his unexpected reappearance. To the party thus pleasantly engaged enters the wife, in a state either of somnambulism or of demoniacal possession; for, from a conversation of certain highly indefinite "voices" a short time before, Mr. Chorley seems to attribute this sleep-walking to a very ill-disposed "Shadow," which makes the lights burn blue. The lady walks up to the altar, and, kneeling down before it, proceeds to utter her "litany," which, it need hardly be said, is not of a conciliatory tendency to her husband. She prays, in fact, in a very emphatic manner, that—

For the lips his breath has soiled,
On his lips be gall and blight;
And the worm that sleeps not, coiled
In his bosom day and night.

After a good deal of this, the bell strikes midnight, and the "unhallowed sprite" leaves her; she awakes, sees her lover lying dead, and, what is indeed the only course open to her under the circumstances, falls on his body and dies herself; the knight goes mad; and "the voices" inform us that the lady and her lover are going up to heaven without further trouble. The various scenes which lead up to this conclusion may be easily imagined. We certainly do not envy Mr. Chorley his dreams, which are unpleasantly suggestive of previous suppers. Admitting, however, that poets have a right to deal in shadows and voices and wild huntsmen and other anomalous beings, the story is well enough told. The form, it appears, is intended to be in imitation of Spanish comedy, and people who like to read pretty verses about such unsubstantial subjects may go through it without any danger of having their taste offended. We confess that dreamland seems to us to be rather too unsubstantial a district even to found poems upon; but Mr. Chorley may boast of having added one more to a list in which Kubla Khan is the only other example that we can at present remember.

Neither of the poems we have noticed can be considered as serious additions to our literature; but, as mathematicians say that one indefinitely small thing may bear an indefinitely great ratio to another, so two poor poems may be incomparably different in merit. Mr. Chorley is not a Shakespeare, nor even a Coleridge; but a talent for writing elegant verse without very much meaning, or very ambitious aim, is enough to establish a vast difference between its possessor and a writer of the unsuccessful prize-poem order. It is worth while to compare him with Mr. Brodie, in order to give him the gratitude due for what is, at first sight, the rather negative merit of not being more prosaic than prose itself.

From the Fortnightly Review.
AMERICA, FRANCE, AND ENGLAND.

M. TAINE speaks of certain conditions under which society becomes nothing more than un commerce d'affronts. Whilst there is reason to hope that the relations between man and man, or class and class, in any society of the present day, cannot be properly characterised as an interchange of insults, it is to be feared that the phrase is, to a sad degree, expressive of the relations subsisting between nations. Here the skies seem always angry, and the volleys of cannon alternate only with the hurtling of recriminations. The historian who shall live when there is a community of nations, will probably, in reading the Blue Books of these years, think of Saurian growlings and gnashings in primæval swamps. It is therefore with a natural anxiety that one of the leading nations is seen holding a brand, and hesitating whether, and whither, to throw it. It is undeniable that the United States stands in this attitude at the present moment, and that the world has reason to await with profound solicitude the decisions of the present Congress as to the foreign policy to be adopted by that nation. I cannot conceive of a legislative assembly gathered under more solemn circumstances than those which surround this Congress, or of one holding in itself more important issues.

Formation, material expansion, centralisation, and an ambition to lead in the affairs of the world, may be traced in history as the successive embryonic phases through which nations pass. Unfortunately history attests also many "arrests" on this line of development. America, however, has thus far advanced well, and has now reached the last form that precedes a settled nationality. Her foreign policy, hitherto relatively of the least, now becomes of the first importance; for while it seems inevitable that she should now be tempted to aspire to a leading position in the world, the temptation is reinforced by some provocations from without, and by certain strong inducements from within. The conditions for a war policy are so obvious that I have little doubt the nations immediately concerned would be in certain expectation of it, were it not for the general belief that there are in America paramount domestic reasons against the adoption of such a policy. Such a course would increase the financial burdens, already very heavy, under which the country is now struggling; it would indefinitely postpone that return to a settled and normal condition of things which trade always craves, and especially after the losses consequent upon war; it would call again from their homes the soldiers who, after the wear and tear of four years of hardship and danger, are desirous of rest; it would cost more than any probable result of a foreign war could repay; it would involve the possibility of defeat, which would imply a humiliating downfall from the position and prestige which the United States has gained by the thorough suppression of the gigantic rebellion that threatened its existence. Nevertheless, convinced as the writer himself is, by these and higher considerations, that it would be wrong for the United States to enter upon a war with any foreign power, he is equally convinced that there are other considerations calculated to tempt the present Government at Washington to an opposite course, some of which may be briefly stated here.

It is an old idea with rulers that, in certain conditions, a foreign war is conducive to the health of a nation,—an idea which old countries have outgrown, but one that is sure to have powerful advocates in a young one. A civil war, says Lord Bacon, is like the heat of a fever; a foreign one, is like the heat of exercise. It need be no longer a secret that, in the few months succeeding the bombardment of Fort Sumter, and preceding the actual determination to coerce the South into the Union by military power, there was a powerful influence at Washington seeking to superinduce a war with England, with the object of uniting the discordant parties and sections by a direct appeal to the patriotism of both. This concession to the anti-English sentiment—which, for reasons to be hereafter stated, was hitherto confined to the South and its ally, the Northern Democratic party — seemed a fine card to play at that juncture; and if the Trent affair could have occurred sooner than it did, that card might have been played. That it was not, at any rate, is due to the moral character of Mr. Lincoln, and to the strong friendship for England of the Chairman of the Senatorial Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Hon. Charles Sumner. It was plain, too, that New England, the centre of friendship for England at that time, would permit no war to be undertaken on such immoral grounds, and at the same time that she was determined to make the crisis that had come an occasion for settling the slavery question for ever. Thus the foreign war project for evading the national emergency was smothered. It was essentially a pre-slavery plan — though it might have encountered a powerful opposition from those Confederates of Virginia and the Carolinas who cared more for separation than for slavery — and had it succeeded in uniting the North and South, slavery would to-day be entering upon a new lease of existence instead of being abolished.

Just now the same temptation recurs. The status of the negro in the South is a subject for agitations and divisions nearly as fierce as those which preceded and resulted in the civil war. The South and its old ally, the Democratic party in the North, are demanding the return of the Southern States with their governments still committed exclusively to the whites: the Northern Republicans bitterly oppose this, maintaining that the humiliated slaveholders cannot be trusted to legislate justly for the blacks, without whose aid (in the declared opinion of President Lincoln) the rebellion could not have been suppressed. The issue is most important; for, once restored to the position of equal States, the Southern legislatures could — providing only that they did not contravene technically the law against chattel slavery — enact a system of serfdom, and retain the "Black Codes," which prohibit the education and prevent the elevation of the negroes, the North being powerless to interfere unless another war should arise to arm it with the abnormal right, which it now has, to control the section it has just conquered. The security proposed by the Northern Republicans is to give the negroes votes, which the Southerners and the Democrats furiously oppose. It will be seen at once that this political situation necessitates the continuance of a bitter sectional strife. The arguments of the Southern party about the constitutional rights of States to regulate their own suffrage naturally provoke taunts concerning their four years' effort to overthrow the constitution; their talk about the inferiority of the negro leads their antagonists to place the barbarities of Andersonville prison by the side of the long patience of the negro; the alleged "unfitness of the negro to vote" is replied to with the tu quoque based on the disloyalty of the whites; and so long as this issue is before the country, the Northern press naturally parades every current instance of inhumanity to the negro, and every expression of hatred to the Yankees, of which its correspondents easily find enough in the South. All this of course wakes an angry and defiant spirit there; and thus the country is relegated to the dissension and agitation about the negro which had prevailed without intermission for more than a generation before the war.

There is no doubt that the late President Lincoln foresaw this issue, and he has left on record, in a letter recently published, his determination to have ended the negro agitation for ever by demanding equal rights in the seceded States for the negro. But President Johnson is a very different man. For more than thirty years a Southern slave-holder, a Democratic politician, and a steady voter in the Congress against all New England ideas, he nevertheless — simply from a pride in the old flag — opposed his own section. He vigorously resisted the rebellion, though it can scarcely be said that he clung to the North. The North rewarded his constancy by electing him to the Vice-Presidency. But now that the convulsion is over, he and the country are discovering that sudden changes are rarely thorough. So, in the present controversy on negro-suffrage, President Johnson takes the side that might be expected of a Tennessean Democrat, and opposes the party which elected him. Of course his cabinet are with him. Nevertheless President Johnson and his cabinet see that either by conceding the last hope of slavery — "a white man's government" — or by some other means, this controversy must terminate, at least for the present, in order that reconstruction, clamorously demanded by the national exchequer and by trade, may take place.

If it has been determined that negro-suffrage shall not be conceded, what "other means" remain? Suppose some great and overpowering national emergency were to occur — one involving the national pride or interest — would it not at once divert attention from the sectional issue? If the Northern and the Southern man should fight side by side for a common cause, against a common foe, for some years—the longer the better—would not old differences be healed? And if to carry on such a war Southern States as well as Northern must furnish quotas of men and money, and raise crops for food, then Southern States must be at once reconstituted; and to effect this at once, must not the country be persuaded to compromise on the negro-suffrage question?

The influence at Washington—I need not mention names—which four years ago urged these considerations to prevent utter rupture between North and South, survives to suggest them as furnishing a possible escape from the dilemma of the administration which is hardly strong enough to encounter the present Congress—the most radical one that has ever assembled in America. And to this influence is now added another, urging a new class of considerations in favour of a foreign war; chiefly this: there are a number of able leading men in the South, each influential in his community, who are now in disgrace, and who, if the country settles down to peace, have nothing left but to live on in obscurity, unable to hold office, and without anything to mitigate the deep sense of humiliation or the wounds of pride. The flag at which Lee, Beauregard, Johnstone, Mosby, and many others struck, can float only to bring a shadow upon them. The greatest of them has already hidden himself in a fourth-class college. Already the North asks, Which shall we prefer, the negro who defended, or the white who trampled upon, our flag? A foreign war would be the rehabilitation of these Southern men. Indeed, emigration seems to be almost the only alternative which would enable them to emerge from their disgrace with the American people, recover position, and claim rights as defenders of the nation. Moreover, it is not at all certain but that they might—particularly in the case of a war with England—be able to cast a part of the cloud under which they now sit upon the people and leaders of New England, who have never applauded the motto, “Our country, right or wrong,” and who assuredly could not be brought to fight with anything like the earnestness lately displayed in their war with slavery, in an unnecessary or a doubtful war—not at all in one whose political objects would be precisely those which are most repulsive to the strong moral sense of that section.

My belief is that New England and the North-West may be relied upon to oppose any undisguised postponement by compromise of the negro question; and if their Government should attempt to bring on a foreign war for the purpose of suppressing the agitation of that question, there would not be wanting clear-headed men to repeat throughout the country the story of how the original colonies compromised on the negro question in order that they might form a Union “for the common defence,”—that is, present an unbroken front to George III. should he seek to subjugate them,—and how that compromise has proved to have been pregnant with wrongs and agonies which make the tea-tax of our fathers ridiculous. To keep off King George they bowed to King Slavery: their posterity, still groaning under the terrible results of that “policy,” will be very unlikely to extemporise a King George for the purpose of repeating the blunder. When, however, the restoration of the Southern people and leaders, and the re-pledging them to the Union, are added to the first consideration, the North-West, to whose prosperity the loyalty of the Mississippi river and of both its banks to the Gulf is essential, may not prove to be of inflexible virtue.

A third reason why a foreign war might not be unwelcome to the Washington Government is, that it has now a large army already collected and to a certain extent drilled, which it is deemed inexpedient, for reasons connected with the internal condition of the country, to dissolve at once, and which is likely to be demoralized if it has nothing to do. Nor would the people of America be willing to support a large army and navy in idleness. And in this connection it may be said that whilst the rank and file of the American military force would be glad to remain, for a long time certainly, in their homes, a war would be more welcome to the vast number of officers whom the late conflict raised from obscurity, and for the most part created, and to the large majority of whom peace is sure to bring the obscurity which it brought them six years ago. The prominent generals of the United States were before the war railroad-presidents, surveyors, lawyers, &c.; hardly one of them, excepting Fremont, had a national reputation. It need not be a matter of wonder that so many among them, General Grant being of the number, are already widely and justly quoted as favourable to a foreign war policy.

As crowning all these considerations it must not be forgotten that the old undying dream of continental occupation, of which the “Monroe doctrine” is the familiar but inexact label, is at present producing more exasperations and is under fewer restraints than ever before. The Romulus of the United States, whoever he may have been, did not surround the country with any furrow, and the Remuses had not in the first years even to leap, so long as their filibustering expeditions respected those boundaries which the average American regards as the natural ones of his country—i.e. the Pacific Ocean on the west, the Atlantic on the east, the Isthmus of Panama on the south, and the North Pole on the north. Since the Mexican war, and in recoil from the meanness and criminality which led to and attended the seizure of Texas, there has been in the United States a moral sentiment able to hold in check the disposition to encroach upon its neighbours, as those representatives of a Democratic administration who met at Ostend a few years ago and proposed to obtain Cuba by fair means or foul, discovered to their cost. But the moral sentiment which would have continued to shelter Mexico would not find a single American to plead its applicability to Maximilian, unless in the reverse of the obvious sense. And since it is understood that the expulsion of Maximilian by the power of the United States means the grateful self-annexation of Mexico (in some way) to the Union, it will be at once seen that the passion for expansion and the moral sentiment of the country jump together in a way that they never did before. On the other hand, whilst the desire for Canada is much feebler than that for Mexico, the restraint of international morality which would have protected it has been removed by the general sense of wrongs received at the hands of England, and the representatives of England in Canada, and by a current belief that annexation to the Union is desired by nearly all of the French Canadians and the Irish.

Whilst these considerations are being urged at Washington, those who are most strongly opposed to a foreign war, and were among the most trusted advisers of President Lincoln—as, for example, the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, before alluded to—are now without the ear of the President, and range in hostility to his plan of reconstruction. Of all the reasons that have been mentioned, the consideration which will weigh most strongly with the President and his Cabinet will be the hope of starving off the negro-agitation, and of securing the return of the Southern States without negro-suffrage. If negro-equality were to be placed beyond question by the present Congress, every cloud of war would clear away for the present, and the Mexican Empire would be the only thing concerning which one could anticipate, even at a distant period, any collision between the United States and any nation of the Old World. Hence the friends of peace in America are as anxiously hoping for the settlement of the negro question on the only basis which can be final, and that will not remit the country to the bitter animosities and agitations of the past, as the friends of war are indifferent to or anxious to evade such settlement. The particular danger is that the Congress will decide to keep out the Southern States without imposing negro-suffrage as a condition of their return, in which case the President might be induced to try and alter the conditions under which the question would come before another Congress, by seeking, as above indicated, to weld the two sections, and purge the South of the stain upon its loyalty, with the fires of a foreign war. I confess that the probabilities affecting the question of war or peace between America and France or England seem to me slightly inclining to the side of war; and I am sure that the internal considerations enumerated, much more than the claim against England, or the Monroe doctrine—whose importance in the case I am far from undervaluing—will be the mainspring of the war policy, if it be adopted.

The next question of interest is whether a hostile movement, if determined upon, will be directed against France or against England.

There is in America a traditional friendliness towards France. At a celebration of the national American Thanksgiving-day, by Americans in Paris, December 7, the heartiest applause was awarded to a toast proposed by General Schofield in these words:—"The old friendship between France and the United States; may it be strengthened and perpetuated!" At the same festival the Hon. John Jay, the chairman, alluded to some of the associations which are stirred in every American's mind when France is mentioned. "Our patriotic assemblage," he said, "in this beautiful capitol, amid the splendours of French art and the triumphs of French science, recalls the infancy of our country, and the various threads of association that are so frequently intertwined in the historic memories of America and France. The French element was early and widely blended with our transatlantic blood, and it is a fact that two of the five commissioners who in this city signed the Treaty of Paris in 1783—that treaty by which England closed the war and recognised the American Republic—were of Huguenot descent. In the war now closed, as in that of our Revolution, French and American officers fought side by side, and side by side in our House of Representatives hang — and will continue to hang, as a perpetual memento of the early friendship between the countries — the portraits of Washington and Lafayette. The territory of Orleans, including that vast and fertile valley extending from the gulf to the limits of Missouri, was ceded to us by the First Napoleon almost for a song, and there are still perpetuated in its names, habits, and traditions, pleasant memories of France." Mr. Jay did not, in Catholic France, hint why the Huguenots happened to be in America; he did not bring to any rude test of historic criticism the part played, literally, by the Marquis de Lafayette in the first, or by the young French chevaliers, who enjoyed their cigars and champagne with McClellan whilst the soldiers of the Union were being massacred before Richmond, in the second revolution; neither did he inquire whether at that time the Emperor of the French was making proposals to England to join him in an intervention favourable to the South, nor remember the hisses and cries in the French Assembly which drowned M. Pelletan's voice when he announced the downfall of Richmond (which M. Pelletan declared — mistakenly, it would appear — were so loud, that they would be heard across the Atlantic). But, in ignoring such questions and crowning his address with the toast "The Emperor of the French," Mr. Jay undoubtedly represented the general determination of his countrymen to put the best construction possible upon everything that France does, and their instinctive disposition to wink at her plainest offences. This disposition must be considered prominently in our calculations of the probable action of the United States upon the Mexican Empire. There can be no doubt that if any other nation than France had established that Empire, the end of the rebellion in America would have been swiftly followed by the march of Federal troops across the Rio Grande.

The Monroe doctrine was of gradual and natural development. The earliest expression of the sentiment out of which it grew was given by the First Napoleon, when he assigned as a chief reason for disposing of the territory of Orleans — the greater part of the Mississippi Valley — on the easy terms in which President Jefferson obtained it, that it was the manifest destiny of that territory to become a portion of the United States. He did but express, however, his perception of a growing feeling for territorial expansion among the Americans. But an element of even paramount importance in this feeling was a dread that the American Republic might have to struggle with powerful and hostile forms of government. The Monroe doctrine was really that for which few Europeans would give it credit — a conservative policy. Explicitly respecting powers already planted on that continent, it affirmed the limits of the right of intervention for itself, as well as for foreign powers. It was meant to be, and was, an especial check upon the westward aggressions of American filibusters, by implying that only their unjust encroachments from abroad could justify interference with other nations. It recommended itself to the most thoughtful men of the last generation in the United States, as the means of keeping for ever out of the Western hemisphere that grim political idol to which the peace of the old world had been so often sacrificed — the "balance of power." It assumed, indeed, the predominance of the United States on that continent, but then the United States opened its arms, its lands, its honours to the people of all nations. The Monroe doctrine was, then, conservative, in that it put a definite check upon the idea of absorbing surrounding countries, and limited the United States to the idea of predominance. Even this may seem arrogant, but it is difficult to see by what other means the New World could have been saved from becoming the mere duplicate of the Old. To permit the occupation of countries, which the United States has restrained herself from occupying, by foreign governments of forms essentially hostile, necessitates an injurious modification of her own. Any such Power, once admitted and established, must be watched; and to watch it implies expensive fortifications of long frontiers, standing armies, and young men supplying them — things utterly opposed to the spirit in which the American Republic was founded. A few ships might prevent the landing on those shores of a Power which, once fixed there, would require that the Union should become a centralized and military nation. Thus there is no principle that would protect California, or Texas, or Louisiana from French encroachment, that would not have equally have protected Mexico. The south-western states have only to be weak to become food for the further growth of "the Latin race," and the glory of its new Caesar. Hence garrisons, under General Weitzel, and others, are already on the south-western border, where they must stay so long as the representative of French power stays. The best men in America are persuaded that it would be more favourable to the peace of the world if such garrisons should cease to exist, through the removal of the occasion for them.

The traditional friendship of the United States with France has undoubtedly been strained to the utmost by this invasion of Mexico, and by the circumstances under which it occurred. The subversion of the Mexican Republic was consummated in the face of three unequivocal declarations to the American Minister at Paris, that the Government then existing in Mexico should not be altered by the invasion; it was accomplished at a time when the United States was prevented from having any voice in the matter by the gigantic war which tied her hands; it was for the avowed purpose of building up a rival power on the North American continent; and it selected as the representative of that flagrant defiance of the principle which in America has a sanctity corresponding to that of the "balance of power" in Europe, a prince belonging to a House more unpopular among Americans, and more associated with the oppression of weaker peoples, than any that has reigned on the continent of Europe.

If it should ultimately appear that only by war can the empire thus attempted be expelled, war will surely come. But there are reasons why the United States will strain every nerve to secure that object by negotiation before resorting to armed force. The friendly feeling towards France already adverted to, the equally strong feeling among the Irish and the Roman Catholics generally, and the especial affection and gratitude to France of the Southerners—whom the foreign war, if undertaken, is expected to rehabilitate—would all make the conflict one for which the American people could have little heart. It would require repeated refusals of any other settlement on the part of Louis Napoleon to generate the amount of popular exasperation requisite for the war. At the same time I doubt not but that General Schofield and others will sufficiently convince the Emperor of the French that the American Government and people will never consent to the permanent existence of a foreign monarchy in Mexico. The willingness to postpone positive action in the matter is enhanced by the consideration that non-recognition and hesitation on the part of the United States, encouraging as they do the Juarists to continue their resistance, injuriously affecting the Mexican loan, and accumulating the expenditure of France, constitute in themselves almost a forcible attack upon Maximilian. There is also something like a superstitious belief among the people that no government will stand long in Mexico until it is consigned by destiny to the United States; and I venture to predict that in that direction the United States will pursue the Micawber policy of waiting for something to turn up, and that this policy will be presently justified by the evacuation of Mexico by French troops, with Maximilian close upon their heels.

Much as I regret to say it, I cannot deny to myself that a war with England—were there any pretext for it, or anything to be gained by it—would unite all sections and classes in America more effectually than one with any other Power. The reasons for a war, so far as they are external, weigh against France; the feeling, against England. The traditional feeling in America toward England has been the reverse of what it has been toward France. The origin of this anti-English feeling is not wonderful. Next to those portraits of Washington and Lafayette, mentioned by Mr. Jay as hanging side by side in the Hall of Representatives at Washington, may be found several pictures of the American generals and English generals standing in less gentle relations to each other. But the ruscitation and increase of the ill-feeling toward England are due to causes which it may be well to explain, for there have been strong commercial and other reasons why all animosities between the countries should long ago have passed away. The jealousies which existed after the separation of 1782, were such as are often witnessed between parties just near enough to each other to make differences irritating—as the right and left wings, or old and new schools of Churches—but these tend to subside as the parties become more and more set and secure in their respective positions. As a matter of fact these jealousies had almost disappeared, and but few traces of them can be found in the generation that preceded this. The cause of the animosity between the Northern and Southern States was the cause also of the revival of an anti-English feeling in America—Slavery. English Quakers were among the first agitators for emancipation in the Union. The first abolitionist in America—Benjamin Lundy—had by his side Fanny Wright, who established in Tennessee a colony of liberated negroes with the intent of proving that they were fit for freedom. The Anti-Slavery Society, which sprang up in the North, was materially assisted by the English societies; its watchwords were taken from the great anti-slavery leaders of England, and the utterances of Sharpe, Clarkson, Wilberforce, and others, were hurled with tremendous effect against the Southern institution. The Methodists were made to remember that Wesley had pronounced slavery to be "the sum of all villainies;" and everywhere it was held up as a token of the superiority of England that her air was "too pure for a slave to breathe." When the "pro-slavery re-action," as it is termed, set in—that is, when the invention of the cotton-gin (about the first part of this century) had gradually quadrupled the value of slaves, and the Southern politicians began to reverse the verdict of Washington, Jefferson, and Henry against slavery per se—mutterings against "English Abolitionists" began to be heard. The anti-slavery visits, in later times, of William Forster, Joseph Sturge, George Thompson, and other distinguished abolitionists, led to a fierce outcry in the South that her rights and institutions were threatened by "British abolitionists," "British emissaries," and "British gold." The writer can remember when every political gathering in Virginia, his native State, was lashed into fury by the use of these phrases. President Jackson, in a Message to Congress, denounced the interference of "foreign emissaries" with the institution of slavery. Boston, because of its anti-slavery character, was scornfully called "that English city." The pro-slavery re-action gained a complete sway of the Union about twenty years ago; since which time, until 1860, slavery elected every President, and was represented by large though gradually diminishing majorities in Congress. The commercial classes of the North were its violent adherents on account of the immense value of the Southern trade; and if any merchant became tarnished by a suspicion of his pro-slavery soundness, the New York Herald published his name—a proceeding which withdrew all dealings from him, and threatened him with ruin. Thus a vast majority, North and South, came to nourish a deep hostility toward England, for her policy of emancipation in her own colonies, and for her alleged interference with slavery in America. How furious the South was toward England was shown in those disgraceful scenes—not to be reported here—which are said to have attended the attempt of the Prince of Wales to visit Richmond, Virginia, and led to his immediate withdrawal from that city, and a determination to proceed no farther into the Slave States. But meanwhile this feeling had a strong reinforcement. The Irish were thronging to America by thousands, and the Irish vote had become the deciding power in every general election. It is a dreary fact that the Irish elected every American President from 1844 to 1860. To win that Irish vote a political party had simply to take the ground of violent antagonism to England: that sure card the Democratic party had always been willing to play, and the Irish, almost without exception, voted for it and its protégé, Slavery. The denouncers of England in the North were notoriously the leading Democrats, who, for party purposes, fanned the hatred of this country which every Irishman was sure to bring with him to the United States. I have no idea that these demagogues really felt any sympathy with the Irish, or that they knew anything whatever about Ireland or its relations to England, whilst pouring out their invectives against "British Tyranny." The Fenians have, perhaps, by this time learned (if a Fenian can learn anything) how much reality there was in this profuse Democratic sympathy for Ireland; but when it is considered that there are five million Irish haters of England in America, and that to obtain this great electoral power the Democratic party has committed itself to every anti-English policy, it will be seen how vast an addition to the hatred of the enraged pro-slavery men has thus been made in these later years.

In all this time the only section of America that could be called friendly to England was New England, such friendliness having been frequently made the occasion for denouncing that group of States. The leading men of New England—Emerson, Channing, Phillips, Sumner, Garrison, Lowell—had been guests in the best English homes, and had entertained English gentlemen. The youth of the colleges and universities of New England were kindling with enthusiasm for Carlyle, Tennyson, Mill, and the Brownings. Along with her anti-slavery influence there went forth also from New England editions of English books and English modes of thought; and as the country at large was, in the years immediately preceding the war, gradually won to an anti-slavery position, England became, if not generally liked, at least the most respected of foreign nations. The virtues of Queen Victoria were especially a subject of frequent eulogium throughout the North; and everything bade fair to bring about a reaction in the feeling towards the people over whom she ruled. Indeed the welcome given to the Prince of Wales at the time of which I now write, bore witness to the existence of a friendlier spirit regarding "the mother country" than any one would have ventured to predict a few years before. The gradual repression of the anti-English prejudice cost the Republicans of the North a long period of political weakness (for they too might have bid for the Irish vote); it was the result of the laborious diffusion of English literature, and I know that it was esteemed by the reflecting Americans to be a victory for mankind.

The reasons why this friendliness has been of late replaced by indignation and anger, in New England as well as elsewhere, are too well known to require much elucidation here. I am quite sure that if England had known as much about the United States five years ago as she knows now, the present unhappy relations between the two countries could not be subsisting. England sneered at those who had been her friends, who were fighting the last battles of a conflict begun by herself, and gave her sympathies to those who had denounced her for her love of freedom. Not going far enough to do more than repress for a moment the traditional animosity of the South, she went far enough to fill the North with indignant surprise, and has left in both sections a sentiment which might easily find vent in war, if any sufficient object to be gained thereby should present itself. If it were England that had occupied Mexico, war would have been declared against her ere now; hitherto, as I have intimated, whilst the war-interest has pointed to France, the war feeling in America has been toward England. The feeling of anger towards this country is so universal in the United States that I believe it would be impossible to find amongst its public men, or even its literary men, a single exception from it, — unless it be among a few who, having constant personal intercourse with England, know how little any quick generalisations concerning this country, its character, or its feeling, are likely to be correct. A few protests against the very general denunciation of England may have been uttered there, or sent there by Americans resident here; but they have been lost like chips in the rapids of Niagara. I write these things with profound regret; but I think the facts should be known.

There have been many instances in history where such a condition of popular feeling has required the merest pretext to initiate war. In the present case there is something which is already regarded in America as a sufficient occasion for war (were war desirable), and may be presently regarded as an adequate cause for it. The United States has, although so young as a nation, presented more than a score of "claims" against other nations; and in every case, I believe, these claims have been ultimately adjusted to its satisfaction, though now and then refused at first. The late claim upon the English Government for damages committed by the Alabama — for those alone would probably have been insisted upon — meant much more than a pecuniary matter to the Americans. As for the merchants who had suffered losses by Confederate cruisers they were generally men who a few years ago were so patient and resigned when slavery was scuttling human hearts and homes, that many of us smiled with a grim satisfaction at their pathetic emotions when some defenceless sloop with its innocent family of bags and barrels was sent to the bottom. But withal the Alabama was regarded as the palpable symbol of that anti-American sentiment which had appeared at the outbreak of the war — a symbol which not the Kearsage, but England alone, could sink; and the claim for the losses by her signified also a reclamation for wounds rankling in every American heart.

I have no intention of discussing here the case of the Alabama; but the legal case as it stands in the correspondence between Earl Russel and Mr. Adams is so different from the moral case which is at this moment powerfully agitating the American mind, that it seems to me important to mention a few points recently laid by Mr. George Bemis, the eminent jurist of Boston, before his countrymen, which are more likely to poison the future relations between the two countries than any question raised in the diplomatic discussion referred to. This hitherto unwritten, or rather uncollected, chapter in the history of the Alabama is derived from the English Blue Book, and refers to the last two days' stay of that cruiser in British waters, after the Government had decided upon her detention, and after the alleged telegraphic order for her seizure had been sent to the officials of Liverpool.

The Alabama left Laird's dock in Liverpool in July, 1862, under pretence of taking out a pleasure party, and went to sea without ever returning to that port again. The American Minister having called upon

Earl Russell for an explanation of this, wrote home the following as the statement he received at that interview :—

"His lordship first took up the case of the '290' [the name by which the Alabama was first known], and remarked that a delay in determining upon it had most unexpectedly been caused by the sudden development of a malady of the Queen's Advocate, Sir John D. Harding, totally incapacitating him for the transaction of business. This made it necessary to call in other parties, whose opinion had been at last given for the detention of the gunboat, but before the order got down to Liverpool the vessel was gone." *

In the debate on the escape of the Alabama, which occurred in the House of Lords, April 29, 1864, Earl Russell gave this further explanation :—

"The United States Government had no reason to complain of us in that respect [in regard to the escape of the Alabama], because we took all the precaution we could. We collected evidence, but it was not till it was complete that we felt ourselves justified in giving the orders for the seizure of the vessel. These orders, however, were evaded. I can tell your lordship from a trustworthy source how they were evaded." [Earl Russell then proceeded to quote a passage from Fullam's 'Cruise in the Confederate States War Steamer Alabama' (p. 5), of which the last paragraph ran as follows] :—

"Our unceremonious departure [from Liverpool] was owing to the fact of news being received to the effect that the customs authorities had orders to board and detain us that morning."

[Upon which Earl Russell adds] :—

"That was the fact. However the owner came to be informed of it, it is impossible for me to say. There certainly seems to have been treachery on the part of some one furnishing the information."

On the morning of July 29th, 1862, the Alabama put out from the Liverpool docks, having on board several ladies and gentlemen of the family of Mr. John Laird, M. P., and enough of other invited guests to make a show of a pleasure party, and was towed by a steam-tug, the Hercules, to a point fourteen miles from Liverpool. There the party was transferred to the Hercules, and the Commander of the Alabama made an appointment with the Hercules to return to Liverpool and bring a large portion of his crew to Beaumaris Bay, about forty miles distant from the town. The Hercules reached Liverpool on the evening of the 29th, and anchored for the night. (It may be well to remind the reader here that, so early as July 4th, the British Government had promised Mr. Adams that the Custom House officials at Liverpool should keep a strict watch on the movements of the expected Alabama, and report any further information that could be collected concerning her.) The Hercules proceeds to fulfil her errand, but has not completed her shipping of men and warlike equipment until sometime during the morning of the 30th. During the forenoon, some hours before the Hercules starts, the American Consul has placed the following note under the eye of the head of the Custom House :—

"U. S. Consulate, Liverpool,

July 30, 1862.

"Sir, — Referring to my previous communication to you on the subject of the gunboat 'No. 290,' fitted out by Mr. Laird at Birkenhead, I beg now to inform you that she left the Birkenhead dock on Monday night [the 28th], and yesterday morning [the 29th] left the river, accompanied by the steam-tug Hercules. The Hercules returned last evening, and her master stated that the gunboat was cruising off Port Lynas, that she had six guns on board concealed below, and was taking powder from another vessel.

"The Hercules is now alongside the Wood-side landing-stage, taking on board men (forty or fifty), beams, evidently for gun carriages, and other things, to convey down to the gunboat. A quantity of cutlasses was taken on board on Friday last.

"These circumstances all go to confirm the representations heretofore made to you about this vessel, in the face of which I cannot but regret she has been permitted to leave the port, and I report them to you that you may take such steps as you may deem necessary to prevent this flagrant violation of neutrality.

"Respectfully, I am your obedient servant,

"THOMAS H. DUDLEY, Consul.

"The Collector of Customs, Liverpool."

In response to this urgent appeal, Mr. E. Morgan, Surveyor of the Port, seems to have been sent to visit the Hercules. The following is the record of his labours :—

"Copy of a Letter from Mr. E. Morgan, Surveyor, to the Collector, Liverpool.

"Surveyor's Office, 30 July, 1862.

"Sir, — Referring to the steamer built by the Messrs. Laird, which is suspected to be a gunboat intended for some foreign government, —

"I beg to state that since the date of my last report concerning her she has been lying in the Birkenhead docks fitting for sea, and receiving on board coals and provisions for her crew.

"She left the dock on the evening of the 28th instant, anchored for the night in the Mersey, abreast the Canning Dock, and proceeded out of the river on the following morning, ostensibly on a trial trip, from which she has not returned.

"I visited the tug Hercules this morning, as she lay at the landing-stage at Woodside, and strictly examined her holds, and other parts of the vessel. She had nothing of a suspicious character on board — no guns, no ammunition, or anything appertaining thereto. A considerable number of persons, male and female, were on deck, some of whom admitted to me that they were a portion of the crew, and were going to join the 'gunboat.'

"I have only to add that your directions to keep a strict watch on the said vessel have been carried out, and I write in the fullest confidence that she left this port without any part of her armament on board; she had not as much as a single gun or musket.

"It is said that she cruised off Point Lynas 1st night, which, as you are aware, is some fifty miles from this port.

"Very respectfully, (Signed) "E. MORGAN, Surveyor.

The Foreign Enlistment Act says very plainly that every ship "having on board, conveying, carrying, or transporting" any person or persons "enlisted, or who have agreed or been procured to enlist, or who shall be departing from his Majesty's dominions for the purpose or with the intent of enlisting," "shall and may be seized by the Collector," &c., (Stat. 59 George III. c. 69, s. 6). Mr. Morgan says some of the men on the Hercules admitted to him "that they were a portion of the crew, and were going to join the gunboat;" he knows that it is a gunboat, and that it has gone off "ostensibly on a trial trip;" and yet we find the following letter sent to the Commissioners of Customs in London:—

"Custom House, Liverpool, 30th July, 1862.

"Honourable Sirs, — Immediately on receipt of the foregoing communication [not given, or perhaps Consul Dudley's, qu. ?], Mr. Morgan, Surveyor, proceeded on board the Hercules, and I beg to enclose his report, observing that he perceived no beams, such as are alluded to by the American Consul, nor anything on board that would justify further action on my part.

"Respectfully,
(Signed) "S. PRICE EDWARDS."

The following telegram was laid before The Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury on the morning of July 29:—

"Liverpool, 29th July, 1862.
"No. 290."

"Sir, — We telegraphed you this morning that the above vessel was leaving Liverpool. She came out of dock last night, and steamed down the river between 10 and 11 a. m.

"We have reason to believe she has gone to Queenstown.

"Yours obediently,
"DUNCAN, SQUAREY, & BLACKMORE."

Lastly, here is the record of how, when the horse was stolen, the stable-door was locked:—

"Thirty-first July, 1862, at about half-past seven, P. M.

"Telegrams were sent to the Collectors at Liverpool and Cork [at above date] pursuant to Treasury Order, dated 31st July, to seize the gunboat (290) should she be within either of those ports.

"Similar telegrams to the officers at Beaumaris and Holyhead were sent on the morning of the 1st August. They were not sent on the 31st July, the telegraph offices to those districts being closed.

"And on the 2d August a letter was also sent to the Collector at Cork, to detain the vessel should she arrive at Queenstown."

It is noticeable that only on the evening of the 31st of July was any word sent to Queenstown, where, according to the telegram of the 29th, the American agents in Liverpool "have reason to believe she (the Alabama) has gone!" And why was no telegram sent to Point Lynas on the night of the 30th? Three days were lost when all depended upon hours. Nay, there have been cases when England, feeling herself aggrieved by such ships, has — as those who remember the cases of the Terceira and the Heligoland know — pursued and destroyed them even in foreign waters. The feeling was of another kind in this case: the Alabama was followed through English and other waters, but with plaudits.

Now all this is far from pleasant reading to an American. Earl Russell himself, as quoted above, has said that there seems to have been "treachery" in the proceeding. Nay, in "Hansard" for February 16, 1864, he will be found to have classified it as a "belligerent operation," and as "a scandal and in some degree a reproach to British law." Is it wonderful then that the United States should prefer a claim, accompanied by a suggestion of arbitration, for the losses by this cruiser, which for a time swept American ships from the seas? Is it wonderful that it should interpret the refusal to admit the claim or the suggestion as a moral confession of judgment? Is it wonderful that, irrespective of the legal points of the case, Americans should perceive in the above facts the expression of a hostile animus toward her, as yet unalaid, so far as any official act is concerned, and that they should, with their deep sense of wrong, be eager to seize an occasion for retaliation?

The liberation of John Mitchell, at the request of the Fenians, by President Johnson, after he (Mitchell) had rendered himself so especially odious to the people of the United States by his treason, was attended with no popular outcry. It could never have been done had there not been a general feeling of resentment toward England. It is a straw only, but it shows the wind to be setting from a tempestuous quarter.

It may be supposed that the very causes which have operated to alienate the Northern States from England would imply a friendship for her in the South; but besides the old animosity of the South toward England, on account of her influence against slavery, she feels bitterly the sympathy of the English masses for the North, the cold shoulder given to her agents at the English Court, the repeated refusals of the British Government to join France in an intervention, and its refusal of any aid to prevent the South being crushed. Thus every class and section in America has a grievance against England.

There are, indeed, men in that country whose thoughts reach beyond the vexations and passions of the moment, who may be counted on to do what they can to prevent such a dire calamity as a war between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race would be. But the fact may not be concealed that by the refusal to submit the case of the Alabama to arbitration, in the present state of American feeling, the wildest Irishman who would fire a hemisphere to boil his potatoes is made stronger than the most thoughtful statesman. To a point of ministerial dignity—for the dignity of a nation cannot depend upon shielding the blunders of a Cabinet or the "treachery" of its subordinates—it must be ascribed, that the entrance into Parliament of such friends of the United States as Mill, Hughes, and Fawcett, and of Forster into the Government, does not mark the beginning of an era of good-will between the two nations; that the sunken Alabama leaves a brood of her kind to be hatched out by the heat of the next English war, and to resuscitate a semi-barbarous mode of warfare which had seemed about to pass away; and that even this ugly programme is the least disastrous alternative to which the friends of peace can look forward.

JANET'S QUESTIONS.

JANET! my little Janet!

You think me wise I know;
And that when you sit and question,
With your eager face aglow,
I can tell you all you ask me:
My child, it is not so.

I can tell my little Janet
Some things she well may prize;
I could tell her some whose wisdom
Would be foolish in her eyes;
There are things I would not tell her,
They are too sadly wise.

I can tell her of noble treasures
Of wisdom stored of old;
To the chests where they are hidden
I can give her keys of gold;
And as much as she can carry
She may take away untold.

But till her heart is opened,
Like the book upon her knee,
What is written in its pages
She cannot read nor see:
Nor tell till the rose has blossomed
If red or white 'twill be.

And till life's book is opened,
And read through every age,
Come questions, without answers,
Alike from child and sage:
Yet God himself is teaching
His children page by page.

I still am asking questions
With each new leaf I see;
To your new eyes, my Janet,
Yet more revealed may be.
You must ask of God the questions
I fail to answer thee.

— Good Words.

From the Quarterly Review.

A History of Caricature and Grotesque in Literature and Art. By Thomas Wright, Esq.; with Illustrations from various sources, drawn and engraved by F. W. Fairholt, Esq.

AMONG the many contributions which Mr. Thomas Wright has made towards English antiquarian research, and, in particular, towards the familiar delineation of the manners and customs of our ancestors, none is, perhaps, so popular or so well known as his two volumes entitled 'England under the House of Hanover, illustrated from the Caricatures and Satires of the day.' The very spirited woodcuts with which this book is adorned by Mr. Fairholt might alone have sufficed to make its fortune. Published only in 1848, it is already difficult to procure a copy. Encouraged by his success in this line, Mr. Wright has now attempted the wider enterprise announced in this title-page. We fear that in doing so he has been somewhat over ambitious. A history of the 'caricature and grotesque in literature and art,' extending over all countries and all time, comprising not only pictorial representations, but poetry, satire, the drama, and buffoonery of all descriptions, is a subject which, if it be attempted at all in a single octavo volume, could only be so in the form of a compact and well-reasoned essay, to which Mr. Wright's entertaining fragmentary sketches bear little resemblance. The 'immeasurable laughter' of nations, ancient and modern, cannot be reduced within so small a compass. We must therefore content ourselves with thanking Mr. Wright for his desultory but agreeable attempts for our enlightenment. And we propose, on the present occasion, to confine ourselves entirely to the artistic portion of them; enlivened, as it is, by a new series of Mr. Fairholt's excellent illustrations. Our inability to transfer these to our own pages places us, as we feel, at a great disadvantage: many words are required to explain to the reader the contents of a picture, which a few outlines by an able hand impress at once visibly on the recollection. Deprived of this advantage, we must confine ourselves as well as we can to the points on which caricature touches the history of social and political life, rather than those by which it borders on the great domain of Art, properly so called.

'The word caricature is not found in the dictionaries, I believe, until the appearance of that of Dr. Johnson, in 1755. Caricature is, of course, an Italian word, derived from the verb caricare, to charge or load; and therefore it means a picture which is charged or exaggerated. ["Kitratto ridicolo," says Barotti's Dictionary, "in cui fienfi grandemente accresciuti i difetti."] The old French dictionaries say, "c'est la même chose que charge en peinture." The word appears not to have come into use in Italy until the latter half of the seventeenth century, and the earliest instance I know of its employment by an English writer is that quoted by Johnson from the 'Christian Morals' of Sir Thomas Brown, who died in 1682, but it was one of his latest writings, and was not printed till long after his death: "Expose not thyself by fourfooted manners unto monstrous draughts (i. e. drawings) and caricatura representations." This very quaint writer, who had passed some time in Italy, evidently uses it as an exotic word. We find it next employed by the writer of the Essay, No. 537, of the 'Spectator,' who, speaking of the way in which different people are led by feelings of jealousy and prejudice to detract from the characters of others, goes on to say "From all these hands we have such draughts of mankind as are represented in those burlesque pictures which the Italians call caricaturas, where the art consists in preserving amidst distorted proportions and aggravated features, some distinguishing likeness of the person, but in such a manner as to transform the most agreeable beauty into the most odious monster." The word was not fully established in our language in its English form of caricature until late in the last century." — p. 415.

This, no doubt, is a serviceable, artistic definition of the word; but its popular meaning is, perhaps, a little more limited. It would be difficult accurately to distinguish 'caricature' in composition, according to the above description, from what we simply term 'grotesque;' exaggeration, that is, of natural effects for the mere purpose of the ludicrous. In using the word caricature, we generally add to this notion that of satire; and the best definition for our purpose, as well as to suit ordinary apprehension, though not at all originating in the primary meaning of the word, will be, that 'caricature' implies the use of the grotesque for the purpose of satire: satire, of course, of many kinds, individual, moral, political, as the case may be.

Looking at our subject from this point of view, we must never eliminate from it all those amusing details respecting classical 'caricature,' to which Mr. Wright has devoted the first part of his work, and which a clever French writer, M. Champfleury, has just illustrated in a little book, superficial, entertaining, and 'cock-sure of everything,' as the manner of his nation is, entitled 'Histoire de la Caricature Antique.' The ancients were passionately fond of the grotesque: the Greeks intermingled it strangely, but gracefully, with their inimitable creations of beauty: the Romans, after their nature, made it coarse and sensual, where not merely imitative of the Hellenic.

'The discourses of Socrates resemble the pictures of the painter Pauson.' Some one had ordered of Pauson the picture of a horse rolling on the ground. Pauson painted him running. The customer complained that the condition of his order had not been fulfilled. 'Turn the picture upside down,' said the artist, 'and the horse will seem to roll on the ground.' From this moderately facetious anecdote of Lucian; from a passage of Aristotle, in which it is said that 'Polygnotus painted men better than they are; Pauson, worse than they are; Dionysius, such as they are;' and, lastly, from a few lines of Aristophanes, in which some Pauson or other is jeered at for his poverty, assumed to be the lot of Bohemian artists in general; M. Champfleury has arrived at the rapid conclusion, that Pauson was the doyen of all caricaturists. And he vindicates him, eloquently, from the aspersions of the Stagirite. 'Aristotle,' says he, 'preoccupied with the idea of absolute beauty, has not expounded the scope of caricature, and its importance in society. This thinker, plunged in philosophical abstractions, despised as futile an act which nevertheless consoles the people in its sorrows, avenges it on its tyrants, and reproduces, with a satirical pencil, the thoughts of the multitude.'

Pliny the elder, after mentioning the serious compositions of the painter Antiphilus, informs us that 'idem (Antiphilus) jocosomine Gryllus deridiculi habitus pinxit. Unde hoc genus picturæ Grylli vocabantur.' The meaning of this obscure passage—whether Gryllus was a ridiculous personage who had the misfortune to descend to posterity in some too faithful portrait by Antiphilus, or whether Gryllus was a serious personage, perhaps the son of Xenophon and hero of Mantinea, whose portrait was placed by the Athenians in the Ceramicus, whom Antiphilus had the audacity to caricature—has exercised the wits of plenty of antiquaries, and will no doubt give occupation to many more. However, it seems to be from this anecdote of Pliny that grotesque figures engraved on ancient gems have received the name of 'Grylli,' among the curious in modern times. This title has been particularly applied to those which represent figures 'composed of the heads and bodies of different animals capriciously united, so as to form monstrous and chim-erical creatures.' In others, the desired effect is produced, not by these mere fabrications, but by grouping men and animals together in fanciful or ridiculous conjunctions. And these—conceived and executed with a prodigality of imagination amounting in many instances to genius—constitute, perhaps, the favourite, though by no means the only, style of comic art familiar to the classical ancients; one of which the known examples have of late years greatly multiplied, owing to the discoveries of ancient paintings at Pompeii and elsewhere. There is a pretty description of a picture of this sort in the 'Icones' of Philostratus. It represents a 'number of Cupids riding races on swans: one is tightening his golden rein, another loosening it; one dexterously wheeling round the goal: you might fancy that you could hear them encouraging their birds, and threatening and quarrelling with one another, as their very faces represent: one is trying to throw down his neighbour; another has just thrown down his; another is slipping off his steed, in order to bathe himself in the basin of the hippodrome.*'

But, to revert to our original distinction, ancient art, though rich in the grotesque, does not produce on us the effect of caricature; either it has no definite satirical aim, or, if it has such, the satire is lost upon our ignorance. The attempts of antiquaries to explain its productions by giving them a supposed libellous meaning are among the most comical efforts of modern pedantry. A laughable scene on an Etruscan vase, representing a lover climbing a ladder to his mistress's casement, figures, we are told, Jupiter and Alcmena. The capital travesty of Æneas and Anchises as monkeys (Pompeii) is meant to satirise the imitative style of Virgil! The well-known and amusing scene in a painter's studio (ibid.) is 'an allusion to the decadence of art.' A pigmy and a fox (Gregorian Museum) are a philosopher and flatterer. An owl cutting off the head of a cock is Clytemnestra murdering Agamemnon; and a gra-shopper driving a parrot in a char (Herculaneum) is

* The 'Icones' of Flavius Philostratus, a writer of the age of the Flavian Emperors, contain a rhetorical description of a series of pictures which he saw, or feigns himself to have seen, in, a 'stoa,' or colonnaded building, 'of four or five stories,' situated 'in a suburb of the city Neapolis.' The subjects described are partly mythological, partly landscape. Some of them are identical with those of frescoes of Pompeii, overwhelmed at the same period; and the general description of the style of treatment such as to remind the reader closely of those beautiful and singular specimens of the art of a world gone by.

Seneca conducting Nero! Such are a few among the solemn interpretations which modern sagacity has put on these 'capricci, rather than caricatures,' as M. Champfleury truly calls them, with which the spirit of Greek antiquity, as playful as it was daring, loved to decorate the chamber and engrave the gem.

It is painful, and in some degree humiliating, to note the transition from the light and comparatively graceful character of ancient art, even in its comic forms, to the excessive grossness, meanness, and profanity, which characterised the corresponding branch of it in the middle ages in Western Europe. No doubt this change was partly a continuation of that which took place when the brief importation of Grecian models into the West had ceased, and the coarser Roman style succeeded it.

'The transition from antiquity to what we usually understand by the name of the middle ages,' says Mr. Wright, 'was long and slow: it was a period during which much of the texture of the old society was destroyed, while, at the same time, a new life was gradually given to that which remained. We know very little of the comic literature of this period of transition; its literary remains consist chiefly of a mass of heavy theology or of lives of Saints.

The period between antiquity and the middle ages was one of such great and general destruction, that the gulf between ancient and mediæval art seem to us greater and more abrupt than it really was. The want of monuments, no doubt, prevents our seeing the gradual change of the one into the other; but enough, nevertheless, of facts remain to convince us that it was not a sudden change. It is now, indeed, generally understood that the knowledge and practice of the arts and manufactures of the Romans were handed onward from master to pupil after the empire had fallen; and this took place especially in the towns, so that the workmanship, which had been declining in character during the later periods of the Empire, only continued in the course of degradation afterwards. Thus, in the first Christian edifices, the builders who were employed, or at least many of them, must have been pagans; and they would follow their old models of ornamentation, introducing the same grotesque figures, the same masks and monstrous faces, and even sometimes the same subjects from the old mythology, to which they had been accustomed. It is to be observed, also, that this kind of iconographical ornamentation had been encroaching more and more upon the old architectural purity during the latter ages of the Empire, and that it was employed more profusely in the later works, from which this task was transferred to the ecclesiastical and to the domestic architecture of the middle ages. After the architects themselves had become Christians, they still found pagan emblems and figures in their models, and still went on imitating them, sometimes merely copying, and at others turning them to caricature or burlesque. And this tendency continued so long that, at a much later date, where there still existed remains of Roman buildings, the mediæval architects adopted them as models, and did not hesitate to copy the sculpture, although it might be evidently pagan in character. The accompanying cut represents a bracket in the church of Mont Majour, near Nismes, built in the tenth century. The subject is a monstrous head eating a child, and we can hardly doubt that it was really intended for a caricature on Saturn devouring one of his children.' — pp. 40-49.

For our own parts, we should doubt greatly whether the sculptor in question had Saturn in his mind at all, any more than Dante had when he imagined Satan devouring a sinner with each of his three mouths: the illustrations of which passage, in early illuminations and woodcuts, are exactly like the copy in Mr. Wright's work of this Mont Majour sculpture. And generally, we doubt whether Mr. Wright does not attribute to classical recollections too large a share in the production of that monstrous style of art which furnishes our next remarkable chapter in the history of caricature — the Ecclesiastical Grotesque, such as it exhibited itself especially in France, England, and Germany. It has to our minds very distinctive marks of a rougher Northern original. However this may be, there is something humiliating, as we have said, in the degradation of skill and æsthetic perception which is evinced by these relics of generations to which we so often ascribe a peculiarly reverential character. No doubt its elements, so to speak, may be traced in part to some very ordinary propensities of the human mind. It has been said, probably with some truth, that when the most prevailing of all common motives was an intense fear of hell and of evil spirits, the most natural mode of relief, by reaction, was that of turning them into ridicule. And however impossible it may be, to intellects cultivated after the modern fashion, to reconcile these propensities with a strong sense of the majestic and the beautiful, yet we cannot doubt the fact that they were so reconciled. As Dante could intermingle his unique conceptions of supernatural grandeur with minute descriptions of the farcical proceedings of the vilest possible fiends with their pitchforks, so the same artists who produced, or at least ornamented, our cathedrals, with those glorious expressions of thought sublimed at once by the love of beauty and the love of heaven, could furnish them out with the strangest, meanest, often filthiest images which a debased imagination might suggest. Fortunately, age has done so much to veil these debauches of skill with sober indistinctness, that they seldom strike the eye of a casual observer, in a sacred edifice, very offensively. But they lurk everywhere, and in disgusting multitudes; in the elaborate stonework of ceilings, windows, and columns; in battlements, bosses, and corbels; in the wood-carving of stalls, misericords, and often on the lower surface of folding subcellia; while they are equally to be found, strangest of all, where the Donna Inez of Lord Byron's 'Don Juan' found them, in the illuminated pages of missals, destined for purposes of daily devotion. So long as these were confined to mere burlesque, no great harm was done, and certainly none intended.

'The number and variety of such grotesque faces,' says Mr. Wright, 'which we find scattered over the architectural decoration of our old ecclesiastical buildings, are so great that I will not attempt to give any more particular classification of them. All this church decoration was intended especially to produce its effect upon the middle and lower classes, and mediæval art was, perhaps more than anything else, suited to mediæval society, for it belonged to the mass and not to the individual. The man who could enjoy a match at grinning through horse collars, must have been charmed by the grotesque works of the mediæval stone-sculptor and wood-carver; and, we may add, that these display, though often rather rude, a very high degree of skill in art, a great power of producing striking imagery.'—p. 148.

'In all the delineations of demons we have yet seen,' he says elsewhere, 'the ludicrous is the spirit which chiefly predominates; and in no one instance have we had a figure which is really demoniacal. The devils are droll, but not frightful; they provoke laughter, or at least excite a smile, but they create no horror. Indeed, they torment their victims so good-humouredly that we hardly feel for them. There is, however, one well-known instance in which the mediæval artist has shown himself thoroughly successful in representing the features of the spirit of evil. On the parapet of the external gallery of the cathedral church of Notre Dame in Paris, there is a figure in stone, of the ordinary stature of a man, representing the demon, apparently looking with satisfaction upon the inhabitants of the city as they were everywhere indulging in sin and wickedness. The unmixed evil—horrible in its expression in this countenance—is marvellously portrayed. It is an absolute Mephistopheles, carrying in his features a strange mixture of hateful qualities—malice, pride, envy; in fact, all the deadly sins combined in one diabolical whole.'—p. 74.

The goat-like countenance of the archfiend is a common mediæval, as well as modern German, type; but whoever wishes to trace backward the conception of Retsch's Mephistopheles, should look in particular at an ivory carving, in the Maskell collection at the British Museum, of exquisite workmanship, styled the Temptation of Christ, by Christoph Angermair, 1616.

One more instance, and a very striking one, may be mentioned by way of exception to the ordinary meanness and vulgarity which characterise the mediæval representations of the supernatural. It is noticed and engraved by Malcolm, in his 'History of Caricature.' The missal of King Richard II., preserved in the British Museum, is full of grotesque illustrations of the ordinary cast, though beautifully executed. But among them is one of a higher and stranger turn of invention, the exact meaning of which is unknown. It represents the choir of a solemn Gothic chapel. A white monk is celebrating mass at the altar; another lies prostrate before it; ten of the order, seated in their stalls, sing the service. Above these appear, seated in a higher range of stalls, five figures dimly drawn, which on examination appear to be robed skeletons—two with the Papal tiara, two with coronets, one with a cardinal's hat. The effect of the whole is very terrific, after the fashion of the ghostliest conceptions of Jean Paul Richter, and other German masters of the spectral: and calling back to the mind, at the same time, the coincidence of the lines which Shakspeare has put into the mouth of the same monarch—

'For within the hollow crown

That wreathes the mortal temples of a King,
Keeps Death his court: and there the antic sits,
Scoffing his state, and grinning at his pomp.'

But when the prevailing and violent quarrels between different classes of religious persons in the Church perverted the same tendency into a taste for licentious ribaldry—when it was no longer the Devil who was piously laughed at in these compositions, but monks, nuns, hermits, and so forth, who were introduced as symbols of everything degrading—when grotesque, assuming the attitude of satire, turned, according to our suggested distinction, into caricature properly so called—then the practice in question assumed a much darker complexion. The foulest of these representations, and they are only too numerous, can be barely alluded to in a work like Mr. Wright's. An older publication, already noticed, Malcolm's very imperfect 'History of Caricature,' goes into more details respecting them. We will only say that those who enter on the subject had better not carry into the inquiry exaggerated notions respecting the decorum or the piety of the so-called 'Ages of Faith,' lest they should be too abruptly dispelled.

Gradually, and with the progress of enlightenment, a somewhat more serious, though still familiar, mode of dealing with subjects of this description became general; but the change was not so early as has been sometimes supposed, since the stalls of Henry VII.'s chapel at Westminster exhibit some of the very worst of this class of offences against taste and religious feeling. But in the fifteenth century, under the hands of its artists, the supernatural, though still tainted with the grotesque, germinated into the awful. The union of the two may still be traced in that marvellous but perishing series of representations, ranging over all the known and conjectured regions of life and eternity, which decorates the Campo Santo of Pisa—that 'Antechamber of Death,' as the Italians call it. From the same sources of thought arose the profuse crop of 'Dances Macabres,' dances of death, coarsely painted on thousands of cemetery walls, and drawn and engraved by numberless artists, with more or less of spirit; phantasmagorias, in which the love of the horrible was repulsively mixed with that of the ludicrous, but still far less ignoble in taste and character than those early grotesques of ecclesiastical sculpture, to which our attention has been hitherto drawn.

It is refreshing, however, to turn from this disagreeable class of subjects to the few specimens of a freer and healthier turn for the ludicrous, unmixed with profanity, which mediæval art has left us. Probably one of the earliest specimens of English caricature drawing, as distinguished from mere grotesque, is that described by Mr. Wright, as follows:—'It belongs to the Treasury of the Exchequer, and consists of two volumes of vellum, called Liber A and Liber B, forming a register of treaties, marriages, and similar documents of the reign of Edward I. The clerk who was employed in writing it seems to have been, like many of these official clerks, somewhat of a wag, and he has amused himself by drawing in the margin figures of the inhabitants of the provinces of Edward's crown, to which the documents referred. Some of these are plainly designed for caricature.' Two of them are evidently Irishmen, their costume and weapon, the broad axe, exactly answering to the description given of them by Giraldus Cambrensis. Two are Welchmen—ludicrous figures enough, whose dress is equally in accordance with contemporary description, except in one curious particular, which writers have not noticed. The right legs are naked, like those of the German hackbutteers in the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel':—

'Each better knee was bared, to aid
The warrior in the escalade.'

'When the official clerk who wrote this transcript came to documents relating to Gascony, his thoughts wandered naturally enough to its rich vineyards and the wine they supplied so plentifully, and to which, according to old reports, clerks seldom showed any dislike; and accordingly, in the next sketch, we have a Gascon occupied diligently in pruning his vine tree.'

From the sculptured and illuminated religious-grotesque of the Middle Ages to the German and Dutch woodcut-literature of the period of the Reformation, the transition is not a very wide one. The style is pretty similar, the profanity much the same, only a fiercer element has been added by controversial bitterness. Perhaps this class of works may be justly cited, in chronological series, as affording the real commencement of the art of modern political caricature, properly so called. On both sides of the question this method of ridiculing antagonists was most profusely resorted to. The jovial, popular figure of Martin Luther, in particular, formed, as it well might, a very favourite pièce de resistance for pictorial satirists in the old interest to work upon. One cut, preserved by Mr. Wright, 'taken from a contemporary engraving in wood, presents a rather fantastic figure of the demon playing on the bagpipes. The instrument is formed of Luther's head, the pipe through which the devil blows entering his ear, and that through which the music is produced forming an elongation of the reformer's nose. It was a broad intimation that Luther was a mere tool of the evil one, created for the purpose of bringing mischief into the world.'—p. 251. But, continues Mr. Wright, the reformers were more than a match for their opponents in this sort of warfare. Doctor Martin had been identified, for various cogent reasons, with Antichrist:—

'But the reformers had resolved, on what appeared to be much more conclusive evidence, that Antichrist was only emblematical of the papacy: that under this form he had been long dominant on earth, and that the end of his reign was then approaching. A remarkable pamphlet, designed to bring this idea pictorially before the world, was produced from the pencil of Luther's friend, the celebrated painter Lucas Cranach, and appeared in the year 1521, under the title of "The Passionale of Christ and Antichrist." It is a small quarto, each page of which is nearly filled by a woodcut, having a few lines of explanation in German below. The cut to the left represents some incident in the life of Christ, while that facing it to the right gives a contrasting fact in the history of Papal tyranny. Thus, the first cut on the left represents Jesus in His humility, refusing earthly dignities and power, while on the adjoining page we see the Pope, with his cardinals and bishops, supported by his hosts of warriors, his cannon and fortifications, in his temporal dominion over secular princes. On another we have Christ washing the feet of his disciples, and in contrast the Pope compelling the Emperor to kiss his toe. And so on, through a number of illustrations, until at last we come to Christ's ascension into heaven, in contrast with which a troop of demons, of the most varied and singular forms, have seized upon the Papal Antichrist, and are casting him down into the flames of hell, where some of his own monks wait to receive him. — p. 254.

This style of pictorial satire, as the advancing art of wood-engraving began more and more to multiply specimens, attained, as we have said, much popularity in the sixteenth century in Germany, and extended itself from religious to political and purely social subjects. Its latest employment in those regions on a large and popular scale was perhaps during the Thirty Years' War; but the extremity to which that country was reduced by that dreary contest seems to have extinguished its very life. The works of this class, disseminated through broadsides, printed sheets, large illustrated folios and popular duodecimos, are frequently executed with considerable spirit as well as humour. But often, and especially towards the latter portion of the period, they exhibit a strong tendency to become pedantic and allegorical. When the art of caricature, becoming over-learned, addresses itself to particular classes only, and requires a special education in order to make its products understood, it may be safely pronounced in a declining condition.

Perhaps the most successful result of the early woodcut-grotesque was, that it led the way for greater achievements in art; and its influence may be especially traced in the designs of one who deserves, notwithstanding the inferiority of the department which he chose, to rank among the most original as well as powerful of modern artists—the famous Jacques Callot, born at the end of the century, in 1592—a man, as Mr. Wright truly observes, who was destined not only to give a new character to the then recent art of engraving on copper, but also to bring in a new style of ludicrous and fanciful composition. Inimitable, however, as Callot's works are, they belong rather to the class of 'caprices,' or 'extravaganzas,' than of caricature in the sense in which we have used it; for his genius had not the satirical turn, properly speaking: and the same may be said of his most successful copyist, Della Bella, a clever artist, but who never succeeded in equalling his original. The works of Romain de Hooghe, who, brought up in the merely extravagant school of Callot, was extensively employed in producing satirical and emblematic representations of English political events after the Restoration, perhaps serve as the connecting link between the old 'caprice' and the modern political caricature.

The need for pictorial representations to stimulate the political feelings of the public, in times when literature was comparatively scanty, had been of course as keenly felt in England as in other countries; but it was kept in check, through the public contests of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, by the great inferiority of our artists, and particularly our engravers, to those of the Continent. Here and there we meet with striking exceptions. The woodcuts to the first edition of 'Fox's Martyrs' contain, among the fearful scenes which they generally represent, caricature likenesses of Gardiner, Bonner, and other well-known personages of the time, and are singularly powerful in execution. But the like of these are very few. One odd illustration, perhaps, of the need felt for these pictorial representations, and the defectiveness of the ordinary means for supplying it, is to be found in the peculiar taste of that age for employing elaborate devices on banners borne in procession or carried in the field, in order to stimulate the ardour of partisans. It will be remembered how the Scottish Protestant lords took the field against Queen Mary with (among others) a great standard, on which the catastrophe of the Kirk of Field was represented, with the figure of Darnley lying on the ground, and the words 'Judge and revenge my cause, O Lord.' In the Great Rebellion such standards were abundantly used, chiefly on the Royalist side, with devices both serious and of the caricature order. Here is an example of the latter, taken by the Roundheads at Marston Moor, described by Rushworth:—

'A yellow coronet: in its middle a lion couchant, and behind him a mastiff seeming to snatch at him, and in a label from his mouth written, Kimbolton: at his feet little beagles, and before their mouths written, Pym, Pym, Pym: and out of the lion's mouth these words proceeding, Quousque tandem abutere patientiâ nostrâ?'

Another curious vehicle of political caricature in England, in the seventeenth century, generally of very inferior order, was that of playing-cards. 'The earliest of these packs of cards known,' says Mr. Wright, is one which appears to have been published at the very moment of the restoration of Charles II., and which was perhaps engraved in Holland. It contains a series of caricatures on the principal acts of the commonwealth, and on the parliamentary leaders.' The ace of diamonds, for instance, represents 'The High Court of Justice, or Oliver's Slaughterhouse.' Among other packs of a similar character which have been preserved, one relates to the Popish Plot, another to the Ryehouse Conspiracy (published in Holland), another to the South Sea Bubble.

Romain de Hooghe, already mentioned as a follower of Callot, became, together with others of his countrymen, as we have seen, the great exponent of English political satires during the events of the last Stuart reigns. Their productions must have been widely circulated in England; and, in fact, superseded in public estimation the very inferior articles of domestic manufacture. This period of Dutch supremacy among us may be said to have continued down to the date of the South Sea Bubble aforesaid—'the time,' says Mr. Wright, 'in which caricatures began to be common in England; for they had been before published at rare intervals, and partook so much of the character of emblems that they are not easily understood.' The earliest of these, and the best, were of Dutch manufacture, yet these were negligently executed. 'So little point is there often in these caricatures, and so great appears to have been the call for them in Holland, that people seem to have looked up old engravings destined originally for a totally different purpose, and, adding new inscriptions and new explanations, they were published as caricatures on the Bubble.*

* House of Hanover, i. 71.

English specimens of art, at first few and far between, began to make their way into favour among these foreign importations; and it is just at this period (the reign of George I.) that we find them first exhibiting the well-known advertisements, 'Printed for Carington Bowles, next the Chapter House in St. Paul's Church Yard, London,'—a house famous in the same line for full a century afterwards.

'It was a defect of the earlier publications of this class,' says Mr. Wright in his earlier work, 'that they partook more of an emblematical character than of what we now understand by the term "caricature." Even Hogarth, when he turned his hand to politics, could not shake off his old prejudice on this subject; and it would be difficult to point out worse examples than the two celebrated publications which drew upon him so much popular odium, "The Times." The reader will easily understand the distinction, though it cannot of course be traced out with absolute accuracy in comparing different pieces. A design, for example, in which political characters are represented under the guise of various animals, is generally emblematic or symbolical in character. This is a simple instance; but the symbolism is often complicated, and not easy of comprehension. Hence a necessity for long letterpress explanations in the form of labels issuing from the mouths of the characters, or otherwise—a device showing inferiority of skill. The most effective caricature explains itself, and exhibits point instead of allegory. The favourite plates of the first part of the Georgian era, which appeared periodically, about 1740, styled 'The Series of European State Jockies,' and so forth, were compositions of many figures, as hieroglyphical as the frontispiece to a prophetic almanac. The gradual way in which English comic art became emancipated from this somewhat pedantic mould may be illustrated by a later instance, out of Gillray's works. Charles Fox was represented by the caricaturists of his youth with a fox's head, as his father, Lord Holland, had almost invariably been before him. And so he is in one or two of Gillray's first prints. But Gillray almost immediately abandoned the old usage, and gave the patriot his own burly physiognomy. The gradual passage from the emblematic to the simply satirical completes the establishment of the modern English school of caricature.

The nature of the change cannot be better exemplified than by reference to a piece which had prodigious vogue in its day, and is repeatedly mentioned with interest by Horace Walpole and other contemporaries. Copies of it are still common in collections: we have seen it even converted into the mounting of a lady's fan. This is headed 'The Motion, 1741,' and commemorates the failure of a famous attempt to upset Sir Robert Walpole's government. The background represents Whitehall, the Treasury, and the adjoining buildings as they then stood. (The spectator is looking down Whitehall from a point nearly opposite the modern Admiralty: to his left is a dead wall along the east side of the street, behind it private buildings, Scotland Yard, &c., extending as far as the Banqueting House; in front, the gateway over the entrance of what is now Parliament Street, with the inscription 'Treasury'.)

'Lord Carteret, in the coach, is driven toward the Treasury by the Duke of Argyll as coachman, with the Earl of Chesterfield as postilion, who, in their haste, are overturning the vehicle; and Lord Carteret cries "Let me get out!" The Duke brandishes a wavy sword, instead of a whip; and between his legs the heartless changeling, Bubb Dodington, sits in the form of a spaniel. . . . Lord Cobham holds firmly by the straps behind, as footman; while Lord Lyttelton follows on horseback, characterised equally by his own lean form, and that of the animal on which he strides. . . . In front, Pulteney, drawing his partisans by the noses, and wheeling a barrow laden with the writings of the Opposition, the Champion, the Craftsman, Common Sense, &c., exclaims, "Zounds, they're ours!"'

This once famous squib affords, as we have said, a good exemplification of the passage from the old and formal to the modern style of political caricature. It bears strongly the type of Dutch origin, but without the carefulness of Dutch execution. The idea is clever and suggestive, but the workmanship at once artificial and feeble. The likenesses were no doubt sufficiently good to amuse the public of that day; Horace Walpole calls them 'admirable;' but they are inexpressive. The wavy sword, a relic of the emblematic school, is a clumsy piece of allegory, spoiling the realism of the piece; and so is the figure of Pulteney, leading the Tory squires by cords passed through their noses. The only fun in the composition is to be found in the figures of Bubb Dodington as a spaniel, and Lord Lyttelton on horseback — 'so long, so lean, so lank, so bony,' as described in the verses accompanying the print, which are wittier than the print itself. Its great success, however, was evinced by the numerous rival works of art of both political colours which it called forth, 'the Reason,' 'the Motive,' 'the Grounds,' &c. It may perhaps be said with truth to be the prototype of that whole class of pictorial satires, great favourites with Englishmen, in which the small revolutions of ministries and oppositions are travestied as scenes of popular life.

We need not delay over the other innumerable caricatures of the same reign; they are generally very ignoble ones; but the comparative novelty of the fashion in England rendered them extremely popular, and there was a kind of frank jollity predominant in the English body corporate just at that epoch — the epoch, as Hallam satisfied himself, of the maximum of physical well-being to be traced in our history among the mass of the people — which peculiarly suited this development of broad national humour. One or two specimens may detain for a moment the eyes of those who turn them over, rare as they have now generally become, in the collection at the British Museum, or in that far more valuable one amassed in many a year of busy collectorship by Mr. Hawkins, formerly of that establishment. There is a wild force in the very rough execution of the print on the original broadside of Glover's famous ballad, 'Hosier's Ghost,' in which the spirits of 'English captains brave,' really form a very spectral crew. Another may be noted for the quiet savageness of its insult to Lord George Sackville: it is entitled, 'A Design for a Monument to General Wolfe (1760), or, a Living Dog better than a Dead Lion.' The dead lion reclines below a bust of this hero: the living dog at his side is a greyhound, and on his collar is the word 'Minden.' And, lastly, one more, for the very oddity of the conception: 'Our late Prime Minister,' 1743. It is simply the jolly face of Sir Robert Walpole, without any accessories whatever, thrown back as against a pillow, and the jaws relaxed into a most contagious yawn, with the words, 'Lo, what are all your schemes come to?' and the lines from the Dunciad: —

'Ev'n Palinurus nodded at the helm
The vapour mild o'er each Committee crept,
Unfinished treaties in each office slept,
And chiefless armies dozed out the campaign,
And navies yawned for orders on the main.'

We cannot, however, pass over the period of George II. without noticing that it seems to us to be the first in which that much enduring animal, the British lion, figures extensively as a popular character. As yet, people's eyes were not open to his ludicrous side, and artists accordingly made free with him in every variety of emblematic action. We have him roaring with indignation at the misdeeds of various Ministers; 'hocussed' apparently, and with the Spaniard paring his claws, in allusion to the matter of Jenkins's ears: frightening the Gallic cock, defending the Austrian eagle, led passive in a leash by the Duke of Newcastle; and, lastly, 'embracing George II.' (1745), to the discomfiture of the Pope and Pretender, who exclaim: 'We shall never be a match for George while that lion stands by him!'

* House of Hanover, I. 179.

Some of the names of the hack caricaturists of this epoch are preserved by Mr. Wright; most of them of as little notoriety as merit. Among them, however, are some amateurs of social position; and one dame of quality—a Countess of Burlington. 'She was the lady of the Earl who built Burlington House in Piccadilly; was the leader of one of the factions in the Opera disputes at the close of the reign of George I.; and is understood to have designed the well-known caricature upon Cuzzoni, Farinelli, and Heidegger, which was etched by Guppy, whom she patronised.'

Such were the very undistinguished characteristics and history of English art in the grotesque and comic line, when the appearance of Hogarth on the stage marked an entirely new epoch in its history. It would be superfluous here to recapitulate the details of the life or achievements of our great domestic painter; the more so, as his powers in the line of caricature, properly so called, though very great, were subordinate to his far higher merits as a painter of 'genre,' as the French phrase it, a delineator of popular scenes and incidents into which the humorous only entered as an ingredient, although a very important one. As a political caricaturist poor Hogarth made a fatal mistake: he took the wrong side:—

'It appears evident,' says Mr. Wright, 'that before this time (October, 1760) Hogarth had gained the favour of Lord Bute, who, by his interest with the Princess of Wales, was all powerful in the household of the young Prince. The painter had hitherto kept tolerably clear of politics in his prints, but now, unluckily for himself, he suddenly rushed into the arena of political caricature. It was generally said that Hogarth's object was, by displaying his zeal in the cause of his patron, to obtain an increase of his pension; and he acknowledges himself that his object was gain. "This," he says, "being a period when war abroad and contention at home engrossed every one's mind, prints were thrown in the background; and the stagnation rendered it necessary that I should do some timed thing to recover my lost time, and stop a gap in my income." Accordingly he determined to attack the great minister Pitt, who had recently been compelled to resign his office, and had gone over to the opposition. It is said that John Wilkes, who had previously been Hogarth's friend, having been privately informed of his design, went to the painter, expostulated with him, and, as he continued obstinate, threatened retaliation.'

'The Times, No. 1,' was the first fruit of Hogarth's unlucky fit of loyalty; a labour-ed emblematic print, after the older fashion, to the glory of Lord Bute and discredit of Pitt. Wilkes attacked the artist in the 'North Briton'; Hogarth retorted—only too successfully—in this admirable print of Wilkes with the cap of liberty: 'eventu-que impalluit ipse secundo,' for Wilkes, with all his apparent fun and bonhomie, was a deadly enemy. The nettled patriot brought his friend Churchill, and a host more of libellers in letterpress and in copperplate, on the back of his unfortunate assailant:—

'Parodies on his own works, sneers at his personal appearance and manners, reflections upon his character, were all embodied in prints which bore such names as Hogg-ass, Hogzart, O'Garth, &c. . . . The article by Wilkes in the "North Briton," and Churchill's metrical epistle, irritated Hogarth more than the hostile caricatures, and were generally believed to have broken his heart. He died on the 26th of October, 1764, little more than a year after the appearance of the attack by Wilkes, and with the taunts of his political as well as his professional enemies still ringing in his ears.'—pp. 446-449.

Hogarth left no school of followers; his genius was of too independent and peculiar an order to admit of this. Perhaps the nearest to him was Paul Sanby; described by Mr. Wright as 'one of those rising artists who were offended by the sneering terms in which Hogarth spoke of all artists but himself, and foremost among those who turned their satire against him.' Sanby was one of the original members of the Royal Academy, and is best known as a topographical draughtsman; but Mr. Wright terms him the father of water-colour art in England. As a caricaturist he led the attack against Lord Bute and the Princess Dowager, as well as against Hogarth; his sketch of the two Scotchmen travelling to London on a witch's broomstick, with the inscription, 'the land before them is as the Garden of Eden, and behind them a desolate wilderness,' is one of the best of the witticisms provoked by the miso-Caledonian movement of that day.

We cannot quite agree with Mr. Wright when he says that, 'with the overthrow of Bute's Ministry (1763) we may consider the English school of caricaturists as completely formed and fully established.' On the contrary, it seems to us, from such collections as we have examined, that the political branch of the art was at a particularly low standard for nearly twenty years after that event. The American war produced very little amusement of this kind; it was an affair into which the nation entered with a dogged and reluctant seriousness: and Washington and Franklin, Silas Deane and John Adams, afforded but drab-coloured subjects for the facetious limner. Social topics were just then much more in vogue; the extravagances in dress of the Macaronies and high-flying ladies of the day (the acme of absurdity, in modern costume, was certainly reached in the years 1770-1780), the humours of Vauxhall, and Mrs. Cornely's masquerades, diverted men's minds from the bitter disappointment of a contest in which nothing was to be gained either by persevering or giving way.* Perhaps the best specimen of the pictorial humour of that time was to be found, not in the shop window prints, but in the pages of the numerous magazines; some of these never appeared without an illustration or two of the jocose order, like the comic newspapers of our time. But when the incubus of the American war was removed, and domestic faction reappeared on the stage in all its pristine vivacity, the simultaneous appearance of the 'Rolliad' and its fellow satires in literature, and of Gillray and his fellow-workmen in art, heralded the advent of a new era.

We must hasten to him whom Mr. Wright terms, with perfect justice in our opinion, 'the greatest of English caricaturists, and perhaps of all caricaturists of modern times whose works are known — James Gillray.'

His father was an out-pensioner of Chelsea Hospital, and sexton of the Moravian burial-ground at Chelsea, where the caricaturist was born in 1757. Belonging by his origin, and still more by his loose and Bohemian habits, to a very ordinary sphere of life, it is certainly singular that he should have acquired such a close observation and intimate knowledge of events as they occurred, not only in the political, but in the fashionable world. His great sources of information were, no doubt, the newspapers; but occasionally he seems even to have anticipated the newspapers; more than one court scandal and state intrigue seems to have been blazoned first to public notice in the well-known shop windows of Humphreys or of Fores, always crowded with loiterers as soon as one of Gillray's novelties appeared. It is no doubt true, and affords a curious subject of speculation to any one who may think the inquiry worth pursuing, that, when Gillray's fame was established, many an amateur of the higher circles seems to have assisted him, not merely in furnishing hints, but also sketches, which Gillray etched and sold for his own profit. Some of his best caricatures, if we are not mistaken, are from outlines supplied by Bunbury, others were composed by Brownlow North. But these are exceptions only, and do not invalidate the general proposition as to the singularity of the circumstance that this drunken son of a sexton was for many years the pictorial Aristophanes of his day, and aided, at least, by those who were behind the scenes, of much which took place in the inner recesses of high life.

His fame as a political caricaturist was first established by his burlesque prints on Rodney's victory (1782). The rueful figure of the unlucky French admiral De Grasse, in one of them, is among the most characteristic of his performances. As we have said, it was some time before he thoroughly emancipated himself from the allegorical style; and another peculiarity of inferior artists haunted him a long time, the fashion, namely, of overloading his compositions with quantities of letter-press, oratorical or jocose, proceeding from the mouths of his characters, as if his pencil had not been fully powerful enough to speak for itself. He rushed with an energy all his own into the war of squibs which succeeded the Fox and North coalition, and then conceived those ideals of the leading patriot, and of his friend Burke, which he afterwards rendered popular in every corner of the kingdom by a thousand repetitions. A very admirable series of sketches, however, of these two

* In one of the caricatures of this period (reproduced by Mr. Wright in his former work) Lord Sandwich is represented with a bat in his hand, in allusion, we are told, to his fondness for cricket; but it is a curved piece of wood, much more resembling that with which golf is played. And the same peculiarly shaped instrument is put into the hand of a cricket-loving lady in a print of 1778 (Miss Wicket and Miss Trigger). What is the date of the bat now used?

and Lord North, as 'War, Peace, and Neither War nor Peace,' portraits scarcely touched with grotesque, though in skilfully exaggerated attitudes, commonly inserted in the bound volumes of Gillray's works, is, we are satisfied, not his; it bears much more the appearance of Sayer's workmanship. Fox and his personal following were peculiarly the objects of Gillray's aversion; and, not many years later than this, the unhappy circumstances of the Prince of Wales's matrimonial career provoked him into a series of the most popular, daring, and spirited of all his works; some of which, however, it is not easy in our decent age to indicate even by reference, though they seem to have been exposed without scandal in the most frequented thoroughfares of London. Gillray, however, was 'not a hired libeller,' says Mr. Wright, 'like Sayer and some other of the lower caricaturists of that time: he evidently chose his subjects in some degree independently, as those which offered him the best mark for ridicule; and he had so little respect for the ministers or the court, that they all felt his satire in turn.' After exhausting his power of pictorial invention against the heir apparent, he found a still more congenial subject of satire in the peculiarities of his Majesty George III. himself. Here, however, personal spite is said to have given the inducement.

'According to a story which seems to be authentic, Gillray's dislike of the King was embittered by an incident somewhat similar to that by which George II. had provoked the anger of Hogarth. Gillray had visited France, Flanders, and Holland, and he had made sketches, a few of which he had engraved. He accompanied the painter Louthembourg, who had left his native city of Strasburg to settle in England, and became the King's favourite artist, to assist him in making groups for his great painting of the 'Siege of Valenciennes,' Gillray sketching groups of figures while Louthembourg drew the landscapes and buildings. After their return, the King expressed a desire to see these sketches, and they were placed before him. Louthembourg's landscapes and buildings were plain drawings, and easy to understand, and the King expressed himself greatly pleased with them. But the King's mind was already prejudiced against Gillray for his satirical prints: and when he saw his hasty and rough, though spirited sketches of the French soldiers, he threw them aside contemptuously with the remark, "I don't understand these caricature fellows." Perhaps the very word he used was intended as a snarl upon Gillray, who, we are told, felt the affront deeply, and he proceeded to retort by a caricature which struck at once at one of the King's vanities, and at his political prejudices. George III. imagined himself a great connoisseur in the Fine Arts, and the caricature was entitled "a connoisseur examining a Cooper." It represented the King looking at the celebrated miniature of Oliver Cromwell, by the English painter, Samuel Cooper. When Gillray had completed this print, he is said to have exclaimed, "I wonder if the Royal connoisseur will understand this!" It was published on the 18th of June, 1792, and cannot have failed to produce sensation at that period of revolutions. The King is made to exhibit a strange mixture of alarm with astonishment in contemplating the features of this great overthrower of kingly power, at a moment when all kingly power was threatened. It will be remarked, too, that the satirist has not overlooked the royal character for domestic economy; the King is looking at the picture by the light of a candle end stuck on a save-all.'

If there is any truth in the story, certainly never was artist's revenge more complete. The homely features of the poor old king — his prominent eyes, light eyebrows, protruding lips, his shuffling walk, his gaze of eager yet vacant curiosity — are even now better known to us through Gillray's caricatures than through anything which the Muses of painting and sculpture, in their serious moods, could effect for him or against him. Gillray's etchings, and Peter Pindar's verses, were for years among the minor plagues of royalty. Not, indeed, in the estimation of the stout-hearted monarch himself, as impervious to ridicule as to argument whenever he thought himself in the right; no man in his dominions laughed more regularly at each new caricature of Gillray than he; and a whole set, inscribed 'for the king,' forwarded to him as they came out, is said to be preserved at Windsor. But they were more keenly felt by his little knot of attached courtiers, and also by sober-minded people in general, seriously apprehensive, in those inflammable times, of anything which might throw ridicule on the Crown. One of the coarsest and most powerful, and which is said to have given especial offence at head-quarters, is that which represents Queen Charlotte as Milton's Sin, between Pitt as Death and Thurlow as the Devil. Others, of less virulence, such as 'Affability,' or the King and the Ploughman; the 'Lesson in Apple Dumplings,' the conjugal breakfast scene, where George is toasting muffins, and Charlotte frying sprats; the 'Anti-Saccharites,' where the Royal pair are endeavouring to coax the reluctant princesses (charming figures) to take their tea without sugar, — these, and numbers more, held up the Royal peculiarities, especially the alleged stinginess of the Court, in a manner in which the usual coarseness of the execution rather tended to heighten the exceeding force and humour of the satire.

But when this country became seriously involved in hostilities with France, republican, and afterwards imperial, a change came over the spirit of Gillray's satire. Thenceforth he gradually ceased his attacks, not only on the Royal family, but on domestic objects of railery in general, and applied himself almost exclusively to sharpening the national spirit of hostility against the foreign enemy. His caricatures against the French are those by which he is best known, especially abroad, and occupy the greatest space in his works. This was, no doubt, the popular line to take, and Gillray worked for money; but it would be doing great injustice to the poor caricaturist's memory to suppose that money was his main object. The son of the old pensioner was full of the popular instincts of his class. It was not the French revolution or conquests that he opposed; it was the French themselves, whom he hated with all the vehemence of a Nelson or a Windham. These later compositions of his are, indeed, marvellous performances. But they are so rather from the intensity of imaginative fury with which they are animated, than from the ordinary qualities of the caricaturist.

They are comparatively destitute of his old humour and fun. 'Not that he had outgrown these. His few domestic caricatures are still full of them; such are those on 'All the Talents' (1806), one of which, the 'Funeral of Baron Broadbottom,' is among the most comic of all his productions. The last survivor of its procession of mourners, the late Marquis of Lansdowne, has now been dead for some years; the features of the remainder are quite unfamiliar to this generation; and yet it is scarcely possible to look at it even now without a smile, such as we bestow on the efforts of our coteremporaries Leech or Doyle. But when Gillray tried his vein on a French subject, he passed at once from the humorous to the grotesque, and thence to the hideous and terrible. One of his eccentric powers, amounting certainly to genius, comes out strongly in these later caricatures; that of bringing together an enormous number of faces, distorted into every variety of grimace, and yet preserving a wonderfully human expression. We would signalise particularly two, one almost tragical, the 'Apotheosis of Hoche'; one farcical, the 'Westminster Election' (1804). The tendency to the wild and extravagant now grew on him. Doubtless it was sharpened by the effect on his brain of constant potations, which gradually brought on delirium tremens. His latest art-debauches — if such we may term them — have often a touch of phantasmagoric-pictorial nightmare, like those of Callot, Teniers, and Höllenbreughel. His last drawing is preserved in the British Museum, executed when he was quite out of his mind — a madman's attempt at a portrait, said to be that of Mr. Humphreys, the printseller. He died in 1815; and the inscription 'Here lies James Gillray, the caricaturist,' marks, or lately marked, the spot of his interment in the Broadway, Westminster. His works, once so popular, had fallen so much in fashion a few years ago that the plates were about to be sold for old copper, when they were rescued by Mr. J. H. Bohn, the publisher, who gave to the public those now well-known re-impressions which have procured for the artist a new lease of fame.

Gillray was the Rubens of caricature, and the comparison is really one which does no injustice to the inspired Fleming. The life-like realism of the Englishman's boldly-rounded, muscular figures, and the strong expression communicated to them by a few strokes of the pencil, are such as Antwerp in all her pride might not disdain. Any one who has studied some of Rubens's crowds of nude figures which approach nearest to the order of caricature — his sketches of the 'Last Judgment,' for instance, in the Munich Gallery — will appreciate the justice of the parallel. Gillray was undoubtedly coarse to excess, both in conception and execution; so much so, as to render his works mere objects of disgust to many educated in the gentler modern school. But there are also numbers of a taste more refined than catholic, who disclaim all admiration for Rubens on the very same grounds. And one quality Gillray possessed which was apparently discordant from his ordinary character. Many of his delineations of female beauty are singularly successful, and he seems to have dwelt on them with special pleasure, for the sake of the contrast with his usual disfigurements of humanity. His heroines are certainly not sylphs, but they often are, like the celestials of Rubens, uncommonly fine women. Let us refer to a few well-known instances only; such as his representations of Mrs. Fitzherbert at her best time, notwithstanding the prominence of the aquiline feature, which it was his business to enhance; of George III.'s daughters in the 'Anti-Saccharites,' and other prints; the Duchess of Richmond as the 'Height of Fashion'; the charming seated figure entitled 'Modern Elegance,' 1795 (said to be Lady Charlotte Campbell, but is it not an older person?), in which, though the costume is playfully exaggerated, the features are finely drawn; the beauty (evidently a portrait also) who is reading Monk Lewis's 'Tales of Wonder' to a bevy of very homely gossips (1802); and even the common ball-room figures in 'A Broad Hint of not meaning to Dance' (1804), in which, however, the design is Brownlow North's.

Still, we fear that Gillray must be generally comprehended in the somewhat audacious assertion of M. Champfleury, that 'satirists, from Molière down to Prudhon, only recognise two conditions for women — those of courtesan and housewife.' It will be seen that several of our instances are taken from what may be termed social, in contradistinction to political, caricatures, many of which are quite equally worthy of the master, although not those on which his popularity mainly rests. They are often of a libellous boldness, inconceivable now-a-days, and equally so in earlier times; for the generation to which Gillray belonged stood out in bad pre-eminence among all others in English domestic history in respect of this particular kind of coarseness — a generation which could see exposed in the shop-windows such shameless pictorial satires as those directed against Lady Archer, and other dames of gambling celebrity; or the representation of the dashing daughters of a countess as the 'Three Graces in a High Wind'; or of a titled beauty nursing her infant in a ball-dress, as the 'Fashionable Mamma'; or of Lady Cecilia Johnston, an inoffensive lady, of unobtrusive style as well as character, against whom it is said the artist had conceived some grudge, which induced him spitefully to represent her in all manner of ludicrous situations. Others of this class, it may be added, related to darker scandals behind the scenes, and may not now be met with in the ordinary collections of Gillray's works, though they excited little comment, and no disgust, in his day. To pass again, for one moment only, from Gillray's merit as an artist, to his specialty as a caricaturist; his strong power of seizing likenesses, and giving them a ludicrous expression, was, no doubt, the chief element of his popularity. In this he surpassed all his predecessors, though he has been equalled by one or two of his successors. But in one bye-quality we are inclined to think him unrivalled: the faculty of giving by a few touches a kind of double expression to a countenance; cowardice underlying bravado; impudence, affected, modesty. See, as a specimen, the exceedingly comic representation of Addington and Napoleon, sword in hand, daring each other to cross the Channel which flows between them. A single figure of Burke as an 'Uniform Whig' (1791), admirably drawn in other respects, conveys much of this mingled meaning, though not quite so easily decipherable. The sage is leaning against a statue of George III.; he holds in one hand Burke's 'Thoughts on the Revolution,' in the other a cap of liberty; the motto, 'I preserve my consistency, by varying my means to secure the unity of my end.' The caricaturist's experience had attained for once to 'something like prophetic strain.' His facility of execution was wonderful. It must, no doubt, be added, as a natural qualification of such praise, that his drawing is often incorrect and careless in the extreme, even after all allowance for what we have never seen fully explained, the vast difference, in point of excellence, between various copies of what is apparently the same print. He is said 'to have etched his ideas at once upon the copper, without making a previous drawing, his only guides being sketches of the distinguished characters he intended to produce, made on small pieces of card, which he always carried about with him.'

Of Rowlandson (born 1756, died 1827), Mr. Wright speaks in high terms of praise, saying that he 'doubtless stands second to Gillray, and may, in some respects, be considered as his equal. . . . He was distinguished by a remarkable versatility of talent, by a great fecundity of imagination, and by a skill in grouping quite equal to that of Gillray, and with a singular ease in forming his groups of a great variety of figures. It has been remarked, too, that no artist ever possessed the power of Rowlandson of expressing so much with so little effort.' We are sorry that we cannot, for our own parts, subscribe to these eulogies. As a political caricaturist — to which line he resorted as a matter of trade, espousing the Whig side as others did the Tory — he seems to us dull enough. In general subjects he succeeded better, yet appears to us endowed with all Gillray's coarseness, but with little of his satirical power and none of his artistic genius.

James Sayer, coteremporary with these two as an artist, deserves mention as possessed of a certain amount of original talent, though not of a very high order. He was 'a bad draughtsman,' says Mr. Wright —surely too sweeping a criticism—‘and his pictures are produced more by labour than by skill in drawing, but they possess a considerable amount of humour.’ His likenesses, generally produced by a small number of hard and carefully-executed lines, seem to us of great merit as such, though wanting in life and energy. He was almost exclusively a political caricaturist, and, unlike the reckless but independent Gillray, he turned his talents to good account, devoting himself to the cause of Pitt, who bestowed on him in return the ‘not un lucrative offices of Marshal of the Court of Exchequer, Receiver of the Sixpenny Dues, and Cursitor.’ His most famous production was the well-known ‘Carlo Khan’s Triumphant Entry into Leadenhall-street’ (on the occasion of Fox’s India Bill, 1783), still common in collections. But this succeeded chiefly because it fell in with the humour of the time; though the idea is good, the execution is cold, and it is encumbered with symbolical accessories, after the older fashion which we have described. Among his minor works, an unfinished proof of Boswell, Mrs. Piozzi, and others of the Johnsonian clique, with the ghost of the Doctor himself scowling at them from above, exhibits a good deal of his peculiar laborious talent.

Our catalogue of cotemporaries would hardly be complete without including in it the clever and goodhumoured amateur Henry Bunbury, though no dabbler in State affairs, like Gillray and Sayer. Bunbury had (as Mr. Wright says) ‘little taste for political caricature, and seldom meddled with it. He preferred scenes of social life and humorous incidents of cotemporary manners, fashionable or popular.’ It may be added that he does not seem to have often inserted portraits in his pieces. He was rather the forerunner of the modern French school of grotesque artists ‘de genre,’ of whom we shall have a word to say presently. His drawing, says Mr. Wright, ‘was often bold and good, but he had little skill in etching.’ After some early essays in that line, ‘his designs were engraved by various persons, and his own style was sometimes modified in this process.’ We have ourselves seen original drawings by his hand, very superior both in force and refinement to the coarse style of the ordinary plates which bear his name. Perhaps the best known and most ludicrous of his compositions are his illustrations of ‘Geoffrey Gambado’s Art of Horsemanship.’ Bunbury was brother to the baronet who married Lady Sarah Lennox, and himself husband of one of Goldsmith’s favourite Miss Hornecks. He died in 1811, the date of his last work, ‘A Barber’s Shop in Assize Time,’ engraved by Gillray.

Passing over Isaac Cruikshank—a very prolific artist of the same period with Gillray, of whom he was a pretty close imitator—we arrive at his illustrious son George, who still survives to connect our era with the last. He is now almost forgotten as a political caricaturist, in which line he embarked, fifty years ago, under the auspices of his father, but soon abandoned it to achieve his peculiar and unique celebrity as an etcher of small figures, chiefly in the way of illustrations to letterpress, in which humour and the most exquisite appreciation of the ludicrous alternate with beauty and pathos of no common order. ‘The ambition of George Cruikshank,’ says Mr. Wright, ‘was to draw what Hogarth called moral comedies, pictures of society through a series of acts and scenes, always pointed with some great moral; and it must be confessed that he has, through a long career, succeeded admirably.’ Every one is aware of the zeal with which the amiable artist has devoted himself to promote the public good by this employment of his brain, of which an amusing illustration is furnished by the current story—for the truth of which, however, we will by no means vouch—that he insisted on formally presenting his ‘Drunkard’s Progress’ to her Majesty! And yet, to our taste, George Cruikshank’s most ambitious attempts in this line are scarcely equal to the trifling productions which he has now and then thrown off in mere exuberance of genius and animal spirits. The first edition of a little book, entitled ‘German Popular Stories,’ which appeared in 1834 (the letterpress was by the late Mr. Jardine), contains, on the minutest possible scale, some of the most perfect gems, both of humour and gracefulness, which are anywhere to be found. The reader need only cast his eye on ‘Cherry, or the Frog-Bride;’ the ‘Tailor and the Bear;’ ‘Rumpelstiltskin;’ and the inimitable procession of country folks jumping into the lake after the supposed flocks of sheep in ‘Pee-wit,’ to learn how much of fun, and grotesque, and elegance of figures also, and beauty of landscape, may be conveyed in how few lines.

The history of English caricature of the Georgian era would be incomplete without a notice of the various printsellers who supplied the material to the public, and whose shop-windows furnished, not so many years ago, favourite stages or stations, as it were, for the wandering Cockney, on his peregrinations between East and West; and with this Mr. Wright has accordingly furnished us. Perhaps the most celebrated were Humphreys, of New Bond-street and Piccadilly (whom, however, Mr. Wright does not mention), and Fores.

'S. W. Fores dwelt first at No. 3, Piccadilly, but afterwards established himself at No. 50, the corner of Sackville Street, where the name still remains. Fores seems to have been most fertile in ingenious expedients for the extension of his business. He formed a sort of library of caricatures, and other prints, and charged for admission to look at them; and he afterwards adopted a system of lending them out in portfolios for evening parties, at which these portfolios of caricatures became a very fashionable amusement in the latter part of the last century. At times some remarkable curiosity was employed to add to the attractions of his shop. Thus, on caricatures published in 1790, we find the statement that "In Fores Caricature Museum is the complete collection in the kingdom. Also the Head and Hand of Count Struenzee. Admission, one shilling." Caricatures against the French revolutionists, published in 1793, bear imprints stating that they were "published by S. W. Fores, No. 3, Piccadilly, where may be seen a Complete Model of the Guillotine. Admission, one shilling." In some this model is said to be six feet high.'

Mr. Wright closes his list with George Cruikshank, as the last representative of the great school of caricaturists formed in the reign of George III. But there is another, still living among us, whose experience as an artist goes very nearly back to that reign, and who may be in the most literal sense called the last of the political caricaturists as he is considered by many the best — Mr. Doyle, the world-famous H.B. of the past generation. Those who belonged to it can well remember the height of popularity which his lithographed sketches achieved, the little blockades before the shop-windows in St. James's-street and the Haymarket whenever a new one appeared, and the convenient topic of conversation which it was sure to afford to men of the clubs, when meeting each other on the pavement. For it was to critics of this class that H.B. particularly addressed himself. His productions wanted the popular vigour of those of Gillray and his school. But it is to Mr. Doyle's high honour that they were also entirely free from the scandalous coarseness of his predecessors, and that he showed the English public how the purposes of political satire could be fully secured without departing a hand's breadth from the dignity of the artist or the character of the gentleman. As a delineator of figures, we cannot esteem him very successful. They run too much into the long and lanky; portions of the outline, the extremities in particular, are often almost effeminate in their refinement: when he attempts a really broad, bluff personage, he is apt to produce the effect of a fine gentleman masquerading as a Falstaff. But it was in the likeness of his portraits, and their expression, that his chief and singular merit consisted. And in these, again, his success was extremely various. His fortune, in a professional sense, may be said to have been made by three faces — those of the Duke of Wellington, King William IV., and Lord Brougham. The provoking, sly no-meaning, establishing itself on the iron mask of the first; the good-humoured, embarrassed expression of the second; the infinite variety of grotesque fancies conveyed in the contorted features of the third; these were reproduced, week after week, for years, with a variety and fertility perfectly astonishing. In other cases he never could succeed in hitting off even a tolerable likeness: of his hundred or so representations of the late Sir Robert Peel, we do not recollect one which conveys to us any real remembrance of the original. The Peel of caricaturists in general, not only of H.B., was a conventional personage; as is, though in a less marked degree, the Gladstone of our present popular artists. Still more remarkable was the failure of H.B., in common with his predecessors, in catching the likeness of George IV. In all the countless burlesque representations of that personage, from the handsome youth of 1780 to the puffy veteran of 1827, there are scarcely any which present a tolerable resemblance. The courtly Lawrence succeeded in portraying him well enough; the caricaturists, usually so happy, never. H.B.'s published sketches amount to some nine hundred, and afford a capital key to the cabinet and parliamentary history of England, from the Ministry of Wellington to the end of Lord Melbourne's. While numbers of them do credit to the artist's political sagacity as well as his skill, we cannot forbear to notice one which, to our present notions, illustrates the 'nescia mens hominum fati sortisque futuræ' — produced when the Tories, to whom H.B. appertained with all his heart, anticipated the triumphs of French over English diplomacy under the conduct of our then Foreign Secretary: it is No. 171 in the series, 'The Lame leading the Blind:' Lord Palmerston, guided into a ditch by Talleyrand.

With the renowned H.B. the line of regular British caricaturists closes. The taste of the nation has sought another direction. But do not let us be misunderstood. The spirit of the art survives, and will do so as long as England is a free country and Englishmen retain a sense of the ludicrous; but its form is so completely changed, by the substitution of the cheap illustrated newspaper for the comparatively expensive broad-sheet of the last century, that a more convenient moment could not be found, for closing the old chapter in artistic history and beginning a new one, than that in which Doyle ceased his labours and the 'Punch' school of satirists began theirs. The very distinct mode of treatment which the small size of the modern comic newspaper, compared with the old sheet, necessarily requires, combines with other causes of difference to render this new school something quite apart from the old one. Its success must needs be obtained more through skill in the delineation of individual faces, and compactness of wit in the 'motive' of the composition, than through breadth of treatment, or (generally speaking) through talent for grouping. In the delineation of faces, however, and especially in portrait, which is the specialty of political caricature, the designers with whom we are now dealing have an immense advantage over those of former times, in being able to use the results of the art of photography. Photographs of faces and figures, always at hand, are a very superior class of auxiliaries to those hasty 'drawings on bits of card' with which Gillray was wont to content himself. The popularity which our present favourites have earned is probably more real, certainly much more extensive, than that gained by their most successful predecessors, from Hogarth to Cruikshank: with whose names that of Leech, so lately lost to us, and of his living associates and rivals, of whom we need only name Doyle the younger and John Tenniel as specimens, will assuredly find their places in the future annals of art. But, arrived at this turning point, we must take farewell of our subject, devoting only a few pages more to the cotemporary history of modern French caricature, on which Mr. Wright (to our regret) does not enter. We had hoped to derive considerable assistance for this purpose from a new publication of our friend M. Champfleury, entitled 'Histoire de la Caricature Moderne,' which has just fallen into our hands; but although the title is thus comprehensive, the contents reduce themselves to a few lively pages of panegyric on two or three recent artists, which seem to be dictated in great measure by personal feelings.

The general subject can be nowhere so well studied in a summary way as in the two volumes of M. Jaime ('Musée de la Caricature'), with very fairly executed illustrations, to which we can only apply the ancient reproach, 'tantamne rem tam negligenter;' for M. Jaime has but treated the matter in a perfunctory way, as if afraid of dwelling too much on it. It has not, however, the interest which attaches either to the coarser but bolder style of art inaugurated by the Germans in the sixteenth century, or to that which prevailed in the great English age of political caricature. Callot was indeed a Frenchman, by race at least, though born in Lorraine, then independent; but his associations were more with the school of the Netherlands than that of France. Nor had he any followers of note in the latter country. The jealous wakefulness of French government, and the cold and measured style which French art derived from a close addiction to supposed classical models, were both alike unfavourable to the development of the artistic empire of 'Laughter, holding both his sides.' French artists of the eighteenth century for the most part touched ludicrous subjects in a decorous and timid way, as if ashamed of them. As the literature of the country is said to abound in wit, while it is poor in humour, so its pictorial talent found vent rather in the neat and effective 'tableau de genre' than in the irregularity of the grotesque; or, to employ another simile, French comic art was to English as the genteel comedy to the screaming farce. And the same was the case (to treat the subject briefly) with that of other nations over which France exercised predominant influence. Chodowiecki was the popular German engraver of domestic scenes in the last century, and his copper-plates have great delicacy of execution and considerable power of expression. He was in high vogue for the purpose of illustrating with cuts the novels and the poetry of the great age of German literature, and his productions are extraordinarily numerous. But he habitually shrank from the grotesque. His admirers styled him the German Hogarth — a comparison which he, we are told, rejected with some indignation, and which Hogarth, could he have known it, would certainly have rejected likewise; for Chodowiecki, with all his other merits, very seldom approaches the ludicrous, and never soars to the height or descends to the depth of caricature.

The unbounded licence of the first French Revolution, and the strange mixture of the burlesque with the terrible which attended its progress, gave of course for some years the most favourable opportunities possible for the exercise of pictorial wit, so far as the nation possessed it. There can be no greater treat to one who loves to tread the by-ways of history, often the shortest cuts to truth, than to turn over the series of those magnificent volumes in the Imperial Library of Paris, in which the whole pictorial annals of the last century or so in France are preserved; everything arranged as nearly as may be in order of date, and not of subjects: portraits, festal shows and triumphs, processions, battles, riots, great events, represented under every form down to the rough newspaper woodcut and street caricature, unrolling in one vast phantasmagoria before the eye. We have much that is valuable and useful in our Museum, but nothing, in the matter of historical art, comparable to this collection. An inadequate idea of it only can be formed from the miscellaneous contents of the well-known three folio volumes of prints, entitled 'Tableaux de la Révolution Française.' The earlier part of the caricatures of that age are the most humorous and also the best executed. As the tragedy deepened, fun became more and more out of place; and the satirists who had seen its outbreak having most of them lost their heads or fled the country, the business fell into the hands of more vulgar workmen. One of the first (1788) may be mentioned, not so much for its execution, which is tame enough, as because it is (as far as we know) the real original of a piece of wit which has since made its fortune in every language, and been falsely attributed to many facetious celebrities. Calonne, as a monkey, has assembled his 'notables,' a flock of barn-door fowl. 'Mes chers administrés, je vous ai rassemblés pour savoir à quelle sauce vous voulez être mangés.' 'Mais nous ne voulons pas être mangés du tout.' 'Vous vous écarterez de la question.'

But French art, as we have seen, refined and softened into effeminacy under the class civilization of the ancien régime, and rendered prudish also by its adherence to classical models, had its decorum soon shocked by too coarse intermixture of the grotesque. Indeed, the reason often given by Frenchmen of the last generation for the acknowledged inferiority of their caricatures to ours, was the superiority of French taste, which could not accommodate itself to 'ignoble' exaggeration. On the whole, therefore, those of the revolutionary series of which we have been speaking are more interesting historically, and also from the keen wit often developed in them, than from their execution. There is no French Gillray or Rowlandson. Here and there, however, among a multitude of inferior performances, the eye is struck by one really remarkable as a work of a higher order than our English cotemporary series could furnish. Such is the famous 'Arrestation du Roi à Varennes,' 1791. The well-known features of the Royal party, seated at supper with lights, are brought out with a force worthy of Rembrandt, and with slight but marked caricature; while the fierce, excited patriotic figures, closing in on them from every side, have a vigour which is really terrific. Another, in a different style, is the 'Intérieur d'un Comité Révolutionnaire,' 1793. It is said, indeed, to have been designed by a first-rate artist, Fragonard, one who doubtless wrought with a will, for he had prostituted his very considerable talents to please the luxurious profligacy of the last days of the ancient régime, and the stern Revolution had stopped his trade, annihilated his effeminate customers, and reduced him to poverty. Fragonard's powers as a caricaturist are characterised by a well-known anecdote. He was employed in painting Mademoiselle Guimard, the famous dancer, as Terpsichore; but the lady quarrelled with him, and engaged another to complete the work. The irritated painter got access to the picture, and with three or four strokes of his brush turned the face of Terpsichore into that of a fury. The print now in question is a copper-plate, executed with exceeding delicacy of touch. A dozen figures of men of the people, in revolutionary costume, are assembled round a long table in a dilapidated hall of some public building. A young 'ci-devant,' his wife and child, are introduced through an open door by an usher armed with a pike. If the artist's intention was to produce effect by the contrast of these three graceful figures with the vulgar types of the rest of the party, he has succeeded admirably. They are humbly presenting their papers for examination; but it is pretty clear that the estimable committeeman, to whom the noble is handing his passport, cannot read it. The cunning, quiet, lawyer-like secretary of the committee, pen in hand, is evidently doing all its work. At the opposite end of the table an excited member is addressing to the walls what must be an harangue of high eloquence; but no one is listening to him, and the two personages immediately behind him are evidently determined to hear no noise but their own. But our favourite figure — and one well worthy of Hogarth — is that of the sentinel off duty: he is seated beside a bottle, pike in hand, enjoying his long pipe, and evidently, from the expression of his face, far advanced from the excited into the meditative stage of convivial patriotism. A placard on the door announces, somewhat contradictorily as well as ungrammatically, 'Ici on se tutoient : fermez la porte s'il vous plaît !' Altogether there is much more of the comic than the ferocious about the patriots ; and one may hope that the trembling family, for whom it is impossible not to feel an interest, will this time be 'quittes pour la peur.'

The popular governments — Revolutionary and of the First Empire — easily tamed the spirit of caricature, as they did that of more dangerous enemies, and it only revived when France was replaced under the tyranny of legitimacy. There is a great deal of merit in those on the Bonapartist side, of 1814 and 1815 ; many of them appear to be executed by some one clever artist, to us unknown. We will only notice one of them, the 'Vœu d'un Royaliste, ou la seconde entrée triomphante.' Louis XVIII. is mounted behind a Cossack — the horse and man are admirably drawn — while the poor King's expression, between terror and a sense of the ludicrous of his position, is worthy of the best efforts of Gillray or Doyle.

Caricature continued to be a keen party weapon in France through the period of the Restoration, and in the early years of Louis Philippe. The latter monarch's head especially, under the resemblance of a pear, which Nature had rendered appropriate, was popularised in a thousand ludicrous or ignominious representations ; his Gillray was Honoré Daumier, a special friend and favourite of M. Champfleury, but in whom we are unable ourselves to recognize more than secondary merit. 'Entre tous, Daumier fut celui qui accommoda la poire aux sautes les plus diverses. Le roi avait une honnête physionomie, large et étouffée. La caricature, par l'exagération des lignes du masque, par les différents sentimens qu'elle prêta à l'homme au toupet, le rendit typique, et laissa un ineffaçable relief. Les adversaires sont utiles. En politique, un ennemi vaut souvent mieux qu'un ami.' The genius of Daumier had some analogy with that of the sculptor-caricaturist Dantan.

But the liberty of art, like that of the Tribune, degenerated into licence, and France has never been able in her long age of State tempests to maintain the line between the two. Political caricature was once more extinguished in the Orleans reign, with the applause of decent people in general, by the so-called laws of September. It had a brief and feverish revival under the Republic of 1848 ; some of its productions in that period are worth a moment's notice, both from their execution and good humour : we remember two of the class of general interest ; the 'Apparition du Serpent de Mer,' a boat full of kings, startled by the appearance of the new Republic as the 'problematical monster of the deep ;' and the 'Ecole de Natation,' in which the various Kings and Emperors of Europe are floundering in a ludicrous variety of attitudes among the billows of revolution, while the female rulers of Britain, Spain, and Portugal are kept afloat by their crinolines. But under the decorous rule of the Empire, no such violation of the respect due to constituted authorities at home is any longer tolerated, while ridicule, even of foreign potentates, is permitted only under polite restrictions. Debarred from this mode of expressing itself, French gaiety finds one of its principal outlets, in the more innocent shape of social caricature, which was never so popular, or cultivated by artists of so much eminence, as within the last thirty years. And here we must notice a singular change in French workmanship, which appears to us to have been occasioned chiefly or wholly by the introduction of lithography. We have already observed how much difficulty its artists found in departing from the rules of classical outline and correct drawing, so long as the old-fashioned line engraving prevailed, and the consequent inferiority of French to English caricature in breadth, its superiority in correctness. The introduction and great popularity of lithography in France seems to have altogether changed the popular taste. Artists now dash off, rather than embody, their humorous conceptions in the sketchiest of all possible styles, and that which affords the greatest licence for grotesque distortions of figure and face. Boilly, a clever and fertile lithographer, was perhaps the first to bring this style of composition into vogue. But to such an extent has the revolution now gone, while we, on the other hand, have been pruning the luxuriance of the old genius of caricature, that the positions of the two countries seem to have become reversed, and England to be now the country of classic, France of grotesque art ; in the comic line of which any reader may judge for himself, by comparing the style of the cuts in 'Punch,' for instance, with those in the 'Charivari.' We cannot say that we find the change on the other side of the Channel an improvement, or that we have been enabled to acquire a taste for the hasty lithographed caricatures of popular figures and scenes which encumber French print-shops. The works of Bunbury, among English artists of this kind of renown, perhaps most nearly approach them; but these, rough though they are, have, at all events, a body and substance, and consequently a vigour, which their Gallic successors appear to us to lack, and which they endeavour too often to supply by loose exaggeration. However, it is idle to set up our own canons of taste in opposition to that of a nation, and a foreign nation into the bargain; and we may do our readers more service by giving them a few short notices of the leading artists who have risen to popularity in modern France by this style of composition.

Nicolas Toussaint Charlet had an education and parentage somewhat like those of our Gillray; born in 1792, the son of an old dragoon of Sambre-et-Meuse, he began his career in a not very noble occupation, being employed in the office where military recruits were registered and measured: and it was in that function, possibly, that he picked up and stored in his memory those thousand types of grotesque young conscripts and old grognards, 'enfants de troupe,' 'tourlourous,' and 'gamins,' with which he filled the shop-windows while amusing the multitude with their darling 'scènes populaires.' He was not exactly a caricaturist in the peculiar sense which we have given to the word, but an artist 'de genre;' in his own peculiar line few have surpassed him. It must be noticed that his sturdy Bonapartism evinced itself in some ambitious attempts at more serious compositions; one of which, 'La Garde meurt et ne se rend pas,' established his fame in 1816, while an 'Episode de la Campagne de Russie' (1836) is ranked at the head of his works by some of his admirers. But for our part, we greatly prefer the exquisite naïveté, though without much of the English vigour, which characterises some of his popular scenes; such — to quote one among a thousand — as that in which a peasant, looking down with the utmost gravity on a comrade who is lying in the road, helplessly drunk, exclaims, 'Voilà pourtant comme je serai dimanche!' Charlet, who died in 1845, left some two thousand lithographed designs, besides numerous water-colours and etchings.

Paul Chevalier Gavarni, born in 1801, ranks at the head of the living caricaturists of France, unless the Vicomte Amédée de

Noé (under his nom de plume, or rather de crayon, of 'Cham,' Ham the son of Noah) be supposed to contest with him that eminence. The journal 'Les Gens du Monde' (1835), and subsequently the 'Charivari,' owed to him the greater part of their celebrity. If not equal to Charlet in the 'naïf' and simply popular style, Gavarni excels him in satirical force and in variety. Twenty-five years hence (says Théophile Gautier) 'it is through Gavarni that the world will know of the existence of Duchesses of the Rue du Helder, of Lorettes, students, and so forth.' Gavarni visited England in 1849, where, according to his biographer M. de Lacaze (in the 'Nouvelle Biographie Générale'), he took so profound a dislike to our English aristocratic social system (it was the year, be it remembered, in which the doctrine 'la propriété c'est le vol,' took some short hold on Parisian spirits), that he fell into a fit of 'le spleen,' became misanthropic, and produced nothing for a long time but sketches of 'gin-shop frequenters, thieves, street-sweepers, Irishmen, and the beggars of St. Giles's and Whitechapel;' but we are happy to learn, from the same authority, that he soon recovered his gaiety in the less oppressive atmosphere of Paris. His 'Œuvres Choiesies' were published as long ago as 1845, in four volumes. 'Déjà,' says Champfleury, 'son œuvre est curieuse à consulter comme l'expression d'un peintre de mœurs épris d'idéal élégant dans une époque bourgeoise.'

Completing these brief notices of modern French caricaturists with the mere mention of the great artist Gustave Doré, who has lately condescended to some clever extravagances allied to caricature, and of that eccentric novelty Grisct, we must now conclude our hasty retrospect of the art in general. The institution of the 'comic illustrated newspaper' has now made the tour of the world; the United States furnish abundant specimens; Germany and Italy toil manfully in the wake of France and England; we have even seen political caricatures from Rio de Janeiro nearly as good as the ordinary productions of either. But it is impossible to follow a subject so greatly widening in its dimensions; and as cheapness of execution, while it extends the popularity of this class of compositions, diminishes the labour expended on them, we have not to expect for the future either productions of so much interest, or artists of such celebrity, as some of those dealt with in this article.

REST FOR THE WEARY.

"There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God."—HEB. iv. 9.

DEAR the storm-won calm of autumn
Brooding o'er the quiet lea;
Sweet the distant harp-like murmur
Trembling from the charmed sea.
Nestling breezes clog the branches;
Leaves lie swooning on the air;
Nature's myriad hands are folding
O'er her gentle heart, for prayer.

New-born on the lap of silence,
Cradled on a hoary tomb,
Lo! babe evening craves a blessing
As the day forsakes the gloom;
As one lingering sunbeam flashes
The grey spire to golden red,
And the motto "peace" is blazoned
Glorious o'er the resting dead.

Peace be to the shapeless ashes,
Perfect once in valour's mould;
Once on fire for truth and duty,
Now without a spark, and cold.
Smiting was the hero smitten,
Swordless hands now cross his breast;
Share we his mute supplication;
Weary, may the soldier rest!

Peace to him who braved the tempest,
Polar ice, and tropic wave;
Long the homeless sea who traversed,
Then came home to find a grave!
In this calmest roadstead anchored,
May no more the sailor rove,
Till he lose himself for ever
"In the ocean of God's love!"

Peace to him, the tried and saintly;
Wise to counsel, apt to cheer;
With a sober smile for gladness,
With a hope for every tear.
Earth lies lightly on his bosom,
Faith bedecks his priestly tomb
With the sacred flowers that symbol
Life, and light, and deathless bloom.

Peace to him who bears no legend
Carved above his lowly bed,
Save that he was found, unsheltered
From the storm and winter, dead.
Peace to him, that unknown brother,
Quit of want, and woe, and shame;
Trust we that the nameless stranger
Bears in heaven a filial name!

From the four winds assembled,
Kindred in the fate to die;
Eld and infant, alien, homebred,
Neighbours now, how calm they lie!
Valour, beauty, learning, goodness,
With the weight of life opprest,

Make the lean grave sleek with treasure,
Whilst they, weary, take their rest.

Dead they are not; only sleeping,
Dull although their senses be,
Yet they for the summons listen,
Calling to eternity.
Brothers, sleeping in the Saviour,
Sound their dreamless sleep and blest;
But we trust, when this is broken,
There remaineth still a rest!

THE BITTER AND THE SWEET.

Come, darling Effie,
Come, take the cup:
Effie must drink it all—
Drink it all up.

Darling, I know it is Bitter and bad;
But 'twill make Effie dear
Rosy and glad.

Mother would take it all
For her wee elf—
But who would suffer then?
Effie herself.

If Effie drinks it,
Then, I can tell,
She will go out to play
Merry and well.

Drink, and then, darling,
You shall have this,— Sweet after bitter:
Now, first, a kiss.

Ah, darling Effie,
God also knows,
When cups of bitterness
His hand bestows,

How His poor children need Urging to take Merciful draughts of pain,
Mixed for their sake.

He, too, gives tenderly
Joy after pain,
Sweet after bitterness,
After loss gain.

WERE WOLVES.*

In this remarkable little book, remarkable for a power its external aspect does not promise and an interest its name will not create, Mr. Baring-Gould, an author known hitherto chiefly by his researches in Northern literature, investigates a belief, once general in Europe, and even now entertained by the majority of the uneducated class. In widely separated places, and among races the most distinct, a belief has been traced in the existence of beings who combine the human and the animal character, who are in fact men changed either in form or in spirit into beasts of prey. The belief, though strong still, was strongest in the Middle Ages, when men were more unrestrained both in their acts and their credulities. In the extreme North it was so powerful that Norwegians and Icelanders had a separate name for the transformation, calling men gifted with the power or afflicted with the curse men "not of one skin." Mr. Baring-Gould pushes his theory far when he connects the story of the Berserkir with the theory of were wolves, the Berserkir being extant to this day in Asia, calling themselves Ghazis, and keeping up their fury as the Berserkir probably did, with drugs; but all Scandinavia undoubtedly believed that men had upon occasion changed into animals, and exhibited animal bloodthirstiness and power. So did the Livonians. So down to the very end of the sixteenth century did all Southern Europe, where the Holy Office made cases of metempsychosis subject of inquiry and of punishment. The very victims often believed in their own guilt. One man in 1593, Jacques Roulet, of Angers, stated in his confession that though he did not take a wolf's form he was a wolf, and as a wolf committed murders, chiefly of children. Even now the peasants in Norway believe as firmly in persons who can change themselves into wolves as the peasants in Italy do in the evil eye, the Danes think persons with joined eye brows liable to the curse, the people of Schleswig-Holstein keep a charm to cure it, the Slovaks, Greeks, and Russians have popular words for the were wolf, and Mr. Baring-Gould was himself asked at Vienne to assist in hunting a loup garou, or wolf who ought to have been a human being. In India the belief is immovable, more particularly in Oude, where the mass of evidence collected is so extraordinary that it shook for a moment the faith of a man so calm as the Resident, Colonel Sleeman, and induced him to give currency to a theory that wolves might suckle and rear the children of human beings, who thenceforward would be wolves. Ultimately, we believe, he abandoned that notion, but not before he had puzzled all India with his collection of exceptional facts, and riveted the superstition of the people of Oude.

A belief so universal and so lasting suggests some cause more real than a superstitious idea, and Mr. Baring-Gould believes he has discovered one. He holds that in every human being there is some faint trace of the wild-beast nature, the love of destruction and of witnessing the endurance of suffering. Else why do children display cruelty so constantly, string flies on knitting-pins, and delight in the writhings of any animal? In the majority this disposition is eradicated either by circumstances, by training, or by the awakening of the great influence we call sympathy. In a minority the desire remains intact but latent, liable to be called out only by extraordinary incidents or some upset of the ordinary balance of their minds. In a few it becomes a passion, a sovereign desire, or even a mania entitled to be ranked as a form, and an extreme form, of mental disease. It was the latter exhibition which gave rise to the belief in the were-wolves, who were, in Mr. Baring-Gould's opinion, simply raving maniacs, whose wildness took the form either of a desire to murder or of a belief in their own power of becoming beasts of prey. So late as 1848 an officer of the garrison in Paris was brought to trial on a charge of rifling graves of their bodies and tearing them to pieces, and the charge having been proved on conclusive evidence, his own confession included, was sentenced to one year's imprisonment. He was mad, but had he lived before madness was understood he would have been pronounced either a vampire or a loup garou. Madness miscomprehended was the cause of the facts which supported the monstrous belief, a theory almost demonstrated by the history of the case of Jacques Roulet. The extract is long, but the story is complete:—

"In 1593, a year memorable in the annals of lycanthropy, a trial took place in Angers, the details of which are very terrible. In a wild and unfrequented spot near Cande, some countrymen came one day upon the corpse of a boy of fifteen, horribly mutilated and bespattered with blood. As the men approached, two wolves, which had been rending the body, bounded away into the thicket. The men gave chase immediately, following their bloody tracks till they lost them; when suddenly crouching among the bushes, his teeth chattering with fear, they found a man half naked, with long hair and beard, and with his hands dyed in blood. His nails were long as claws, and were clotted with fresh gore and shreds of human flesh. This is one of the most puzzling and peculiar cases which come under our notice. The wretched man, whose name was Roulet, of his own accord stated that he had fallen upon the lad and had killed him by smothering him, and that he had been prevented from devouring the body completely by the arrival of men on the spot. Roulet proved on investigation to be a beggar from house to house, in the most abject state of poverty. His companions in mendicancy were his brother John and his cousin Julien. He had been given lodging out of charity in a neighbouring village, but before his apprehension he had been absent for eight days. Before the judges, Roulet acknowledged that he was able to transform himself into a wolf by means of a salve which his parents had given him. When questioned about the two wolves which had been seen leaving the corpse, he said that he knew perfectly well who they were, for they were his companions, Jean and Julien, who possessed the same secret as himself. He was shown the clothes he had worn on the day of his seizure, and he recognized them immediately; he described the boy whom he had murdered, gave the date correctly, indicated the precise spot where the deed had been done, and recognized the father of the boy as the man who had first run up when the screams of the lad had been heard. In prison, Roulet behaved like an idiot. When seized, his belly was distended and hard; in prison he drank one evening a whole pailful of water, and from that moment refused to eat or drink. His parents, on inquiry, proved to be respectable and pious people, and they proved that his brother John and his cousin Julien had been engaged at a distance on the day of Roulet's apprehension. 'What is your name, and what your estate?' asked the judge, Pierre Hérault. — 'My name is Jacques Roulet, my age thirty-five; I am poor, and a mendicant.' — 'What are you accused of having done?' — 'Of being a thief — of having offended God. My parents gave me an ointment; I do not know its composition.' — 'When rubbed with this ointment, do you become a wolf?' — 'No; but for all that, I killed and ate the child Cornier: I was a wolf.' — 'Were you dressed as a wolf?' — 'I was dressed as I am now. I had my hands and my face bloody, because I had been eating the flesh of the said child.' — 'Do your hands and feet become paws of a wolf?' — 'Yes, they do.' — 'Does your head become like that of a wolf — your mouth become larger?' — 'I do not know how my head was at the time; I used my teeth; my head was as it is to-day. I have wounded and eaten many other little children; I have also been to the sabbath.'

Jacques Roulet would have been found insane by any modern jury, and there is scarcely in mediæval literature a case of lycanthropy which cannot be explained upon this simple theory, — the one at last adopted, and in our judgment proved, by Colonel Sleeman in Oude, but a more difficult question remains behind. Is it quite certain that all cases of long-continued and outrageous cruelty presuppose madness? Is cruelty in fact a natural quality, which can be cultivated, or an abnormal desire, the result of extreme and gradual depravation of the passions and the reason? Take the well known case of Gilles de Retz in 1440. If evidence can prove anything it is certain that this man, head of the mighty House of Laval, lord of entire counties and of prodigious wealth, did throw up a great position in the public service to wander from town to town and seat to seat kidnapping children, whom he put slowly to death to delight himself with their agonies. He confessed himself to eight hundred such murders, and his evidence was confirmed by the relics found. He was betrayed by his own agents, and in the worst age of a cruel cycle his crimes excited a burst of horror so profound that he, a noble of the class which was beyond the law, so powerful that he never attempted to escape, was burnt alive. Was he mad, or only bad beyond all human experience? Mr. Baring-Gould inclines evidently to the former theory, and it is at all events a pleasing one, but it is difficult for thinking men to forget that power has in other instances produced this capacity of cruelty, to refuse credence to all stories of the cruelty of Cæsars, and Shahs, and West Indian slaveholders. It is possible, and we hope true, that the genuine enjoyment of pain is rare among the sane, though the Roman populace felt something like it, and though we are ever and anon startled by cases of wilful cruelty to animals, but genuine indifference to it is frequent, and granted the indifference, any motive may give it an active form. The thirst for domination is the most common impulse, but in well known instances jealousy, fear, hatred, religious bigotry, and even vanity, have been equally efficacious. At all events the passion differs from madness in that it is restrainable. Hardly one genuine case on a great scale has been recorded in a civilized country for many years, and it seems certain that the restraints of order prevent it from acquiring its full sway, and that therefore it is rather the depravation of nature than nature itself which is its origin. Gilles de Retz is possible, if he were sane, only in a class which can indulge every impulse with impunity, and at a time when law is no longer to be feared. It may be true that he belonged to the were-wolf genus, the men afflicted with homicidal mania, but he may also have belonged to a class now almost as exceptional, the men in whom unrestricted power has developed that thirst for testing it in its highest, its most frequent, and its most visible form, the infliction of slow death-agonies upon powerless human beings. It was, we fear, the madness of a Caesar rather than of a were wolf which influenced Gilles de Retz, and Mr. Baring-Gould would, we think, have exemplified his theory more perfectly had he excluded stories which testify not so much to the instability of human reason as to the depths of evil lurking in the human heart. He argues indeed that Gilles de Retz is the link between the citizen and the were wolf, but then in so doing he assumes one tremendous datum, that madness always shows itself in the extreme development of the latent heart, and not in its radical perversion. One of its commonest forms nevertheless is intense hatred of those whom the patient has most genuinely and fondly loved, and the balance of probability is that insanity as often perverts as intensifies the secret instincts of its victim. Mr. Baring-Gould has, we think, demonstrated that madness misapprehended was the root of the were-wolf delusion, but not that homicidal mania is the ultimate expression of an inherent tendency in universal human nature.

SCIENCE AND MIRACLE.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY, in the remarkable lecture on "improving natural knowledge" delivered to the working classes at St. Martin's Hall, and since published in the Fortnightly Review, states with a candour and moderation worthy of all praise, certain notions destructive of all worship, — except that very impossible kind of worship recommended by Professor Huxley, worship of the Unknown and Unknowable, — which have been gaining more and more hold of merely scientific men for many generations, and which, we need not say, are absolutely inconsistent with admitting the activity of any supernatural will in the Universe, and still more the actual occurrence of miracle.

Now it is a matter worth a little consideration how far men of pure science are trustworthy on matters of this kind, how far their evidence is what we should call on other subjects the evidence of experts, or not: On a medical subject, we should never think of adopting absolutely any theory rejected by a very large and, perhaps increasing, number of the most eminent men in the medical profession. On a historical subject, we should think it absurd to take up with a view against which every fresh historian of learning and eminence began with clearer and clearer conviction to protest. How far, then, even if it be true, as it possibly may be, that the tendency of the highest and calmest scientific thought is increasingly anti-supernatural, can we consider this the tendency of a class entitled to special intellectual deference, or the reverse? Mr. Brooke Foss Westcott, in a very thoughtful volume which he has just published on the Gospel of the Resurrection,* freely admits that "a belief in miracles decreases with the increase of civilization," but maintains, amidst other weaker and less defensible positions, that the accuracy of comprehensive views of nature as a whole, is not only not secured, but may be even specially endangered, by too special and constant a study of given parts of nature. "The requirements," he says, "of exact science bind the attention of each student to some one small field, and this little fragment almost necessarily becomes for him the measure of the whole, if indeed he has ever leisure to lift his eyes to the whole at all." And undoubtedly the man who has been studying, say, for the sake of a definite example, the chemical effects of light all his life, and who knows that every different substance when burnt yields a different spectrum, so that you may know by the number and situation of the dark lines exactly what substance it is that is burning, might be inclined to look at the possibility of miracle, and at faith in the supernatural will, from a narrow point of view. He will say to himself, 'If one of these spectra were suddenly to change its appearance, if such a dark line vanished, and such others appeared, should I not know with a certainty to me infallible, — a certainty on the absoluteness of which I should never hesitate to risk my own life or that of my family, — that some other element had been introduced into the burning substance? Could anything persuade me that the change was due to divine volition apart from the presence of a new element or new elements in the burning substance? Must not the Almighty himself, if He chose to make the change, make it by providing the characteristic element for the purpose,—just as if He chose to alter the moral traits of a human character, He could only do it by a process that would alter the character itself, and not by making a stupid and ignorant man give out all the characteristic signs of wisdom and learning, or a malignant and cruel man put forth all the moral symptoms of warm benevolence and charity.' So the scientific man would argue, and we are disposed to think would argue rightly. For, admitting that the physical qualities of things are realities at all, we should say that to make the physical qualities of one thing interchange with the physical qualities of another, without interchanging the things, is, if it be logically and morally possible, as the Transubstantiationists believe and most other men disbelieve, a piece of divine magic or conjuring, and not a miracle. But then, do not many great scientific men like Professor Huxley really infer from such trains of reasoning far more than they will warrant? All that such reasonings do tend to show, is, that if you truly conceive the natural constitutions of things, there are changes which you cannot make without destroying those very things altogether, and substituting new ones. As a miracle which should make two and two five is intrinsically impossible (Mr. Mill and the Saturday Review in anywise notwithstanding), so also (though less certainly) a miracle which should make oxygen a combustible gas instead of a supporter of combustion, and quite certainly a miracle which should make it right to do what is known to be wrong, or wrong to do what is known to be right, is intrinsically impossible. But the modern scientific inference goes much further than this, and immediately extends the conception of these inherent constitutions of certain things and qualities to the whole Universe,—assuming, for instance, that it is just as impossible, just as much a breach in the inherent constitution of some one or more things, for one who has been dead to live again, for the phenomena of decomposition to be arrested, the heart once silent to begin to beat, as for oxygen itself to burn without ceasing to be oxygen. The way in which this view would be defended would be that all matter and all its qualities are now almost proved to be modes of force, and all force indestructible, so that any kind of supernatural change in the phenomena of matter would appear to be equivalent to the positive alteration in the essence of a mighty whole, as really astounding in itself as the change which could make oxygen burn (that is, oxidise) or two and two equal to five.

Now this is, we take it, something less than conjecture,—indeed demonstrable scientific error, if science be taken to include anything more than the laws of physical phenomena. It is probably true indeed that in some sense the physical forces of the Universe are an invariable quantity, which only alter their forms, and not their sum total. If I move my arm, the motion, says the physiologist, is only the exact equivalent of a certain amount of heat which has disappeared and taken the form of that motion. If I do not move it, the heat remains for use in some other way. In either case the stock of force is unchanged. This is the conviction of almost all scientific men, and is probably true. But whether the stock of physical force is constant or not, the certainty that human will can change its direction and application—can transfer it from one channel to another—is just the same. And what that really means, if Will be ever free and uncaused, though of course not unconditioned,—which is, we take it, as ultimate and scientific a certainty as any in the Universe,—is no less than this,—that a strictly supernatural power alters the order and constitution of nature,—takes a stock of physical force lying in a reservoir here and transfers it to a stream of effort there,—in short, that the supernatural can change the order and constitution of the natural,—in its essence pure miracle, though miracle of human, and not of divine origin. For example, almost every physiologist will admit the enormous power that pure Will has over the nervous system,—that it can prolong consciousness and even life itself for certain short spaces, by the mere exertion of vehement purpose. Physicians tell you constantly that such and such a patient may no doubt, if it be sufficiently important, by a great effort command his mind sufficiently to settle his affairs, but that it will be at the expense of his animal force,—in short, that it will be a free transfer of force from the digestive and so to say vegetating part of his system, to that part of his physical constitution, his nervous system, which lies closest, as it were, to the will. Nay, we have heard physicians say that patients, by a great effort of pure will, have, as they believe, prolonged their own life for a short space, that is, have imparted, we suppose, through the excitement produced by the will on the nervous system and so downwards, a certain slight increase of capacity to assimilate food to the failing organic powers of the body. In other words, we conclude, just as the organism is failing to draw supplies of physical force from the outward world, its power of doing so may be slightly prolonged, — the outward world drained of a small amount of force it would otherwise have kept in stock, and the organism compelled to absorb it — by a pure volition. Can there be a clearer case of action of the supernatural on the natural, — even granting that the sum total of physical force is not altered, but only its application changed?

What more do we want to conceive clearly the room for Christian miracle, than the application of precisely the same conception to God and Christ? The students of the Universe appear to us to be in precisely the same condition with regard to the Universe, as a scientific observing mind secreted in some part of a human body (not the mind moving that body, but some other) would be in with relation to the structural, chemical, mechanical laws of that body. Suppose an atom of your blood able to retain its identity constantly in a human body, and to travel about it on a tour of scientific observation. It would very soon arrive at the conclusion that there were great laws of circulation of the blood and the fluids which supply it, — such as we see in nature in the astronomical laws, — great laws of force by which the legs and arms are moved, like the forces of tides or falling waters in the Universe, — great structural laws, by which different tissues, like the hair, the skin, nails, the nervous and muscular tissues, grow up out of the nourishment supplied them, just as we notice the growth of trees and flowers out of the earth, — and great though somewhat uncertain laws of alternation between activity and repose, — like the laws of night and day; — and such a scientific particle as we have supposed would undoubtedly soon begin to say that the more deeply it studied these things, the more the reign of pure law seemed to be extended in the universe of the body, so that all those uncertain and irregular phenomena (which we, however, really know to be due to the changes effected by our own free self-governing power), must be ascribed, it would say, not to any supernatural influence, but to its own imperfect knowledge of the more complex phenomena at work. And such a scientific particle would be perfectly justified in its inferences; for we have supposed it only an intellectual observing machine, not a free will with knowledge of its own that there is a power which is not caused, and which can effect real modifications in the relation even of physical forces which never vary in amount. But nevertheless it would be wrong, and could never know the truth, namely, that the ordering of the succession in these physical forces, — the interchanges between one and the other, — the physical influences over the body exerted by the command of the appetites and passions, were all of them really traceable in great part to supernatural power, though to supernatural power which does not either add to or subtract from the sum total of physical force present in the Universe. And we maintain that the men of pure science, as they are called, — the men who study everything but Will, — fall into precisely the same blunder as such a rationalizing particle of a human body, and for the same reason. They are quite right in their inferences from their premises, but their premises are radically defective.

In truth the room for miracle remains as wide as ever. Admit all the discoveries of science, and still they only prove a certain constancy in the amount of physical force, and a certain invisible law of succession between the same phenomena. But just as a man who puts forth a great effort to retain his consciousness and reason or even life for a short time longer than he would otherwise do, may succeed, — succeed, that is, in pumping up the failing supply of physical force from the Universe to his system for a few minutes or hours, when without such an effort it would have fled from his body and passed away into other channels, — so miracle only assumes that a supernatural power infinitely greater than man's will might, on sufficient reason, — which every Christian believes to be far more than sufficient, — do the same thing infinitely more effectually, and for a far longer time. Miracle is in essence only the directing supernatural influence of free mind over natural forces and substances, whatever these may be. In man we do not call this miracle, only because we are accustomed to it, — and in nature scientific men refuse to believe that any such directing power exists at all. But nevertheless, every accurate thinker will see at once, that free will, Providence, and Miracle do not differ in principle at all, but are only less or more startling results of the same fact, — which true reason shows to be fact, — that above nature exist free wills, probably of all orders of power, which do not, indeed, ever break the order of nature, but can and do transform, — as regards man by very small dribblets, — but as regards higher than human wills in degrees the extent of which we cannot measure, — natural forces from one phase of activity into another, so as greatly to change the moral order and significance of the Universe in which we live.

THE DURATION OF OUR SUPPLY OF COAL.

UNDER the title of "The Coal Question," Mr. Jevons* has furnished the public with a number of well-arranged and for the most part indisputable facts, and with a series of suggestive reflections, which every one interested in the future progress and greatness of his country will do well to ponder seriously. Few of us need to be reminded how completely cheap coal is at the foundation of our prosperity and our commercial and manufacturing supremacy. Coal and iron make England what she is; and her iron depends upon her coal. Other countries have as much iron ore as we have, and some have better ore; but no country (except America, which is yet undeveloped) has abundant coal and ironstone in the needed proximity. Except in our supply of coal and iron we have no natural suitabilities for the attainment of industrial greatness; nearly all the raw materials of our manufactures come to us from afar; we import much of our wool, most of our flax, all our cotton and all our silk. Our railroads and our steamboats are made of iron and are worked by coal. So are our great factories. So now is much of our war navy. Iron is one of our chief articles of export; all our machinery is made of iron; it is especially in our machinery that we surpass other nations; it is our machinery that produces our successful textile fabrics; and the iron which constructs this machinery is extracted, smelted, cast, hammered, wrought into tools, by coal and the steam which coal generates. It is believed that at least half the coal raised in Great Britain is consumed by the various branches of the iron trade.

With these facts present to our mind we shall readily understand that the vital questions for the wealth, progress, and greatness of our country are these: — "Is our supply of coal inexhaustible? and if not, how long will it last?" — Mr. Jevons enables us to answer both these questions. It is very far from being inexhaustible; it is in process of exhaustion; and, if we go on augmenting our consumption from year to year at our present rate of increase, it will not last a hundred years. Our geological knowledge is now so great and certain, and what we may term the underground survey of our islands has been so complete that we know with tolerable accuracy both the extent, the thickness, and the accessibility of our coal fields, and the quantity of coal annually brought to the surface and used up. The entire amount of coal remaining in Great Britain, down to a depth of 4,000 feet, is estimated to be 80,000 millions of tons. Our annual consumption was in 1860 about 80 millions. At that rate the available coal would last for 1,000 years. But our consumption is now steadily increasing at the rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, and will in 1880 be, not 80 millions, but 160 millions; and, if it continues thus to increase, will have worked out the whole 80,000 millions before the year 1960. Nay it would reach this climax probably some time earlier; for our calculation includes all the coal down to 4,000 feet; and no coal mine has yet been worked at a greater depth than 2,500 feet; and we do not believe that mines can be worked profitably, and we have little reason to think they can be worked at all, at such a depth as 4,000 feet.

Of course we know that, practically, our coal-fields will not be worked out within this period. Of course we are aware that our present rate of annual augmentation cannot be maintained. Every year we have to go deeper for our supply; and going deeper means incurring greater and greater expense for labour, for machinery, for ventilation, for pumping out the water, for accidents, &c. Going deeper, therefore, implies an enhanced price for the coal raised, and that enhancement of price will check consumption. But it is precisely this imminent enhancement of price, and not ultimate exhaustion, that we have to dread; for it is this enhancement which will limit our rate of progress and deprive us of our special advantages and our manufacturing supremacy. Let us see a little in detail the modus operandi. The difficulty of working and raising coal increases rapidly as the mine grows deeper, or as inferior mines have to be worked; the heat grows more insupportable, the shafts and passages longer, the danger greater, the ventilation more costly, the quantity of water to be kept out or got out more unmanageable. A very short period may raise engine coal and smelting coal from 5s to 10s per ton. Now a cotton mill of ordinary size will often use for its steam-power 80 tons of coal per week. This at 5s is 1,000*l* a year; at 10s per ton, it is 2,000*l*. But the cotton mill is full of machinery; and one great element in the cost of this machinery is the coal used in smelting and working the iron of which the machinery is made. The railroads which bring the cotton to the mill and take the calico and yarn back to the place of exportation are made of iron and worked by coal: so are the steamboats which bring the cotton to our shores and export the yarn to Germany; — the cost of carriage, therefore, which is a very large item in the contingent expenses of our factories, will be greatly increased both directly and indirectly by a rise in the price of coal. An advance in that price from 5s to 10s per ton, may be estimated to be equivalent to 2,000*l* a year on the working cost of a good-sized cotton mill. That is, as compared with the present state of things, and as compared with foreign countries, every manufacturer would have a burden of 2,000*l* a year laid upon him, and would have to raise the cost of his goods to that extent. How long could he continue to compete with his rivals under this disadvantage, or (it would be more correct to say) with his present advantage taken away from him? And how long would coal continue to be supplied even at 10s a ton?

And, be it observed, the check to the consumption of coal — the retardation i. e. in our progress towards ultimate and absolute exhaustion — can only come from increase of price, and the moment that it does come, the decline of our relative manufacturing pre-eminence has begun. We shall avoid the extinction of our coal in the short period of a century; but we shall do so only by using less now; — and using less now means producing less iron, exporting less calico and woollens, employing less shipping, supporting a scantier population, ceasing our progress, receding from our relative position. We may, it is true, make our coal last a thousand years instead of a hundred, and reduce the inevitable increase in its price to a very inconsiderable rate; but we can do so only by becoming stationary; and to become stationary implies letting other nations pass us in the race, exporting our whole annual increase of population, growing relatively, if not positively, poorer and feebler.

Nor does there seem any escape from these conclusions theoretically, nor any way of modifying them practically. We may, it is said, economise in the use of coal. But, in the first place, the great economies that can be reasonably looked for have been already introduced. In smelting iron ore we use two-thirds less coal than formerly, and in working our steam engines one-half less; and, in the second place, it is only a rise in the price of coal that will goad us into a more sparing use of it; and this very rise of price is the proof and the measure of our danger. "Export no more coal," it is suggested, and so husband your stores. But we could not adopt this expedient, even if it were wise to do so, or consistent with our commercial policy, without throwing half our shipping trade into confusion by depriving them of their ballast trade; and even then the evil would be scarcely more than mitigated? "Why," ask others, "should we not, when our own stores of coal are exhausted, import coal from other countries which will still be rich in mineral fuel, and thus supply our need?" Simply because of all articles of trade and industry coal is the most bulky in proportion to its value; and that it is the fact of having it at hand, of having it in abundance, of having it cheap, of having it without the cost of carriage, that has given us our manufacturing superiority. With coal brought from America, with coal costing what coal then would cost, we could neither smelt our iron, work our engines, drive our locomotives, sail our ships, spin our yarn, nor weave our broad cloths. Long before we had to import our fuel the game would be up.

Of 136 millions of tons now annually raised throughout the world, Great Britain produces 80 millions and the United States only 20. But this is only because we have had the first start, and because our population is far denser, and because our iron and our coal lie conveniently for each other and conveniently for carriage. As soon as America is densely peopled, to America must both our iron and our coal supremacy — and all involved therein — be transferred; for the United States are in these respects immeasurably richer than even Great Britain. Their coal-fields are estimated at 196,000 square miles in extent, while ours are only 5,400. But this is not all: their coal is often better in quality and incomparably more accessible than ours, especially in the Ohio valley. In some places the cost at the pit's mouth even now is 2s per ton in America, against 6s in England.

HAIRDRESSING IN EXCELSIS.

It is not easy to understand the differences in the popular appreciation of the minor trades. Why is a tailor considered rather contemptible, when no idea of ridicule attaches to a bootmaker? Both make clothes, and in trade estimation the tailor, who must always be something of a capitalist, is the higher man of the two, but the popular verdict is against him. Nobody calls a hosier the eighteenth part of a man, yet strictly speaking his business is only a minor branch of tailoring. No ridicule attaches to a hatter, notwithstanding the lunatic proverb about his permanent mental condition, but everybody laughs internally as he speaks of a hairdresser. Is it because hairdressers were once popularly supposed to be all Frenchmen, and therefore share the contempt with which dancing-masters are regarded by people who, while they express it, would not for the world fail to profit by their instructions? A singing-master is allowed to be an artist, often one of the first class, but a dancing-master is considered a cross between an artist and a monkey. Or are hairdressers despised, like men milliners, because their occupation, especially in modern Europe, where men have abandoned wigs, long locks, and the careful arrangement of the hair, is essentially feminine? That may be the explanation, for nobody despises the lady's-maid more or less because if she is "very superior" she can dress hair as well as any hairdresser. Or is the sufficient cause to be sought in their pretensions, in their constant but unsuccessful claim to be considered artists, something a little lower than professionals, but a great deal higher than mere tradesmen, a claim which induces them to indulge in highflown advertisements and the invention of preposterous names, usually Greek, but not unfrequently Persian, for totally useless unguents? The claim is allowed in France, but in England, like the similar one of the cook and the confectioners, it has always been rejected, a rejection which excites the profession every now and then to somewhat violent and therefore ridiculous self-assertion. They perceive an opportunity just at present. For a good many years past the business of the coiffeur has been comparatively a very simple affair, rising scarcely to the dignity of a trade and entirely outside the province of art. Men all over Europe have adopted the fashion of the much ridiculed Roundheads, cut their hair habitually close, till the assertion that a man's hair is naturally as long as a woman's strikes them with a sense of surprise, and have almost ceased to dress it. They use pomade still, or at least hairdressers say so, and a few of them, unaware that a mixture of cocoa-nut oil and thin spirit is in all ways the absolutely best unguent, waste cash upon costly coloured oils, but hairdressing for men is out of fashion. The average hairdresser contemptuously turns over the male head to some beginner, who snips away till hair and tournure are got rid of with equal speed. Up to 1860, too, women wore their hair, even on occasions demanding a grand toilette, after a very simple fashion, one which the majority of them could manage very well for themselves, and which required only careful brushing. This fashion was not perhaps altogether in perfect taste. Simplicity has charms, but still a custom which compelled women with Greek profiles and complexions of one shade only and girls with cherry cheeks and turned-up noses equally to wear their hair like Madonnas, was open to some slight attack on artistic grounds. Madonnas should not have laughing blue eyes, or pouting lips, or flaxen hair, or that look of espieglerie which accompanies a properly turned-up nose, — not a snub, that is abominable, but just the nez retroussé which artists detest and other men marry. The Second Empire, however, does not approve simplicity, and gradually the art of dressing hair has come again into use. The fashion of wearing hair à l'Impératrice was the first blow to the Madonna mania, and young women with no foreheads, and with pointed foreheads, and with hair-covered foreheads, all pulled their unruly locks straight back because an Empress with a magnificent forehead chose to make the best of it. Anything uglier than this fashion in all women with unsuitable foreheads and all women whatever with black hair it would be hard to conceive, and the mania did not as a mania last very long. Then came the day of invention, the use of false hair, the insertion of frisettes, the introduction of golden dyes, the re-entry of the vast combs prized by our great grandmothers, the admiration of pins stolen from the Ionian and Pompeian head-gear, and a general attention to the head-dress which we can best describe by quoting from the Manners and Customs of Ancient Greece a paragraph on the hairdressing of Athenian women: — "On nothing was there so much care bestowed as upon the hair. Auburn, the colour of Aphrodite's tresses in Homer, being considered most beautiful, drugs were invented in which the hair being dipped, and exposed to the noon day sun, it acquired the coveted hue, and fell in golden curls over their shoulders. Others, contented with their own black hair, exhausted their ingenuity in augmenting its rich gloss, steeping it in oils and essences, till all the fragrance of Arabia seemed to breathe around them. Those waving ringlets which we admire in their sculpture were often the creation of art, being produced by curling-irons heated in ashes; after which, by the aid of jewelled fillets and golden pins, they were brought forward over the smooth white forehead, which they sometimes shaded to the eyebrows, leaving a small ivory space in the centre, while behind they floated in shining profusion down the back. When decked in this manner, and dressed for the gunæitis in their light flowered sandals and semi-transparent robes, they were scarcely farther removed from the state of nature than the Spartan maids themselves."

The grand triumph of the Ionic barbers, the invention of a mode of plaiting which occupied many hours, and could therefore be repeated only once a week, and required those who wore it to sleep on their backs with their necks resting on wooden trestles, hollowed out lest the bed should derange the hair, has not indeed been repeated, though under the fostering care of Mr. Carter even that perfection may one day be attained. Still we have the auburn dyes, and the pins, and all the Athenian devices, and it is not quite certain that the "chignon," the nasty mass of horsehair and human hair which women have learnt to stick on the back of their heads, and which is actually sold in Regent Street attached to bonnets, is not an additional triumph over nature. We have a picture somewhere of a chignon more than three thousand years old, but if we are not mistaken there are feathers on it as well as hair, the very idea which the President of the Hairdressers' Academy on Tuesday reinvented, and for which he was so heartily applauded. Of course, with the new rage for artificial arrangement, false hair, dyes, chignons, hair crêpe, hair frisé, and we know not what, the hairdresser's art is looking up, and the sensible tradesmen who practise it, sensible in all but their grandiloquence — which is, we take it, half-comic, half a genuine effort at self-assertion — are making the most of their opportunity.

The soirée, or "swarry," as the doorkeeper persisted in calling it, of the Hairdressers' Academy, held in the Hanover Square Rooms on Tuesday, was really a noteworthy incident in the annals of modern folly. Some thirty women had their hair dressed in public by the same number of men — not, we are sorry to say, to the accompaniment of slow music, — an improvement we recommend to Mr. Carter's attention — and some two hundred men and women looked on and applauded the result. There was in the middle of the room a long table covered with a white cloth, as it were for some sort of experiment, but upon the table could be seen nothing but hand-mirrors, which looked indigestible. So long were other visitors in coming that one visitor, who was conscious of wanting the scissors and of a total absence of bear's grease, was afraid that one of the many gentlemen who in winning costume, and faultless "eads of air," and unmistakable hairdressing propensities, hovered near the door, would insist upon his having his hair cut and dressed forthwith, merely to wile away the time. But fortunately, just as a gentleman with a "ead of air" which would have done credit to any wax figure in any shop window, was approaching with sinister looks, visitors, masculine and feminine began to pour in. Then there was diffused around the room an odour of bear's grease, and probably costlier unguents, and from the look of the ladies' hair the writer was under the impression that he beheld the victims who had been immolated upon the shrine of hairdressing, and who were to exhibit the effects of the sacrifice. But not so. Awhile, and then there came in, each leaning upon the arm of the cavalier who was to "dress her," about thirty-two ladies, from an age to which it would be ungallant to allude down to (one can hardly say "bashful") fifteen. Their hair was in some instances apparently just out of curl-papers, but for the most part hanging unconfined except at the back, where it was fastened close to the crown, and then hung down like a horse's tail. Among the thirty were one or two magnificent chevelures, but we did not see one that quite realized the painter's ideal, one which the wearer could have wrapped round her as Titian's model must have done, or one on which the owner could have stood, as on a mat, as Hindoo women have been known to do. Their comic appearance, and the clapping of hands which arose thereat, showed one at once that they were the victims or (if you please) the heroines. They sat at the white-cloth-covered table, and the cavaliers drew from black bags combs, and puffs, and hair-pins, and what looked like small rolling-pins, and tapeworms, and bell-ropes, and cord off window-curtains, and muslin and tissue-paper, and flowers and fruits of the earth imitated in green and gold. Then the "dressing" began, and the spectator saw with awe and amazement what art can do for hair, then one repented of ever having doubted the truth of ladies who at balls say, with a significant glance at head-dresses, "Why, how do you do, dear? I really did not know you." Some people may think that hair, however plenteous or however scanty, looks better in its natural state than when it is made into a flower garden; and others may hold that no kind of hair is improved by being interwoven with tape-worms or bell-ropes, or even the cord off window-curtains. But it is certain that by the use of muslin and other materials already spoken of a result may be obtained which would justify a man in cutting his mother (on the score of non-recognition, if on no other), and which would lead one to believe that so long as a lady has a couple of handfuls of hair left she may, with the help of art, hold her own against Berenice. When all the ladies were "dressed" one of the "dressers" made an unexceptionable little speech in unexceptionable English (for which our experience of hairdressing had not prepared us), concluding by saying that the ladies in their "dressed" state would walk round the table each leaning on the arm of her "dresser," so that the spectators might all have a full view. As he said, so did they; nay, they went further, and walked round twice, amidst the applause of the assembled witnesses. We were disappointed that no prize beyond applause was given; we had thought that at least a small-tooth, comb, after the fashion of those said by Miss Emmeline Lott to be used in the Turkish harems, would have been bestowed. But perhaps it would have been dangerous to have given so decided a preference to the hair of one lady over that of another, for after all it must be with some difficulty that the subjects of the exhibition are collected. After the "swarry" came a ball, at which whosoever danced with the ladies who had their heads powdered was, if he disliked dust, to be pitied. The company seemed to be, for the most part, or at any rate to a considerable extent, connected with the hairdressing interest, and that they should do all they could to bring their craft to perfection is not only pardonable, but commendable. Would it, however, be well if society in general should patronize such exhibitions? Opinions happily differ, but we cannot help thinking evil would come of it. What manner of woman, is it that must study such matters as hairdressing, if she would entice our "golden youth" (or our golden age, for the matter of that)? What manner of woman, then, would set the fashion in hairdressing? And we know what has been the consequence in France (if we are not nearly as bad here) of following in small matters the lead of the demi-monde. On the other hand, two convictions at all events we acquired from the spectacle. One is that modern hairdressing in its highest form is a branch of jewellery, the real art being shown not in the arrangement of the hair, but in the addition of things which are not hair — combs, ribbons, flowers, dewdrops, and gilt insects — the last a taste essentially inartistic and depraved. The other was that it is not safe for any man to make a proposal in the evening. So utterly were some of the "subjects" changed by the act of the operators, that the possibility of not knowing in the morning the betrothed of the evening seemed very real indeed, and the mistake would be an awkward one for both parties.

THE ANALOGY BETWEEN THE FRENCH AND AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONS.

THE Emperor of the French has said many remarkable things, but few more remarkable than the short sentence in which he hints that there is some analogy between the Constitution of France and that of the United States. The statement has been received in England with an impatience which is a little unjust, and is caused by too exclusive an attention to surface differences. Those differences are of course patent to every one; but the analogy is not the less real and striking. The key-note of the American Constitution is the existence of an Executive which during its term of office is irresponsible to the people, which acts by its own volition, which can pursue if necessary a policy diametrically opposed to the wishes of those who elected it. That also is the key-note of the system established by the Second Empire. The President does as he pleases in all matters within his province just as the Emperor does, and like him is irresponsible to the Legislature — need not, indeed, explain to the representatives of the people his own official acts. His ministers are his ministers or clerks, bound to obey his orders; not bound to pay any heed, and frequently, not paying any heed, to votes passed by the popular body. Of course, in America as in France this absolute disunion between the Executive and the body which controls the purse is very inconvenient, and it has in each country been met in the same way. In France the Minister without a portfolio explains to the Corps Legislatif the plans of departments which he does not control, and in America a friend or connection or political ally of the President performs the same function, Mr. Raymond for example occupying as nearly as possible that position in Congress, which M. Rouher occupies in the French Chamber. It is true the French spokesman is a recognised official, and the American spokesman is not, but the recognition does not diminish "responsibility" in the English parliamentary sense, but rather increases it. It is true Mr. Johnson cannot effect through Congress what the Emperor can effect through his Legislature, but that is because he has not a majority and the Emperor has. In theory the French Chamber has as much right to reject a bill proposed by the Imperial Government as Congress has, and were the Emperor less dreaded it would frequently do so. At the present moment Mr. Johnson is trying to "make a majority" to support his policy by means quite as strong as those used in French elections. He has ordered that no radical recommendation for office shall be listened to, and has it is said threatened that unless his opponents give way he will dismiss every official throughout the Union who owes his election to the recommendation of an opponent, a measure which has daunted his stoutest adversaries as fatal to their re-election. They will be in fact, as in France, struck out of the Government list. Indeed the prerogative of the President is in many ways greater than that of the Emperor. Each is commander-in-chief, but the President can deprive any officer of his commission by decree, and the Emperor cannot. A French officer's grade is his "property," and though the law has 'once or twice been violated, it could not be broken through except for a State necessity. Emperor and President are alike masters of the Civil Service, but the President can and does dismiss at will, and the bureaucracy of France is permanent. An order, such as Mr. Johnson is said to have threatened to give, would in France have aroused an unconquerable resistance. No doubt the Emperor of the French can do things infinitely more high-handed than the President could attempt, but that is not by virtue of the idea of the French Constitution, but by reason of his control over a system essentially and radically despotic, which he did not make, and which his predecessors also used, the French police. Mr. Johnson has no such organisation at his disposal, but when it existed during the first two years of the war it was used without much regard to anything but the safety of the Federation. Without the police and the immense army, and with a hostile majority in the Chamber, the Emperor would be almost precisely in the position of the President.

But the latter is subject to removal at the expiration of his term? No doubt Mr. Johnson is, and has therefore a great temptation to make his policy accord with the policy approved by the electors, and so has the Emperor Napoleon, who follows opinion quite as anxiously; but that deference is no part of the Constitution, which provides for change in the individual, but not for change in the absolute independence of the office. In changing our Premier, we ensure a change of policy, because if the new man disobeys, he also can be dismissed next day; but in changing the President, America merely places one independent and irremovable official in place of another. The theories of the Imperial and Republican systems are identical, except in the illogical peculiarity of the French Constitution, that it introduces the hereditary element into the Executive, whereas the right of election logically includes a right of dismissal at periods fixed by mutual agreement. But the freedom of the Press, of speech, of association? Well, these things exist in America and do not exist in France; but it is not in consequence of the Constitution, but of the popular will. Nothing prevents an American President, with Congress at his back, from subverting the freedom of the Press, by means, for example, of remissible taxes, if they think that policy sound. The Emperor and his first Chamber did think it sound, and so freedom in France ended, a fact greatly no doubt to be regretted, but in no way proving that the principles of the American and French Constitutions are not analogous. One very remarkable power indeed is possessed by the American Legislature which is not possessed by the French, and that is the right of passing a law by a two-third vote, in defiance of the President. But the French Chamber is theoretically just as strong, for it could insist on a certain law being passed, under penalty of a rejection.

tion of the Budget, and the Emperor must either yield, or appeal to a plebiscite, that is, strike a coup d'état upsetting the Constitution, which gives the Chamber such a right of control. That the two sets of institutions are worked in a different way, and with a different spirit, is too obvious for remark; but that does not destroy the theoretic analogy to which the Emperor points.

The truth is that apart from the operation of the State system, which with many faults still organises popular resistance, the President of the United States is, during his term of office, an excessively powerful monarch, and the fact, revealed only by the war, has evidently struck forcibly on the imagination of the Emperor of the French. As he acknowledges in his speech he still dislikes Parliamentary Government, for which he is himself singularly unfitted, and he glances at the Union with a passing thought that if he ever grants "liberty," it will be in the American and not in the English form. Should the thought ever become active, it is astonishing how little he will have to do to restore "liberty" after the American model as it would appear were the Union a republic one and indivisible. He would have to introduce laws establishing the freedom of the press, and the right of association, and the liability of all officials to prosecution for illegal acts done in their official capacities; and the exemption of all citizens from arrest except on criminal charges, and the constitutional change would be theoretically almost complete. The remaining changes which would be necessary—such as abstinence from interference in the elections, recognition of the right of debate, and restoration of the legislative initiative to individual members—are scarcely constitutional. These changes once accomplished, France would be in possession of a great amount of practical liberty, of the control of her own Legislature, and of an Executive terribly strong indeed, but not stronger than that of the American Union; rather less strong, because hampered by the legal rights of the army, and the customary rights of the civil bureaucracy. That is not a form of Government we admire, because it lacks the one strength of the Parliamentary system, the absolute identity of the Legislature and the Executive power; but it is one which might suit France for a time, and would have the immense advantage of permitting free thought and its expression, and some activity of Parliamentary life without the previous dismissal of the Napoleonic dynasty, which will never, we fear, consent to that incessant intellectual conflict by which alone a constitutional monarch can acquire great individual power. At all events, should circumstances ever compel the Emperor to relax the overstrictness of his regime, it is to the American rather than to the British form of freedom that he appears likely to feel his way.

MEXICO.

THE position which the Government of the United States is prepared to take up with regard to Mexico is at last clearly and finally established, and it is one that is calculated to excite some apprehension for the future peace of the world. During the autumn months of last year, Mr. SEWARD was continually urging on the Federal Government the expediency of the speedy withdrawal of the French troops; and, with many sincere protestations of the most friendly feeling towards France, he gave the EMPEROR to understand that, if his troops were to stay much longer where they were, a rupture between the two countries was inevitable. The EMPEROR would be only too glad to get his troops away if he could do so without compromising his own honour, and that of France; and it seemed to him that the best way of arranging the matter would be that the French troops should go, and that the United States should recognise the Emperor MAXIMILIAN. The Mexican Empire, being thus placed on a friendly footing with the only Power it has to dread, might hope to establish itself and prosper, if prosperity in Mexico is possible for it. France would have succeeded, or, at least, would not have openly and conspicuously failed; and all jealousy between Washington and Paris would have been at an end. But Mr. SEWARD has distinctly and decisively rejected this proposal. The United States will not recognise the Emperor MAXIMILIAN, nor treat him on any but a hostile footing. In the eyes of the Americans, he is an intruder, and an enemy of an injured and friendly Republic, and they can never be content until his enterprise has wholly failed. Congress, as Mr. SEWARD remarks, must exercise its legitimate influence on the Government of the PRESIDENT; and the PRESIDENT has not only to announce his own decision, but that of the American people and its representatives; and the opinion of the American people is violently against the

Mexican Empire. Of this there can be no doubt; for even if the accusations continually brought up in Congress against the Emperor MAXIMILIAN were true, instead of being, as for the most part they are, gross misrepresentations, still the vehemence and pertinacity with which they are urged show clearly enough how deep is the animosity that prompts them. If the whole question were simply one of the continuance of the Mexican Empire, it might be worth while to discuss these accusations, and to show how very slight is the basis on which they have been reared; but all matters of detail are swallowed up in the gravity of the declaration which the United States have now issued. The view of the Government of the United States is, that the French have violated the MONROE doctrine in its proper and original sense. There was a Republic established in Mexico, holding its territory unopposed, in harmony with the country, dear to the inhabitants, and in the most friendly relations with the United States. The French came to pull down this Republic, and to set up a Monarchy, and they persist in remaining in Mexico to force this alien Empire on an unwilling Republican people. This is the mode in which the United States have determined, after full deliberation, to regard the recent history of Mexico; and they will not allow any compromise by which their adherence to this view might seem to be weakened. So long as France stays in Mexico, forcing an Empire on the Republicans of a contiguous State, America will treat France exactly as she would expect France to treat her if she sent a fleet, and landed troops, to set up a Republic in Belgium. Much, it is acknowledged, is to be borne from France, which would not be borne from any other country. It will be only in the last resort that the language of America would become hostile to a country endeared to her by so many traditions, and bound to her by so many ties. The tone of Mr. SEWARD's letter is very conciliatory, and the Government of President JOHNSON has been resolute in preventing any indirect breaches of amity. The export of arms from California has been prevented, and still more recently a considerable portion of the troops in Texas has been disbanded. France has nothing to complain of in small things; there is only the one great point of difference between her and the United States, that she has violated a doctrine to which the United States attach the greatest importance, and which they are resolved to uphold. They now merely ask that the French troops shall be withdrawn; but if this is not done, the time must come when they will insist on having their wishes fulfilled.

This uncompromising language of the American Government has placed the Emperor of the FRENCH in a very difficult position. He cannot seem to yield to threats; but still he knows that, if any way of withdrawing his troops with honour can be found, he must use it. He has, therefore, set earnestly to work to disprove the view which the American Government has adopted. He denies altogether that he ever wished to set up a Monarchy in Mexico, or to crush a Republic. But the Republican Government had insulted and offended him, plundered and murdered his subjects, gave no compensation, and perhaps was too weak, poor, and anarchical to give any. He interfered merely to get redress, but he did not see how it was possible to hope for redress from such a Government as then existed in Mexico. Several leading Mexicans proposed to establish a Monarchy, and he concurred in the idea because he thought a Monarchy, which had long been a favourite notion of many Mexicans, offered the best chance of getting a Government strong, durable, and enlightened enough to pay him what he was owed. This is all. He no more wishes to put down a Republic in Mexico than he does to put down a Republic at Washington; he merely wished, and wishes, to have an instrument ready to provide him with the redress he asked. The Emperor MAXIMILIAN and his Court, and his Orders of the Eagle and Gaudalupe, are only pretty bits of machinery for the recovery of money owing to Frenchmen; and it must be owned that, if this is all, they are about as expensive a piece of machinery, in comparison with the object to be effected, as was ever invented. But then, as the EMPEROR said in his speech, this machinery has answered, or very nearly answered. There is now in Mexico an enlightened Government triumphant over all opposition, with a French commerce trebled in an incredibly short space of time, plentifully supplied with troops, and quite ready to pay off all that is due to France. A few more arrangements have still to be made with the Emperor MAXIMILIAN, so that the stipulated payments may be fully secured, and then the French troops will be finally and honourably withdrawn. The ecstatic visions of M. CHEVALIER, and the ardent proclamations of Marshal FOREY, are forgotten, or utterly neglected. We hear no more of the spread of French influence over the Western hemisphere, of the necessity of enabling the Latin race to confront the Anglo-Saxon race in the New World. The Americans are told that all that has been done in Mexico has been done simply to redress the wrongs and support the claims of Frenchmen; the French themselves are told that this most desirable end has been accomplished, and that the troops who have rendered its accomplishment possible may soon be expected home. But it is scarcely necessary to say that neither the Americans nor the French will be satisfied. The Americans think, and think with perfect truth, that the experiment of recovering French debts by shooting Republicans until the Austrian Archduke was made Emperor would never have been tried unless it had been supposed that it could be tried without the United States being able to interfere with it. The French know that at least twenty millions of French money have been sunk in the experiment, and that if their troops were withdrawn it would be a great deal more difficult to recover the new debt than it was to recover the old one. The EMPEROR, by adopting the view that he is merely trying to get his just dues from Mexico, has done something to conciliate the Americans; yet he has made it even harder than before to justify to France the withdrawal of the troops. To throw away twenty millions in the attempt to get back a tenth of that sum is as deplorable an investment, and as conspicuous a failure, as he could well make. The last Mexican loan of about six millions sterling was almost entirely subscribed by the French poor, on the direct solicitation of the local officials of the Government, and it would most seriously impair the confidence of the lower classes in the EMPEROR's policy if it ended in a loss to them of money which they only subscribed because he seemed to ask for it himself.

The EMPEROR must, therefore, risk something. He might risk either a war with America, or a blow to his prestige in France. His speech was very judiciously worded, and he seemed to be preserving a firm attitude, and consulting the dignity of his country, while he prepared a mode of escape from his embarrassment by asserting that his work was done in Mexico, and that the Emperor MAXIMILIAN was firmly established there. It will now naturally be his first object to get the Emperor MAXIMILIAN to share this opinion; and the story may be true that he has sent over a special envoy to represent to the Emperor of MEXICO that he must consent to the withdrawal of the French troops, and try his chance of empire from his own resources. If the Emperor MAXIMILIAN would but announce that he was now quite sure of his throne, and that French aid was no longer necessary to him, the French might undoubtedly retire without dishonour. They could not retire at once, but it may be presumed that the Americans would be quite satisfied if a Convention like the September Convention with Italy were agreed on, and if it were arranged that all French troops should have quitted Mexico by the end of the present year. If the French went, the Austrians and Belgians must go too—not necessarily at the very same time, but before very long; as it is obvious that, if the French have been guilty of coming to American soil to trample down a Republic and set up a Monarchy, so have they. The Emperor MAXIMILIAN would therefore have to decide whether he could possibly hold his own with native troops against his domestic enemies; and secondly, whether, if he thought it possible to succeed, he would also think it worth while to try. It may be assumed, perhaps, that the Emperor of the FRENCH would be able to provide that Mexico should be left alone, and that, if he did not go there, neither would the Americans. But if all foreign troops were withdrawn, the EMPEROR would have to fight Mexicans with Mexicans. His Mexicans would feel no enthusiasm for him, would regard him as a foreigner, and would with difficulty be induced to believe that his cause was the winning one. His adversaries would be ardent, stimulated by the encouragement of the Americans, panting for revenge, and able to take advantage of that general disposition to go against the existing Government, whatever it may be, which pervades all nations of Spanish descent. But even if the EMPEROR thought that, after a very long and protracted fight, he might possibly hold his own, and retain a precarious possession of some of the richer parts of the Mexican territory, he might very probably hesitate before he embarked on so dangerous an adventure, and might begin to examine whether it could possibly answer to him to take the risk. If he stayed as long as the French stayed, and found that the pressure of the Americans was depriving him even of his Austrians and Belgians, he would incur no disgrace by resigning a position that he might fairly consider untenable. But the French could scarcely withdraw altogether if he went. They could not acknowledge that their attempt to obtain redress had been entirely in vain, and all their money wasted; and they would naturally seek to make some arrang-ment with the United States by which, if a Government favoured by the United States was set up, a return to mere anarchy should be prevented, and the right of the French to enjoy some sort of guarantee for the settlement of their claims should be recognized.

THE French EMPEROR's address to his Legislature is generally an interesting study. It is feebler and less clever this year than usual, but still it is interesting. The august author of these compositions has the art of touching all great questions of European concern in a tone of frankness and generosity, and noble sentiments in a Royal or Imperial speech are always pleasant and refreshing. What, for example, can be more considerate or delicate than the manner in which he handles the Americans? They are reminded of a century of friendship, and it is politely suggested that Imperialism is only the Constitution of the United States in a French Court dress. The Mexican expedition is explained in a manner that ought to disarm the most suspicious Yankee, and it seems as if all had been a mistake about the Latin race, as it was about the proposed recognition of the South. Somebody did say something about the Latin race, which has evidently been misconstrued a good deal; but the "American people" will now comprehend that "the expedition, in which we invited them to join, was not opposed to their interests." France "prays" sincerely for the prosperity of the great Republic, and, just as a French Emperor is only an American President in disguise, so Imperialism in Mexico has been founded "on the will of the people." Mr. SEWARD very likely never swears. His talent lies chiefly in the line of making other people swear. But it is possible that some less courteous Anglo-Saxons in Washington and in New York, who are anxious about the MONROE doctrine, after reading all these high-minded expressions, and especially the one about the French praying for them, will feel inclined, in the language used in the School for Scandal by the friends of JOSEPH SURFACE, to observe, "Damn your sentiments." However this may be, and whatever may be the turn the Mexican difficulty is taking, one thing is clear, that the French EMPEROR puts his sentiments neatly and well.

THE EMPEROR'S SPEECH.

THE Emperor of the French has opened the Session of his Chambers for the thirteenth time, and for the thirteenth time his speech is the political fact in the European history of the week. Its interest turns mainly upon three paragraphs, those relating to Mexico, to Italy, and to his pledge of one day "crowning the edifice" by conceding liberty. Of course he says other things, but they are so vague or so formal that they add nothing to our knowledge either of his purposes or his position. He will "remain a stranger" to the internal disputes of Germany, "provided French interests are not directly engaged," but as he is the sole judge whether they are so or not, this amounts only to a pledge that France will not interfere with Prussia until her Emperor chooses, an assertion which makes a very small draft upon our political faith. He promises to restore the right of association for industrial purposes, but the liberty thus regained is to be "outside politics," and to be limited "by the guarantees which public order requires" i. e., by any guarantee the Emperor thinks expedient. He announces a reduction of the Army, but it has been effected without a reduction of numbers, and declares that a financial equilibrium has been secured by the surplus of revenue, for which surplus his Minister of Finance only just ventures to hope on condition that everything goes right for two more years. He suggests that France is governed very much like the United States, but does not attempt to explain wherein he finds the analogy between a Constitution which changes its Executive every four years, and leaves the entire legislative power to the representatives of the people, and a Constitution which was intended to make the executive power hereditary, and which intrusts the initiative of legislation entirely to the man who is to carry that legislation out. On all these subjects, Germany, finance, co-operation, and the Constitution, the Emperor's utterance is suggestive, without clearly instructing either his subjects or the world. No one, for example, could tell without knowing facts which the Emperor does not reveal whether his paragraph on Germany is a hint to Count von Bismark to go on in his course and prosper, or a menace that France would not bear a Union of Northern Germany against which its interests are directly engaged.

Even on the three points we have excepted the Emperor, as his wont is, gives the world a riddle to read. What, for instance, is the meaning of the sentence which says that France "has reason to rely on the scrupulous execution of the Treaty with Italy of the 15th September, and on the indispensable maintenance of the power of the Holy Father?" Does it mean that Napoleon regards the temporal power as indispensable, or only the spiritual; that he will put down internal revolt in Rome, or suffer Italy to garrison the city, provided only the Pope is left spiritually independent? Is his dictum a threat to the Revolution or a threat to the priests? Reading it by the light of the Emperor's character, we should believe the sentence intended only to ward off opposition until the evacuation of Rome was complete, but read by the facts in progress, by the recruiting for Rome going on in France, and the pressure employed in Florence to make Italy accept the Papal debt, we should believe it implied that while Napoleon will retire, the Pope must remain independent King of Rome. The maintenance of the Pope's power is declared indispensable, but nothing is said of the invisible means by which it is to be maintained.

So with the Mexican declaration. The Emperor, we admit, is upon this point placed in a most difficult position. He made the singular blunder made by the Times and by the majority of English politicians, but not made by the people he rules. Careless of principle and forgetting precedent, rejecting the idea that freedom must conquer slavery, and overlooking his uncle's adage that twenty-five millions must beat fifteen if they can once get at them, he convinced himself that the South must break up the Union. Consequently he invaded Mexico, and placed his nominee on its throne. As his subjects, with the strange instinct which supplies to great populations the place of wisdom, had from the first foreseen, he erred in his first essential datum. The South did not break up the Union, but the Union broke up the South, and Napoleon finds himself compelled either to withdraw from a great undertaking visibly baffled and repulsed, or to accept a war with the oldest ally of France — a war in which, if defeated, he risks his throne, and if successful, can gain nothing except financial embarrassment. Neither alternative seems to him endurable — the former as fatal to the reputation for success which is essential to his personal power, the latter as bringing him into direct conflict with the wishes of all his people. He strives therefore to find some middle course, and the object of this part of his speech is simply to soothe Americans into waiting until he can retreat with honour. He who three years ago spoke only of strengthening a branch of the Latin race to resist Anglo-Saxon aggression, now anxiously repudiates any idea of hostility to the Union. He recalls to the Americans "a noble page in the history of France," her assistance to the Republic in its great rebellion, reminds them that he requested them to take a part in reclaiming Mexican debts, and almost implores them to recollect that "two nations equally jealous of their independence ought to avoid any step which would implicate their dignity and their honour." Is that an assurance or a menace? For a French Sovereign to speak of possible contingencies as "implicating French dignity and honour" is a very serious thing, but then why these unusual professions of regard for the Union? It is true in a preceding paragraph Napoleon has affirmed that he is arranging with the Emperor Maximilian for the recall of his army, but then their return must be effected when it "will not compromise the interests which France went out to that distant land to defend." When is that? Do the interests to be defended include the reinvigoration of the Latin race? Nothing is clear from the speech, and according to the Yellow Book, which is always supposed to explain the speech, the French Army is only to return from Mexico when the President of the Union has recognized the Mexican Empire, an act which he has refused to do, and which Congress has specifically forbidden him to perform. There is nothing in the speech inconsistent with that interpretation, and if it is correct the Americans will simply contrast the compliments offered them in words with the impossible proposal submitted in fact, and be less content than ever. All they obtain is a promise that at some time not specified, when a result they dislike has been accomplished, the Emperor will, if consistent with his honour, withdraw the troops through whom he has been able to accomplish it — not a very definite or very satisfactory pledge.

It is on the "crowning of the edifice" alone that the Emperor is partially explicit. He will not grant a responsible Ministry. That system of government, always abhorrent to him, has not become more pleasant of late years, and he declares for the tenth time that "with one Chamber holding within itself the fate of Ministers the Executive is without authority and without spirit," the "one" being inserted either to avoid a direct sarcasm upon the English Constitution, or from a sudden recollection of the part played by the Prussian Chamber of Peers. He believes that his system has worked well, that France, tranquil at home, is respected abroad, and, as he adds with singular audacity, is without political captives within or exiles beyond her frontiers. Are, then, the Duc d'Aumale, M. Louis Blanc, and the author of Labienus at liberty to return to France? Consequently nothing will be changed, but the Emperor, resolving to "improve the conditions of labour," will await the time when all France, being educated, shall abandon seductive theories, and all who live by their daily toil, receiving increasing profits, "shall be firm supporters of a society which secures their well-being and their dignity." No one can complain of any obscurity in that apology for the Empire. Its central ideas are all expressed, and all expressed with truthful lucidity. The Emperor is to rule "with authority and spirit." There is to be no political freedom, no discussion even of "theories of government, which France for eighty years has sufficiently discussed." Intelligence and capital are still to remain disfranchised, but in return the labourer's condition is to be improved. "Bread to the cottage, justice to the palace," was the promise of the Venetian Ten, and Napoleon, if he changes the second, adheres to the first condition. His offer is also bread to the cottage, provided only that there is silence in the palace. It is for France to decide whether she accepts an offer which is not a small one, which if honestly made is capable of fulfillment, and which would pledge her Government to the best ad interim occupation it could possibly pursue. Only we would just remind her that education in the Emperor's mouth has hitherto meant only education through priests, and improvement in the condition of the labourer only a vast expenditure out of taxes which the labourer pays, that the first result of these works has been the reckless over-crowding of all towns, and that of these promises there is not one which liberty could not also secure.

THE BEAU-MONDE AND THE DEMI-MONDE IN PARIS.

THE Paris journals lately surprised their French, and startled their foreign, readers by an announcement for which, after all, both should have been prepared. No one who is at all conversant with the ordinary course of Parisian life — we do not say familiar with its inner mysteries — ought to have been astonished at hearing that certain grandes dames of French society had sought for invitations to a masqued ball which was to be given by a distinguished leader of the demi-monde. We have had, in our own country, certain faint and partial indications of the same curiosity, revealed in an awkward and half-hesitating sort of way. English great ladies once made an off-night for themselves at Cremorne, in order to catch a flying and furtive glance, not of the normal idols of those gay gardens, but of the mere scenic accessories to their attractions and triumphs. But as yet we have never heard that the matrons of English society have sought an introduction to the Lais of Brompton or the Phryne of May-fair, even under the decorous concealment of mask and domino. Nor has it yet been formally advertised, here that the motive of so unusual a request was a desire to learn the arts and tactics by which the gilded youth — and, it might be added, the gilded age — of the country is subjected to the thrall of venal and meretricious beauty.

That such a rumour should be circulated and believed in France is — to use the current slang — "highly suggestive." It suggests a contrast of the strongest, though it is far from a pleasing, kind between the society of to-day and the society of other days. It was long the special boast of the French that with them women enjoyed an influence which in no other part of the world was accorded to their sex, and that this influence was at least as much due to their mental as to their physical charms. The women of other nations may have been more beautiful. To the Frenchwomen was specially given the power of fascination; and it was the peculiar characteristic of her fascination that its exercise involved no discredit to the sense or the sensibility of the men who yielded to it. A power which showed itself as much in the brilliance of bons mots and repartee as in smiles and glances, a grace of language and expression which enhanced every grace of feature and of attitude, a logic which played in the form of epigram, and a self-respect which was set off rather than concealed by the maintenance of the most uniform courtesy to others — such were the arts and insignia of the empire which the most celebrated Frenchwomen, from the days of Maintenon and De Sévigné to those of

Madame Deffand and Madame Roland or those of Madame Recamier, exercised over the warriors, sages, and statesmen of France. The homage paid by the men to the brilliant women who charmed the society which they had helped to create may not always have been perfectly disinterested. The friendship of the women for their illustrious admirers may not always have been perfectly Platonic. There may have been some impropriety—or, as our more Puritan friends would say, some sin—in the intercourse of some of the most celebrated Frenchmen and Frenchwomen. Yet even this could not have been predicated of all. Madame de Sévigné's reputation comes out clear and spotless even from the foulest assault of wounded vanity and slighted love. We do not forget the comprehensive loves and the deliberate inconstancy of Ninon. But Ninon, corrupt as she may have been, was not venal. She did not ruin her lovers by her covetousness, and then receive their wives and sisters in her salons. She was courted by elegant and virtuous women, because she was the single and solitary instance as yet known of a woman possessing every grace and every charm save the grace and charm of virtue. Whatever may have been the relations between the sexes in those days, it was at least free from grossness. The charms which attracted men to the Maison Rambouillet were not those of sense alone, or in a special degree. They were those of conversation at once spirited, graceful, elegant, and vivacious. To an accomplished man there is perhaps no greater social treat than to hear good French spoken by an educated and clever Frenchwoman. In her hands a language of which both the excellences and the defects eminently qualify it for the purposes of conversational combat becomes a weapon of dazzling fence. Those delicate turns of phrase which imply so much more than they express fly like Parthian shafts, and the little commonplaces which may mean nothing do what the pawns do when manipulated by a clever chess-player—everything. And in the age when the empire of Frenchwomen rested upon their grace and power in conversation, there was ample matter to task their remarkable talents. It was an age of new ideas. Government, religion, and philosophy; the administration of the kingdom and the administration of the universe; the rights of kings to be obeyed by their people and the right of the Creator to the adoration of his creatures; the claims of privilege and the claims of prerogative; the pretensions of rank and the pretensions of the roturier; the conflicts of science and theology—all these furnished materials for the tongues of the clever women, materials of which the clever women fully availed themselves. The final result was not, indeed, wholly satisfactory. How many a short sharp sarcasm, shot from the tongue of brilliant causeuses, rebounded on the gilded rooms wherein it first hurtled! How many a satire, sugared with compliment, at which rival beaux chuckled in delight, came back with its uncovered venom to the hearts of those whose admiration had first provoked it! How many a gibe of reckless truth, aimed at courts and nobles, distilled through laquais and waiting-maids into the streets of Paris, to whet the after-wrath of that fierce canaille! Many of those clever women had better been silent; many of those pungent epigrams had better been unsaid. Still, while the spirited talk went on, life was illumined by no common brilliance; and vice not only decked itself, but forgot itself, in the guise of intelligence and wit.

But what a change is it now! There are drawing-rooms in Paris which are more brilliant and gorgeous than any that De Sévigné or Recamier ever sat in. But their brilliance and splendour are not of such airy impalpabilities as genius or wit. They are solid, substantial, tangible. They are the brilliance and the splendour, not of able men and clever women, but of the upholsterer, the mechanician, and the decorator. There is gold, there is marble, there is lapis lazuli; there are pictures, statues, ormolu-clocks; there are rich velvets and cloud-like lace, and a blaze of amethysts, rubies, and diamonds. There are trains of Imperial dimensions and tiaras of Imperial brightness. And in whose honour is all this grand display? To whom is the court paid by this mob of sombre-clad and neatly-gloved men of every age, from twenty to sixty? Who have taken the place of the great female leaders of society whose names have added lustre to France? Strange as it may seem, their successors are second-rate or third-rate actresses, opera-dancers, and singers at public rooms and public gardens. We do not intend to undertake the superfluous task of penning a moral diatribe, or inveighing against the immorality of the age. Sermons there are, and will be, in abundance on so prolific and provoking a theme. In every age actresses and ballet-girls have had their admirers. In every age, probably, they will continue to have admirers. But what is worthy of note is this. Formerly this admiration was of an esoteric kind. The worshippers adored their divinities in secret. The temples of the goddesses were, at any rate, not obtruded on the public eye, nor in possession of the most open, public, and splendid streets. The cult, too, was confined to a narrower circle. But now all this is changed; the fanes of the divinities are splendid and in the most splendid streets; the cult is open, avowed, public. The worshippers are of every age, and are all equally indifferent to secrecy. There is no restriction and no exclusion, save on two grounds—those of poverty and intelligence. There is a kind of intellect admitted into this gorgeous coterie, but it is intellect in livery. The dramatic author and the dramatic critic are now as much appendages to the dramatic courtesan as her coachman and her femme de chambre. Where professional reputation depends on scenic effect, and scenic effect depends upon the équivoque put into the actress's mouth, and the applause with which their delivery is received, the man who concocts the équivoque and the man who criticises their delivery become equally objects of attention to the actress who is looking out for a clientèle. Saving these necessary exceptions, these assemblies are comprised of rich old men anxious to dissipate the money which they have made, and rich young men as anxious to dissipate the wealth which they have inherited. And now we hear that the wives and sisters of these men seek admission to these Paphian halls.

It is, indeed, not an unnatural, though it is far from a decent, curiosity which prompts ladies entitled to the reputation of virtue to examine something of the life and domestic economy of those ladies whose very existence presupposes an entire repudiation of virtue. The married women naturally desire to know something of the manners and mein and language of the rivals whose arts have diverted their own husbands' treasures into alien and obnoxious channels. When a wife hears that her husband has, at one magnificent stroke on the Bourse, carried off one or two millions of francs, she is curious to ascertain the process by which no inconsiderable proportion of these winnings has been "affected" to the payment of Madlle. Théodorine's debts or to the purchase of Madlle. Valentine's brougham. And the anxious mother, who has long dreamed of the ceremony which might unite the fortunes of her dear Alcide with the dot of her opulent neighbour's daughter, is tortured between the misery of frustrated hopes and curiosity to understand the motives which impel Alcide to become the daily visitor of Madlle. Gabrielle in the Rue d'Arcade, and her daily companion when riding in the Bois de Boulogne. Certainly the subject is a very curious one. But does the solution of the problem quite justify the means taken to solve it? Might not enough be inferred from the antecedent history of those who are the subjects of it to dispense with the necessity of a nearer examination? Take a number of women of the lower classes from the different provinces of France—with no refinement, with a mere shred of education, and with but small claim to what an English eye would regard as beauty—but compensating for lack of knowledge, education, and refinement by a vivacity and a coquetry peculiarly French. Take these women up to Paris, tutor them as stage supernumeraries, and parade before them the example of the arts of the more successful Lorettes. The rest may be imagined. From these general premises it is not difficult to conjecture the product obtained; to conceive that manner on which jeunes gens dote, a manner made up of impudence and grimace; that repartee which mainly consists of a new slang hardly known two miles beyond the Madeleine; those doubles entendres of which perhaps memory is less the parent than instinct, and that flattery which is always coarse and always venal. It would be erroneous to say that we have here given a complete picture of the class which certain leaders of Paris fashion wish to study. There are, in the original, traits and features which we could not describe, and which it is unnecessary for us to attempt to describe, as they are portrayed in the pages of the satirist who has immortalized the vices of the most corrupt city at its most corrupt era. Juvenal will supply what is wanting to our imperfect delineation. English ladies may read him in the vigorous paraphrases of Dryden and Gifford; while their French contemporaries may arrive at a livelier conception of what we dare not express, if only they stay till the supper crowns the festal scene of the masqued ball. If they outstay this, they will have learned a lesson the value of which we leave it for themselves to compute.

It is idle to say that curiosity of this kind is harmless because it is confined to a few. Only a few, indeed, may have contemplated the extreme step of being present at the Saturnalia of the démi-monde. But how many others have thought of them and talked of them? To how many leaders of society are the doings of these women the subjects of daily curiosity and daily conversation? How many patrician—or, at all events, noble—dames regular attendants at mass, arbiters of fashion, and ornaments of the Church, honour with their inquisitiveness, women of whose existence, twenty years ago, no decent Frenchwoman was presumed to have any knowledge? And do these noble ladies suppose that this curiosity is disregarded by the adventuresses from Arles or Strasburg, Bordeaux or Rouen, whom successful prostitution has dowered with lace, diamonds, carriages, and opera-boxes? Do they suppose that the professed admiration of the young Sardanapali for the ex-conturières and ballet-girls of Paris has not a more potent effect when combined with the ill-concealed interest of their mothers and sisters? And what that effect is on the men in one class, and on the women in another, a very slight knowledge of human nature is sufficient to suggest. That girls of moderately good looks will contentedly continue to fly the shuttle at Lyons, or to drudge as household servants in Brittany, or to trudge home to a supperless chamber in Paris with the bare earnings of a supernumerary or a coryphée at a small theatre, when a mere sacrifice of chastity may enable them not only to ruin young dukes and counts, but to become the theme and admiration of duchesses and countesses, is a supposition which involves too high a belief in human virtue; and the conditions we have named are found to be fatal to the virtue of the poorer Frenchwomen. And as for the men, what must be the effect on them? Debarred from the stirring conflict of politics; exiled, so to speak, from the natural arena of patriotic ambition; knowing no literature save that of novels in which courtezans are the heroines, and caring for no society but that of which courtezans are the leaders; diversifying the excitement of the hazard-table and the betting-room with the excitement of the coulisses; learning from their habitual associations to lose that reverence for women and that courteous attention to them which are popularly supposed to have at one time characterized the gentlemen of France—they partially redeem the degradation which they court by showing that even a mixture of vapid frivolity, sensual indulgence, and senseless extravagance is insufficient to corrupt a nation, unless also the female leaders of society conspire to select for their notice and admiration those creatures for whom the law of the land would better have provided the supervision of the police and the certificate of professional prostitution. When virtuous women of birth and position rub shoulders with strumpets, protests are useless and prophecies are superfluous; for the taint which goes before destruction is already poisoning the heart of the nation.

THE COVERT.

THE eagle beats his way
Strong-winged through the burning blue:
All through the heat of the day
In the covert the wood-doves coo.
Take the wings of the dove, my soul!
Take the wings of the dove!
For the sun is not thy goal,
But the secret place of love.

Close to the earth and near,
And hidden among the flowers,
By the brink of the brooklet clear,
The dove in her covert cowers.

Take the wings of the dove, my soul!
Take the wings of the dove!
For the sun is not thy goal,
But the secret place of love.

Flee not afar, my soul
Flee not afar for rest!
The tumult may round thee roll,
Yet the dove be in thy breast.
Take the wings of the dove, my soul!
Take the wings of the dove!
For the sun is not thy goal,
But the resting place of love.

Good Words;

IN MEMORY OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN, THE MARTYR PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Oration of the Hon. GEORGE BANCROFT, at the request of both Houses of Congress, in the Hall of the House of Representatives of the United States, on Monday, Feb. 12, 1866.

Senators, Representatives, of America:—

GOD IN HISTORY.

THAT God rules in the affairs of men is as certain as any truth of physical science. On the great moving power which is from the beginning hangs the world of the senses and the world of thought and action. Eternal wisdom marshals the great procession of the nations, working in patient continuity through the ages, never halting, and never abrupt, encompassing all events in its oversight, and ever affecting its will, though mortals may slumber in apathy or oppose with madness. Kings are lifted up or thrown down, nations come and go, republics flourish and wither, dynasties pass away like a tale that is told; but nothing is by chance, though men in their ignorance of causes may think so. The deeds of time are governed as well as judged, by the decrees of eternity. The caprice of fleeting existences bends to the immovable omnipotence which plants its foot on all the centuries, and has neither change of purposes nor repose. Sometimes like a messenger through the thick darkness of night, it steps along mysterious ways; but when the hour strikes for a people, or for mankind, to pass into a new form of being, unseen hands draw the bolts from the gates of futurity; an all-subduing influence prepares the mind of men for the coming revolution; those who plan resistance find themselves in conflict with the will of Providence, rather than with human devices; and all hearts and all understandings, most of all the opinions and influences of the unwilling, are wonderfully attracted and compelled to bear forward the change which becomes more an obedience to the law of universal nature than submission to the arbitrament of man.

GROWTH OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC.

In the fulness of time a republic rose up in the wilderness of America. Thousands of years had passed away before this child of the ages could be born. From whatever there was of good in the systems of former centuries she drew her nourishment: the wrecks of the past were her warnings. With the deepest sentiment of faith fixed in her inmost nature, she disenthralled religion from bondage to temporal power, that her worship might be worship only in spirit and in truth. The wisdom which had passed from India through Greece, with what Greece had added of her own; the jurisprudence of Rome; the mediæval municipalities; the Teutonic method of representation; the political experience of England; the benignant wisdom of the expositors of the law of nature and of nations in France and Holland, all shed on her their selectest influence. She washed the gold of political wisdom from the sands wherever it was found; she cleft it from the rocks; she gleaned it among ruins. Out of all the discoveries of statesmen and sages, out of all the experience of past human life, she compiled a perennial political philosophy, the primordial principles of national ethics. The wise men of Europe sought the best government in a mixture of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy; and America went behind these names to extract from them the vital elements of social forms, and blend them harmoniously in the free Commonwealth, which comes nearest to the illustration of the natural equality of all men. She intrusted the guardianship of established rights to law; the movements of reform to the spirit of the people, and drew her force from the happy reconciliation of both.

TERRITORIAL EXTENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

Republics had heretofore been limited to small cantons or cities and their dependencies; America, doing that of which the like had not before been known upon the earth, or believed by kings and statesmen to be possible, extended her republic across a continent. Under her auspices the vine of liberty took deep root and filled the land; the hills were covered with its shadow; its boughs were like the goodly cedars, and reached unto both oceans. The same of this only daughter of freedom went out into all the lands of the earth; from her the human race drew hope.

PROPHECIES ON THE CONSEQUENCES OF SLAVERY.

Neither hereditary monarchy nor hereditary aristocracy planted itself on our soil; the only hereditary condition that fastened itself upon us was servitude. Nature works in sincerity, and is ever true to its law. The bee hives honey, the viper distils poison; the vine stores its juices, and so do the poppy and the upas. In like manner, every thought and every action ripens its seed, each in its kind. In the individual man, and still more in a nation, a just idea gives life, and progress, and glory; a false conception portends disaster, shame, and death. A hundred and twenty years ago, a West Jersey Quaker wrote: "this trade of importing slaves is dark gloominess hanging over the land; the consequences will be grievous to posterity." At the North the growth of slavery was arrested by natural causes; in the region nearest the tropics it thrived rankly, and worked itself into the organism of the rising States. Virginia stood between the two; with soil, and climate, resources demanding free labour, and yet capable of the profitable employment of the slave. She was the land of great statesmen; and they saw the danger of her being whelmed under the rising flood in time to struggle against the delusions of avarice and pride. Ninety-four years ago, the Legislature of Virginia addressed the British king, saying that the trade in slaves was "of great inhumanity," was opposed to the "security and happiness" of their constituents, "would in time have the most destructive influence," and "endanger their very existence." And the king answered them, that "upon pain of his highest displeasure, the importation of slaves should not be in any respect obstructed." "Pharisaical Britain," wrote Franklin in behalf of Virginia, "to pride thyself in setting free a single slave that happened to land on thy coasts, while thy laws continue a traffic whereby so many hundreds of thousands are dragged into a slavery that is entailed on their posterity." "A serious view of this subject," said Patrick Henry in 1773, "gives a gloomy prospect to future times." In the same year George Mason wrote to the Legislature of Virginia: "The laws of impartial Providence may avenge our injustice upon our posterity." In Virginia, and in the Continental Congress, Jefferson, with the approval of Edmund Pendleton, branded the slave trade as piracy; and he fixed in the Declaration of Independence as the corner stone of America: "All men are created equal, with an unalienable right to liberty." On the first organization of temporary governments for the continental domain Jefferson, but for the default of New Jersey, would, in 1784, have consecrated every part of that territory to freedom. In the formation of the National Constitution Virginia, opposed by a part of New England vainly struggled to abolish the slave trade at once and forever; and when the ordinance of 1787 was introduced by Nathan Dane, without the clause prohibiting slavery, it was through the favourable disposition of Virginia and the South that the clause of Jefferson was restored, and the whole Northwestern Territory—all the territory that then belonged to the nation—was reserved for the labor of freemen.

DESPAIR OF THE MEN OF THE REVOLUTION.

The hope prevailed in Virginia that the abolition of the slave trade would bring with it the gradual abolition of slavery; but the expectation was doomed to disappointment. In supporting incipient measures for emancipation, Jefferson encountered difficulties greater than he could overcome; and after vain wrestlings, the words that broke from him, "I tremble for my country, when I reflect that God is just, that his justice cannot sleep forever," were words of despair. It was the desire of Washington's heart that Virginia should remove slavery by a public act; and as the prospect of a general emancipation grew more and more dim he, in utter hopelessness of the action of the State, did all that he could by bequeathing freedom to his own slaves. Good and true men had, from the days of 1776, thought of colonizing the negro in the home of his ancestors. But the idea of colonization was thought to increase the difficulty of emancipation; and in spite of strong support, while it accomplished much good for Africa, it proved impracticable as a remedy at home. Madison, who in early life disliked slavery so much that he wished "to depend as little as possible on the labor of slaves;" Madison, who held that where slavery exists "the republican theory becomes fallacious;" Madison, who in the last years of his life would not consent to the annexation of Texas, lest his countrymen should fill it with slaves; Madison, who said, "slavery is the greatest evil under which the nation labors, a portentous evil, an evil—moral, political and economical—a sad blot on our free country," went mournfully into old age with the cheerless words: "No satisfactory plan has yet been devised for taking out the stain."

NEW VIEWS OF SLAVERY.

The men of the Revolution passed away. A new generation sprang up, impatient that an institution to which they clung should be condemned as inhuman, unwise and unjust; in the throes of discontent at the self-reproach of their fathers, and blinded by the lustre of wealth to be acquired by the culture of a new staple, they devised the theory that slavery, which they would not abolish, was not evil, but good. They turned on the friends of colonization; and confidently demanded, "Why take black men from a civilized and Christian country, where their labor is a source of immense gain and a power to control the markets of the world, and send them to a land of ignorance, idolatry, and indolence, which was the home of their forefathers, but not theirs? Slavery is a blessing. Were they not in their ancestral land naked, scarcely lifted above brutes, ignorant of the course of the sun, controlled by nature? And in their new abode, have they not been taught to know the difference of the seasons, to plough, to plant and reap, to drive oxen, to tame the horse, to exchange their scanty dialect for the richest of all the languages among men, and the stupid adoration of follies for the purest religion? And since slavery is good for the blacks, it is good for their masters, bringing opulence and the opportunity of educating a race. The slavery of the black is good in itself; he shall serve the white man forever." And nature, which better understood the quality of fleeting interest and passion, laughed, as it caught the echo: "man" and "forever!"

SLAVERY AT HOME.

A regular development of pretensions followed the new declaration with logical consistency. Under the old declaration every one of the States had retained, each for itself, the right of manumitting all slaves by an ordinary act of legislation; now, the power of the people over servitude through their legislatures was curtailed, and the privileged class was swift in imposing legal and constitutional obstruction, on the people themselves. The power of emancipation was narrowed or taken away. The slave might not be disquieted by education. There remained an unconfessed consciousness that the system of bondage was wrong, and a restless memory that it was at variance with the true American tradition, its safety was therefore to be secured by political organization. The generation that made the Constitution took care for the predominance of freedom in Congress, by the ordinance of Jefferson; the new school aspired to secure for slavery an equality of votes in the Senate; and while it hinted at an organic act that should concede to the collective South a veto power on national legislation, it assumed that each State separately had the right to revise and nullify laws of the United States, according to the discretion of its judgment.

SLAVERY AND FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The new theory hung as a bias on the foreign relations of the country; there could be no recognition of Hayti, nor even the American colony of Liberia; and the world was given to understand that the establishment of free labor in Cuba would be a reason for wresting that island from Spain. Territories were annexed; Louisiana, Florida, Texas, half of Mexico; slavery must have its share in them all, and it accepted for a time a dividing line between the unquestioned domain of free labor and that in which involuntary labor was to be tolerated. A few years passed away, and the new school, strong and arrogant, demanded and received an apology for applying the Jefferson proviso to Oregon.

SQUATTER SOVEREIGNTY.

The application of that proviso was interrupted for three administrations; but justice moved steadily onward. In the news that the men of California had chosen freedom, Calhoun heard the knell of parting slavery; and on his deathbed he counselled secession. Washington, and Jefferson, and Madison, had died despairing of the abolition of slavery; Calhoun died in despair at the growth of freedom. His system rushed irresistibly to its natural development. The death struggle for California was followed by a short truce; but the new school of politicians who said that slavery was not evil, but good, soon sought to recover the ground they had lost, and confident of securing Texas, they demanded that the established line in the territories between freedom and slavery should be blotted out. The country, believing in the strength and enterprise and expansive energy of freedom, made answer, though reluctantly: "Be it so; let there be no strife between brethren; let freedom and slavery compete for the territories on equal terms, in a fair field under an impartial administration;" and on this theory, if on any, the contest might have been left to the decision of time.

DRED SCOTT DECISION.

The South started back in appallment from its victory; for it knew that a fair competition foreboded its defeat. But where could it now find an ally to save it from its own mistake? What I have next to say is spoken with no emotion but regret. Our meeting to-day is, as it were, at the grave, in the presence of Eternity, and the truth must be uttered in soberness and sincerity,

In a great republic, as was observed more than two thousand years ago, any attempt to overturn the state owes its strength to aid from some branch of the government. The Chief Justice of the United States, without any necessity or occasion, volunteered to come to the rescue of the theory of slavery. And from his court there lay no appeal but to the bar of humanity and history. Against the Constitution, against the memory of the nation, against a previous decision, against a series of enactments, he decided that the slave is property, that slave property is entitled to no less protection than any other property, that the Constitution upholds it in every territory against any act of a local Legislature, and even against Congress itself; or, as the President tersely promulgated the saying: "Kansas is as much a slave State as South Carolina or Georgia; slavery, by virtue of the Constitution, exists in every territory." The municipal character of slavery being thus taken away, and slave property decreed to be "sacred," the authority of the courts was invoked to introduce it by the comity of law into States where slavery had been abolished; and in one of the courts of the United States a judge pronounced the African slave trade legitimate, and numerous and powerful advocates demanded its restoration.

TANEY AND SLAVE RACES.

Moreover, the Chief Justice, in his elaborate opinion, announced what had never been heard from any magistrate of Greece or Rome — what was unknown to civil law, and canon law, and feudal law, and common law, and constitutional law; unknown to Jay, to Rutledge, Ellsworth and Marshall — that there are "slave races." The spirit of evil is intensely logical. Having the authority of this decision, five States swiftly followed the earlier example of a sixth, and opened the way for reducing the free negro to bondage; the migrating free negro became a slave if he but touched the soil of a seventh; and an eighth, from its extent and soil and mineral resources, destined to incalculable greatness, closed its eyes on its coming prosperity, and enacted — as by Taney's decision it had the right to do — that every free black man who would live within its limits must accept the condition of slavery for himself and his posterity.

SECESSION RESOLVED ON.

Only one step more remained to be taken. Jefferson and the leading statesmen of his day held fast to the idea that the enslavement of the African was socially, morally and politically wrong. The new school was founded exactly upon the opposite idea; and they resolved first to distract the democratic party for which the Supreme Court had now furnished the means, and then to establish a new government, with negro slavery for its corner stone, as socially, morally and politically right.

THE ELECTION.

As the presidential election drew on, one of the old traditional parties did not make its appearance; the other reeled as it sought to preserve its old position; and the candidate who most nearly represented its best opinion, driven by patriotic zeal, roamed the country from end to end to speak for union, eager at least to confront its enemies, yet not having hope that it would find its deliverance through him. The storm rose to a whirlwind; who should allay its wrath? The most experienced statesmen of the country had failed; there was no hope from those who were great after the flesh; could relief come from one whose wisdom was like the wisdom of little children?

EARLY LIFE OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The choice of America fell on a man born west of the Alleghanies, in the cabin of poor people of Hardin county, Kentucky — Abraham Lincoln.

His mother could read, but not write; his father could do neither; but his parents sent him, with an old spelling-book, to school, and he learned in his childhood to do both.

When eight years old he floated down the Ohio with his father on a raft which bore the family and all their possessions to the shore of Indiana; and, child as he was, he gave help as they toiled through dense forests to the interior of Spencer county. There in the land of free labor he grew up in a log cabin, with the solemn solitude for his teacher in his meditative hours. Of Asiatic literature he knew only the Bible; of Greek, Latin, and mediæval, no more than the translation of Æsop's Fables; of English, John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. The traditions of George Fox and William Penn passed to him dimly along the lines of two centuries through his ancestors, who were Quakers.

HIS EDUCATION.

Otherwise his education was altogether American. The Declaration of Independence was his compendium of political wisdom, the life of Washington his constant study, and something of Jefferson and Madison reached him through Henry Clay, whom he honoured from boyhood. For the rest, from day to day, he lived the life of the American people; walked in its light; reasoned with its reason, thought with its power of thought; felt the beatings of its mighty heart; and so was in every way a child of nature—a child of the West—a child of America.

HIS PROGRESS IN LIFE.

At nineteen, feeling impulses of ambition to get on in the world, he engaged himself to go down the Mississippi in a flat boat, receiving ten dollars a month for his wages, and afterwards he made the trip once more. At twenty-one he drove his father's cattle as the family migrated to Illinois, and split rails to fence in the new homestead in the wild. At twenty-three he was a captain of volunteers in the Black Hawk war. He kept a shop; he learned something of surveying; but of English literature he added to Bunyan nothing but Shakespeare's plays. At twenty-five he was elected to the Legislature of Illinois, where he served eight years. At twenty-seven he was admitted to the bar. In 1837 he chose his home at Springfield, the beautiful centre of the richest land in the State. In 1847 he was a member of the national Congress, where he voted about forty times in favour of the principle of the Jefferson proviso. In 1854 he gave his influence to elect from Illinois to the American Senate a democrat who would certainly do justice to Kansas. In 1858, as the rival of Douglas, he went before the people of the mighty Prairie State, saying: "This Union cannot permanently endure, half slave and half free; the Union will not be dissolved, but the house will cease to be divided." And now, in 1861, with no experience whatever as an executive officer, while States were madly flying from their orbit, and wise men knew not where to find counsel, this descendant of Quakers, this pupil of Bunyan, this child of the great West was elected President of America.

He measured the difficulty of the duty that devolved on him, and was resolved to fulfil it.

HE GOES TO WASHINGTON.

As on the eleventh of February, 1861, he left Springfield, which for a quarter of a century had been his happy home, to the crowd of his friends and neighbours whom he was never more to meet, he spoke a solemn farewell: "I know not how soon I shall see you again. A duty has devolved upon me, greater than that which has devolved upon any other man since Washington. He never would have succeeded, except for the aid of Divine Providence, upon which he at all times relied. On the same Almighty Being I place my reliance. Pray that I may receive that Divine assistance, without which I cannot succeed, but with which success is certain." To the men of Indiana he said: "I am but an accidental, temporary instrument; it is your business to rise up and preserve the Union and liberty." At the capital of Ohio he said: "Without a name, without a reason why I should have a name, there has fallen upon me a task such as did not rest even upon the Father of his country." At various places in New York, especially at Albany before the Legislature, which tendered him the united support of the great Empire State, he said: "While I hold myself the humblest of all the individuals who have ever been elevated to the Presidency, I have a more difficult task to perform than any of them. I bring a true heart to the work. I must rely upon the people of the whole country for support; and with their sustaining aid even I, humble as I am, cannot fail to carry the ship of State safely through the storm." To the Assembly of New Jersey, at Trenton, he explained: "I shall take the ground I deem most just to the North, the East, the West, the South, and the whole country, in good temper, certainly with no malice to any section. I am devoted to peace, but it may be necessary to put the foot down firmly." In the old Independence Hall of Philadelphia he said: "I have never had a feeling politically that did not spring from the sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence, which gave liberty, not alone to the people of this country, but to the world in all future time. If the country cannot be saved without giving up that principle, I would rather be assassinated on the spot than surrender it. I have said nothing but what I am willing to live and die by."

IN WHAT STATE HE FOUND THE COUNTRY.

Travelling in the dead of night to escape assassination, Lincoln arrived at Washington nine days before his inauguration. The outgoing President, at the opening of the session of Congress had still kept as the majority of his advisers men engaged in treason: had declared that in case of even an "imaginary" apprehension of danger from notions of freedom among the slaves, "disunion would become inevitable." Lincoln and others had questioned the opinion of Taney; such impugning he ascribed to the "factious temper of the times." The favorite doctrine of the majority of the democratic party on the power of a territorial legislature over slavery he condemned as an attack on "the sacred rights of property." The State Legislatures, he insisted, must repeal what he called "their unconstitutional and obnoxious enactments," and which, if such, were "null and void," or "it would be impossible for any human power to save the Union!" Nay! if these unimportant acts were not repealed, "the injured States would be justified in revolutionary resistance to the government of the Union." He maintained that no State might secede at its sovereign will and pleasure; that the Union was meant for perpetuity; and that Congress might attempt to preserve, but only by conciliation; that "the sword was not placed in their hands to preserve it by force;" that "the last desperate remedy of a despairing people" would be "an explanatory amendment recognizing the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States." The American Union he called "a confederacy" of States, and he thought it a duty to make the appeal for amendment "before any of these States should separate themselves from the Union." The views of the Lieutenant-General, containing some patriotic advice, "conceded the right of secession," pronounced a quadruple rupture of the Union "a smaller evil than the reuniting of the fragments by the sword," and "eschewed the idea of invading a seceded State. After changes in the Cabinet, the President informed Congress that "matters were still worse;" that "the South suffered serious grievances," which should be redressed "in peace." The day after this message the flag of the Union was fired upon from Fort Moultrie, and the insult was not revenged or noticed. Senators in Congress telegraphed to their constituents to seize the national forts, and they were not arrested. The finances of the country were grievously embarrassed. Its little army was not within reach—the part of it in Texas, with all its stores, were made over by its commander to the seceding insurgents. One State after another voted in convention to go out of the Union. A peace Congress, so-called, met at the request of Virginia, to concert the terms of capitulation for the continuance of the Union. Congress in both branches sought to devise conciliatory expedients; the territories of the country were organized in a manner not to conflict with any pretensions of the South, or any decision of the Supreme Court; and, nevertheless, the seceding States formed at Montgomery a provisional government, and pursued their relentless purpose with such success that the Lieutenant-General feared the city of Washington might find itself "included in a foreign country," and proposed, among the options for the consideration of Lincoln, to bid the seceded States "depart in peace." The great republic seemed to have its emblem in the vast unfinished capitol, at that moment surrounded by masses of stone and prostrate columns never yet lifted into their places: seemingly the monument of high but delusive aspirations, the confused wreck of inchoate magnificence, sadder than any ruin of Egyptian Thebes or Athens.

HIS INAUGURATION.

The fourth of March came. With instinctive wisdom the new President, speaking to the people on taking the oath of office, put aside every question that divided the country, and gained a right to universal support, by planting himself on the single idea of Union. That Union he declared to be unbroken and perpetual; and he announced his determination to fulfil "the simple duty of taking care that the laws be faithfully executed in all the States." Seven days later, the convention of confederate States unanimously adopted a constitution of their own; and the new government was authoritatively announced to be founded on the idea that slavery is the natural and normal condition of the negro race. The issue was made up whether the great republic was to maintain its providential place in the history of mankind, or a rebellion founded on negro slavery gain a recognition of its principle throughout the civilized world. To the disaffected Lincoln had said: "You have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors." To fire the passions of the Southern portion of the people the confederate government chose to become aggressors; and on the morning of the 12th of April began the bombardment of Fort Sumter, and compelled its evacuation.

UPRISING OF THE PEOPLE

It is the glory of the late President that he had perfect faith in the perpetuity of the Union. Supported in advance by Douglas, who spoke as with the voice of a million, he instantly called a meeting of Congress, and summoned the people to come up and repossess the forts, places and property which had been seized from the Union. The men of the North were trained in schools; industrious and frugal; many of them delicately bred, their minds teeming with ideas and fertile in plans of enterprise; given to the culture of the arts; eager in the pursuit of wealth, yet employing wealth less for ostentation than for developing the resources of their country; seeking happiness in the calm of domestic life; and such lovers of peace that for generations they have been reputed unwarlike. Now, at the cry of their country in its distress, they rose up with unappeasable patriotism: not hirelings—the purest and of the best blood in the land; sons of a pious ancestry, with a clear perception of duty, unclouded faith and fixed resolve to succeed, they thronged round the President to support the wronged, the beautiful flag of the nation. The halls of theological seminaries sent forth their young men, whose lips were touched with eloquence, whose hearts kindled with devotion to serve in the ranks, and make their way to command only as they learned the art of war. Stripplings in the colleges, as well as the most gentle and the most studious; those of sweetest temper and loveliest character and brightest genius passed from their classes to the camp. The lumbermen sprang forward from the forest, the mechanics from their benches, where they had been trained by the exercise of political rights to share the life and hope of the Republic, to feel their responsibility to their forefathers, their posterity and mankind, went forth resolved that their dignity as a constituent part of this republic should not be impaired. Farmers and sons of farmers left the land but half ploughed, the grain but half planted, and, taking up the musket, learned to face without fear the presence of peril and the coming of death in the shocks of war, while their hearts were still attracted to the charms of their rural life, and all the tender affections of home. Whatever there was of truth and faith and public love in the common heart broke out with one expression. The mighty winds blew from every quarter to fan the flame of the sacred and unquenchable fire.

THE WAR A WORLD-WIDE WAR.

For a time the war was thought to be confined to our own domestic affairs; but it was soon seen that it involved the destinies of mankind, and its principles and causes shook the politics of Europe to the centre, and from Lisbon to Peking, divided the governments of the world.

GREAT BRITAIN.

There was a kingdom whose people had in an eminent degree attained to freedom of industry and the security of person and property. Its middle class rose to greatness. Out of that class sprung the noblest poets and philosophers, whose words built up the intellect of its people; skillful navigators, to find out the many paths of the ocean; discoverers in natural science, whose inventions guided its industry to wealth, till it equalled any nation of the world in letters, and excelled all in trade and commerce. But its government was become a government of land, and not of men; every blade of grass was represented, but only a small minority of the people. In the transition from the feudal forms, the heads of the social organization freed themselves from the military services which were the conditions of their tenure, and throwing the burden on the industrial classes, kept all the soil to themselves. Vast estates that had been managed by monasteries as endowments for religion and charity were impropriated to swell the wealth of courtiers and favorites; and the commons, where the poor man once had his right of pasture, were taken away, and, under forms of law, enclosed distributively within their own domains. Although no law forbade any inhabitant from purchasing land, the costliness of the transfer constituted a prohibition; so that it was the rule of that country that the plough should not be in the hands of its owner. The church was rested on a contradiction, claiming to be an embodiment of absolute truth, and yet was a creature of the statute book.

HER SENTIMENTS.

The progress of time increased the terrible contrast between wealth and poverty; in their years of strength, the laboring people, cut off from all share in governing the State, derived a scanty support from the severest toil, and had no hope for old age but in public charity or death. A grasping ambition had dotted the world with military posts, kept watch over our borders on the northeast, at the Bermudas, in the West Indies, held the gates of the Pacific, of the Southern and of the Indian Ocean, hovered on our northwest at Vancouver, held the whole of the newest continent, and the entrances to the old Mediterranean and Red Sea; and garrisoned forts all the way from Madras to China. That aristocracy had gazed with terror on the growth of a commonwealth where freeholds existed by the million, and religion was not in bondage to the state; and now they could not repress their joy at its perils. They had not one word of sympathy for the kind-hearted poor man's son whom America had chosen for her chief; they jeered at his large hands, and long feet, and ungainly stature; and the British secretary of state for foreign affairs made haste to send word through the palaces of Europe that the great republic was in its agony, that the republic was no more, that a head stone was all that remained due by the law of nations to "the late Union." But it is written: "Let the dead bury their dead;" they may not bury the living. Let the dead bury their dead; let a bill of reform remove the worn-out government of a class, and infuse new life into the British constitution by confiding rightful power to the people.

HER POLICY.

But while the vitality of America is indestructible, the British government hurried to do what never before had been done by Christian powers, what was in direct conflict with its own exposition of public law in the time of our struggle for independence. Though the insurgent States had not a ship in an open harbor, it invested them with all the rights of a belligerent, even on the ocean; and this, too, when the rebellion was not only directed against the gentlest and most beneficent government on earth, without a shadow of justifiable cause, but when the rebellion was directed against human nature itself for the perpetual enslavement of a race. And the effect of this recognition was that acts in themselves piratical found shelter in British courts of law. The resources of British capitalists, their workshops, their armories, their private arsenals, their shipyards, were in league with the insurgents, and every British harbor in the wide world became a safe port for British ships, manned by British sailors, and armed with British guns, to prey on our peaceful commerce; even on our ships coming from British ports, freighted with British products, or that had carried gifts of grain to the English poor. The prime minister in the House of Commons, sustained by cheers, scoffed at the thought that their laws could be amended at our request, so as to preserve real neutrality; and to remonstrances now owned to have been just, their secretary answered that they could not change their laws ad infinitum.

RELATIONS WITH ENGLAND.

The people of America then wished, as they always have wished, as they still wish, friendly relations with England; and no man in Europe or America can desire it more strongly than I. This country has always yearned for good relations with England. Thrice only in all its history has that yearning been fairly met; in the days of Hampden and Cromwell, again in the first ministry of the elder Pitt, and once again in the ministry of Shelburne. Not that there have not at all times been just men among the peers of Britain — like Halifax in the days of James the Second, or a Granville, an Argyll, or a Houghton in ours; and we cannot be indifferent to a country that produces statesmen like Cobden and Bright; but the best bower anchor of peace was the working class of England, who suffered most from our civil war, but who, while they broke their diminished bread in sorrow, always encouraged us to persevere.

FRANCE AND THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

The act of recognizing the rebel belligerents was concerted with France; France, so beloved in America, on which she had conferred the greatest benefits that one people ever conferred on another; France, which stands foremost on the continent of Europe for the solidity of her culture, as well as for the bravery and generous impulses of her sons; France, which for centuries had been moving steadily in its own way towards intellectual and political freedom. The policy regarding further colonization of America by European powers, known commonly as the doctrine of Monroe, had its origin in France; and if it takes any man's name, should bear the name of Turgot. It was adopted by Louis the Sixteenth, in the cabinet of which Vergennes was the most important member. It is emphatically the policy of France; to which, with transient deviations, the Bourbons, the First Napoleon, the House of Orleans have ever adhered.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON AND MEXICO.

The late President was perpetually harassed by rumors that the Emperor Napoleon the Third desired formally to recognize the States in rebellion as an independent power, and that England held him back by her reluctance, or France by her traditions of freedom, or he himself by his own better judgment and clear perception of events. But the republic of Mexico, on our borders, was, like ourselves, distracted by a rebellion, and from a similar cause. The monarchy of England had fastened upon us slavery which did not disappear with independence; in like manner, the ecclesiastical policy established by the Spanish council of the Indies, in the days of Charles the Fifth and Philip the Second, retained its vigor in the Mexican Republic. The fifty years of civil war under which she had languished was due to the bigoted system which was the legacy of monarchy, just as here the inheritance of slavery kept alive political strife, and culminated in civil war. As with us there could be no quiet but through the end of slavery, so in Mexico there could be no prosperity until the crushing tyranny of intolerance should cease. The party of slavery in the United States sent their emissaries to Europe to solicit aid; and so did the party of the church in Mexico, as organized by the old Spanish council of the Indies, but with a different result. Just as the republican party had made an end of the rebellion, and was establishing the best government ever known in that region, and giving promise to the nation of order, peace, and prosperity, word was brought us, in the moment of our deepest affliction, that the French emperor, moved by a desire to erect in North America a buttress for Imperialism, would transform the republic of Mexico into a secundo-geniture for the house of Hapsburgh. America might complain; she could not then interpose, and delay seemed justifiable. It was seen that Mexico could not, with all its wealth of land, compete in cereal products with our northwest, nor, in tropical products, with Cuba; nor could it, under a disputed dynasty, attract capital, or create public works, or develop mines, or borrow money; so that the imperial system of Mexico, which was forced at once to recognize the wisdom of the policy of the republic by adopting it, could prove only an unremunerating drain on the French treasury for the support of an Austrian adventurer.

THE PERPETUITY OF REPUBLICAN INSTITUTIONS.

Meantime, a new series of momentous questions grows up, and forces themselves on the consideration of the thoughtful. Republicanism has learned how to introduce into its constitution every element of order, as well as every element of freedom; but thus far the continuity of its government has seemed to depend on the continuity of elections. It is now to be considered how perpetuity is to be secured against foreign occupation. The successor of Charles the First of England dated his reign from the death of his father; the Bourbons, coming back after a long series of revolutions, claimed that the Louis who became king was the eighteenth of that name. The present emperor of the French, disdaining a title from election alone, is called the third of his name. Shall a republic have less power of continuance when invading armies prevent a peaceful resort to the ballot box? What force shall it attach to intervening legislation? What validity to debts contracted for its overthrow? These momentous questions are by the invasion of Mexico thrown up for solution. A free State once truly constituted should be as undying as its people; the republic of Mexico must rise again.

THE POPE OF ROME AND THE REBELLION.

It was the condition of affairs in Mexico that involved the Pope of Rome in our difficulties so far that he alone among temporal sovereigns recognized the chief of the Confederate States as a president, and his supporters as a people; and in letters to two great prelates of the Catholic Church in the United States gave counsels for peace at a time when peace meant the victory of secession. Yet events move as they are ordered. The blessing of the Pope at Rome on the head of Duke Maximilian could not revive in the nineteenth century the ecclesiastical policy of the sixteenth; and the result is only a new proof that there can be no prosperity in the State without religious freedom.

THE PEOPLE OF AMERICA.

When it came home to the consciousness of the Americans that the war which they were waging was a war for the liberty of all the nations of the world, for freedom itself, they thanked God for the severity of the trial to which he put their sincerity, and nerved themselves for their duty with an inexorable will. The President was led along by the greatness of their self-sacrificing example; and as a child, in a dark night on a rugged way, catches hold of the hand of its father for guidance and support, he clung fast to the hand of the people, and moved calmly through the gloom. While the statesmanship of Europe was scoffing at the hopeless vanity of their efforts, they put forth such miracles of energy as the history of the world had never known. The navy of the United States drawing into the public service the willing militia of the seas, doubled its tonnage in eight months, and established an actual blockade from Cape Hatteras to the Rio Grande. In the course of the war it was increased five fold in men and in tonnage, while the inventive genius of the country devised more effective kinds of ordnance, and new forms of naval architecture in wood and iron. There went into the field, for various terms of service, about two million men; and in March last the men in service exceeded a million; that is to say, one of every two able-bodied men took some part in the war; and at one time every fourth able-bodied man was in the field. In one single month, one hundred and sixty-five thousand were recruited into service. Once, within four weeks, Ohio organized and placed in the field, forty-two regiments of infantry — nearly thirty-six thousand men; and Ohio was like other States in the east and in the west. The well-mounted cavalry numbered eighty-four thousand; of horses there were bought, first and last, two thirds of a million. In the movements of troops science came in aid of patriotism; so that, to choose a single instance out of many, an army twenty-three thousand strong, with its artillery, trains, baggage and animals, were moved by rail from the Potomac to the Tennessee, twelve hundred miles in seven days. In the long marches, wonders of military construction bridged the rivers; and wherever an army halted, ample supplies awaited them at their ever changing base. The vile thought that life is the greatest of blessings did not rise up. In six hundred and twenty-five battles, and severe skirmishes blood flowed like water. It streamed over the grassy plains; it stained the rocks; the undergrowth of the forest was red with it; and the armies marched on with majestic courage from one conflict to another, knowing that they were fighting for God and liberty. The organization of the medical department met its infinitely multiplied duties with exactness and despatch. At the news of a battle, the best surgeons of our cities hastened to the field, to offer the zealous aid of the greatest experience and skill. The gentlest and most refined of women left homes of luxury and, ease to build hospital tents near the armies, and serve as nurses to the sick and dying. Besides the large supply of religious teachers by the public, the congregations spared to their brothers in the field the ablest ministers. The Christian Commission, which expended five and a half millions, sent four thousand clergymen chosen out of the best, to keep unsoiled the religious character of the men, and made gifts of clothes and food and medicine. The organization of private charity assumed unheard of dimensions. The Sanitary Commission, which had seven thousand societies, distributed, under the direction of an unpaid board, spontaneous contributions to the amount of fifteen millions, in supplies or money — a million and a half in money from California alone — and dotted the scene of war from Paducah to Port Royal, from Belle Plain, Virginia, to Brownsville, Texas, with homes and lodges.

THE EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION.

The country had for its allies the River

Mississippi, which would not be divided, and the range of mountains which carried the stronghold of the free through Western Virginia and Kentucky and Tennessee to the highlands of Alabama. But it invoked the still higher power of immortal justice. In ancient Greece, where servitude was the universal custom, it was held that if a child were to strike its parent, the slave should defend the parent, and by that act recover his freedom. After vain resistance, Lincoln, who had tried to solve the question by gradual emancipation, by colonization, and by compensation, at last saw that slavery must be abolished, or the Republic must die; and on the 1st day of January, 1863, he wrote liberty on the banners of the armies. When this proclamation, which struck the fetters from three millions of slaves reached Europe, Lord Russell, a countryman of Milton and Wilberforce, eagerly put himself forward to speak of it in the name of mankind, saying: "It is of a very strange nature;" "a measure of war of a very questionable kind;" an "act of vengeance on the slave owner," that does no more than "profess to emancipate slaves where the United States authorities cannot make emancipation a reality." Now there was no part of the country embraced in the proclamation where the United States could not and did not make emancipation a reality. Those who saw Lincoln most frequently had never before heard him speak with bitterness of any human being; but he did not conceal how keenly he felt that he had been wronged by Lord Russell. And he wrote, in reply to another caviller: "The emancipation policy, and the use of colored troops, were the greatest blows yet dealt to the rebellion. The job was a great national one; and let none be slighted who bore an honorable part in it. I hope peace will come soon, and come to stay; then there will be some black men who can remember that they have helped mankind to this great consummation."

RUSSIA AND CHINA.

The proclamation accomplished its end, for, during the war, our armies came into military possession of every State in rebellion. Then, too, was called forth the new power that comes from the simultaneous diffusion of thought and feeling among the nations of mankind. The mysterious sympathy of the millions throughout the world was given spontaneously. The best writers of Europe waked the conscience of the thoughtful, till the intelligent moral sentiment of the Old World was drawn to the side of the unlettered statesman of the West. Russia, whose emperor had just accomplished one of the grandest acts in the course of time by raising twenty millions of bondmen into freeholders, and thus assuring the growth and culture of a Russian people, remained our unwavering friend. From the oldest abode of civilization, which gave the first example of an imperial government with equality among the people, Prince Kung, the secretary of state for foreign affairs, remembered the saying of Confucius, that we should not do to others what we would not that others should do to us, and in the name of the Emperor of China closed its ports against the warships and privateers of "the seditious."

CONTINUANCE OF THE WAR.

The war continued, with all the peoples of the world for anxious spectators. Its cares weighed heavily on Lincoln, and his face was ploughed with the furrows of thought and sadness. With malice towards none, free from the spirit of revenge, victory made him importunate for peace; and his enemies never doubted his word, or despaired of his abounding clemency. He longed to utter pardon as the word for all, but not unless the freedom of the negro should be assured. The grand battles of Mill Spring which gave us Nashville, of Fort Donelson, Malvern Hill, Antietam, Gettysburg, the Wilderness of Virginia, Winchester, Nashville, the capture of New Orleans, Vicksburg, Mobile, Fort Fisher, the march from Atlanta and the capture of Savannah and Charleston, all foretold the issue. Still more, the self-regeneration of Missouri, the heart of the continent; of Maryland, whose sons never heard the midnight bell chime so sweetly as when they rang out to earth and heaven that, by the voice of her own people, she took her place among the free; of Tennessee, which passed through fire and blood, through sorrows and the shadow of death, to work out her own deliverance, and by the faithfulness of her own sons to renew her youth like the eagle—proved that victory was deserved and would be worth all that it cost. If words of mercy uttered as they were by Lincoln on the waters of Virginia, were defiantly repelled, the armies of the country, moving with one will, went as the arrow to its mark, and without a feeling of revenge struck a deathblow at rebellion.

LINCOLN'S ASSASSINATION.

Where, in the history of nations, had a Chief Magistrate possessed more sources of consolation and joy, than Lincoln? His countrymen had shown their love by choosing him to a second term of service. The raging war that had divided the country had lulled; and private grief was hushed by the grandeur of its results. The nation had its new birth of freedom, soon to be secured forever by an amendment of the Constitution. His persistent gentleness had conquered for him a kindlier feeling on the part of the South. His scoffers among the grandees of Europe began to do him honor. The laboring classes every where saw in his advancement their own. All peoples sent him their benedictions. And at the moment of the height of his fame, to which his humility and modesty added charms, he fell by the hand of the assassin; and the only triumph awarded him was the march to the grave.

THE GREATNESS OF MAN.

This is no time to say that human glory is but dust and ashes, that we mortals are no more than shadows in pursuit of shadows. How mean a thing were man, if there were not that within him which is higher than himself—if he could not master the illusions of sense, and discern the connections of events by a superior light which comes from God. He so shares the divine impulses that he has power to subject interested passions to love of country, and personal ambition to the ennoblement of man. Not in vain has Lincoln lived, for he has helped to make this Republic an example of justice, with no caste but the caste of humanity. The heroes who led our armies and ships into battle—Lyon, McPherson, Reynolds, Sedgwick, Wadsworth, Foote, Ward, with their compeers—and fell in the service, did not die in vain; they and the myriads of nameless martyrs, and he, the chief martyr, died willingly "that government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

THE JUST DIED FOR THE UNJUST.

The assassination of Lincoln, who was so free from malice, has from some mysterious influence struck the country with solemn awe, and hushed, instead of exciting, the passion for revenge. It seemed as if the just had died for the unjust. When I think of the friends I have lost in this war—and every one who hears me has, like myself, lost those whom he most loved—there is no consolation to be derived from victims on the scaffold, or from any thing but the established union of the regenerated nation.

CHARACTER OF LINCOLN.

In his character Lincoln was thorough and thorough an American. He is the first native of the region west of the Alleghanies to attain to the highest station; and how happy it is that the man who was brought forward as the natural outgrowth and first fruits of that region should have been of unblemished purity in private life, a good son, a kind husband, a most affectionate father, and, as a man, so gentle to all. As to integrity, Douglas, his rival, said of him, "Lincoln is the honestest man I ever knew."

The habits of his mind were those of meditation and inward thought, rather than of action. He excelled in logical statement, more than in executive ability. He reasoned clearly, his reflective judgment was good, and his purposes were fixed; but like the Hamlet of his only poet, his will was tardy in action, and for this reason, and not from humility or tenderness of feeling, he sometimes deplored that the duty which devolved on him had not fallen to the lot of another. He was skilful in analysis, discerned with precision the central idea on which a question turned, and knew how to disengage it and present it by itself in a few homely, strong old English words that would be intelligible to all. He delighted to express his opinions by apothegm, illustrate them by a parable, or drive them home by a story.

Lincoln gained a name by discussing questions which, of all others, most easily led to fanaticism; but he was never carried away by enthusiastic zeal, never indulged in extravagant language, never hurried to support extreme measures, never allowed himself to be controlled by sudden impulses. During the progress of the election at which he was chosen President, he expressed no opinion that went beyond the Jefferson proviso of 1784. Like Jefferson and Lafayette, he had faith in the intuitions of the people, and read those intuitions with rare sagacity. He knew how to bide his time, and was less apt to be in advance of public opinion than to lag behind. He never sought to electrify the public by taking an advanced position with a banner of opinion; but rather studied to move forward compactly, exposing no detachment in front or rear; so that the course of his administration might have been explained as the calculating policy of a shrewd and watchful politician, had there not been seen behind it a fixedness of principle which from the first determined his purpose and grew more intense with every year, consuming his life by its energy. Yet his sensibilities were not acute, he had no vividness of imagination to picture to his mind the horrors of the battle-field or the sufferings in hospitals; his conscience was more tender than his feelings.

Lincoln was one of the most unassuming of men. In time of success, he gave credit for it to those whom he employed, to the people, and to the providence of God. He did not know what ostentation is; when he became President he was rather saddened than elated, and his conduct and manners showed more than ever his belief that all men are born equal. He was no respecter of persons; and neither rank, nor reputation, nor services overawed him. In judging of character he failed in discrimination, and his appointments were sometimes bad; but he readily deferred to public opinion, and in appointing the head of the armies he followed the manifest preference of Congress.

A good President will secure unity to his administration by his own supervision of the various departments. Lincoln, who accepted advice readily, was never governed by any member of his Cabinet, and could not be moved from a purpose deliberately formed; but his supervision of affairs was unsteady and incomplete; and sometimes, by a sudden interference transcending the usual forms, he rather confused than advanced the public business. If he ever failed in the scrupulous regard due to the relative rights of Congress, it was so evidently without design that no conflict could ensue, or evil precedent be established. Truth he would receive from any one; but, when impressed by others, he did not use their opinions till by reflection he had made them thoroughly his own.

It was the nature of Lincoln to forgive. When hostilities ceased, he who had always sent forth the flag with every one of its stars in the field, was eager to receive back his returning countrymen, and meditated "some new announcement to the South." The amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery had his most earnest and unwearied support. During the rage of war we get a glimpse into his soul from his privately suggesting to Louisiana that "in defining the franchise some of the colored people might be let in," saying: "They would probably help, in some trying time to come, to keep the jewel of liberty in the family of freedom." In 1857 he avowed himself "not in favor of" what he improperly called "negro citizenship:" for the Constitution discriminates between citizens and electors. Three days before his death he declared his preference that "the elective franchise were now conferred on the very intelligent of the colored men and on those of them who served our cause as soldiers;" but he wished it done by the States themselves, and he never harbored the thought of exacting it from a new government as a condition of its recognition.

The last day of his life beamed with sunshine, as he sent by the speaker of this House his friendly greetings to the men of the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific slope; as he contemplated the return of hundreds of thousands of soldiers to fruitful industry; as he welcomed in advance hundreds of thousands of emigrants from Europe; as his eye kindled with enthusiasm at the coming wealth of the nation. And so, with these thoughts for his country, he was removed from the toils and temptations of this life and was at peace.

PALMERSTON AND LINCOLN.

Hardly had the late President been consigned to the grave, when the Prime Minister of England died, full of years and honours. Palmerston traced his lineage to the time of the conqueror: Lincoln went back only to his grandfather. Palmerston received his education from the best scholars of Harrow, Edinburgh, and Cambridge; Lincoln's early teachers were the silent forest, the prairie, the river, and the stars. Palmerston was in, public life for sixty years; Lincoln for but a tenth of that time. Palmerston was a skilful guide of an established aristocracy; Lincoln a leader or rather a companion of the people. Palmerston was exclusively an Englishman, and made his boast in the House of Commons that the interest of England was his Shibboleth; Lincoln thought always of mankind as well as his own country, and served human nature itself. Palmerston from his narrowness as an Englishman did not endear his country to any one court or to any one people, but rather caused uneasiness and dislike; Lincoln left America more beloved than ever by all the peoples of Europe. Palmerston was self-possessed and adroit in reconciling the conflicting claims of the factions of the aristocracy; Lincoln, frank and ingenuous, knew how to poise himself on the conflicting opinions of the people. Palmerston was capable of insolence towards the weak, quick to the sense of honour, not heedful of right; Lincoln rejected counsel given only as a matter of policy, and was not capable of being wilfully unjust. Palmerston, essentially superficial, delighted in banter, and knew how to divert grave opposition by playful levity. Lincoln was a man of infinite jest on his lips, with saddest earnestness at his heart. Palmerston was a fair representative of the aristocratic liberality of the day, choosing for his tribunal, not the conscience of humanity, but the House of Commons; Lincoln took to heart the eternal truths of liberty, obeyed them as the commands of Providence, and accepted the human race as the judge of his fidelity. Palmerston did nothing that will endure; his great achievement, the separation of Belgium, placed that little kingdom where it must gravitate to France; Lincoln finished a work which all time cannot overthrow. Palmerston is a shining example of the ablest of a cultivated aristocracy; Lincoln shows the genuine fruits of institutions where the laboring man shares and assists to form the great ideas and designs of his country. Palmerston was buried in Westminster Abbey by the order of his Queen, and was followed by the British aristocracy to his grave, which after a few years will hardly be noticed by the side of the graves of Fox and Chatham; Lincoln was followed by the sorrow of his country across the continent to his resting-place in the heart of the Mississippi valley, to be remembered through all time by his countrymen, and by all the peoples of the world.

CONCLUSION.

As the sum of all, the hand of Lincoln raised the flag; the American people was the hero of the war; and therefore the result is a new era of republicanism. The disturbances in the country grew not out of anything republican, but out of slavery, which is a part of the system of hereditary wrong, and the expulsion of this domestic anomaly opens to the renovated nation a career of unthought of dignity and glory. Henceforth our country has a moral unity as the land of free labour. The party for slavery and the party against slavery are no more, and are merged in the party of Union and freedom. The States which would have left us are not brought back as conquered States, for then we should hold them only so long as that conquest could be maintained; they come to their rightful place under the Constitution as original, necessary and inseparable members of the State. We build monuments to the dead, but no monuments of victory. We respect the example of the Romans, who never, even in conquered lands, raised emblems of triumph. And our generals are not to be classed in the herd of vulgar conquerors, but are of the school of Timoleon and William of Orange and Washington. They have used the sword only to give peace to their country and restore her to her place in the great assembly of the nations. Our meeting closes in hope, now that a people begins to live according to the laws of reason, and republicanism is intrenched in a continent.

To the Editor of the Living Age.

I think thou wilt agree with me that the following poem is worthy of a place in thy miscellany. Its author, as the lines indicate, is both blind and deaf, and I know not where to look for a more pathetic, or, with the exception of Milton's sonnets and Samson Agonists, a more sublime description of the double solitude of night and silence.

J. G. W.

DARKNESS AND SILENCE.

"Silence and darkness, solemn sisters, twins
From ancient night, who nurse the growing thought
To reason, and on reason build resolve,
(That column of true majesty in man,)
Assist me; I will thank you in the grave;
The grave your kingdom; there this frame shall fall
A victim sacred to your dreary shrine."
YOUNG'S NIGHT THOUGHTS.

I.

WHERE is the harp that once with dirges thrilled,
But now is hushed in leaden slumbers,
Save when the withered hand old *age hath chilled
Sweeps o'er its chords in broken numbers?
It hangs in halls where shapes of sorrow dwell,
Where echoless silence tolls the muffled knell
Of dead delights and fleeting years.
Go, bring it me, sweet friend; and, ore we part,
A tale I'll weave so sad 'twill wring thy heart
Of all its pity, all its tears.

As fitful shadows round me gather fast,
And solemn watch my thoughts are holding,
Dear Memory comes, lone hermit of the past,
The rising morn of life unfolding.
Now fade from view all living joy and strife;
Time past is now my present, death my life;
All that exists is obsolete;
While o'er my soul there steals the pensive glow
Of sainted joys that young years only know;
And past scenes looming dimly rise, and throw
Their lengthening shadows at my feet.

I see a morn domed in by sunny skies;
The dew is on its budding pleasures;
The fresh warm light all glad some on it lies;
And to it from this dark my pent soul flies,
As misers nightly to their treasures.
With airy pace in one long glittering train,

THIRD SERIES. LIVING AGE. VOL. XXXII. 1479.

Winding along the dream-lit shadowy plain,
Like ghosts of hope and youth and bloom,
Year after year, all beautiful and bright,
In phantom silence stealing on my sight,
Comes gliding, gliding from the tomb;
And, trooping by, their lines of fading light
Remind of youth's decay and beauty's blight, Till, like spent meteors shimmering through the night,
The vision melts in closing gloom.

Another day, in sable vesture clad,
All drear with new-blown pleasures blighted,
Comes blindly groping through the twilight sad,
Like one in moonless mists benighted.
Oh, day unhappy! could oblivion roll
Its leaden billows o'er my shrinking soul,
Living or dying I'd ne'er forget!
For life bereft of light no memory needs
To tell of night that ne'er to morning leads,
Or day that is for ever set.

From yonder sky the noonward sun was torn,
Ere day dawn's rosy hue had fled;
A midnight blotted out my spreading morn,
Ere childhood's dewy joys had vanished.
No slow-paced evening ushered in the night;
Like a spangled web, the heavens were swept from sight;
The mild moon fled and never waned,
And all of earth that's beautiful and fair
Became as shadows in the empty air:
A boundless, blackened blank remained.

I heard the gates of Night with sullen jar
Close on the smiling Day for ever;
Hope from my sky dropped like a falling star,
Again to reach her zenith never.
For she, blithe offspring of the jocund Day,
Was loath to enter with obtrusive ray,
Where Night, swart goddess, held unsocial sway;
And things of beauty, grace, and bloom,
And fair-formed joys that once around me danced,
Bewildered grew where sunbeams never glanced,
And lost their way in that thick gloom.

Pensylla, o'er me many sunless years
Of faithless hopes and soul-benumbing fears
Have flown, since last a beam of Heaven,
The coming-on of morn mid smiles and tears,
The soft descent of dreamy even;
Or sight of woods and meads in green arrayed,
Valley or hill or stream or dewy glade,

Or vernal sunshine or autumnal shade,
 Or winter's gloom or summer's blaze;
 Or bird or beast or creeper of the sod,
 Or all those works that trophy man's abode,
 Or him divine the image of his God,
 Answered my failing gaze.

Look, gentle guide, thou seest the impatient
 Sun
 Forth sending far his ambient glory,
 O'er laughing fields and frowning mountains
 dun,

O'er glancing streams and woodlands hoary.
 In orient clouds is steeped his amber hair;
 His beams, far-slanting through the flaming air, Bid Earth, with all her hymning sounds, declare

The praise of everlasting light.
 On my bared head I feel his pitying ray;
 He gently shines on my benighted way;
 But ah, Pensylla, he brings me no day, —
 Nor yet his setting, deeper night.

O thou that veil'st the dread eternal throne,
 And dost of him in sense remind me!
 From me, O Light of Heaven! why hast thou flown,

To these dark shades why hast resigned me?
 On pinions of surpassing beauty borne,
 When Nature hails the glad ascent of morn,
 In thine unsullied loveliness
 Thou comest; but to my darkened eyes in vain:
 My night, e'en in the noon of thy domain,
 Yields not to thee; for joy of thine again
 Can ne'er my dayless being bless.

II.

Next Silence, fit companion of the night,
 In dismal nought my being steeping,
 Like the felt presence of an unseen sprite,
 With muffled tread comes creeping, creeping.

Before me close her smothering curtain swings,
 And o'er my life a shadeless shadow flings,
 Descending pitilessly slow,
 To shroud this last sweet glimpse of earth and
 man,

And trammel me within the narrow span,
 An arm's length here below.

Oh, whither shall I fly this stroke to shun!

Where turn me this side death and heaven!
 Almost I would my course on earth were run,
 And all to night and silence given!
 I turn to man. Can he but bless and mourn?
 Like me he's helpless; and, like bubbles borne,
 We to a common haven float.

To Him, the All-seeing and All-hearing One, Behold, I turn. More hid than he there's none,

More silent none, none more remote.

Alas, Pensylla, stay that pious tear!
 Now, hither come, I fain thy voice would hear.
 Like music when the soul is dreaming,
 Like music dropping from a far-off sphere,

Like music heard when the close of life is near,
 It faintly comes, — a spirit's seeming.
 The sounds that once delighting round me stole,

Lifting to heaven in silent praise my soul;
 The rush of winds and waves, the thunder's roll,

The steed's proud neigh, the lamb's meek
 plaint,

The insect's hum, the vesper hymn of birds,
 The rural harmony of flocks and herds,
 The sounds of mirth, and man's inspiring words, —

Come to me fainter, yet more faint.

Was my poor soul to God's great works so dull
 That they from her must hide for ever?
 Is earth too bright, too fair, too beautiful,

For me ingrate, that we must sever?
 By blossom-scented gales that round me blow,
 By vernal showers, the sun's impassioned glow,
 And smell of woods and meads, alone I know

Of Spring's approach and summer's bloom;
 And by the pure air void of odors sweet,
 By noontide beams low slanting without heat,
 By rude winds, yielding snows, and hazardous sleet,

Of autumn's blight and winter's gloom.

As at the entrance of a yawning cave

I shrink; so still is all and sombre:
 This death of sense makes life a breathing
 grave,

A vital death, a waking slumber.
 Yet must I yield. Though fled for e'er the light,

Though utter silence bring me double night,
 Though to my insulated mind

Knowledge no more her precious leaves unfold,
 And cheering face of man I ne'er behold,
 Yet must submit, must be resigned.

III.

Thou sad, blind Milton, solemn son of night,
 Great exile once from day's dominion bright,
 Though from thine eyes earth's beauteous form was veiled,

And thickening shadows round thee blindly sailed,

Yet thou, in lone effulgence beaming,
 From that proud height unscaled by mortal
 man,

As with an angel's ken at will didst scan

Wide heaven in solid glory gleaming.
 When seraph harps with loud hosannas thrilled,
 And Eden with descending echoes filled,
 Or at Jehovah's voice were sweetly stilled;

When envy peace celestial marred,
 And on swift wings the embattled hosts of heaven

With untried arms to unwonted war were driven,

When with that fall the empyreal walls were fiven,

Which hell to its black welkin jarred;
 And when in ether God from chaos hurled

The wondrous fabric of a new-born world,
And yon star-spangled firmament unfurled,
E'en then thou wert, O mighty bard !

O'er earth thy numbers shall not cease to roll
Till man to live, who to them hearkened ;
Thy fame no less immortal than thy soul,
Shall shine when yon proud sun is darkened,
Methinks I see thee now, O bard divine !
Where ripen no fair joys that are not thine,
And God's full love delights on thee to shine.
Still by the heavenly muses fired.
And in obedience swift to high command,
Thou sweep'st the sacred lyre with matchless hand,
While seraphs in mute rapture round thee stand,
As one by God alone inspired.

And thou Beethoven wizard king of sound,
Once exiled from thy realms, but not dis-crowned,

Assist me ; for my spirit, thrilling
With thy surpassing harmony, is mute,
As when the echoes of a dreaming lute
With music weird the ear is filling.
When Silence clasped thee in her dismal spell,
And earth-born Music sang her sad farewell,
Thy mighty genius, as in scorn,
Arose in silent majesty to dwell,
Where from harmonious spheres thou heardest to swell

Sounds scarce by angels heard, e'en in their dreams,

Which at thy bidding wove a thousand themes,
And, flowing down in rich pellucid streams,
Filled organ grand and silvery horn,
With limpid sweetness touched each dulcet string,

Made martial bugle and wild clarion ring,
Soft flute provoked, like some lone bird of spring,

To breathe the love-lays of hope forlorn ;
Woke shrilly reed to many a pastoral note, Thrilled witching lyre, and lips melodious smote,

Till earth in tuneful ether seemed to float,
As first when sang the stars of morn ;
Till wondering angels were entranced to chime
With harp and choral tongue thy strains sublime,

And bear thy name beyond the blight of time,
Heaven's halls harmonious to adorn.

Ah me ! could I with ken angelic scan Celestial glories hid from mortal man,
I'd deem this night a day supernal !
Could music, born in some far-singing sphere,
Float sweetly down and thrill my stricken ear,
I'd pray this hush might be eternal !

IV.

And now, with iridescent points of fire,
The sun red-sinking tips yon distant spire ;
O'er wooded hills and lawny meadows
Shoots wide and level his expiring beams ;
Then sinks to rest, like one sure of sweet
dreams,

'Mid pillowing clouds and curtaining shadows.

Night's ebon wings brood darkling o'er the earth ;

The stars gleam out, the meek-eyed moon comes forth ;

The evening hymn of praise, the song of mirth,
Rise gratefully from man's abode.

O Night ! I love her sombre majesty ;
'Tis sweet, her double solitude to me !
Pensylla, leave me now, alone I'd be,
Alone with darkness and my God !

O thou whose shadow is but light's excess,
The echo of whose voice but silentness,
To one, for whom in vain thy lamps now burn,
A hearing deign, nor from thy footstool spurn
The offering of a sorrowing mind !

And as but now in darkness downward whirled,
Thy likeness dim, that thereby might the world,
Behold thy star-dropt firmament unfurled.

So in my night let me but find
New realms, where thought and fancy may rejoice ;

Let its long silence ne'er displace thy voice
But in my soul pour radiance from above ;
Me so inspire with truth, faith, courage, love,
That thou and man my work shall well approve, —

And I shall be resigned
Though smitten deaf and blind !

And now, O harp of the mournful voice, farewell !

As night-winds wailing down some spectred dell,

In memory still my spirit haunting,
I hear thine echoes burdened with the swell
Of long-sung monody and long-tolled knell,
And dirges o'er the dead past chanting.

I'll hang thee up again in Sorrow's hall,
Where Night and Silence spread oblivion's pall O'er joys that, one by one, like sere leaves fall,
And leave the stricken soul to weep.

Henceforth I sing in happier, bolder strains.
What's lost to me is God's ; what yet remains,
Still his own gifts. In endless light he reigns,
And reck'ning of my long and voiceless night will keep.

THE saying of Lord Bacon, that 'Death opens the gate of Fame, and shuts the gate of Envy after it,' is but half true of politicians. On the evening of a statesman's funeral Jealousy and Grudge drink their last cup of malice; and through the aisles of the cathedral Echo faintly sings, 'His name liveth evermore.' But is it always so? Talleyrand, Castlereagh, Metternich, Pozzo di Borgo, — the men who plied the loom of Europe's diplomatic fate at Paris and Vienna, and upon whose very bon mots governments and nations hung, — who thinks or speaks of any of them now? 'They are all gone,' in the words of Carlyle, 'sunk down, down, with the tumult they made; and the rolling and the trampling of ever new generations passed over them, and they hear it not any more forever.'

But there is a distinction solid and real to be drawn between the men who have spent their lives in diplomatic or executive work and those who, though they have never worn the livery of office, have either as publicists or legislators, or both, wrought important changes in the condition of their country, and in the plight of their fellow-men. One may even distinguish between the tribute which popular memory pays to the longevity of good in a man's works, and to the comparative evanescence of result in those performances of his which attract more attention and win more praise at the time. Tradition tells but a confused tale of Alfred's heroic ousting of the Dane; but through the lapse of centuries it has never faltered in its thanks to the founder of popular order and popular right, of free school learning and of jury-made law. Of the subtle statecraft of King Cromwell, how little is remembered now? but who forgets his agitator life in contraband conventicle at Yarmouth or the Fens, and the part he bore in the great strife of words at Westminster? For what is Napoleon remembered gratefully by Western Europe? Not for Marengo, Austerlitz, or Wagram, but for that imperishable code of just and equal laws which he had the wisdom to devise, the industry to elaborate, and the humanity to impose wherever ruined feudalism had left society an unsheltered wreck. And when we look down the roll of public-men since the Revolution, we are constrained to ask ourselves again and again, how little trace has been left upon the sands of time by the great majority of those who have held power, as it is called, in their day! Even of Walpole and Pitt, how much is practically remembered? — less by the educated many than of Burke, Adam Smith, Wilberforce, or Macintosh. The year gone by has seen the last of two of our foremost men, each in his way without compeer, but in their ways so entirely different that, save for the sake of contrast, they can hardly be spoken of together. This is not the place or the fitting opportunity to speak of the illustrious minister whose mortal career has lately closed. Nor would it be a gracious or a grateful task on our part, to inquire what the probable effect of time may be upon his reputation. At present we have to perform another duty — that of endeavouring to recall the features of a man who, without any of the adventitious aids of birth or fortune, raised himself, in the most aristocratic and money-worshipping country in the world, to a position of influence and power the like of which no man without rank or office has of late years exercised amongst us. If Richard Cobden be forgotten, it will be because the good that men do does not live after them; and this we are bound to disbelieve. Whatever he accomplished in public life was not only professedly, but on all hands was confessedly for the uplifting of the people, and for the rendering permanently better their condition, and that of their neighbours. Purer and nobler and wider aims no man ever cherished. That he sometimes mistook the best way to their accomplishment, and sometimes miscalculated the odds and chances of the political game, is only to say that he was fallible, and at the same time enthusiastic. But his errors, now that he is gone, his severest critics cheerfully acknowledge to have been mistakes of intellect, not of heart, and of but passing moment, not of enduring evil.

The family of Copden is traceable in the territorial records of Sussex through several centuries. With other yeomen of substance we find one of them offered as surety for the payment by Sir Roger de Covert, Lord of the Manor, for whose charges or fines by tenure of chivalry distress had been levied by the Crown. In 1313, Thomas Copden was sent to Westminster to serve in Parliament for the episcopal city of Chichester; and when the fear of Spanish invasion kindled the pride and pluck of all classes in the land, five and twenty pounds, a large sum in those days, were subscribed by Thomas Copden, to prepare for resisting the Armada. The like spirit warmed his illustrious descendant when, repudiating the charge of indifference to the inviolability of the realm, he said in a speech advocating naval retrenchment, — 'I would never consent to our fleets being reduced to less than an equality with those of any two other maritime powers. But with that, I think, we ought to be content.' The orthography of the patronymic seems to have changed early in the seventeenth century; but the characteristic self-reliance, thrift, and contempt for social affectation remained unchanged. In 1629, when Charles I. resorted to the device for raising money, of offering knighthood to many persons among the smaller and wealthier yeomanry, with the alternative of paying so much money to be excused, Thomas Copden preferred to pay his fine rather than assume a title which would not have rendered him the happier, but which might have tended in some sort to alienate the sympathy, if not to excite the envy, of his farming neighbours. The sturdy self-respectful instinct, as we know, did not die out in his descendants. No man in our time who has been so feted and flattered, showed less desire to forget the measure of the family hearth by which in childhood he had played, or to have it forgotten. Ambition he had abundantly; and if not covetous of riches, he was not insensible to their value, or wanting in the self-denying energy and perseverance calculated to secure the immunity from privation they afford to those he loved. But readily and without a sigh he abandoned the pursuit of wealth to nobler objects; and when the opportunity presented itself of choosing a permanent residence for the evening of his days, his heart naturally turned to the old family home, in whose quiet and seclusion he felt more happiness and pride than he could have done in the showiest suburban villa, with its bronze gates, flower-houses, and rococo finery. He used to say that he valued a man above all other things for his having a backbone: the want of almost every other member might be in some degree supplied; wig, false teeth, glass eye, stuffed arm, and wooden leg — all might be had for a trifle round the corner; but if a man was born without a backbone, you could never put it into him, or get him to stand for half an hour as if he had one.

In his own demeanour, conduct, language, and life, he was the most consistently regardless man of the pretensions and of the unrealities of rank we have ever known. There was not a spark of envy or grudge in his disposition; and if ever he thought of levelling, it was in the sense only of raising up those below him, not of undermining or despoiling those above him.

At the Grammar School of Midhurst, under the mastership of Mr. Philip Knight, he had the reputation of an open-hearted, unassuming boy, steady and diligent at the tasks set him, but evincing less quickness of parts than his elder brother Frederick. At twelve he was transferred to Mr. Clarkson's Seminary at Greta, in Yorkshire, where he remained three years. He had no turn for classical acquirements, the value of which in after years he was rather disposed to depreciate. What he loved best, and what he most completely mastered, was geography, of which he probably knew more than all the rest of his classfellows put together. The value he set on this branch of study is noticeable throughout all his after-life. He was the comparative anatomist of modern civilization; and not only believed in the worth of international sympathy as a humanizing sentiment, but in the policy and wisdom of international knowledge as indispensable to a full reciprocity of benefits. At a public meeting a friend incidentally made use of the expression once, that as it was not in the sight of Heaven good for man to be alone, neither was it right or wise for a community to try to dwell apart. He cheered the expression vehemently, and afterwards commended in warm terms the maxim conveyed in the illustration. To use his own words, 'No nation, however strong or good, can afford to play the hermit.' No wonder that he continued throughout life to prize what had been, as it were, in his mind the ground-plan of his whole political system. In his last speech at Rochdale he dwelt at considerable length upon the neglect of geographical teaching in our schools, and told the tale of his search, when visiting Attica, for the stream of the storied Iliussus, and of his amusement when at last he discovered the insignificant brook hardly containing water enough to serve the purposes of some dozen laundresses: and yet, as he chidingly observed, too many of our fine young English gentlemen who, fresh from College, undertake to legislate for the wants of the Empire and its relations with the rest of the civilized world, know more of the course of this classic land-drain than they do of the Amazon or the Mississippi. For this he was soundly rated in the columns of the daily and weekly press, as if he had been guilty of inculcating some darkening heresy, or wished to discredit scholastic learning. But this was not his meaning or his aim. He thought indeed that the uniform drill of upper class intellect in Greek prosody, Latin verse, and the religion of Olympus, was an inadequate substitute for modern knowledge, in the youth of a ruling class. No man had a greater respect for true scholarship of any and of every kind; but he knew that one-half the young men who, by the right divine of territorial rank or fortune, enter Parliament at an early age, have never willingly spent an hour in the study of the Classics, which at Eton and Christchurch they regard simply as the plague of their idle lives. And being a man wholly devoid of superstition, whether social or educational, he could not help laughing aloud at that which prescribes a uniform system of mental training, so barren of flower or fruit, to the exclusion or neglect of teachings that might prove less irksome and that might fairly be expected to serve a more practical purpose.

At sixteen he began his unindentured apprenticeship to trade under his uncle, who was an extensive warehouseman in East-cheap. The knowledge derivable from books was regarded at that time as wholly out of place in a youth bound to follow business and nothing else. There might be nothing actually wrong in his skimming through a novel once in a way; and of course it was all right to read a chapter or a Psalm on a Sunday night before going to bed; always provided that he was not too sleepy to forget to put out the candle, a circumstance fairly presumable. But as for study of any kind, or the collecting of information, even about trade, from books, pamphlets, or newspapers, the thing was deemed an absurdity or an affectation; and when the beardless youth betrayed leanings that way, he incurred at first pity for his want of sense, and then reproof for his obdurate wilfulness in thus misusing his time. Luckily for himself and for the world, however, he still went his way, working hard and well by daylight and by dusk, and never neglecting the business of his relative till the doors of the warehouse closed. But when his companions had betaken themselves to the amusements befitting their time of life, or were glad to enjoy an early sleep, he loved to occupy himself with such books of travels, biography, and history, as his limited opportunities enabled him to obtain: and very early his mind became attracted by the study of those branches of knowledge which furnish the materials of industrial philosophy. Opinions he could be hardly said to have thought of forming. Although, if we knew all, it is probable that we should be able to trace very early the seemingly haphazard shedding of seed, which in his genial mind quickly struck root and slowly but steadily grew, although unnoticed and unnoticeable for many a year to come. In the fluctuations of trade the old merchant proved unfortunate; while his studious nephew, having belied his forebodings and thriven as well as risen in life, had the gratification of repaying his anxious though undiscerning care by contributing to his comfort in his declining years.

On quitting his uncle's warehouse, young Cobden undertook the duties of a commercial traveller, and showed so much activity and discrimination in that capacity, that he was early enabled to obtain a junior partner's share in a house trading both in Manchester and London. He threw himself with energy into the development of the particular branch of manufacture with which his name was subsequently associated; and in a few years the firm, mainly owing to his personal skill, perseverance, and enterprise, had acquired a high reputation. In his leisure hours he continued to enlarge his stock of general information, and from the outset felt longings he could not wholly restrain, to have his say about what was publicly passing around him. He saw the children of the working classes growing up without any species of instruction, and when they drew near the verge of maturity left without any species of intellectual relaxation, or any means of qualifying themselves to enjoy it. He applied himself with zeal to the local remedy of both evils. His voice, his pen, and his purse were devoted to the encouragement of free schools in Manchester; and he was one of the founders of the Athenæum in that city, one of the first institutions of the kind established in England. For the purpose of extending the connections of his house he made several journeys abroad, by which his views were greatly expanded, and as he used himself to say, his islander vanity and pretension cut down. Love of country was with him not an exclusive, but a preferential love. He did not want to grow rich himself by overreaching others or by grinding them down, and he did not want his country to do as it would not be done by. He had a thorough faith in the doctrine that for all who will work honestly and intelligently the world is wide enough, and that there is room to spare. He gloried in the thought that England was the most successful merchant adventurer of the nations; but he reprobated the narrow and short-sighted maxims that so long bade her exult in her strength as a means of jostling competitive industries in the race, or throwing them out of the running. He wished to see his country occupying, not the hated place of commercial tyrant or monopolist, but the noble and beloved position of chief among brethren.

He first visited America in 1835, making a rapid tour through the principal seaboard States, and the adjacent portions of Canada, during the months of June and July. His early impressions of the great commonwealth of the West were alike vivid and permanent, some of them finding their way to publicity in the course of the following year.

His first appearance as an author was in the character of a Manchester manufacturer, under which name he published a remarkable pamphlet, entitled 'England, Ireland, and America.' His aim was to advocate in foreign affairs the policy of strict non-intervention, based upon considerations of an industrial and commercial rather than of a political kind. Mr. Fox and Lord Grey had resisted armed intermeddling in the affairs of the Continent, when interference sprang from dynastic and anti-democratic motives; and Mr. Canning had, from considerations of expediency, refused to interpose in Italy and Spain, even when he felt called upon most loudly to protest against the intrusion of French and Austrian bayonets. But non-interference was defended by these statesmen on specific grounds alone, and not in assertion of any general rule. The right to apply the resources of their own country to the vindication of neighbouring liberty they hardly seemed to have ever doubted; and however they might differ about the fitness of opportunities, or the adequacy of means, they generally assented to the standing maxims handed down from the Revolution, that England's duty and interest lay in maintaining the balance of power in Europe. The truth of these maxims Mr. Cobden boldly challenged. In his view the whole history of the grand alliances and continental wars in which, from the days of Marlborough to those of Wellington, we had engaged, at an infinite cost of blood and treasure, was but a record of disappointment and labour in vain. We should have been, as he believed, far stronger and freer, and abler to render real service as leader of the nations in the march of freedom, had we kept minding our own affairs instead of meddling with theirs, and by our example been content to show them a more excellent way. He particularly strove to arouse resistance to the struggle he saw impending on the shores of the Bosphorus, in defence of Ottoman rule. He viewed with mingled contempt and aversion the supremacy of the Moslem in Asia Minor and Roumelia, which he cited the testimonies of many travellers and publicists to show, had been but one long protracted blight and burden. How different would the once crowded, opulent, and busy shores of the Levant become were they subject to Christian institutions, and re-animated by industrial enterprise! Russian ascendancy might not in itself have anything to recommend it, but neither was it, he thought, to be seriously feared in any sense as a source of danger to Great Britain. At all events, it was not our business to squander money or life in defending the Ottoman. He had failed in every sense as a ruler, in the fairest and most fertile region of the world. If he could not keep his ruffian hold, let him go; the cause of civilization, commerce, and of Christian freedom, could not be in any way injured thereby. We had a tariff to reform, a press to liberate from statutable thralldom, a colonial system to reconstruct, and many other great works of domestic policy demanding our undistracted care. Let these suffice, and let us leave the political dead to bury their dead.

While extolling the frugality of the American government, and its adherence to the principle of non-intervention in the affairs of its neighbours, consequent upon the essentially popular character of its constitution, Mr. Cobden emphatically disclaimed all idea of holding up Republicanism as a model for English imitation. The worship of rank pervaded, he was convinced, every grade of the middle and working classes; there were no real elements of democracy amongst us; and he could see no gain in deposing from power patricians by descent, if it were only to make way for rich men of yesterday. But some things in American rule he regarded as eminently deserving the consideration of our statesmen—the reliance upon small armaments by sea and land in time of peace for the maintenance of national dignity, and the equality assured to all forms of belief in the eye of the law. At the time he wrote, the small national debt originally contracted by the United States in their struggle for independence had been entirely paid off; and contrasting their perfect exemption from the necessity of raising taxes upon that account, with the vast sums our own people were compelled to pay every year only to keep down the interest upon our foreign war debt, he indulged in the expression of a fear lest our national industry should one day find itself overweighted in the race with its Transatlantic competitor. How strangely it would have sounded in his ears had any one told him that he should live to see the odds reduced almost to nothing in this respect, not by England's abatement of wasteful expenditure, but by America's self-imposition of a public debt, amounting to three-fourths of our own!

In the unreclaimed condition of Ireland, and in the unredeemed plight of the mass of her people, we had more than enough to do, if all our energies were devoted to the work of wiping out, though late, that national scandal and shame. With rapid and vigorous hand, he etched the narrative of English misrule, wilfully destructive of Celtic industry, and blindly preventive of social and religious amelioration. The existence of a Church Establishment alien to the belief of the people, and maintained by the mere brute force of conquering power in defiance of their feelings, was in itself, he argued, a more than sufficient recounting cause for ceaseless discontent, agitation, and crime. Would Englishmen be found devoted to adventure and trade with the traditional steadiness which has so long characterised them, if, through any political misfortune, they were compelled to behold their cathedrals and parish churches occupied by a priesthood whose tenets they disapproved, and to see the vast wealth derivable from church lands and tithes sequestered for the maintenance of a hated faith? He hoped not; and that from sire to son they would hand down the pledge of discontent and detestation until the evil were removed. Believing moreover, as he did fervently, that Ireland would be happier and better and richer if it were Protestant, he deprecated the continuance of that ecclesiastical imposition which above and beyond all other causes, had contributed to render the spread of the doctrines of the Reformation in that country impossible. 'So long as the Church of England possesses the whole of the religious revenue of Ireland, there cannot be — nay, judging of the case as our own, there ought not to be — peace or prosperity for its people; and what is of still more vital importance, there

After passing in review the various palliatives and pretexts for doing nothing effectual then in vogue, he summed up his appeal for doing justice to Ireland before seeking distant objects of national interposition, in the following terms:— 'Our efforts have been directed towards the assistance of States for whose welfare we are not responsible; whilst our oppression and neglect have fallen upon a people over whom we are endowed with the power and accountable privileges of government. . . . Does not the question of Ireland in every point of view offer the strongest possible argument against the national policy of this country, for the time during which we have wasted our energies, and squandered our wealth upon all the nations of the Continent, whilst a part of our own empire, which more than all the rest of Europe has needed our attention, remains to this hour an appalling monument of our neglect and misgovernment?' This remarkable brochure quickly attracted attention, and in a few months went through several editions.

His next pamphlet, entitled 'Russia, Turkey, and England,' evinced an equal diversity of information, and comprehensive breadth of view. It contains many passages of great power and eloquence, intermingled with others less careful in their style, and less calculated perhaps to win general approval. His description of the attenuation of Muscovite power by the rapid and unconsolidated extension of territory, is admirably contrasted with the growth during the same period, of the United Kingdom and the United States, in concentrated wealth and population. He argues truly, that in such concentration has ever lain the greatest strength of nations; and he relies upon the logical converse as a sufficient reason for treating with indifference the threatening aspect of Russian aggrandizement. But while discounting the military strength of the Cossack empire, he endeavours to show in how many ways it stands superior to the stolid and stifling oppression of the Turk, against whom his bill of indictment is as terrible as true. If a choice must be made, he contends that it would be better for the Czar to reign at Constantinople than the Sultan; and that English interests, neither present nor future, would in any way be damaged by the change. Of any other alternative he takes no note. This is perhaps the weak point in his argument, which, whenever it was repeated an after years struck dispassionate listeners, and checked their disposition to adopt his policy. For ourselves, we could never understand why either set of oppressors should reign forever over the most beautiful and prolific country in the world. Admitting all that can be said against the Turks — and we are far from being prepared to dispute any portion of it — we cannot see the necessity of transferring all Greece and Asia Minor to Scythian rule. ‘Constantinople,’ said Lord Palmerston, during the Crimean war, ‘may be truly described as very inferior to St. Petersburg; and the cause of the inferiority may be truly assigned to misrule; but that is no reason why Russia should have both.’ When the Manchester Manufacturer wrote, railroads were a Western luxury, of which the half-peopled plains of the Volga and the Neva did not dream. Already considerable lines have been laid down in various districts, and ten years hence all the chief places in European Russia will be connected by electricity and steam. It must be owned that this will make an essential difference in the question, whether it be safe for Europe to allow any one Power to have her fortified arsenals on the Sea of Marmora and the Baltic, with the instantaneous means of knowledge as to what is going on at either extremity, and the power of concentrating in the course of a few hours on any point of her frontier the whole avalanche of her disciplined ambition. Nevertheless, for the time in which he wrote, and having regard to the diplomatic doctrines then in vogue respecting foreign policy, there cannot be a doubt that the vigorous utterance of opinions till then almost unheard was of infinite use, and that the good thus done has not and will not pass away.

He spent the winter of 1836–7 in Egypt, Syria, and Greece. Possessing little classical knowledge, and but a niggard love of antiquities, his wanderings among the monuments and ruins of bygone times were perhaps less pleasurable than they usually are to men of a different caste of mind. On the other hand, there was for him in the gaunt remains of dead civilization, extinguished commerce, and abandoned art, a world of suggestion and teaching. He understood too thoroughly what the far-reaching commerce of Phœnicia and Greece must have been in the days of its glory not to people with a phantom crowd of busy speculators and labourers the wharves of harbours now choked with sand, and the half-ruined highways leading from city to city. Few visitors to the Levant were so capable of realizing the busy life of which it was anciently the scene, or of measuring therefore the depth of political and social degradation that has since befallen its shores. He returned to England detesting Turkish barbarism, and the infamy of forced labour and the slave-market, more intensely than he had ever done when merely reading of such things in books. He brought home with him a thousand fresh facts and new ideas; and his was a mind on which the impression of realities was never lost, and from which the photograph once imprinted never passed away.

Before entering on the course of commercial agitation in which his best energies were so soon to be absorbed, he felt a desire to freshen his earlier impressions of the comparative anatomy of neighbouring industrial States. About the middle of May, 1840, he visited Havre and Rouen, proceeding thence to Paris and the southern cities of France. Subsequently he visited Savoy and Switzerland, the Rhine towns, and the chief places of commerce in Holland. He was not wanting in appreciation of the beauties of external nature, but the sight of Genoa and Geneva, Cologne and Amsterdam, stirred in him deeper thoughts, and dwelt more vividly in his recollection than the Passes of the Alps or Schaffhausen Falls. He was by nature, habit, and feeling a man of action; not in the vulgar sense which associates energy and ambition with incessant stir and noise; he was neither talkative or restless, greedy of excitement or afflicted with the feverish thirst of fame. The key to his life is to be found in the earnestness of his sympathy with his kind, — with their sufferings and struggles, their hopes and fears, their wrongful humiliations and noble aspirations; with all, in short, that, whether for individuals or communities, goes to make up the wear and tear, the trials and the triumphs of our nature. He was called an economist, and so he was; his reason being convinced that the greatest service he could render mankind was to keep them clear of errors in the application of their industry and skill. But it was not for the sake of the theory of rule or with any mere intellectual pride in victorious casuistry that he inquired, computed, argued, and, when necessary, made costly sacrifices of time and health and fortune. With him the actuating motive was from first to last the accomplishment of the greatest possible amount of good to others in his day and generation. He thought habitually through his feelings, and no one ever succeeded in engaging his co-operation or alliance who failed to show him that his efforts, if successful, would alleviate some misery, or vindicate some questioned right, or help to give a better dinner to the working man, or strike down the uplifted arm of violence or oppression. He had the heart of a woman, with the intellect of a man; and those who knew him best well knew what depths of tenderness for those he loved lay within him, unobserved by the many, and often dark and silent as unopened fountains. Of his private griefs he spoke seldom and little; his instincts recoiled from utterances that had for him something of the sense of exposure. Even when receiving the generous and gentle tribute of sympathy, he would remain mute until his fixed eye began to fill; and then, when he could bear the agony of unspoken gratitude no longer, he would quietly murmur some expression of assent and turn away, as though to break the spell.

It was not until the general election of 1841 that Mr. Cobden obtained his seat in Parliament. The agitation for the repeal of the Corn Laws was then beginning to assume somewhat of the menacing proportions by which it was afterwards known, and the newly-returned member for Stockport was the life and soul of the agitation. His first speech in the House of Commons was an earnest appeal to men of both parties on behalf of the manufacturing population, then suffering acutely from want of work. The Whigs had, on the eve of the general election, offered an 8s. fixed duty as a compromise; but their bidding came too late to appease commercial discontent, and the newly-formed Association had bound itself to be satisfied with nothing short of the total abolition of the tax on bread. Its members authorized him, moreover, to declare — as he did openly in his maiden speech — that they would give all the political support they could command to whichever party in the State should first concede the great principle at stake. A meeting of ministers of religion of all denominations had likewise confided to him the presentation to Parliament of their remonstrances and prayers on behalf of their famished flocks. A majority of the new Parliament, elate with party triumph and confiding in the pledges of Sir Robert Peel to maintain Protection, received the most touching statements of popular suffering with depressive cheers; and the outgoing Whigs were in no humour to lend support to a man who avowed his indifference to party combinations, and his readiness to sacrifice party interests for the attainment of what they were accustomed to designate as an economic crotchet. Lord Melbourne had but a few months before told the House of Lords that the man must be mad who would think of the entire repeal of the Corn Laws; and he had told the Queen that the men who proposed it would take the crown off her head: and Lord Melbourne was Prime Minister. But Cobden cared for none of these things. The agitation spread and grew as the distress deepened. Every month during the dismal winter of 1841–42 brought new recruits to its standard. Not a few of the squeamish politicians who had lisped on the hustings their condescending assent to an 8s. duty, and got well beaten for their pains, sent in their subscriptions with an intimation that they were now ready to stand, whenever an opening offered, on thorough-going Free Trade principles; and in this manner some of them actually did find their way back to Westminster.

We need not dwell upon the five years' wordy war against monopoly, which ended in the conversion of Sir Robert Peel, Lord Aberdeen, Sir James Graham, and Mr. Gladstone to the doctrines of the Anti-Corn Law League; and of the consequent disintegration and overthrow of the most powerful Conservative party which had existed in England since the death of Mr. Pitt. No such moral triumph has ever been accomplished, without the loss of a single life or the striking of a single blow, within the same brief space. Religious freedom was the slow work of generations. Parliamentary reform took nearly half a century in its partial accomplishment. The emancipation of trade had been indeed begun, and was pursued tentatively during the twenty years preceding the formation of the League; but the abolition of a tax on corn, to keep up the rent of land for the benefit of the classes who possessed nine-tenths of the seats in the Legislature, was a task which to the most experienced and enlightened men of the Liberal party seemed desperate, and which nothing but the combined wisdom and enthusiasm of true political genius could have accomplished. The story has, however, so often and so well been told that it needs not to be told again. On the eve of his fall from power, the conscience-stricken opener of the gates of Protection, which he had spent his prime in endeavouring to bar, confessed in the House of Commons that no one had contributed so much to bring about that result as Mr. Cobden.

The work, indeed, was done, and the nation was not unmindful or ungrateful. For its achievement it had been necessary to neglect the profitable pursuits of business and to sacrifice leisure, gain, and mercantile opportunities of every kind. It was felt that the man who had, without ever once alluding to these things, practised unflinchingly such self-denial, ought not to go uncompensated; and a very large sum was accordingly subscribed, chiefly though not altogether in the manufacturing districts, as a tribute of acknowledgement for the immeasurable benefits conferred.

The Whigs resumed power, and could find no room in the Cabinet for the man by whose courage, energy, and eloquence, more than that of any other man, their restoration had been brought about. They offered him the subordinate post of Vice-President of the Board of Trade, which he of course declined. Before the struggle was over, Sir Robert Peel addressed to him a letter, as remarkable for its contents as for the signature and superscription, in which he reiterated the acknowledgments he had made in the House of Commons, that from Mr. Cobden he had tardily learned the wisdom and necessity of Free Trade in corn. He explained with his accustomed clearness and completeness the considerations by which he had been governed in breaking with his party, and renouncing power for the sake of accomplishing a great national good; and concluded by expressing a wish that he and his correspondent might in future meet as private acquaintances, if not friends. Mr. Cobden replied in befitting terms to this communication; but he went abroad before any opportunity arose of meeting the ex-minister; and on his return, from some cause unexplained, no further step, we believe, on either side was taken towards a rapprochement.

On his way to Paris he had an interview with Louis Philippe at the Château d'Eu. 'The king was very civil and communicative,' but left on his visitor the impression that he 'did not like to discuss the Free-trade question.' The diplomatizing, by the grace of gold, charter, monopoly, and corruption, was too wary to commit himself to a triumphant tribune on his travels; and whatever may have been his wishes or convictions, he was too much afraid of setting any new stone rolling in France, and too much out of humour just then with Palmerston and his colleagues, to let fall anything that might be turned into an encouragement of even economic agitation in his ignitable dominions.

On the 18th of August the Duc d'Harcourt presided at a public dinner given to Mr. Cobden, by the chiefs of the Liberal party and leading economists of France. M. Horace Say occupied the vice-chair, and amongst those present were Baron Billing, MM. Dupéron and Renouard (peers), and MM. Garnier Pagès, Leon Faucher, G. Beaumont, M. Chevalier, and other men of distinction. He received much attention from M. Duchatel, the Minister of the Interior, and the Duc de Broglie, who impressed him as being 'a man of elevated moral and religious sentiments, but wanting in the masculine qualities requisite to sway a French political party.' Of the Abbé de Lamennais he speaks 'as a meek little man, religious in a certain sense, and with a heart.*' He was naturally struck with the want of knowledge on economical questions betrayed by many of the ablest politicians he encountered; but, on the whole his visit to the French capital was one unceasing round of compliment and congratulation.

After a brief stay at Bordeaux, where likewise he was entertained in public by the leading merchants and bankers of the City of the Vine, he crossed into Spain. At Madrid another festival in his honour awaited him, at which several of the leading politicians of the Chamber of Representatives took part. While in the Spanish capital he witnessed a bull-fight for the first time. The spectacle pained him deeply. 'So long,' he wrote, 'as this continues to be the popular sport of high and low, so long will the people be indifferent to human life, and have their civil contests marked with displays of cruelty which make other nations shudder.† Narvaez struck him as the man of 'most practical sense and knowledge' of the politicians he met with at Madrid; for he admitted many of the evils of the prohibitive system, and owned that one-fourth of the population of Andalusia were more or less engaged in contraband trade; but he argued that none but a very strong government could reform the tariff in Spain, and that, if one administration fell in the attempt, no other could be formed for many years that would touch it. The aspect of the Peninsula and its people, in the eyes of the Manchester Manufacturer, was not encouraging: 'The Spaniards of the last two centuries seem literally to have done nothing but glorify themselves for the deeds of their ancestors, or loll in the shades of their olives and vines, and leave to nature the task of feeding and clothing them.' Entertainments awaited him at Cadiz and Malaga, and by the end of the year he had completed his tour in Southern Spain.

At Genoa, on the 16th January, 1847, the Marquis d'Azeglio presided at the feast wherewith the descendants of the old merchant princes of the Gulf welcomed him to their shores. A still more inspiring ovation was given in his honour at Rome, in the following month, which, considering that it took place almost under the walls of the Vatican, and apparently without provoking the slightest jealousy on the part of the newly-elected Pope or his advisers, seemed to him 'the most charming proof of the wide-spread sympathy for Free-trade principles which he had seen in the course of his travels.* Among other notabilities, he was introduced, during his stay in Southern Italy; to the Count of Syracuse, a younger member of the Bourbon family of Naples. He found him, 'for a king's brother, a very clear-headed, well-informed man.'† Pío Nono received him on the 22d of February, 1847, at an audience which lasted a good while. He was habited in a simple dress of white flannel, spoke unaffectedly and with much earnestness of the good work which had lately been accomplished in England by the abolition of the Corn Laws, and dwelt with especial emphasis on the means whereby so great a change had been effected. His visitor called his attention to the desecration of hallowed memories in Spain, where bull-fights were constantly held, as the public advertisements declared, in honour of the Virgin, or the patron saint of the locality. The Pope said he was obliged for the suggestion, and promised to mention the matter to his Nuncio. On the day after this interview, Mr. Cobden dined with the ill-fated Count Rossi, then French Ambassador at Rome. After Naples he was much struck by what he saw in the Pompeian Museum. 'In a couple of hours spent in these rooms, I became better acquainted with the ancient Roman people than I could have been by reading all the histories ever written about them.‡

King Ferdinand desired to see him, and tried to make him believe that he too had become a proselyte to Free-trade, as did most of the men of political and literary distinction at his Court. They asked many questions about the solution of the Irish difficulty; for the apprehended famine, whose coming shadow had scared Sir Robert Peel into surrendering the last outworks of monopoly, was still impending; the failure of the State trials to crush agitation was still fresh in men's minds; and though less energetic and threatening than in former days, O'Connell still lived. Everywhere interrogatories were put to Mr. Cobden about the condition of Ireland and its future. Twenty years are come and gone since then, and English statesmanship during that time, to its shame be it spoken, has never dared to look that question in the face. The month of April was spent in Florence, where he was received with open arms by the men of letters, and many of the foreign residents of that delightful city. The first public dinner said to have been ever given there, was that in his honour, under the presidency of M. Peruzzi; La Farina, the historian, Prince Poniatowski, and many other individuals of distinction, being present. The report of the proceedings was delayed for some days, and was not permitted to appear until the consent of the Grand Duke had been formally signified, in consequence of his name having been mentioned in some of the speeches; yet his was considered, and in point of fact actually was, the best beloved and respected of the old governments of Italy. Leghorn was not wanting in hospitality to the traveller, and there he found once more, for the first time since he had quitted England, the greeting of fellow countrymen of his own class and calling, who could appreciate more vividly than many of his Southern entertainers the amazing difficulties he had had to encounter in his long struggle for the emancipation of commerce, and the specific worth of what he had done. At Turin he spent many pleasant and instructive days. Among the first who called on him were Scialoja, and Charles Cavour, — 'a young man,' as he observed, 'with a sound, practical head.' The incipient statesman clutched eagerly at the opportunity of learning all he could from lips so ready to impart information. He had recently visited England, and studied her industrial and political institutions; and although as yet he did not pretend any more than the rest of his class to see his way to national independence, he already believed in the possibility of working up to constitutionalism and to agricultural and commercial freedom in Piedmont. The administration was still indeed in the hands of the ultra partisans of resistance; and the king, who had never recovered his early disenchantment with popular efforts, was too weak and wavering to originate any measure of importance in the direction of progress. Cavour spent most of his time with Mr. Cobden or his family during their stay, and frequently accompanied them in their walks and drives into the country; and with his uncle, the Marquis Cavour, with whom he then lived, and MM. Balbo, Collobiano, Polloni, Battista, Bignon, the future minister attended the banquet on the 24th May, to do honour to the Apostle of Free Trade. A like celebration followed in the ensuing week at Milan, and also at Venice. At Vienna he was treated with every mark of distinction by Prince Metternich, as at St. Petersburg by Count Nesselrode. At Berlin, Humboldt, Ranke, Eichhorn, Bodelschwing, and most of the eminent men engaged in the administration, were prompt in paying their respects; and he was entertained at dinner by the king. His long tour ended with a visit to Hamburg; and by the middle of October 1847, he found himself once more at home. It was a moment of extreme depression and anxiety. The deferred famine had more than decimated the population of Ireland; and gold had been sent out of the country to buy corn in such quantities, that the Bank of England was, under the Act of 1844, compelled to raise the rate of discount to 10 per cent., and was only enabled to reduce it to 8 per cent. by a Treasury minute suspending the operation of the statute.

In Parliament he never took any part in debates respecting the currency; and in private he used sometimes to say playfully, 'When a man begins by telling me that we can do nothing right until the Bank Charter is annulled, I always suspect that he is a little mad, at least on one point; and so I try to turn the conversation.' He had voted for Peel's Bank Act in 1844, hoping that it would be an improvement on previous legislation; but after twenty years' experience he inclined to regard it as a failure, and to anticipate that, whenever pressure or panic should cause its suspension a third time, it must be virtually abandoned.

In the new Parliament which met in November 1847, Mr. Cobden took his seat as member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, for which, in his absence, he had been chosen, and for which he continued to sit for the ten following years. It was not in human nature that he should be unconscious of the comparative neglect and disparagement, wherewith he was treated by the privileged politicians of his own country, and which contrasted so strongly and so strangely with what he had experienced abroad. That he never condescended to notice it outside the inner circle of friendship and intimacy, does not touch the question — how such folly and such injustice came to pass? No proposal was made to him to join the administration; and though he gave it his general support, his remonstrances against certain measures which he disapproved, were on more than one occasion, repelled in a tone and in terms little short of insulting. In the discussions on the Alien Act, and on the Bill which for the first time constituted open and advised speaking on political subjects sufficient proof of 'treason-felony'; on many items of domestic expenditure, and on many important points of colonial policy; on the memorable affair of compensation to M. Pacifico; on the Ecclesiastical 'Titles' Bill, and generally on the question of Parliamentary Reform, he differed from the Whigs: and the estrangement thus engendered continued to the end, without bitterness or resentment on his part, but not without consequences which it would lead us too far to enter into here.

By many, whose prejudices he offended in the earnest pursuit of objects he deemed politically just, he was called a demagogue. They saw the proofs of his popularity, and they measured his self-love by their own; they felt that the self-made man was able to wield a power which, with all the adventitious aids of birth and wealth and station, they could not gain; and they could not persuade themselves that the exercise of this power had not created an appetite which must ever yearn and crave. They felt the keen edge of his argumentative eloquence in debate: and they would not believe that the man who could thus overthrow opponents did not love the encounter and exult in victory. They knew not the man, or the spirit that animated him. There never was any one who had in him less of the love of ambition, or the lust of triumph. He neither feared nor shunned the fight; and he rejoiced with child-like glee in the success of his cause. But it was the triumph of the cause, not of Cobden, that he fought for; and far from relishing the opportunity of giving battle, or exulting in the humiliation of adversaries, he would readily, at any moment, have secured success by the timely conversion of opponents to sound views, rather than have hazarded the result of public contention. To say that he did not value personal influence, founded as his was, on personal ability and worth alone, would indeed be untrue; and to say that he was insensible to the tribute of popular sympathy and admiration, would be idle. But the gratification these were capable of affording him was essentially transitory and subordinate to that which other and more enduring instincts craved. He delighted in quiet, and he loved love. In the happy faces of the children who never feared him, and the genial talk of friends with whom he never differed sharply, it was his delight to pass his time. Society, so-called, rather bored him; and public display was to him, a matter of penance, not of pride. The proceedings he originated in the House of Commons were not numerous; and the total number of his speeches there, considering the length of time he sat in that assembly, will be found to have been, by comparison with other notabilities, but few. In some degree this may perhaps be accounted for, by his extreme aversion to taking part in debate, without having fully matured what he had to say, 'and the best way of putting it,' as he was wont to phrase it. But a good deal must likewise be set down to the account of his reluctance to provoke angry dispute with men, towards whom he could never bring himself to feel anything like hostility. He might laugh at their follies and make merry with their inconsistencies, in his own limited circle of intimate friends; but when urged to expose their errors publicly, and to resist the impolicy they recommended, he was rarely known to indulge in sarcasm or scoff; for he thought that a legislator's words, like those of a judge, should, as Bacon says, be 'wise, and not taunting.' At heart he disliked conflict; and there was for him no pleasure in inflicting pain. His blows were heavy when they fell, and, roused by a sense of indignation at oppression or injustice, he dealt them with a will. Yet he oftentimes — oftener than the world at large could easily have been persuaded — generously forbore. He not only could make great allowance for educational and social habits of expression, thought, and action not in accordance with his own, but he practically did so; and while no man was less swayed by the influence of society around him, he was content with the enjoyment of his own simple-minded liberty, without cavilling at the fopperies, affectations, or antipathies of those who he knew disliked him.

One evening, as he drove to the House of Commons, to take part in a debate which it was expected would be of the sharpest, his companion, who probably looked forward to the coming struggle with somewhat of bellicose enthusiasm, rallied him gently on being what he called dull; and strove to rekindle his spirit, by anticipating the weakness and waywardness in blundering which their adversaries were certain to betray, and by holding forth the promise of inevitable triumph. He was not to be roused from his dejection, however, and he said calmly — 'I know you can enjoy it all, and perhaps it is so best; but I hate having to beard in this way hundreds of well-meaning, wrong-headed people, and to face the look of rage and loathing with which they regard me. I had a thousand times rather not have to do it; but it must be done.'

It was in this spirit that in 1854 he took a course that for the time undoubtedly lessened his general popularity, by opposing the Russian war. From his first entrance into public life he had questioned the foreign policy of Lord Palmerston, primarily and especially with reference to the maintenance of the Ottoman Empire; and when at length that long-slumbering question came to issue, the complete antagonism between them was more than ever revealed.

In the spring of 1856, there befell him a calamity whose lingering shadow overcast all his remaining years:—

'One fatal remembrance, one sorrow that throws
Its bleak shade alike o'er our joys and our woes;
To which life nothing darker or brighter can bring,
For which joy hath no balm, and affliction
no sting.'

His only son, a youth of singular promise, and endeared to him by every tie of pride and affection, was suddenly struck down by illness at Weinheim, where he was at school; and the same letter that brought intelligence of the fact, conveyed also the tidings of his death. It was long before the bereaved father recovered from this heavy blow. By degrees indeed he learned resignation; and, consoled by the sympathy of a numerous and attached circle of friends, he manfully strove to battle with his grief, and to soothe that of those loved ones who needed his example and his care.

In the autumn of the same year a congress was summoned to meet at Brussels, of the friends of international interchange and amity, at which his recent bereavement rendered it impossible for him to appear. In declining, about the same period, a kind invitation from friends at Paris, he alluded with his usual unselfishness to the weight that hung upon his own spirits and those of his domestic circle:—‘We must throw upon our friends as little as possible of the burden of our grief; for who has not his own share of sorrow at some period of his life to endure? The same circumstance will prevent me from going to Brussels, as I should have otherwise liked to do. His interest in the progress of opinion was not, however, quenched even in affliction. In the same letter he seemed to revive, as he thought of the efforts then making in Belgium by the mercantile community there, to promote the great cause with which his name was identified: ‘We cannot help admiring the noble attitude of that little kingdom, in thus offering its capital and its public halls as the place of rendezvous for kindred minds from all parts of the world. . . . I have been a good deal struck with the energy and talent displayed by the iron-traders of Belgium, in their agitation. It seems a bonâ fide movement in which the manufacturers and merchants are taking a leading part. The best thing they can do for the cause of Free Trade is to carry out the principle in their own country; and thus set a good example to their neighbours.’

The culminating point of his opposition to Lord Palmerston, as a minister, was not reached until the famous controversy regarding the lorcha, called the Arrow, the seizure of whose crew, while bearing the British flag, in the Canton river, led to the bombardment of the town by Admiral Seymour's fleet, and to a great destruction of property and life. Lord Clarendon, with the sanction of Lord Palmerston, praised and thanked the English authorities, civil and military, in China, for their promptitude and vigour. A vote of censure, on the ground of inhumanity and needless violence, was carried in the House of Lords; and on the motion of the member for the West Riding, supported by Mr. Gladstone, Sir James Graham, and Mr. Sydney Herbert, a similar condemnation was carried in the Commons by a majority of sixteen. Parliament was dissolved. The West Riding, it was believed, would not again return the man who had conferred on its industry so many benefits, and he was asked to stand for Huddersfield, where, to the surprise and mortification of his friends, he was defeated by a ministerialist whose local influence was great. The current of popular feeling ran so strong that Messrs. Bright and Gibson were unseated at Manchester; Messrs. Layard, Miall, W. J. Fox, and others lost their seats; and but for Mr. Cobden's timely interposition, Sir James Graham would have given way at Carlisle. The wrong thus inflicted would, it was supposed, be soon repaired by some other constituency; but months rolled by, and the national reproach of his exclusion from the legislature was not effaced. He felt that exclusion deeply. In a letter addressed to the writer in the following year, who had inquired after his health and pursuits at Dunford, he wrote, in bitterness of heart, that—‘He was learning to promote the happiness of pigs, and to give them better food than they had had before; and he had this encouragement—that they could not make him feel that they were ungrateful.’ It was not until the general election of 1859 that he was restored to his place in Parliament, being chosen, during his absence in America, member for Rochdale. Before his return to England the new Parliament had met; and by the combination of parties inaugurated at a meeting held at Willis' Rooms, Lord Derby and his friends were driven from power, and Lord Palmerston was again placed at the head of affairs. Seats in the Cabinet were conceded to Lord Russell, Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. M. Gibson, who, in 1858, had aided in the overthrow of the noble Viscount's former Administration by their votes of censure on the Conspiracy Bill; and it was announced that the Presidency of the Board of Trade was reserved for Mr. Cobden. On his arrival at Liverpool he learned for the first time the administrative change, that had taken place, and received the Premier's invitation to join his Government. In an interview with Lord Palmerston a few days afterwards, while acknowledging in frank and courteous terms the value of the compliment, he stated fully the reasons why he felt it would be incompatible with his sense of self-respect, and his character for consistency, to take confidential office under the man whose policy he had always opposed as wasteful and dangerous. Lord Palmerston would have had him reconsider the matter; but he declined, saying that his resolution was fixed, and that he thought any other course would only involve them both in embarrassment and ridicule. Those who never wished to see him in the Cabinet affected to take this refusal as proof that he was an impracticable man who could find fault with the work of others, but who would never himself incur the responsibilities of official life. Nothing could be more foreign to his disposition or feeling than such an inference, and an occasion soon arose for its disinterested refutation in a way equally unexpected and remarkable.

The suggestion having been publicly made by Mr. Bright, that the first step towards a reduction of armaments, and the cultivation of more intimate ties between England and France, would probably be found in a Treaty of Commerce between the two countries, M. Michel Chevalier wrote to Mr. Cobden assuring him of the favourable disposition of the Imperial Government, and encouraging him to urge upon the English Administration the expediency of making the attempt. After due reflection he resolved to do so. Lord Palmerston and Mr. Gladstone entered into his views, and authorized him to visit Paris, using his own discretion in feeling his way with those in authority there, towards the attainment of so desirable an object. Accompanied by his family, he took up his residence for the winter in the French capital, and put himself in communication with the ministers of Napoleon III. For some time little progress was made. The wall of prejudice in favour of prohibition and protection looked higher and more hard to scale when near its base than it had done at a distance. Men like M. Rouher and M. Fould appreciated the importance, moral and material, of multiplying ties of reciprocal profit between the two nations; but others holding equal or higher political rank dissented from them, and discountenanced as far as in them lay the project of a treaty. Weeks were consumed in preliminary discussions; and in weariness of spirit, the untitled, unsalaried, and unpretentious plenipotentiary of England oftentimes was ready to despair. He was supported, however, by the consciousness of being engaged in an endeavour to accomplish an unmixed good, and by the noble ambition of showing that, without being disciplined in diplomatic forms, a man who thoroughly understood the interests of his country might be its best diplomatist.

One evening, on his return home, he asked a friend whom he found awaiting him, whether he could guess in whose company he had spent the last hour. 'You must keep it a secret,' he said, laughing; 'by which I mean that you must really tell nobody. For although, as you know, I hate mysteries, it would make me very uncomfortable if the thing were talked of.' His companion guessed in vain, and was at last told that the volunteer envoy had had an interview with the Emperor. Strange to say, a rumour of the fact ran through the clubs and cafés the same night; and his confidant being questioned on the point, could hit upon no more innocent way of throwing public curiosity off the scent, than by suggesting gravely, that the blunderer who had watched at the gate of St. Cloud might have mistaken Lord Brougham for Mr. Cobden. It is not, perhaps, surprising that he was dot proof enough against the fascination of manner and of calm indomitable will that has contributed so much to the creation, and still more to the consolidation, of all but unlimited power in the present ruler of France. The interview had been desired by his Majesty; and it was valued at the moment by the ardent Free Trader, not as a compliment to the reputation he had already earned, but as the expression of a sagacious wish to be further informed by competent authority how the revenue of a country might be secured with lightened taxation, and how the wages of labour might be enhanced while invested capital, long used to the artificial shelter and forcing-beds of protection, was exposed to the all-penetrating breath of free competition. Besides the political hazard attendant on any failure of a financial experiment, Napoleon III. had, by the necessity of his position, to incur the greatest amount of personal responsibility — we had almost said peril — in the matter. No one believed, and no one could be made to believe, that the idea of revolutionizing the commercial system of France originated with any minister or any party in or out of doors. What Turgot had so memorably tried and failed to do in the days of Legitimate Absolutism, there was no man who would venture officially to recommend under the new order of things. Republicans and Constitutionists had always been divided in opinion about the theory of trade; and the traditions of the First Empire all seemed to bar the way. The compact weight of vested interests lay heavily in one scale; and there was little of any weight in the other but a conviction of truth and right and policy in the mind of the taciturn and undemonstrative sovereign. What must have been the incisive force, unaided and self-adequate, that wrought in such a mind as that of the Emperor's such a conviction! What would we not give for a snatch of the first conversation, to be followed up in due time by others of like import, between two men so utterly and intensely opposite in their ways of thought and action! On more than one occasion invitations to the Imperial table were proffered, and a wish was intimated through the proper quarter that Mr. and Mrs. Cobden might be included among the autumnal guests at Compiègne. But the repugnance to court ceremony and state of every kind was too inveterate to be overcome. He had never been recognized as worthy of such honour in his own country, he said, and how could he accept it therefore in another? Lest his refusal should in any sense be taken amiss, he supplemented his political apology with one on the score of health, which he pleaded as disabling him from enjoying just then the excitement of so luxurious and glittering a sphere.

During his stay in Paris, he was beset with applications for his name and influence in the promotion of joint-stock companies of various kinds. Hardly a day passed without letters from sanguine projectors, offering him directorships in their promissive undertakings, with the usual guarantee against loss, and upon any terms as to shares he chose to name. His sense of what was due to himself, to his character as the representative of his country, and to the cause he had in hand, rendered it impossible that he should entertain any of these proposals. He referred them all to his friend Mr. Ellison, with whom an intimacy of many years had begotten confidence the most completely unreserved; and by him they were generally answered. Ordinary speculators were thus easily got rid of, and were heard of by him no more, his friend's position as a banker in Paris enabling him to discriminate in what terms each of the various applications ought most fitly to be declined. There were some whose imposing air and provoking tone of bienfaisance disturbed for the moment the negotiator's equanimity. One day he received a courteous but somewhat condescending intimation, that one of the greatest financial adventurers of the day intended to call on him on the morrow, with the view of laying before him a forthcoming scheme of more than ordinary magnificence, and which, in the slang of the Bourse, would be found to present features of peculiar importance to those who might be fortunate enough to be connected with it. Mr. Cobden requested his confidential adviser to be present at the interview, which the latter declined upon the ground that his doing so would probably prove a restraint, and would consequently lead only to a second visit or a correspondence, both of which it was desirable to avoid. But he consented to be within reach should anything occur rendering reference to him necessary. At the hour appointed the subtle weaver of golden dreams appeared, bowed benignantly to the unworldlywise diplomatist, whose single-heartedness he probably pitied, while he thought it might be turned to account as a cutwater for the gorgeous and heavy-laden barge he was about to launch; and, having seated himself and thrown open his furred pelisse, he began his revelations in the customary strain. His host listened with ill-concealed impatience, and eventually cut short the interview by unconditionally refusing to take the matter into consideration, stating his opinion that, if any public man in France or England lent his sanction to the speculation, he would be guilty of complicity in something little short of swindling. The scheme, however, was too splendid to be abandoned. It did not fail; but not very long afterwards its author did, under circumstances that gave rise to litigation in many ways remarkable. When informed of the catastrophe, Mr. Cobden only remarked that he had sometimes regretted not having kept his temper a little longer at the interview above described, for he should have liked to know the price at which the fellow had 'valued his honesty.'

One letter only out of a great number that now lie before us we shall give in extenso. Some temptations are irresistible. Is not this one? He had promised Mr. Ellison to let him know the moment the Treaty was actually signed. There had been many delays, and to the last some misgivings. At length it was a great fact accomplished; and the haste of joy is obvious in the wording of the following note:—

'23rd January, 1860.

'Private.

'MY DEAR SIR, —

'The Treaty is signed, and will, I hope, in a few years change and improve the commercial relations of the two countries. I have lost no time, according to promise, in giving you this information. Believe me,

'M. Maurice Ellison.

'COBDEN.'

It is hardly worth while recalling now the forebodings of failure, and the thwartings of faction and folly on our own side of the Channel, which had beset every step of the protracted negotiation. Even after the Treaty was signed, there were many in Parliament and in the press who strove to depreciate its importance, and to misrepresent it as a departure from true economic principle. The public judgment, however, was not disturbed by these cavillings, and the tangible proofs of the worth of the new international compact became month after month more and more incontestable in the returns of the Board of Trade. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in acknowledging the obligation which Mr. Cobden had conferred on the country and the Government, felicitously noted the rare fortune which, after an interval of many years, had a second time enabled the same man to render a signal and splendid service to the State. Lord Palmerston was permitted by the Queen to offer a baronetcy and the rank of Privy Councillor to Mr. Cobden, as some recompense for that service, but he would have none; and, with his accustomed gentleness and absence of wordy egotism, he begged that he might be excused. Among the many congratulations from eminent persons abroad, came one especially cordial, both on political and personal grounds, from Mr. Charles Sumner, who, when in Europe, had entered fully into Mr. Cobden's anxiety to allay international feelings of distrust, and his unbelief in the danger of French invasion. 'I am happy,' he wrote, 'in your true success. You are the great volunteer, with something in your hand better than a musket. This Commercial Treaty seems like a harbinger of glad tidings. Let that get into full operation, and the war system must be discontinued.'

The following winter and spring he spent at Algiers, for the benefit of his health. He had become of late years more susceptible of cold, which affected him with loss of voice, and at times with difficulty of breathing. In the charming climate of the southern shore of the Mediterranean he eluded for the time the attacks of his only enemy; and in the enjoyment of that best of material blessings, — the unconsciousness of physical weakness. He seemed, on his return to England in May 1861, to have grown young again.

His correspondence, like his conversation, at this period was full of solicitude about the course of events in America, and the consequences to Europe. An anti-slavery President had been elected, and the civil war had begun. From the outset he avowed his conviction that the geographical difficulties in the way of separation between North and South would prove insurmountable. The Western States, he thought, would never agree to leave the gates of their export trade, as he termed the mouths of the Mississippi, in hands that might at any time be hostile. He knew from personal acquaintance, that communities living by agriculture were less likely to be soon depressed by the financial changes incident to civil war than their brethren of the seaboard. He regarded President Lincoln as the impersonation of their indomitable will, and felt persuaded that they would persist in the prolongation of the war until the overmatched Confederates were exhausted. The proposal of the French Government to ours for joint intervention he strongly disapproved, not only on general grounds of principle, but because he was satisfied that it would fail. It would be impossible, as he conceived, to transport across the Ocean any force capable of coercing the United States into separation. The improvements made in the munitions of war tended greatly, in his view, to strengthen those who stood on the defensive against assault from a distant enemy. The engines of warfare had become so vast and so complicated in their appliances, that they were not easily conveyed for a long distance from home. This was, he thought, a salutary tendency in human affairs, as it was to be presumed 'that they who fought on their own soil were more likely to be in the right, than they who went far away from home to find a battle-field.'

He sympathised intensely with the sufferings of Lancashire, and pleaded hard, though long in vain, that the factory hands should by timely measures be saved from sinking to the level of pauperism before receiving public aid. In this as in other instances his wise council was disregarded, until many of the evils it would have averted had been realized; and then the truth, officially re-discovered, was tardily confessed, and its demands conceded.

But we must bring our recollections to a close. His last speech in public was addressed to his constituents at Rochdale early in November 1864. The weather was inclement and the place of meeting cold. He spoke at greater length than usual on the various topics of the day; and after the excitement and exertion were over he felt a chill which he was unable for many hours to shake off. He returned to Dunford, and, yielding to the advice of his physician, hardly left his house for the three ensuing months. When the proposal was made in Parliament, however, to vote large sums of money for fortifications in Canada, his desire to take part in opposing the scheme outweighed all considerations of prudence; and on one of the coldest days of the coldest March within our recollection he came to town. The consequences of that fatal journey are well known. After a few days' suffering he sunk to rest, his life-work done — such work as few in any age or country have been good and great enough to do.

From the Reader, 27th January.

We are indebted to the Magazin für die Literatur des Auslandes for the knowledge of a rising poet in the far west, of whom we believe none of our readers have yet heard, but whose name will certainly ere long become familiar to all lovers of true poetry. Two years ago, in the midst of the great American struggle between North and South, a society was formed of men residing in the Western States who had been educated at any of the great public schools of the Republic. The society, which numbers between 500 and 600 members, held its second annual meeting in June last, and issued an octavo pamphlet of 108 pages, under the title of "Oration, Poem, and Speeches delivered at the Second Annual Meeting of the Associated Alumni of the Pacific Coast, held at Oakland, California, June 6, 1865. Published by the Association. (San Francisco: Towne and Bacon.)" Mr. Edward Rowland Sill, a young banker of San Francisco, wrote the poem on President Lincoln's death, which we quote at length from the pages of our German contemporary, extracted probably from the only copy of the pamphlet to be met with on this side of the Atlantic. We have headed it:—

THE NOBLEST SOUL OF ALL.

WERE there no crowns on earth,
No evergreen to weave a hero's wreath,
That he must pass beyond the gates of death,
Our hero, our slain hero, to be crowned?
Could there on our unworthy earth be found
Naught to befit his worth?

He the noblest soul of all!
When was there ever, since our Washington,
A man so pure, so wise, so patient, one
Who walked with this high goal alone in sight,
To speak, to do, to sanction only Right,
Though very heaven should fall?

Ah, not for him we weep;
What honour more could be in store for him?
Who would have had him linger in our dim
And troublesome world, when his great work was done?
Who would not leave that worn and weary one Gladly to go to sleep?

For us the stroke was just;
We were not worthy of that patient heart;
We might have helped him more, not stood apart,
And coldly criticised his works and ways—
Too late now, all too late, our little praise
Sounds hollow o'er his dust.

Be merciful, our God!

Forgive the meanness of our human hearts,
That never, till a noble soul departs,
See half the worth, or hear the angel's wings,
Till they go rustling heavenward as he springs
Up from the mounded sod.

Yet what a deathless crown
Of Northern pine and Southern orange-flower
For victory, and the land's new bridal hour
Would we have wreathed for that beloved brow!
Sadly upon his sleeping forehead now
We lay our cypress down.

O martyred one, farewell!
Thou hast not left thy people quite alone,
Out of thy beautiful life there comes a tone
Of power, of love, of trust, a prophecy,
Whose fair fulfilment all the earth shall be,
And all the future tell.

THE LOSS OF THE ARGO.

THE vane, it pointed southward;
The breeze, it cheerily blew;
The skipper was standing beside me—
The skipper and all his crew.

It was up with the jib and the topsail;
It was up, and sheet home, and belay;
The skipper he laughed as the breeze came aft,
And the clipper she bowled away.

She was all that he had or he cared for;
His mother had never loved him,
With a love more watchful and tender than his
For his clipper staunch and trim.

And gaily she went and quickly,
Till half the voyage was o'er;
Till she neared those treacherous latitudes
Midway 'twixt shore and shore.

For there and then:—but well you ken—Confusion all on deck:
'Tis an old, old tale—up came the gale—
And down, down went the wreck.

He was not drowned, the skipper—
Nor I, who tell you the tale;
But he thrilled with a mortal agony,
And his cheek was deadly pale.

For—ask not how I consoled him,
Probe not what lies beyond—
It was our little Harry sailing his ship Across Green Brier Pond!

WE made some remarks not very long ago on Lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion. His autobiography — which is partly supplementary to, and partly a continuation of, his more famous work — throws a good deal of additional light on the character of the author and on the age in which he lived. There are three principal periods which the memoirs illustrate. First, the early part of his life, down to the meeting of the Long Parliament (birth, 18th February, 1609, to November, 1640). Secondly, some parts of the history of the Long Parliament and the civil war, and of the residence of Charles II. abroad (1640–1660). Thirdly, the Restoration, the early years of Charles II.'s reign (1660–1667), and the six years which Clarendon passed in banishment, until his death on December 9th, 1673.

The first period is much the most entertaining. Clarendon was not industrious in his youth. He learnt very little at College, where indeed he was a mere boy; and his life as a law student "was without great application to the study of the law for some years, it being then a time when the town was full of soldiers. . . . And he had gotten into the acquaintance of many of those officers, which took up too much of his time for one year." He read some "polite literature and history," however, and, as he remarked in his old age, "lived cautè if not castè." He had, however, the means of seeing good society. He was connected by marriage with the family of the Marquis of Hamilton, and he was brought very early in his career into business of importance. In particular, he vindicated before the Privy Council the rights of the merchants of London in a dispute which affected the revenue; and, in consequence of his management of the case, he was introduced to Archbishop Laud. His professional success and distinction put him in very pleasant circumstances. "He grew every day in practice, of which he had as much as he desired; and, having a competent estate of his own, he enjoyed a very pleasant and a plentiful life, living much above the rank of those lawyers whose business was only to be rich, and was generally beloved and esteemed by most persons of condition and great reputation." His account of these pleasant days is by far the most interesting passage of his writings. It is composed of characters of Ben Jonson, Selden, Sir Kenelm Digby, May, the historian of the Long Parliament, Lord Falkland, Waller the poet, Sheldon, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, Hales, Chillingworth, and some others of less note. The accounts of Falkland and Chillingworth are memorable passages in English literature, and deserve to be described as portraits of the highest excellence. The other characters are rather collections of remarks than pictures. Clarendon's History and his Memoirs are full of interest, but their interest is that of the conversation of an experienced public man, who was, besides, one of the strongest of all conceivable partisans. It is not the interest of a work of art. Moreover, his extreme gravity and stateliness, though it allowed him to be sarcastic and occasionally humorous, prevented him from devising any of those pointed vigorous expressions which, as Mr. Carlyle says of some of Mirabeau's, make a complete portrait in three scratches and a dot. This renders his portraits far less amusing than they would otherwise have been, and in some respects less instructive. That Clarendon's partisanship continually blinded his judgment is painfully obvious. This appears strikingly in the worship which he lavished on Charles I.; but he partially redeems his fault by his views of the Stuart family in general, and of Charles II. in particular. His account of him and his brother is an admirable specimen of the sarcastic vein which he sometimes indulged:—

It was the unhappy fate of that family that they trusted naturally the judgments of those who were as much inferior to them in understanding as they were in quality. . . . They were too much inclined to like men at first sight, and did not love the conversation of men of many more years than themselves, and thought age not only troublesome but impertinent. They did not love to deny, and less to strangers than to their friends; not out of bounty or generosity, which was a flower that did never grow naturally in the heart of either of the families—that of Stuart or the other of Bourbon—but out of an unskillfulness and defect in the countenance; and when they prevailed with themselves to make some pause rather than to deny, importunities removed all resolution, which they knew not how to shut out nor defend themselves against, even when it was evident enough that they had much rather not consent. . . . If the Duke seemed more fixed and firm in his resolutions, it was rather from an obstinacy in his will than from the constancy of his judgment.

A delightful character, from the most faithful servant and most zealous partisan that ever any family had.

We get, however, from Clarendon a very pleasing notion of his early friends. Perhaps the most characteristic point about them is their great intellectual activity, and the extraordinary degree of learning that some of them attained to. Falkland appears to have formed a kind of centre for the whole party, when he was little over twenty; and the well-known passage in which his pursuits are described is so beautiful that we transcribe it:—

His whole conversation was one continued convivium philosophicum or convivium theologicum, enlivened and refreshed with all the facetiousness of wit and good humour, and pleasantness of discourse, which made the argument itself (whatever it was) very delectable. His house, where he usually resided (Tew or Burford in Oxfordshire), being within ten or twelve miles of the University, looked like the University itself, by the company that was always found there. There were Dr. Sheldon, Dr. Morley, Dr. Hammond, Dr. Earles, Mr. Chillingworth, and indeed all men of eminent parts and faculties at Oxford, besides those who resorted thither from London; who all found their lodgings there as ready as in the colleges; nor did the lord of the house know of their coming or going, nor who were in his house, till he came to dinner or supper, where all still met; otherwise there was no troublesome ceremony or constraint to forbid men to come to the house, or to make them weary of staying there; so that many came thither to study in a better air, finding all the books they could desire in his library, and all the persons together whose company they could wish, and not find in any other society. Here Mr. Chillingworth wrote and formed and modelled his excellent book against the learned Jesuit Mr. Knott, after frequent debates upon the most important particulars.

Lord Falkland's own studies were remarkable:—

There were very few classic authors in the Greek or Latin tongue that he had not read with great exactness; he had read all the Greek and Latin fathers, all the most allowed and authentic ecclesiastical writers, and all the Councils, with wonderful care and observation; for in religion he thought too careful and too curious an inquiry could not be made amongst those whose purity was not questioned—and whose authority was appealed to on both sides. The sentence meanders on for thirteen lines more, which we spare our readers; but this is what it comes to. This passage—to which other well-known facts correspond—as, for instance, the prodigious learning of Selden, and the curiously minute acquaintance with all the details of English history which was shown in the great Parliamentary debates of the period, and of which Mr. Forster's Life of Eliot supplies numerous illustrations—raises the question whether men in those days were more energetic and industrious than in our own. To discuss it at length would lead us far from our present subject, but Clarendon's Life throws some light upon the matter. There would seem to have been hardly any light literature in those days, plays excepted; and the common subjects of education were fewer than at present. Falkland, for instance, who was carefully educated at Dublin, knew no Greek till he taught it himself long afterwards. Clarendon learnt French only during his second exile, “not” he says, “towards speaking it, the defect of which he found many conveniences in, but for the reading any books.” A man might get through a great deal of reading if there were no circulating library works, no periodical literature, and only one language besides his own, or at most two, which he had any occasion to understand.

Next to his own immediate friends, the most interesting personages described in the early part of Clarendon's Life are Archbishop Laud and Clarendon himself. He was very fond of Laud; he “had so great an affection and reverence for his memory” that he “believed him to be a man of the most exemplar virtue and piety of any of that age.” Laud took notice of him as he was just rising into large business at the Bar, and when life in general must have looked very bright to him; and probably some of the rays of that brightness fell upon the Archbishop. The only fault that he could, or would, see in him was the roughness of his manner. Clarendon probably secretly liked him all the better for defects which he was conscious of not sharing, though he had a certain tendency towards them, corrected by education. Of Laud he observes, in a well-known passage:—

It is the misfortune of most persons of that education (how worthy soever) that they have rarely friendships with men above their own condition, and that their ascent being commonly sudden from low to high, they have afterwards rather dependants than friends, and are still deceived by keeping somewhat in reserve to themselves even from those with whom they seem most openly to communicate, and, which is worse, received for the most part their informations and advertisements from clergymen who understand the least, and take the worst measure of human affairs of all mankind that can write and read.

It is easy to trace in this celebrated passage the inward satisfaction with which Clarendon contrasted his own social advantages with the somewhat narrow education of Laud. His own temper apparently had something of the same sort of roughness in it, for he continually boasts of his habitual plainness of speech. The following account of himself is one of the oddest passages that ever were written :—

He was in his nature inclined to pride and passion, and to a humour between wrangling and disputing, very troublesome; which good company in a short time so much reformed and mastered, that no man was more affable and courteous to all kinds of persons; and they who knew the great infirmity of his whole family, which abounded in passion, used to say he had much extinguished the unruliness of that fire. That which supported and rendered him generally acceptable was his generosity (for he had too much a contempt of money), and the opinion men had of the goodness and justice of his nature which was transcendent in him, in a wonderful tenderness and delight in obliging. His integrity was ever without blemish, and believed to be above temptation. He was firm and unshaken in his friendships; and though he had great candour towards others in the differences of religion, he was zealously and deliberately fixed in the principles both of the doctrine and discipline of the Church.

Few men have sung their own praises with such calm assurance. A person who says, "Upon mature reflection, I pronounce myself to be a man of transcendent goodness and justice, wonderful tenderness, unblemished integrity, a firm friend, and as candid as I am strict in my religious views," must really be a sort of phenomenon. In every part of his autobiography Clarendon shows a solid, deliberate admiration of himself, which it seems hardly fair to call vanity, because it is so calm and grave, but which, so far as we know, is unrivalled by any other writer.

The great blemish of the early part of the Memoirs is that they throw very little light either upon the logical groundwork of Clarendon's earlier life or on the nature of his change. Perhaps the most plausible guess—for, after all, it is little more that can be made—as to his frame of mind, is that he was one of the very few who clearly understood the nature of the struggle between the King and the Parliament, and took part emphatically and passionately for the King; and this although, in the earlier part of his career, he was as well aware as any one of the existence of great abuses which required a remedy. All study of that period leads to the conclusion that the real question was the question of sovereignty. Was the King or the Parliament to be the substantive or the adjective? Clarendon took the Royal side, perhaps, all the more warmly because he had sufficient faith in it to wish to reform collateral abuses, like the Courts of the Earl Marshal and those of the President of the North, and the Council of Wales. He appears really and honestly to have believed that it was an everlasting divine decree that the King and the Bishops should direct, substantially and really, all the temporal and spiritual affairs of the nation, and that it was in the highest degree morally wicked, and even impious, to try to alter this arrangement. Nothing is more difficult for us, at this distance of time, to realize than the view, which in those days a man like Clarendon took of a man like Hampden. What Hampden thought of Clarendon we do not know, but Clarendon obviously considered Hampden as a wicked man, a rebel, a traitor, and a hypocrite. In a curious summary of his life with which the book concludes, he says, in language too ample for quotation, that he began by "so great a tenderness and love towards mankind" that he believed every one to be virtuous, but that his Parliamentary experience soon taught him that men "upon whose ingenuity and probity he would willingly have deposited all his concerns of this world" were "totally false and disingenuous;" that "religion was made a cloak to cover the most impious designs, and reputation of honesty a stratagem to deceive and cheat others who had no mind to be wicked." It is true that he adds that the Court was "as full of murmuring, ingratitude, and treachery against the best and most bountiful master in the world as the country and the city;" but scores of passages might easily be quoted from his works which show that he was utterly unable to believe that the Parliamentary party could have any conscientious belief at all in their own principles. This intense zeal is the more difficult to explain because he stood almost alone in it. Falkland, for instance, was obviously in great doubt as to the course which he had taken; but perhaps the most curious case was that of Sir Edmund Verney, the standard-bearer. On the march to Edge Hill he complimented

Hyde on his cheerfulness, adding that, for his own part, he could not be cheerful:—

"You," said Verney, "have satisfaction in your conscience that you are in the right; that the King ought not to grant what is required of him . . . but for my part, I do not like the quarrel, and do heartily wish that the King would yield, and consent to what they desire. . . . I will deal freely with you. I have no reverence for the Bishops for whom this quarrel subsists."

Clarendon's intense partisanship for the King and the Bishops, wherever he got it, certainly went a very long way, for it made him thoroughly disingenuous in his subsequent account of the transactions in which he was concerned. No one would ever guess from his writings that he had voted for Strafford's attainder, or for the Bill for perpetual Parliaments. Other instances of great forgetfulness or deceitfulness have been exposed elaborately by Mr. Forster, in his Life of Eliot. It ought, however, to be observed that both his History and his Life are exceedingly imperfect. He omits many matters which ought to have found a place in his writings. For instance, he does not even allude to the Act for abolishing feudal tenures.

In the second stage of his life—the civil war, and the years of exile which followed it—the autobiography adds little to the History of the Rebellion except a certain number of personal anecdotes. The most interesting relate to his residence at Jersey, where he employed himself, between 1646 and 1648, in writing his History. As usual, he commends his own industry with that grave, measured self-esteem which was peculiar to him:—

He seldom spent less than ten hours in the day [amongst his books and papers], and it can hardly be believed how much he read and writ there; inasmuch as he did usually compute that during his whole stay in Jersey, which was some months above two years, he writ daily little less than one sheet of large paper with his own hand.

Creditable enough, but nothing to make a marvel of, one would think.

The third part of Clarendon's Life stands alone, relating as it does, to a period subsequent to the termination of his History. It relates to the first years of the reign of Charles II. It is a good deal occupied with Clarendon's own personal affairs, which have now fallen much out of date. He finds it necessary, for instance, to go with extreme minuteness into most of the points on which his impeachment was grounded, and to show, step by step, how unreasonable they were, and how hardly he was used. This he does successfully enough, but at wearisome length to a modern reader. One only of the personal scenes of the book is curious enough to be worth particular reference. It is the one in which he describes his behaviour on hearing of his daughter's private marriage to James II. When informed of the fact by the Marquis of Ormond and the Earl of Southampton, at the desire of Charles II., he behaved in a manner which it takes him two pages to describe, the nature of which is sufficiently indicated by the marginal notes which illustrate them. "The Chancellor struck with it to the heart" is the summary of about half a page; "and breaks out into a very immoderate passion" is the summary of the remainder. It is a most appropriate one, for the concluding sentences, the stately style of which are in strange contrast to their character, are:—

He hoped their Lordships would concur with him that the King should immediately cause the woman to be sent to the Tower, and to be cast into a dungeon, under so strict a guard that no person living should be permitted to come to her; and then that an Act of Parliament should be immediately passed for the cutting off of her head, to which he would not only give his consent, but would very willingly be the first man to propose it; and whoever knew the man will believe that he said all this very heartily.

He also observed "that he had much rather his daughter should be the Duke's whore than his wife," as, in the first case, he might turn her out of doors, and have done with her; whereas, in the second, his duty as a loyal subject, and as first Minister of the Crown, would be to get her head cut off. This story is often told as a proof of the passionate, bigoted loyalty of Clarendon. We agree with Lord Campbell in thinking that his lordship did protest too much, and that in truth he was by no means so angry as he professed to be. The worst part of his whole character—and the fault is illustrated in endless ways—is his frequent insincerity. No doubt the events of his life afforded much excuse for it, but it shows itself continually, and almost always in the same form. He keeps continually saying, almost in so many words but at all events indirectly—"I am a rough, honest, passionate, plainspoken man, proud of my sincerity, perhaps too secure in my good conscience. My frank harshness of manner was the cause of all my misfortunes." The slyness which lurks under this sort of roughness is the shiest thing in the whole world.

The general view which the latter part of the Life affords of the state of the country at the Restoration is exceedingly interesting. When attentively read, it shows what an immense change had been made by the civil war in the position of Royalty, notwithstanding the eagerness with which Charles was welcomed back in the first instance. It has been usual to represent Clarendon as the grave Mentor, the partisan of decency and order, who was driven into exile by the gross ingratitude and wickedness of a King who could not bear his own vices to be reproved, and of a Court which was the natural enemy of all decency and gravity. In all this there is a good deal of truth, but it is not quite the whole truth. There are many indications which it is impossible to mistake, though it would be difficult to exhibit them at full length in a moderate compass, that, apart from and over and above the offence given by Clarendon's well-deserved rebukes of Charles and his vices, Charles perceived that he did not enter into the spirit of the times, but belonged to a different age. Throughout the whole of his book he speaks of the Presbyterian party in a tone of rancorous moral condemnation. They had, he says in one place, no title to their lives except the King's mercy. All his policy was in the same direction. He never could look upon any of the doings of the Long Parliament with toleration. For instance, the Triennial Act was then as much a part of the law of the land as any other; yet Charles said, in so many words, apparently with the full concurrence of his Chancellor, that he would never permit a Parliament to assemble under its provisions, because they were derogatory to the Royal power. So Clarendon continually tried to get the King to dissolve the Parliament elected after his return—the second Long Parliament, as it was called. This seemed, and perhaps in some respects actually was, a constitutional measure, but Charles's reasons for not doing so show what the real issue between himself and his Chancellor was. He refused to dissolve the Parliament because he thought he could govern through it. His other counsellors told him "that he would never have such another Parliament, where he had near one hundred members of his own menial servants and their near relations, who were all at his disposal." Clarendon would, no doubt, have liked the Parliament to have greater purity and less power. Charles felt that the Parliament could never again recede to the position which it had occupied in the early part of the century, and that the only chance of maintaining his power was by the use of influence. The honestest man of the two was less favourable to freedom than the other. A remarkable summary of Clarendon's own views is given in the latter part of the book:—

He did never dissemble from the time of his return with the King, whom he had likewise prepared and disposed to the same sentiments, whilst His Majesty was abroad, that his opinion was that the late rebellion never could be extirpated and pulled up by the roots till the King's regal and inherent power and prerogative should be fully avowed and vindicated, and till the usurpations in both Houses of Parliament, since the year 1640, were disclaimed and made odious; and many other excesses which had been affected by both before that time, under the name of Privileges, should be restrained or explained.

This was the leading idea of all his policy, and it is to be traced, in a variety of minute ways, in all that he has to say on the subject of the management of public affairs. He could not forgive Charles for being less of a Tory than himself:—

The King had in his nature so little reverence or esteem for antiquity and did, in truth, so much condemn old orders, forms, and institutions, that the objections of novelty rather advanced than obstructed any proposition.

There are a good many incidental remarks in Clarendon's Life which throw light on the manners of the age which he describes. He gives an account, for instance, of his way of spending his time when he began to get business at the Bar—i. e. at some period being between 1630 and 1640. How he spent his mornings does not appear; but he saw his friends at dinner, in the middle of the day. The afternoons "he dedicated to the business of his profession," and he read "polite learning" at night. "He never supped for many years before the troubles brought in that custom." His vacation he passed in study, except two months in the summer, when he went out of town. He afterwards speaks of the House of Commons rising at four as a "disorderly hour," and refers to dinners given by the popular leaders after the House had risen. Probably this is what he means by the troubles bringing in the custom of supping. During the civil war there was a rapid transport of despatches, "when gentlemen undertook the service, which they were willing enough to do," between London and York. Letters went out at twelve on Saturday night and the answer returned at ten on Monday morning. Clarendon, too, gives us the first notice of newspapers:—

After he [the King] had read his several letters of intelligence, he took out the prints of diurnals, and speeches, and the like, which were every day printed at London.

After the Restoration, he speaks of bankers as—

A tribe that had risen and grown up in Cromwell's time, and never were heard of before the late troubles, till when the whole trade of money had passed through the hands of the scriveners.

He thinks it necessary to explain the word "million" as often as he uses it, by adding, in a parenthesis, "Ten hundred thousand."

In concluding a notice of Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, some time ago, we gave a specimen of his occasional eloquence. We will conclude this notice of his Life, which is far from being an eloquent book, with a specimen of the wonderful clumsiness into which he habitually allowed himself to slide when he wrote under no special excitement. As a clue to the labyrinth, we may observe that Clarendon meant that Lord Falmouth despised Pen, and that Mr. Coventry supported him:—

The Earl of Falmouth and Mr. Coventry were rivals who should have most interest in the Duke, who loved the Earl best, but thought the other the wiser man, who supported Pen (who disoblged all the courtiers), even against the Earl, who contemned Pen.

Here are five "whos" in one sentence, and each refers to a different antecedent—namely, 1, Falmouth and Coventry; 2, The Duke of York; 3, Coventry; 4, Pen; and 5, Falmouth.

Shadows of the Old Booksellers. By Charles Knight. Bell and Daldy.

In his Lives of his three famous brothers, Roger North deploras the degradation of the bookseller's calling from its condition in his younger days. "Then," he says, "Little Britain was a plentiful and perpetual emporium of learned authors, and men went thither as to a market, where they seldom failed to meet with a greater conversation. And the booksellers themselves were knowing and conversible men, with whom, for the sake of bookish knowledge, the greatest wits were pleased to converse." Thomas Guy, with whose memoir Mr. Knight's book opens, was not one of these. His life, however, was well worth telling. The son of a Thames lighterman who died when he was eight years old, he was apprenticed in 1660 to a bookseller in Cheap-side. In 1668, just after the Great Fire, he began business on his own account as master of a little shop "near Stocks Market," at the corner of Cornhill and Lombard street. The office of King's printer, carrying with it a monopoly in the printing of Bibles, having continued in one careless family for more than a century, the volumes had come to be so "very bad, both in letter and in paper," that they were hardly legible. Guy was the most enterprising of several booksellers who started a profitable trade in Bibles, printed in Holland. "But this, trade," says Maitland, "proving not only very detrimental to the public revenue, but likewise to the King's printer, all ways and means were devised to quash the same; which, being vigorously put in execution, the booksellers, by frequent seizures and prosecutions, became so great sufferers that they judged a further pursuit thereof inconsistent with their interest." Guy found it his interest to abandon the trade very early. He made a compromise with the monopolists and obtained leave to print Bibles in London, with types imported from Holland. Thereby he soon grew rich. Mr. Knight mistrusts the common stories of his stinginess, and finds him guilty of nothing but "the most scrupulous frugality." He boldly denies the other stories to the effect that he made a great part of his wealth by buying as cheaply as he could the paper with which it was the custom to pay sailors, and then converting them into money at something like their real value. That, says Mr. Knight, was a practice of Charles the Second's day, but not of Queen Anne's. Guy doubtless enriched himself partly by the sale of Bibles, and yet more by investing the profits of that sale in the buying of Government stock and other lawful ways of making money on 'Change. In 1720 he spent 45,500*l.* in buying South Sea stock at 120*l.* for the 100*l.* share. He began to sell out when the shares were worth 300*l.*, and disposed of the last of them for 600*l.* apiece.

In that year, however, he was seventy-six years old, and he had long before become famous for his wealth. It is clear that, apart from penuriousness in his personal affairs, he was willing to use freely his wealth, however gotten. "As he was a man of unbounded charity and universal benevolence," says Maitland, "so was he likewise a great patron of liberty and the rights of his fellow subjects; which, to his great honour, he strenuously asserted in divers Parliaments, whereof he was a member." He sat in the House of Commons, as member for Tamworth, from 1695 to 1707. In 1705 he built some almshouses at Tamworth. In 1707 he added three new wards to St. Thomas's Hospital, and in 1720 his South Sea gains encouraged him to buy ground for a new building. Guy's Hospital, completed very soon after his death in 1724, cost 19,000*l.* in erection, and was endowed by him with 220,000*l.* Even if there were some irregularities in the acquiring of his money, the good uses to which it was applied helped to excuse them.

But Thomas Guy, at best, had little besides prosperity in common with most of the booksellers of his time. The King of these was Jacob Tonson, whose house at Barn Elms, near Barnes, was the summer meeting place of the Kit-Cat-Club.

Tonson's villa has gone into ruin, with the famous room which he built for the meetings of the Club, whose walls were hung with the portraits of the members. Nearly half a century ago, their condition was described with some graphic power, by Sir Richard Phillips. He says: "A lane, in the north-west corner of the common, brought me to Barnes' Elms, where now resides a Mr. Hoare, a barker of London. The family were not at home; but, on asking the servants if that was the house of Mr. Tonson, they assured me, with great simplicity, that no such gentleman lived there. I named the Kit-Cat-Club, as accustomed to assemble here; but the oddity of the name excited their ridicule, and was told that no such Club was held there; but perhaps, said one to the other, the gentleman means the Club that assembles at the public house on the Common. Knowing, however, that I was at the right place, I could not avoid expressing my vexation that the periodical assemblage of the first men of their age should be so entirely forgotten by those who now reside on the spot; when one of them exclaimed, 'I should not wonder if the gentleman means the philosophers' room!'" He was conducted across a detached garden, and brought to a handsome structure, evidently the building, which he sought. The decayed door was unfastened, and he entered a once elegant hall, whose ceiling had partially fallen. He ascended a dilapidated staircase, not without danger. "But," he continues, "I was well repaid for my pains. Here I found the Kit-Cat-Club-room, nearly as it existed in the days of its glory. It is eighteen feet high, and forty feet long by twenty feet wide. The mouldings and ornaments were in the most superb fashion of its age; but the whole was falling to pieces, from the effects of the dry rot. My attention was chiefly attracted by the faded cloth-hanging of the room, whose red colour once set off the famous portraits of the Club that hung around it. Their marks and sizes were still visible, and the numbers and names remained as written in chalk, for the guidance of the hangers. Thus was I, as it were, by these still legible names, brought into personal contract with Addison, Steele, and Congreve, and Garth, and Dryden, and with many hereditary nobles, remembered only because they were patrons of those natural nobles."

Of the Kit-Cat Club and its leading members Mr. Knight gives some interesting notices. His book is specially rich in details about the "old booksellers" of that time, the time of Dryden, Steele, and Swift. Thence he passes to the generation in which Richardson was the most famous bookseller, and one of the most famous authors as well, so famous that Edward Young is reported to have said to him, "Suppose in the title-page of the 'Night Thoughts' 'you should say, 'Published by the Author of Clarissa.'"

About William Hutton, the self-taught and self-made printer of Birmingham, the world knows less. This is part of Mr. Knight's excellent account of his up-hill work:

He took a shop at Southwell, fourteen miles from Nottingham, paying for its use twenty shillings a year. Here he deposited his stock of tattered volumes, and "in one day became the most eminent bookseller in Southwell." He was not, however, a resident in this little town, now better known than it was a century ago by being the scene of the first sensible experiment in the administration of the Poor Laws. The resolute and prudent man thus describes his course of life during a rainy winter: "I set out from Nottingham at five every Saturday morning, carried a burthen of from three to thirty pounds weight to Southwell, opened shop at ten, starved in it all day upon bread, cheese, and half a pint of ale; took from 1*s.* to 6*s.*, shut up at four, and by trudging through the solitary night and the deep roads five hours more, I arrived at Nottingham by nine, where I always found a mess of milk porridge by the fire, prepared by my valuable sister." But as might be expected, the labour of such a life was great and the profit small. In 1750, therefore, he made a journey to Birmingham, where he found that three booksellers were thriving. One of these, Mr. Warren, I have mentioned as having been associated with the early literary efforts of Samuel Johnson. He was one of three mentioned by Hutton as the "great men" of that active, prosperous, and intelligent community. He thought, however, that there might be room for a fourth in a small way. His way was, indeed, a small one. He agreed to pay a shilling a week for the rent of half a very little shop. His stock was not an expensive one. Upon the invitation of a dissenting minister, with whom his sister had once lived as a servant, he walked to Gainsborough, and there purchased of his sister's old master a lot of books at his own price. He estimates their weight at two hundred pounds, and he pays for them by the following note: 'I promise to pay to Ambrose Rudvall one pound seven shillings when I am able.'

It is difficult to imagine a more forlorn condition of life than that of William Hutton as he sat amongst his old books, looking in vain for customers. There was not a face that he knew in this populous town. He was separated from his sister. He saw little hope of making his way in the world without money and without friends. But gradually two or three young men came to know the intelligent bookseller, and to talk with him upon subjects something higher than those belonging to an ordinary retail trade. A popular demand for literature was growing up. The dealer in second-hand books had odd volumes of poets and essayists to tempt the youth who had a sixpence or a shilling to lay out; and if Hutton could purchase any books of greater value, he could smarten them up by his skill in binding. By the most rigid economy he found himself at the end of the first year twenty pounds better than when he began business. He felt that he was at the beginning of a prosperous career. But suddenly there arose a dark cloud which threatened to shut out all the sunshine of his hopes. There were official tyrants a hundred and fifteen years ago, who have continued to exist up to this very time, although their power of injury has been gradually diminishing. He has described this crisis, in which the fortunes of one of the greatest benefactors of Birmingham were very nearly wrecked: "The overseers, fearful I should become chargeable to the parish, examined me with regard to my settlement, and, with a voice of authority, ordered me to procure a certificate, or they would remove me from the town. Terrified, I wrote to my father, who returned for answer, 'that All Saints, in Derby never granted certificates.' I was hunted by ill-nature two years. I repeatedly offered to pay the levies (rates), which was refused. A succeeding overseer, a draper, of whom I had purchased two suits of clothes, value 10*l.*, consented to take them. The scru-ple exhibited a short sight, a narrow principle, and the exultation of power over the defenceless." The adroit purchase of two suits of clothes from the draper in office was an unquestionable assurance of William Hutton's "respectability." The next year he took a better shop and a dwelling house. He had now a prosperous trade, and read the signs of the times aright when he set up the first Circulating Library established in Birmingham.

Contemporary with Hutton was Edward Cave, the starter of the Gentleman's Magazine, and Dodsley and Newberry were only a few years younger. Of them and others Mr. Knight speaks in his later chapters. The last chapter is upon James Lackington, son of a journeyman shoemaker, born in 1746. He began life as a baker's boy:

His first steps in the paths of bookselling are thus described: "During the time that I lived with the baker, my name became so celebrated for selling a large number of pies, puddings, &c., that for several years following, application was made to my father for him to permit me to sell Almanacks a few market days before and after Christmas. In this employ I took great delight, the country people being highly pleased with me, and purchasing a great number of my almanacks, which excited envy in the itinerant vendors of Moore, Wing, Poor Robin, &c., to such a degree, that my father often expressed his anxiety lest they should some way or other do me a mischief. But I had not the least concern; for possessing a light pair of heels, I always kept at a proper distance. O, my friend, little did I imagine at that time, that I should ever excite the same poor mean spirit in many of the booksellers of London and other places."

At fourteen he left the baker to become a shoemaker's apprentice at Taunton. In due time he set up a shop of his own at Bristol, and soon began to sell old books as well as new boots. Before 1780 he removed to London, to open a shop for the sale of books alone, the boots being altogether abandoned. This shop, often enlarged, was burnt down some years ago; but Mr. Knight describes it as he knew it in his youth:

At one of the corners of Finsbury square, which was built in 1789, there was a block of houses which had been adapted to the purposes of a great shop or warehouse, and presented an imposing frontage. A dome rises from the centre, on the top of which a flag is flying. This royal manifestation (now become common to suburban public-houses), proclaims that this is no ordinary commercial establishment. Over the princial entrance is inscribed, "Cheapest Booksellers in the World." It is the famous shop of Lackington, Allen and Co., "where above Half a Million of Volumes are constantly on Sale." We enter the vast area, whose dimensions are to be measured by the assertion that a coach and six might be driven round it. In the centre is an enormous circular counter, within which stand the dispensers of knowledge, ready to wait upon the country clergyman, in his wig and shovel-hat; upon the fine ladies, in feathers and trains; or upon the bookseller's collector, with his dirty bag. If there is any chaffering about the cost of a work, the shopman points to the following inscription: "The lowest price is marked on every Book, and no abatement made on any article." We ascend a broad staircase, which leads to "The Lounging Rooms," and to the first of a series of circular galleries, lighted from the lantern of the dome, which also lights the ground floor. Hundreds, even thousands, of volumes are displayed on the shelves running round their walls. As we mount higher and higher, we find commoner books, in shabbier bindings; but there is still the same order preserved, each book being numbered according to a printed catalogue. This is larger than that of any other booksellers, and it comes out yearly.

We must make no more extracts from this entertaining book. Let those we have made commend it to all who care to understand the history of bookselling. Its interest also is doubled when we recognize in it the work of one who will himself hereafter take the first place among booksellers who have earned for themselves the truest honour and have done the most essential service to their country.

PRETTY WOMEN AND WITTY WOMEN.

THERE are two words, somewhat irreverently made use of when describing a royal and illustrious lady, which will perhaps suggest themselves to the reader's imagination when the shade of the good old Queen Charlotte floats before his mind's eye. "Snuffy and plain," — "plain and snuffy;" sometimes the sentence runs this way, sometimes that; but in any case it is an irreverent, and, as we hope to prove, an unjust sentence upon the little princess, who came chirping so blithely from her dingy German home, to take her place amongst us as the first lady in the land. Ladies who have been younger, and now are — what shall we say? — older, — not old, of course; ladies are never old in "London Society"

— hear what was once said about the young bride who became afterwards so "snuffy and plain," such a homely little German "frau." "Pretty and witty" carried the day then; for, above the thunder of the welcome which England gave to the royal bride, Horace Walpole heard "nothing but proclamations of her beauty;" an opinion which he confirms after his introduction on the same day at St. James's, adding to the remark, "She looks very sensible, cheerful, and is remarkably genteel." This last word sounds strangely in our ears, when issuing from a patrician pen. Even the Times, which (ignoring the wrath of the Saturday Reviewer) still insists upon the birth of "a prince," never sank so deep in the "Jeames" phraseology as to describe our princess, in all her graceful loveliness, as "remarkably genteel." But it has been the abuse of the word, not the use of it, which has made it revolting to our ideas of refinement. It has been made to stand for some of the great shams which have been held up to everlasting ridicule in Thackeray's "Snob Papers," and as the outward sign of superficial refinement only we have rejected it from our vocabulary with contempt. The description of the arrival of the Princess Charlotte is not uninteresting now, with the welcome of our own fair bride to our shores still fresh in our recollections. We seem to hear again "the noise of the coaches, chaises, horsemen, and mob," that assembled to see her pass through the town with clamour "so prodigious" that, like the bachelor of Strawberry-hill on the occasion of the arrival of "Madame Charlotte," we could "hardly distinguish the guns." It was too dark for the weary spectators to notice whether the Princess Alexandria turned pale, when the royal towers of Windsor loomed grandly on her expectant gaze; but as it was also too dark for her to distinguish them, the probabilities are that she did not. But then her bridegroom was at her side, the prince of her romance, as in a fairy tale. In the other case, the unknown wooer was a stranger, and a king; and we read that, as the bride elect caught the first glimpse of his palace, that she "trembled and turned pale." The Duchess of Hamilton smiled at her distress; upon which the princess naively remarked, "My dear duchess, you may laugh — you have been married twice; but it is no joke to me." When the king had grown old, and roamed about his palace — feeble, blind, mad — did the good wife, the homely German frau, ever call to mind the halcyon days of her youth, or think that it might have been the forecast shadow of time which made her tremble and turn pale then? She was nervous when her bridesmaids and future court were presented to her, and exclaimed aloud, "Mon Dieu! il y en a tant! il y en a tant!" The bridesmaids, who were particularly distinguished for their beauty of figure and face, were Lady Caroline Russell, Lady Sarah Lenox, and Lady Elizabeth Keppel. Of Lady Sarah, Walpole says, that "she was by far the chief angel;" and as she was once supposed to have entertained hopes of engaging the royal affections herself, it was particularly amiable in her to look angelic on that occasion. The Duchess of Hamilton was radiant that day, and "almost in possession of her former beauty." The absence of three of the celebrated beauties, Lady Waldegrave, Lady Kildare, and Mrs. Fitzroy was calculated, according to Mr. Walpole, to reassure the new Queen upon the subject of her own charms, which, without being particularly striking, could, in his opinion, hold their own with most of the women whom she saw assembled round her on that eventful occasion. Surely this praise is not to be despised when coming from the cynical Horace, who was not apt to exaggerate, excepting where his prejudices or passions had been keenly excited, which could not have been the case, either for or against, in the case of the German princess. — London Society.

MR. URQUHART AND THE TURKISH BATH.

WHEN we consider the immense energy and perseverance which must be applied in order to obtain due attention to, much more to obtain acceptance of, a new therapeutical means, we cannot but congratulate Mr. Urquhart on the encouraging success which he has already had, both with the medical profession and with the public. It is now some years since Sir John Fife, having satisfied his own mind of the efficacy of the Turkish Bath in the treatment of disease, induced the committee of the Newcastle Infirmary to construct such a bath for the hospital. A continued experience since that time has strengthened his convictions of the value of the bath; from what he has witnessed of its effects in health for training, in convalescence for enabling the valetudinarian to commence exercise, and in disease as a remedy or palliation, "I am not afraid," he says, "to stake my professional character by declaring my belief in its efficacy." Accordingly, he has collected, from the writings and speeches of Mr. Urquhart, an account of the principles of its action, a description of the best mode of its construction, and practical instructions as to its employment, and has edited the whole as a "Manual of the Turkish Bath." Its beneficial effects appear to be most remarkable in diseases of the liver and the kidney; the dropsy attending the latter certainly sometimes disappearing as if by magic under its regular use. In all diseases of a rheumatic nature, however, the bath is likely to produce improvement; in most cutaneous diseases it is an effectual remedy or an important auxiliary of treatment; and Sir John Fife has found it to be most valuable in bronchial and laryngeal affections. The book contains also the testimony of other physicians to the benefit which they have witnessed from the therapeutical use of heat by means of the bath. Mr. Urquhart, with that enthusiastic faith which is so useful in a reformer, appears to believe that no disease, not hydrophobia, nor cholera, nor consumption, nor cancer, could long withstand the proper use of the Turkish Bath at a sufficiently high temperature; and certainly this strong faith is no wise surprising in one who believes himself to have been more than once rescued from the very jaws of death by its means. Though it cannot quite be admitted that the use of heat, however carefully graduated in its application, and however high the temperature may be raised, will do all that Mr. Urquhart claims for it, and is in every case as harmless as he seems disposed to think; and, though assent must be withheld from some of the startling physiological principles which he boldly enunciates, yet every one must heartily sympathize with that unparalleled energy and unfaltering perseverance which has succeeded in forcing the acceptance of a great boon in spite of strong prejudice and general opposition. What is most needed now, however, is that the medical profession, having accepted the bath as a valuable remedial agent, should no longer vaguely extol it, but determine, by exact investigation of its effects, those diseases in which it may be properly used. — Westminster Review.

FENIAN LITERATURE.

Street Ballads, Popular Poetry, and Household Songs of Ireland. Collected and arranged by Duncathail (Dublin, M'Glashan & Gill.)

FENIAN literature has not attracted its fair share of attention. Whilst the prisoners who profess to despise and defy British law are occupying the Four Courts on all the technicalities of certiorari, mandamus, and criminal information, it would be a mistake to imagine that the copious legal arguments with which the Irish journals abound are the only contributions for which the reading public are indebted to the Fenians. The abortive rebellion of '48 was more of a literary imposture than any thing else. The Young Ireland party wrote so well that they managed to excite the interest of all classes except the people of Ireland. In this country we became familiar with the anti-English ballads of Davis and Duffy. The song beginning and the stirring verses of Ferguson, McCarthy, and Barry were very generally read here, and they were criticized as literary efforts, in no unfriendly spirit, by English writers. But we all fell into the delusion, as the authors themselves are now ready to acknowledge, that these political poems were known to the masses in Ireland. The people knew very little about the authors, and less about their works. They had heard of Gavan Duffy as an opponent of O'Connell, but they never heard of 'The Muster of the North,' or 'The Voice of Labour.' It was only when some of these gentlemen got down to Ballingarry that their eyes were opened to the political blindness of the peasantry. The people looked with astonishment and doubt upon such totally unknown leaders as O'Gorman, O'Brien, and Dillon. It is said that some grey-haired farmers, when the rumour spread that fighting was intended, asked "if Boney was come across?" and others inquired "if Lord Edward was really come back?" or "if the Counsellor (meaning O'Connell) was a friend of theirs?" Then the briefless barristers and clever young gentlemen who had never grown tired of repeating, with a little verbal alteration, the dictum of Fletcher of Saltoun, "Let me make the ballads and I care not who make the laws," began to discover the difference between making ballads and securing readers. The movement suddenly collapsed in the disgust of the would-be leaders and the laughter of officials and friends of the Government who for months previously had been in a state of ignorant terror.

Who fears to speak of Ninety-eight ?

The mistake that the British public made in giving undue importance to the rebellious literature of the Young Ireland party, and thus overrating the strength of the agitation, was not, however, greater than the mistake now universally made in the opposite direction. The vast mass of our readers will learn with surprise that not only is there in Ireland a collection of Fenian writings published in 1865 quite equal in point of literary ability to anything in the same strain published from 1843 to 1848, but (which is far more important than any question of literary merit) a collection of writings which has found its way into the cabins and whiskey-shops of the lower classes.

In '48 a good many editors of newspapers were arrested, but not one ballad-singer. In '65 only one disloyal editor, Mr. Clark Luby, has been arrested; but the arrests of ballad-singers in Cork, Dublin, Tralee, Limerick, and the country towns of the south have given constant employment to the police. Not a fair is held in Ireland now at which the authorities do not take precautions for seizing upon the ballad-singers and confiscating their seditious wares. Amongst the most peremptory orders sent from the Castle to the stipendiary magistrates are those touching the suppression of popular ballads. This gives to the Fenian conspiracy a character far graver than the affair of '48, and recalls some of the features of the times of Wolfe Tone. The Wexford insurgents of 1798 never saw a treasonable newspaper; but they were familiar with the rebellion-teaching verses of M'Birney, and such ballads as 'The Wearing of the Green.' Indeed the latter may be found even now amongst the street literature reprinted by the Fenians and purchased extensively by the people. The Young Irelanders never would have re-published such lines as these, —

Then forward stepped young Boney,
And took me by the hand,
Saying, "How is old Ireland,
And how does she stand?"
"It's as poor, distressed a nation
As ever you have seen,
They are hanging men and women
For the wearing of the Green!
For the wearing the Green!
For the wearing the Green!
They are hanging men, and women too,
For wearing of the Green!"

But that the Fenians should have circulated these verses with their own halfpenny productions, shows that they have had a more correct appreciation of the popular taste. Of their own street ballads, the following is one which has attained extensive popularity. As a ballad slip it appears anonymously; but Mr. M'Glashan's publication gives its authorship to a Fenian with an extraordinary name, Mr. Charles J. Kickham, of Mullinahone, — the same Mr. Charles J. Kickham, we presume, who was arrested with the famous Head Centre and prison-breaker, Stephens : —

PATRICK SHEEHAN.

My name is Patrick Sheehan,
My years are thirty-four ;
Tipperary is my native place,
Not far from Galtymore ;
I came of honest parents,
But now they're lying low ;
And many a pleasant day I spent
In the Glen of Aherlow.

My father died ; I closed his eyes
Outside our cabin door ;
The landlord and the sheriff too
Were there the day before !
And then my loving mother,
And sisters three also,
Were forced to go with broken hearts
From the Glen of Aherlow.

For three long months, in search of work,
I wandered far and near ;
I went then to the poor-house,
For to see my mother dear ;
The news I heard nigh broke my heart ;
But still, in all my woe,
I blessed the friends who made their graves
In the Glen of Aherlow.

Bereft of home and kith and kin,
With plenty all around,
I starved within my cabin,
And slept upon the ground ;
But cruel as my lot was,
I ne'er did hardship know
'Till I joined the English army,
Far away from Aherlow.

"Rouse up there," says the Corporal,
"You lazy H Irish hound ;
Why don't you hear, you sleepy dog,
The call 'to arms' sound ?"
Alas, I had been dreaming
Of days long, long ago ;
I woke before Sebastopol,
And not in Aherlow.

I groped to find my musket —
How dark I thought the night !
O blessed God, it was not dark,

It was the broad daylight !
And when I found that I was blind,
My tears began to flow ;
I longed for even a pauper's grave
In the Glen of Aherlow.

O blessed Virgin Mary,
Mine is a mournful tale ;
A poor blind prisoner here I am,
In Dublin's dreary gaol ;
Struck blind within the trenches,
Where I never feared the foe ;
And now I'll never see again
My own sweet Aherlow !

— There is a touch of genius in the shadowy way in which the author announces the death of the three sisters in the lines beginning,

The news I heard nigh broke my heart.

As to the political effect of such a ballad, we have no hesitation in declaring our conviction that there is more danger in the disaffection that this artfully-told story of Patrick Sheehan may produce, than in all the writings of the Young Ireland party, and all the contemptible blusterings of the now so-called national organs — the Nation and the Irishman. In this ballad Mr. Kickham undoubtedly constructs his verses so as to touch the heart of the class to which, we believe, he himself belongs.

Of an apparently ruder stamp, but composed with equal cunning, is a street ballad called 'By Memory Inspired.' It is copied from a broad-sheet which was found hawking about the country, headed with a rude woodcut of two men leaning pensively on a table, and a standing cavalier, with a glass in one hand and bottle in the other, supposed to be engaged singing to them. Its anonymous author has boldly mixed up the moral-force tribune with Mitchell and the men of '98 : —

By Memory inspired,
And love of country fired,
The deeds of MEN I love to dwell upon ;
And the patriotic glow
Of my spirit must bestow
A tribute to O'Connell that is gone, boys, gone !
Here's a memory to the friends that are gone.

In October, 'Ninety-seven —
May his soul find rest in Heaven —
William ORR to execution was led on :
The jury, drunk, agreed
That IRISH was his creed ;
For perjury and threats drove them on, boys,
on :
Here's the memory of John Mitchell that is gone !

In 'Ninety-eight — the month July —
 The informers pay was high;
 When Reynolds gave the gallows brave Mac-Cann;
 But MacCann was Reynolds' first —
 One could not allay his thirst;
 So he brought up Bond and Byrne that are gone, boys, gone:
 Here's the memory of the friends that are gone!

We saw a nation's tears
 Shed for John and Henry Shears;
 Betrayed by Judas, Captain Armstrong;
 We may forgive, but yet
 We never can forget
 The poisoning of Maguire that is gone, boys, gone —
 Our high Star and true Apostle that is gone!

How did Lord Edward die?
 Like a man, without a sigh;
 But he left his handiwork on Major Swan!
 But Sirr, with steel-clad breast,
 And coward heart at best,
 Left us cause to mourn Lord Edward that is
 gone, boys, gone:
 Here's the memory of our friends that are gone!

September, Eighteen-three,
 Closed this cruel history,
 When Emmett's blood the scaffold flowed upon:
 Oh, had their spirits been wise,
 They might then realize Their freedom — but we drink to Mitchell that is gone, boys, gone:
 Here's the memory of the friends that are gone!

This ballad is a key to the historical knowledge or historical ignorance of the multitude by whom it is eagerly read. The leaders of the Young Ireland party — Smith O'Brien, Meagher, Gavan Duffy — are all (with the suggestive exception of Mitchell) totally ignored. No reference is made to Grattan, Charlemont, or Flood. The only real popular heroes appear to be O'Connell and a set of uncompromising rebels. There are some lines in it which show that the author has thoroughly grasped the genius of his countrymen: for example, that episode in the death of Lord Edward —

"But he left his handiwork on Major Swan!"

That line conveys no small amount of consolation to the Irish mind.

Between these Fenian writs and the other Irish Nationalists there is another point of difference. The writers of the old Nation newspaper aspired to be orators as well as authors. They were constantly leaving the editor's desk to move resolutions and deliver fervid addresses at public meetings.

Their paltry successors in the combined line of business are to be found brawling and boasting at national associations and town councils. But not so the Fenian contributors to this little volume or to the columns of the suppressed journal, the Irish People. Luby, O'Leary, Stephens, and their associates, never condescended to attend public meetings or take any part in the clap-trap of the ordinary Irish agitations. They confined their publication to the pages of their weekly organ, and we must not shut our eyes to the fact that that organ, the Irish People, presented a contrast to other anti-Saxon newspapers. As a literary production, the Fenian paper was well written. Its principles of rebellion were decided and clear; but its style, though earnest, was apparently moderate and calm. When Dr. Cullen wrote an inflammatory pastoral, denouncing England and the English, and telling the people that they were grossly misgoverned, but winding up by only asking for a collection towards the Catholic Bishop's pet university, the Irish People coldly dissected the Archbishop's pastoral, and, in much better English, drew the logical conclusion from his Grace's violent premises. Hence the sweeping charge which a certain section of the Roman Catholic party in Ireland have been making against the rebels. As far as this volume, edited by "Duncathail," and the numbers of the Irish People are concerned, we have failed to discover those incitements to assassinating priests and landlords of which so much has been said; and indeed it seems that the only evidence produced goes the other way, for it turns out to be merely a private letter written to Luby, expostulating with him for not hinting at the advantage of thus disposing of the clergy and proprietors. The most vigorous onslaught on the landlords which this Fenian volume contains is the following: —

THE NEW RACE.

O ye who have vanquished the land, and retain it,
 How little ye know what ye miss of delight!
 There are worlds in her heart — could ye seek it or gain it —
 That would clothe a true noble with glory and might.
 What is she, this isle which ye trample and ravage,
 Which ye plough with oppression, and reap with the sword,
 But a harp never strung in the hall of a savage,
 Or a fair wife embraced by a husband abhorred?

The chiefs of the Gael were the people embodied !
 The chiefs were the blossoms, the people the root ;
 Their conquerors, the Normans, high-souled and high-blooded,
 Grew Irish at last from the scalp to the foot.
 And ye ! — ye are hirelings and satraps, not nobles !
 Your slaves, they detest you ; your masters, they scorn !
 The river lives on — but the sun-painted bubbles
 Pass quick, to the rapids incessantly borne.

— And who is the author of this fiery admonition to the Irish landlords ? No one can suspect him of being a Head Centre. He is a professor in the Catholic University ; he is even one of the territorial class ; he is — it is only fair to add — a highly-cultivated gentleman. Mr. Aubrey De Vere. Duncathail, the Fenian editor, avows in his Preface, that he publishes the compilation to “ cheer the reposing soldier amid the camp-fires of the bivouac ; to sing to the listening ears of Age the songs of memory and of hope, to Youth the song of love, to Manhood and Womanhood that of patriotism and duty, to the Child the strain which he may not forget, and which may win him to his home, should he stray, and bind him to Ireland in weal or woe ; ” to pour the precious balm of love upon the weary feet of Ireland ; and to “ cheer the hearts of those who may be capable of serving her with more than words or songs. ” In doing this he has acted judiciously in mingling with such popular strains as ‘ Mackenna’s Dream,’ ‘ The Green Little Shamrock,’ ‘ The Boys of Wexford,’ ‘ The Galloping O’Hogan,’ ‘ The Western Winds,’ and ‘ Arthur McCoy,’ some of the less directly rebellious poems of writers like Mr. De Vere. Very few, however, of his verses have penetrated the ears of the peasantry. The only one, indeed, that seems to have caught the fancy of the common people is a mysterious little effusion, in which he speaks of Ireland under her mystical names. —

THE LITTLE BLACK ROSE.

The Little Black Rose shall be red at last ;
 What made it black but the March wind dry,
 And the tear of the widow that fell on it fast ?
 It shall redden the hills when June is nigh !

The Silk of the Kine shall rest at last ;
 What drove her forth but the dragon-fly ?
 In the golden vale she shall feed full fast,
 With her mild gold horn and her slow, dark eye.

The wounded wood-dove lies dead at last !
 The pine long-bleeding, it shall not die !
 This song is secret. Mine ear it passed
 In a wind o’er the plains at Athenry.

These lines, so unintelligible, no doubt, to most of our readers, indicate Mr. De Vere’s thorough appreciation of the Celtic mind ; but the following passage in a more ambitious poem, ‘ The Bard Ethell,’ is, if possible, still more characteristic : —

*I forgive old Cathbar, who sank my boat ;
 Must I pardon Feargal, who slew my son —
 Or the pirate, Strongbow, who burned Granote,
 They tell me, and in it nine priests, a nun,
 And (worst) St. Finian’s old crosier staff ?
 At forgiveness like that I spit and laugh !*

One of the ablest of the Irish Judges, Mr. Justice Keogh, in charging the jury at the Special Commission in Dublin, remarked that, though rebellious ideas may exist in the mass of the people, such ideas have received no encouragement whatever from any intelligent or educated quarter. We are compelled to differ from this eminent authority — for reasons now given.

A STORM.

“ Oh, I have suffered
 With those that I saw suffer ! A brave vessel,
 Who had no doubt some noble creatures in her,
 Dash’d all to pieces. Oh ! the cry did knock Against my heart. Poor souls, they perished.”

OFTEN during the summer months just past, and while looking at the gentle rippling surface of Carmarthen Bay, I have heard the exclamation, “ How I should like to see a storm ! ” The summer visitors went their way, however, without being gratified by witnessing that grandest of all nature’s sights, a storm at sea ; but winter has come in with a noisy herald, and the trumpet voice of the blast that proclaimed the last month of 1865 will long be remembered.

For nearly a fortnight there had been warning voices in the air, “ the sea and the waves roaring,” hungry for human prey. The heavens one hour hung with heavy black clouds ; another, great white pillow masses, between which drifted a fleecy veil. Then again an even grey pall would be drawn across the ethereal blue ; earth and heaven would seem to unite ; and the vapoury screen press almost palpably upon you; hiding away the fierce blast, you knew, by the action and tremble in the thick hot air, must be blowing somewhere.

How the sea muttered and thundered upon the sands at low water; and then as the tide rose again, what a sheet of angry foam there came up, as if the depths had been at war; foam which, caught by the sudden gusts of wind, was whirled high up the cliffs and hung upon the many-hued rocks and yellow furze.

There is not usually much sea-rack here, but we have had plenty of it these three weeks past; and there it now lies, "rugged and brown," dire witness of storms out in the heart of the Atlantic; lies, grim enough by day, but by night gleaming with phosphorescent light.

Day after day the warning grew plainer; until at last the storm king himself was close upon us.

Upon Monday the symptoms grew more demonstrative; the sun rose red and angry, and sank in a perfect glory of rainbow hues, drawing down upon his departing footsteps a dark curtain, as if to shut out the havoc and distress that he left to revel during the long wild night.

It was low water just after sundown, and for awhile all was tolerably calm. Then a distant throbbing went vibrating along the crests of the hills, most resembling the echo that lingers in the vaulted roof of a cathedral after a mighty burst from the organ. Far away upon the low level beach the sea song was murmuring, exquisitely sweet and solemn, but in it weird voices seemed mingling in eerie song, voices broken by shrill cries and shrieks, which it was almost impossible to believe the piping of wild birds, and which amply accounted for the old Welch superstition of the goblin hounds, who are said to sweep through the air, chilling the listener's blood by their yells and shouts.

The wind did not treat us long to this gentle music; Old Boreas was only striking the key-note, presently he began sounding the chords, gently at first, taking breath, as it might be, between each effort, and listening for the effect.

Until just as the waves touched the cliffs, and the harsher roar told me they were breaking against Selwyne, a fierce gust of wind swept over the hill, striking the house like a hammer, and causing the roof to rattle again. There was a crash, a shiver, and all was over for the present, although you could still hear the mighty rush of the blast as it careered along on its course, and by the time it had sighed itself out, the waves were rushing into the caves, and the vaulted roofs resounded again with hollow mockery.

Some minutes passed, the distant moaning of the tide and souging of the wind only heard, and then the very hill seemed to bend, while over it came a mighty rushing wind.

Shorter and shorter grew the pauses in the storm, nearer and louder the distress of the sea, until the hurricane was upon us.

What a scene it was then; how the waves and winds seemed to outvie each other in wild defiance, drowning any poor weak human voices, appalling the senses, and forcing upon the mind that verily God's voice is in the tempest!

But is there no other voice?

What is it that wakes the dull sinking sickening pain at the listener's heart, as there wells up the involuntary prayer —

"God help those at sea."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMAS.

Who left St. Paul for worthless mammon's sake?

What sleeping prophet did an angel wake?

Whose offering of faith did God accept?

What gentlewoman's death the widows wept?

What Jewish maiden, from a lowly place,
A mighty monarch's throne was called to grace?

By the initials find the doom

'To which the path of sinners tend;

Which casts o'er life its awful gloom,

And deeply darkens to the end.

Who suffered deeds of which he was afraid?

What youth, the sage's counsel disobeyed?

Who would not leave king David in his woe?

Whose kindly works did grieving widows show?

Who boldly slew the oppressor of his land,
And then led on a valiant patriot band?

In the initials of these names,

A world-wide fault we find,

Which sows the seeds of hate and fear

And misery 'mid mankind.

AN EVENING WITH DR. LIVINGSTONE.

WHO does not enjoy an evening with a traveller — a genial, kindly, Christian man, who has been among the strangest people, seen sights that no one else has ever seen, and, full of interest himself in distant and neglected races, strives to communicate that interest to the party that have come together to hear about them? To meet for an hour or two with such a man as Dr. Livingstone, and hear him give a plain, familiar account of some of his African journeys, and of the means best fitted, with God's blessing, to benefit the African race, would probably be one of the first wishes and greatest pleasures of a majority of the readers of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE. Every one, we suppose, knows that Dr. Livingstone himself has again left England, and is engaged once more in his noble endeavour to establish the means of missionary labour and of commercial enterprise among some of the populous tribes of Eastern and Central Africa. We cannot, therefore, have him personally to chat with us of an evening; but we can have what is second best: we may take the large volume which he has just published, and cull from it what we may suppose he would have told us, if it had been our good fortune to spend a Sunday evening in his company. Unhappily, there is little or nothing to tell of the results of missionary labour. Dr. Livingstone is a pioneer, a forerunner of missionaries, rather than himself an acting missionary. He goes to see what can be done, and to arrange for others coming to do it, rather than to do it himself. His idea of his own mission seems to be that he is to conciliate the natives, to disarm their prejudices, to give them a favourable opinion of the British people, to work upon them by kindness and disinterestedness, and thus dispose them to trade with the merchant, and listen to the missionary. But if there be little to say of the results of Christian missions, except that they have hitherto done nothing in those parts, there is, unhappily, far too much to tell of a devil's mission that has been frightfully active and successful — the slave-trade, partly as pursued by the natives, but chiefly by the atrocious Portuguese settlers and adventurers. In fact, the slave-trade has in every way been the ruin of Africa; and, besides making the poor negroes ten times more miserable and degraded than they would otherwise have been, it has proved a most effectual barrier to all missionary and to all commercial undertakings. It is owing to the slave-trade that Dr. Livingstone has failed to establish any centres of missionary and commercial operations on the banks of the Zambesi or its tributaries; and there is little reason to hope for anything better, until measures be taken to repress the infamous traffic on the East, similar to those that have proved so successful on the West Coast of Africa.

For, according to Dr. Livingstone, — and he is so shrewd and careful a man that we can hardly fancy him wrong in this, — the English squadron on the West Coast of Africa has been an extraordinary blessing to that part of the world. Many persons have an opposite impression, and think that England has spent her treasure and the lives of her seamen in vain, in watching those infamous slavers, with which we associate such accursed scenes. Dr. Livingstone is of a very different opinion. There, at the distance of hundreds of miles from the ocean, he found the very decided influence of our national policy: the slave-trade so far suppressed that even the Portuguese spoke of it as a thing of the past; lawful commerce immensely increased; more than twenty Christian missions established; and comparative peace enjoyed by millions of inhabitants. And as regards those missions in Western Africa, of which Captain Burton spoke so disparagingly, Dr. Livingstone entertains a most favourable opinion. At Sierra Leone and elsewhere, Christian natives can be numbered by thousands, who, whatever defects they may have, at least possess the qualification of being trustworthy trade-agents among their countrymen. Making allowance for the fact that many of the native Christians have been the lowest of the low — liberated African slaves, — and also for the strong language of traders annoyed at being prevented from using the people as brutes, Dr. Livingstone thinks that the conduct of England of late years on the West Coast deserves the world's admiration, and that her generosity will appear grand in the eyes of posterity. Neither is it true, as Captain Burton has maintained, that Mahometanism is the only religion that is making proselytes in Africa. The native Christians of Africa contribute no less a sum than £15,000 yearly for the spread of the Gospel. The Mahometans are even beneath the native Africans in their ordinary moral tone. Dr. Livingstone gives an anecdote in illustration of this. He has seen a party of natives plunge into the water to rescue a woman from a crocodile. On the other hand, when a party of his own sailors, who were Mahometans, were coming to the ship after sleeping ashore, one of them walked into the water with the intention of swimming off to the boat; and while yet hardly up to his knees was seized by a crocodile and dragged under; the poor fellow gave a shriek, and held up his hand for aid; but none of his countrymen stirred to his assistance, and he was never seen again. On asking his brother-in-law why he did not help him, he replied, "Well, no one told him to go into the water. It was his own fault that he was killed." This was the part of the priest and the Levite in the parable of the Good Samaritan re-enacted with additional hard-heartedness; for neither the priest nor the Levite was brother-in-law of the man who fell among thieves.

The aspect of intertropical Africa—Eastern, Western and Central—must, by this time of day, be as familiar as his own country to Dr Livingstone; but the feelings of a stranger setting foot in it for the first time "resemble in some respects those which the First Man may have had on his entrance into the Garden of Eden. He has set foot in a new world; another state of existence is before him; everything he sees, every sound that falls upon his ear, has all the freshness and charm of novelty. The trees and the plants are new; the flowers and the fruits, the beasts, the birds, and the insects, are curious and strange; the very sky itself is new, glowing with colours, or sparkling with constellations, never seen in northern climes." Everything in Africa, it was long ago remarked, is contrary: "Wool grows on the heads of men and hair on the backs of sheep." The men often wear their hair long, the women wear it short. Where there are cattle, the women till the ground, plant the land, and build huts. The men stay at home to sew, spin, weave, and milk the cows. The nursery hobgoblin with us is black, but in Africa he is white. Foolish mothers bid their children be quiet, or they will call the white man to bite them. To the unsophisticated natives of Africa there is something frightfully repulsive in the appearance of white men. On entering villages previously unvisited by Europeans, if a child should be met coming quietly and unsuspectingly along, the moment he raised his eyes and saw the whites, he would take to his heels in an agony of terror, such as we might feel if we met a live Egyptian mummy at the door of the British Museum. Alarmed by the child's wild cries, the mother rushes out of her hut, but darts back again at the sight of the same frightful apparition. Dogs turn tail and scour off in dismay; and hens, abandoning their chickens, fly screaming to the tops of the houses. Unfamiliar sights everywhere present themselves. Here and there may be seen rows of elephants two miles long; in the rivers, crocodiles and hippopotamuses, by no means pleasant to bathe with; and even on board ship, one may be aroused, as Dr. Livingstone was in his steamer, by five feet of cold green snake gliding over one's face. But however peculiar the country, and however different the people, Dr. Livingstone has no patience with what has often been said of the negro race. The notions commonly entertained of their language he regards as absurd; their answers to questions on ordinary topics are about as intelligent as are usually got from the common people at home; and if they are addicted to low motives and mean actions, so likewise unhappily are many of those among ourselves who are not under the influence of Christian principles and civilized habits. Dr. Livingstone is full of hope for the negro race; his life of single-hearted devotion to them is a proof of his confidence in what they may become, if Christianity, and her daughter Civilization, should find a home among them. Even the unwholesomeness of the climate would in that case be greatly overcome. It is the very richness of the country, in connection with the neglect of its inhabitants, that makes it so unhealthy. The luxuriance of the vegetation is such that when it decays an extraordinary amount of putridity is generated; the very rivers are poisoned by it, and fever hovers on every side. Were the plains cultivated, drained, and reaped, not only would the most splendid harvests be obtained, but the cause of fever would be to a large extent removed. The beautiful fulfillment of the sixty-seventh Psalm, which would result from missionary enterprise in such a country, will strike every reader:—"God be merciful to us and bless us, and cause His face to shine on us. That Thy way may be known on earth, Thy saving health among the nations. . . . Let the people praise thee, O God, let all the people praise thee. Then shall the earth yield her increase, and God, even our own God, shall bless us." No wonder though Dr. Livingstone sighs when he sees regions of such capabilities turned, literally and figuratively, into the valley of the shadow of death. No wonder though it cuts him to the heart to come on masses of skeletons where he might have looked for living men. His soul is fired with the purpose to dispossess Fever, Famine, War, and the Slave-Trade from those fertile regions, and to see the Angel of Peace and Love spreading his wings over them. When he thinks of his father's native Hebrides,

Of Ulva dark and Colonsay,
And all the group of islets gay
That guard famed Staffa round, inhabited by a comparatively happy and peaceful people, why, he asks, should not those regions of Africa — not by any means the sandy deserts that used to be thought, but as rich and fair as any country on the globe — be peopled by industrious and peaceful tribes, worshipping the God of love, trusting in the work of Christ, and adorning the doctrine of God their Saviour?

The primitive faith of the African people, he conceives to be, that there is one Almighty Maker of heaven and earth; that He has given the various plants of earth to men to be employed as mediators between Him and the spirit-world, where all who have ever been born and died continue to live; that sin consists in offences against their fellow-men, either here or among the departed; and that death is often a punishment of guilt, such as witchcraft. The Great Spirit lives above the stars; but they never pray to him, and know nothing of their relation to him or of his interest in them. As might be expected, they are great believers in spells and nostrums. In one district, the medical profession is subdivided to an extent unknown even in London or Paris. There is the elephant-doctor, who prepares a medicine indispensable to hunters when attacking that animal; the crocodile-doctor, who sells a charm that protects its owner from crocodiles; the dice-doctor, a combination of the detective officer and the physician, part of whose duty is to discover thieves by means of dice; the gun-doctor, the rain-doctor, and numberless others. The various schools deal in little charms, which are hung round the purchaser's neck to avert evil; some of them contain the medicine, others increase its power. On one occasion, near the Victoria Falls, Dr. Livingstone put himself under the guidance of one Tuba Makoro, "smasher of canoes," — an ominous name; but he alone was believed to know the medicine that insured against shipwreck in the rapids above the Falls. In spite of this, one of the canoes struck a rock and was nearly destroyed. But Dr. Livingstone was assured it was not the medicine that was at fault: the accident was owing entirely to Tuba having started without his breakfast.

In the country of the Makololos a man was met with who pretended to be able to change himself into a lion. Dr. Livingstone bid his native attendants ask him to perform this feat at once, and they would give him for his performance a piece of cotton cloth — the article most valued by the natives. "Oh, no," was their reply; "he may come when we are asleep and kill us." This man-lion would sometimes go forth to the forest to kill game, and then, graciously returning to the human form, would tell his neighbours where to find the buffalo or antelope which he pretended to have killed, but had probably found dead. It is believed also that the souls of departed chiefs enter into lions and render them sacred. Dr. Livingstone tells how a lion came near to his encampment one night, which his native followers believed to be tenanted by the spirit of a chief, and how one of them bullied him, and another coaxed him, while the Doctor himself, a terrible unbeliever, supplied him with a piece of meat prepared with strychnine. In another region the monkey is a sacred animal, and is never killed, because the people believe devoutly that the souls of their ancestors occupy these degraded forms, and anticipate that they themselves must, sooner or later, be transformed in the same manner.

Many of their superstitious notions are very grotesque. When a man has his hair cut, he is careful to burn it or bury it secretly, lest, falling into the hands of one who has an evil eye or is a witch, it should be used as a charm to afflict him with headache. In certain parts there is a widespread belief that if one plants the mango-stone he will die. Even among the native Portuguese of Tette there is a superstition, that if a man plants coffee he will never be happy afterwards. There are also superstitions among the people that have a more tragical aspect. The ordeal of the muave is often resorted to. If a person is accused of crime he has to drink the muave, a deadly poison. If the stomach rejects the poison, he is declared innocent; if it is retained, his guilt is proved. Even chiefs are not exempted, and in some cases seem rather to enjoy the thing. A chief, making some assertion that could hardly be received, said, "If you doubt my word, give me the muave to drink." The people of a chief who had successfully gone through the ordeal the day before Dr. Livingstone reached his villiage, manifested their joy by drinking, dancing, and drumming two days and nights. It is surmised that the native doctor who prepares the poison may be able to save those whom he considers innocent.

The practice of polygamy, the sign of so low a civilization and the source of so many evils, prevails everywhere. Singularly enough, it is approved of even by the women. On hearing that a man in England could marry but one wife, several Makololo ladies exclaimed that they would not like to live in such a country. They could not imagine how English ladies could relish such a custom; for—as they thought, every man of respectability should have a number of wives as a proof of his wealth. Along the whole of the Zambesi, no man is respected by his neighbours who has not several wives. The reason for this is doubtless because, having the produce of each wife's garden, he is wealthy in proportion to their number. One of the greatest battles of Christianity will have to be fought on this ground. Till this notion is dislodged, the position of woman must be degraded; and what that implies we need not say.

The usual vices of a wild and irregular life—the outbursts of sensuality and passion, and the deeds of cruelty which are found in all barbarous nations—exist among the Africans, but not to the same extent as in some other communities. By far the worst vices that prevail amongst them, Dr. Livingstone ascribes, as we shall see presently, to the slave-trade, the most fearful parent of vice and devilry the world has ever seen. Some interesting features of character are often shown by the natives. They are very susceptible to the influence of kindly treatment, and do not readily forget it. When Charles Livingstone, the brother of Dr. Livingstone, was at Kebrabasa, during the rainy season, he gave some food and a small piece of cloth to a hungry, shivering native traveller. Eighteen months after, while the party were on their journey into the interior, a man came into the camp, bringing a liberal present of rice, meal, beer, and a fowl, reminding them of what had been done for him (which Charles Livingstone had forgot), and saying he did not like to see them travelling hungry and thirsty. Ready though they are to quarrel, they often try to make peace among themselves. An illustration of Dr. Watts's song, "Let dogs delight to bark and bite," occurred one day when two men were wrangling and cursing each other. A Makololo man rose, and, to prevent mischief, quietly took their spears from the corner in which they stood, and sitting down beside Dr. Livingstone remarked, "It is the nature of bulls to gore each other." The Makololo race are regarded by Dr. Livingstone as by far the most intelligent and enterprising of the tribes he has met. They are, in his judgment, fine subjects for a Christian mission. When talked to about their lawless forays and expeditions for killing their neighbours and stealing their cattle, they seemed impressed with the crime of killing, but not of seizing cattle. They confessed that they needed the Book of God. If that was guilt which custom led them to do, it lay between the white man and Jesus, who had not given them the Book. They were impressed by the thought that there was a Book of God, and that they did not possess it. They are interested in hearing that God's Son appeared among men and died for them, but they do not feel that He has any interest in them. On the last occasion of holding Divine service at Seshake, the English invited them to speak about the future state. The speaker had made some remarks on the resurrection. They said they did not wish to offend the speaker, but they could not believe that all the dead would rise again. "Can those who have been killed in the field and devoured by vultures, or those who have been eaten by the hyenas or lions, or those who have been tossed into the river and eaten by more than one crocodile—can they all be raised again to life?" They were told that men could take a leaden bullet, change it into a salt (acetate of lead) which could be dissolved as completely in water as our bodies in the stomachs of animals, and then reconvert it into lead; or that the bullet could be transformed into the red and white paint of our wagons, and again could be reconverted into the original lead; and that if men, exactly like themselves, could do so much, how much more could He do who had made the eye to see, and the ear to hear? "We added, however," continues Dr. Livingstone, "that we believed in a resurrection, not because we understood how it would be brought about, but because our Heavenly Father assured us of it in His book."

The history of endeavours to plant Christianity in the countries adjoining the Zambesi and its tributaries has hitherto been a history of failures. Ruins of Roman Catholic mission-stations remain, but no trace that their teaching took hold on the people. An anecdote told by Dr. Livingstone of the Roman Catholic priest at Tette will probably account for this. "During the drought of 1858, a neighbouring chief got up a performance, with divers ceremonies and incantations, to bring rain, but it would not come. The Goanese padre of Tette, to satisfy his compatriots, appointed a procession and prayers in honour of St. Antonio for the same purpose. The first attempt did not answer; but on the second occasion, arranged to come off after the new moon appeared, a grand procession in the saint's honour ended in so much rain that the roof of the Residence gave way. St. Antonio's image was decorated the following week with a golden coronal worth 22*l.* for sending the long-delayed and much-needed rain. We never looked with disdain on the rites or ceremonies of any Church; but, on witnessing the acts of worship on this occasion, so great was the irreverence manifested, in the kneeling worshippers laughing and joking between the responses, not even ceasing their grins when muttering 'Ora pro nobis,' that we could not help believing that if, like the natives, they have faith in rain-making, they have faith in nothing else."

It is sad to think that nothing has yet come of all the efforts that have been made, in consequence of Dr. Livingstone's former journey and book, to establish Christian missions in the neighbourhood of the Zambesi. When, a few years ago, a party of missionaries, headed by the Rev. H. Helmore, tried to plant the Gospel at Linyanti, in the neighbourhood of the Victoria Falls, several of the missionaries and their native attendants succumbed to fever almost immediately on their arrival, and the survivors were obliged to retire. Bishop Mackenzie and the other members of the Universities' Mission, it is well known, got into trouble in consequence of their zeal in behalf of captive-slaves, the bishop died of fever, and the Universities' Mission ultimately left the continent of Africa. The Rev. James Stewart, of the Free Church of Scotland, who came out expressly to select a sphere for a mission in connection with that body, was obliged to return without accomplishing his purpose. And even the expedition of Dr. Livingstone described in the volume before us, though conducted with all the authority which the patronage of the Government of Great Britain could give it, has not been successful, except in so far as it has shown how great need there is both for mission and commerce, but how difficult in present circumstances it is to obtain either the one or the other. How comes it that the establishment of Christian missions is so extremely difficult in that region? There may be a variety of answers to the question: but in the opinion of Dr. Livingstone the great obstacle is to be found in that odious curse—the slave-trade.

The most important feature of Dr. Livingstone's present volume is the lurid light it throws on that fearful system. Nothing has made a deeper impression on him than the frightfully demoralizing effects of the traffic. In his view it is the prime agency of the devil in this world for turning human beings into monsters of wickedness. The half-caste Portuguese who are concerned in it are as revolting specimens of humanity as can be found anywhere. The atrocities of Mariano are all but incredible. One of his favourite modes of creating an impression in the country and making his name dreaded, was to spear his captives with his own hands. On one occasion he is reported to have killed in this way forty poor wretches placed in a row before him. It might have been thought that slave-owners, through self-interest, would treat their slaves with humanity; but the slave-trade seems always to engender an unreasoning ferocity that is often reckless even of its own ultimate interests. Dr. Livingstone tells of an old slave-trader, worn out with disease and nearly blind, who was not in other respects without humanity, that when his wife died, to dull the edge of his grief, he made a foray amongst the tribes near the mouth of the Shire, and took many captives. This man had made several fortunes; but he managed to squander them all in riotous living, and himself acknowledged that "the money a man made in the slave-trade was all bad, and soon went to the devil." The loss of life caused in these slave-capturing forays is fearful. Colonel Rigby, late British consul at Zanzibar, told Dr. Livingstone that from the Nyassa country, 19,000 slaves passed annually through the custom-house of that island, exclusive of those sent to Portuguese slave ports. But "besides those actually captured, thousands are killed or die of their wounds and famine, driven from their villages by the slave-raid proper. Thousands perish in internecine war waged for slaves with their own clansmen and neighbours, slain by the lust of gain, which is stimulated by the slave-purchasers of Cuba and elsewhere. The many skeletons we have seen amongst rocks and woods, by the little pools, and along the paths of the wilderness, attest the awful sacrifice of human life, which must be attributed, directly or indirectly, to this trade of hell. It is our deliberate opinion that not one fifth of the victims of the slave-trade ever become slaves. Taking the Shire valley as an average, we should say not even one-tenth arrive at their destination. . . . A small armed steamer on Lake Nyassa could easily, by exercising a control and furnishing goods in return for ivory and other products, break the neck of this infamous traffic in that quarter; for nearly all must cross the lake, or the Upper Shire."

There is nothing in all this book more touching than the engraving opposite page 356, which represents a gang of captives on their way to Tette. They form a long line of men, women, and children, manacled and chained to each other, the men, in addition to their chains, being fastened together in pairs by means of beams of wood with forked extremities, the forks being fitted to their necks, and riveted upon them. The women are compelled to carry baskets on their heads, in some cases in addition to their infants, which are bound round their bodies with a cloth. Slave-drivers, armed with guns, staves, and other implements, accompany the gang, and urge them on. The gang, which numbered eighty-four, was met and liberated by Dr. Livingstone, who learned that the day before two of the women had been shot for attempting to unfasten the thongs. One woman had her infant's brains knocked out because she could not carry her load and it; and a man was despatched with an axe because he had broken down with fatigue.

The awful desolation of a once-populous country after a slave-seizing raid, and the terrible scenes that indicate the sacrifice of life, cannot be read or heard of without a shudder. Dr. Livingstone describes what he saw in the valley of the Shire after such an occurrence. "Instead of smiling villages and crowds of people coming with things for sale, scarcely a soul was to be seen; and when by chance one lighted on a native, his frame bore the impress of hunger, and his countenance the look of a cringing broken-spiritedness. A drought had visited the land after the slave-hunting panic broke over it. . . . Large masses of the people had fled down to the Shire, only anxious to get the river between them and their enemies. Most of the food had been left behind; and famine and starvation had cut off so many that the remainder were too few to bury their dead. The corpses we saw floating down the river were only a remnant of those that had perished, whom their friends, from weakness, could not bury, nor overgorged crocodiles devour. . . . Wherever we took a walk, human skeletons were seen in every direction, and it was painfully interesting to observe the different postures in which the poor wretches had breathed their last. A whole heap had been thrown down a slope behind a village, where the fugitives often crossed the river from the east. . . . Others lay in their huts, with closed doors, which when opened disclosed the mouldering corpse with the poor rags round the loins—the skull fallen off the pillow—the little skeleton of the child, that had perished first, rolled up in a mat between two large skeletons. The sight of this desert, but eighteen months ago a well-peopled valley, now literally strewn with human bones, forced the conviction upon us that the destruction of human life in the middle passage, however great, constitutes but a small portion of the waste, and made us feel that unless the slave-trade—that monster iniquity which has so long brooded over Africa—is put down, lawful commerce cannot be established."

No wonder though Dr. Livingstone is saddened and almost broken-hearted. The sanguine hopes of his earlier days for Africa are blighted by this atrocious slave-trade. If anything is to be done for this great territory, effective measures must be taken to sweep away the cause of its misery and desolation. The suppression of the slave-trade is one of those objects for which all classes of British statesmen are proud to use the power of their country. May they be guided to wise and effectual measures for this end in the East of Africa, and from all our churches may prayer rise with a hundredfold greater earnestness on behalf of those dark places of the earth that are full of the habitations of cruelty.

The Africans have learned to understand England's hatred to slavery. In this respect, our country bears an honourable name, and her prestige is favourable to her missionaries. Her national truthfulness is another distinction in her favour, contrasting for example with the laxity of the Portuguese, whose word cannot be relied on. But other characteristics of a less favourable kind have come to be attached to the English name. In one place, a man's being intoxicated is described by the phrase "he speaks English." The national failing was unconsciously confessed by a sailor of Dr. Livingstone's, who, on it being remarked that certain trees were very like the steeples of England, said, "the picture would be complete if there was only a grog-shop near the church."

Dr. Livingstone cannot doubt that, under God's blessing, Christian missions would be as prosperous on the East coast of Africa as they have been on the West. On the West, sixteen societies are at work: six British, seven American, two German, and one West Indian. These maintain 104 European or American missionaries, have 110 stations, 13,000 scholars, 236 schools, and 19,000 registered communicants—representing probably a Christian population of 60,000. "It is particularly pleasing," he adds, "to see the zeal of our American brethren; they show the natural influences and effects of our holy religion. With the genuine and true-hearted it is never a question of distance but of need. The Americans make capital missionaries; and it is only a bare act of justice to say that their labours on the West Coast are above all praise. And not on that shore alone does their benevolence shine. In China, India, South Seas, Syria, South Africa, and their own far West, they have proved themselves worthy children of the old country,—the asylum for the oppressed of every nation, the source of light for all lands."

We might prolong our "evening with Dr. Livingstone" to the small hours of morning, but the best of friends must part. We conclude by noting two or three interesting illustrations of Scripture, culled from his volume. The shadow of a great rock in a weary land (Isa. xxxii. 2), and the sleep God gives to his beloved (Psalm cxvii. 2), are both illustrated in the following account of an ascent of all but perpendicular rocks. "The strain upon the muscles in jumping from crag to boulder, and wriggling round projections, took an enormous deal out of the party, and they were often glad to cower in the shadow formed by one rock overhanging and resting upon another; the shelter induced the peculiarly strong and overpowering inclination to sleep that too much sun sometimes causes. This sleep is curative of what may be incipient sun-stroke; in its first gentle touches it caused the dream to flit over the boiling brain that they had been sworn in as members of the Alpine Club; and then it became so heavy as to make them feel as if a portion of their existence had been cut from their lives."

A native's idea of "holiness" is worth recording. "When copious showers have descended during the night, and all the earth and leaves and cattle are washed clean, and the sun rising shows a drop of dew on every blade of grass, and the air breathes fresh,—that is holiness." The resemblance to the imagery of the Bible is very striking—especially to David's picture of the Holy One—"He shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain." (2 Sam. xxiii. 4.)

Among the birds of the country, the "honey-guide" seems almost designed as a type of the Christian missionary. "The 'honey-guide' is an extraordinary bird; how is it that every member of its family has learned that all men, whether white or black, are fond of honey? The instant the little fellow gets a glimpse of a man, he hastens to greet him with the hearty invitation to come, as M. Cia translated it, to a bee's hive, and take some honey. He flies on in the proper direction, perches on a tree, and looks back to see if you are following; then on to another and another, until he guides you to the spot. If you do not accept his first invitation, he follows you with pressing importunities, quite as anxious to lure the stranger to the bees' hive as other birds are to draw him away from their own nests. Except when on the march, our men were sure to accept the invitation, and manifested the same by a peculiar responsive whistle, meaning, as they said, 'All right, go ahead; we are coming.' The birds never deceived them, but always guided them to a hive of bees, though some had but little honey in store." We will not go into any curious inquiries as to the motive and purpose of the honey-guide. We would rather see in its singular proceeding a lesson for ourselves. To us has been given the knowledge of a treasure "more to be desired than gold, yea than much fine gold, sweeter also than honey from the honey-comb." And to us there is committed the function of the honey-guide—by our Christian missions to lead the starving African to the Bread of Life; and if he do not accept our first invitation, to persevere with pressing importunities, until at last he finds the hidden manna, and his soul is filled as with marrow and fatness.

650 FINAL ANNIVERSARY OF THE CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

THE FINAL ANNIVERSARY OF THE CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11, 1866.

ALL the people who could by any possibility of energy and interest be crowded and packed within the four walls of the great Representatives' Chamber were present at the fourth and final anniversary of the Christian Commission, this evening. Besides these thousands, there were as many more who surged up and down through the halls and rotunda, for two or three hours, hoping against hope for a chance to look into the chamber, and still a great crowd more which went found every available square foot occupied, and returned home before the exercises began. The following was the order of exercises for the evening:

Hon. Schuyler Colfax, Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the chair; singing, under direction of Mr. Phillip Phillips of Cincinnati. 1. Singing, "Jesus shall reign where'er the sun," &c. 2. Prayer, by Rev. C. B. Boynton, D. D., Chaplain of the House. 3. Reading the Scriptures, by Rev. W. J. R. Taylor, D. D., secretary of the American Bible Society. 4. Introductory remarks by the chairman. 5. Abstract of the annual report, by Rev. Edward P. Smith, secretary of the American Missionary Association. 6. Statement of the work by George H. Stuart, chairman of the Christian Commission. 7. Address by Hon. Charles Demond of Boston. 8. Address by Hon. James Harlan, Secretary of the Interior. 9. Singing, "Your Mission," by Mrs. Phillips. 10. Address by Rear-Admiral Chas. H. Davis, U. S. N. 11. Address by Rev. Herrick Johnson of Pittsburgh. 12. Singing, "We are rising as a people," by Mr. Phillips, the audience joining in the chorus. 13. Address by Senator Doolittle. 14. Address by Major-General George G. Meade. 15. Singing, "America," by the audience. 16. Address by Rev. Bishop Matthew Simpson, D. D., of Philadelphia. 17. Singing, "Home of the Soul," by Mr. Phillips. 18. Prayer, by Rev. Prof. Lemuel Moss, of the University at Lewisburg, Penn. 19. Doxology.

In presenting the final report of the commission, Mr. Stuart happily alluded to the fact that when the last annual report was made, General Grant, now on the platform, was in front of Petersburg, but soon thereafter found a way to relieve the commission from further service by compelling the surrender of one Robert E. Lee. He then read a report of the operations of the commission since its organization.

After the reports were made, Mr. Stuart presented letters from Secretary Stanton, Lieutenant-General Grant, Vice-Admiral Farragut, Chief Justice Chase, Generals Sherman, Howard, Meigs, Butler, Ord, Thomas, Barnes and others. Mr. Stanton thanks the chairman for his invitation, but declines to deliver an address at the meeting, though he cannot refrain from putting on record his high appreciation of the services of the commission, and his thanks for the intelligent and efficient manner in which it has done its work.

"Lieutenant-General Grant," said Mr. Stuart, "we had hoped to press into service for this evening, but he never speaks except on the battle-field, and the world knows of what effect his words are there. We have, however, a letter from him written by his own hand, which I will read. General Grant says, on the eve of the closing of a work which he hopes there will never be an occasion for doing again, he takes pleasure in acknowledging the great services of the Christian Commission. He personally knows that their labors saved much suffering, and does not doubt that it saved thousands of soldiers' lives. The army feels the same gratitude to the Christian and Sanitary Commissions that the American people feel to the army."

Chief Justice Chase says it was not his privilege to aid or see much of the work of the Christian Commission, but he knows by most unquestionable testimony that no such humane and loving beneficence was ever before organized and executed. He is certain that it could have existed in none but a Christian land, and he doubts if it could have been successful in any land but our own.

Vice-Admiral Farragut, writing from New York, said the navy never had so much occasion as the army to need or know the services of the Christian and Sanitary Commissions; but they always knew they could have the latter had they felt the need, and they rejoiced that the boys of the army were so well cared for. Wherever he went he heard the organization much extolled, and could bear his testimony to the patient industry with which it had done its labor.

General Sherman says that the people of this country should have added contributions to the value of more than six millions of dollars to all their efforts and sacrifices of the war, he counts as one of the wonders of the world.

Mr. Demond was the first speaker, and very properly related the circumstances which gave birth to the Christian Commission. He was one of the seven who originally met in Washington on the 10th of November, 1861, to see what could be done for the spiritual welfare of the army. He briefly told the history of the work they begun on that day, and spoke for fifteen minutes in explanation of the causes which led to the great success of that work, and the incidental results which it accomplished.

Mr. Colfax, on rising to announce the song, said that a year ago there was one here whose absence we all now mourn more than we could mourn the absence of relative or friend. He paid a most touching and eloquent tribute to the memory of Mr. Lincoln, and added that during the exercises of the anniversary meeting of a year ago there was sent up to him as presiding officer a programme on the back of which was written, in the peculiar style so well known to all men, the words: "Near the close let us have the song, 'Your Mission,' by Mr. Phillips. Don't say I called for it. Signed Lincoln." "That song," said Mr. Colfax, "was sung then, and will be again sung now." It was received with hearty and repeated and long-continued applause.

Mr. Harlan being absent, the next speaker was Admiral Davis, who spoke very briefly, and was followed by Rev. Mr. Johnson, who related many instances which came under his observation while through the Army of the Potomac as one of the agents of the Commission, who in turn gave way to Senator Doolittle, who spoke in an eloquent and forcible manner for about ten minutes.

General Meade was the next speaker announced, but Mr. Stuart said he was unable to be present on account of sudden sickness in his family. He had however sent a letter, which was read. He says he bears testimony to the value of the Commission in the Army of the Potomac, ministering not only to the spiritual but to the bodily wants of the soldiers, and adds that one of the brightest pages in our history will be that on which is written the record of the noble manner in which the people supplied the wants of their armies.

General Auger was next called upon, and made a brief, modest, soldierly address of thanks to the people for their loving and constant remembrance of the soldiers, and he was followed by Rev. D. A. Chidlaw of Cincinnati, who had seen much service in the Western armies as an agent of the Commission, and made a most telling and thrilling address in a fervid Western manner, which won round after round of applause.

Bishop Simpson's was the principal address of the evening. He called attention to the services which the Commission had rendered the Government and the country. It had sanctified the war in the hearts of the soldiers and the people, and its influence was of such increasing effect that one-fourth of all the contributions made were tendered in the last six months of the war. The success of the Commission had given proof of the power of the influence of the spirit of Christ, and he noticed as an astounding fact that the aggregate of the labors of all the agents was one hundred and eighty-one thousand days. The work of the Commission had presented the world with a true specimen of Christian brotherhood, all sects and religious organizations being represented among its officers and agents.

THE BURNING OIL-WELL.

FRANKLIN, PA., February 13, 1866.

It occurred to me that a more detailed account of the 'Burning Well,' referred to by your correspondent from this place, a few days ago, would be interesting to your readers. It is certainly one of the greatest curiosities to be found in the oil-region. It yields an interest to none of the great phenomena found in other lands, and richly repays one for the trouble and fatigue endured in visiting it. The well is situated on the eastern bank of the Alleghany, at the mouth of Mog's Run, or as it is sometimes called, Pine Hill Run. The distance below Franklin is about twenty miles by the course of the river, or across the hills about twelve miles. The mode of travel by your correspondent was by the river, on the ice about half the distance, the remainder over the hills.

As you approach the region of the well the country becomes rough and romantic in the extreme. High hills and abrupt precipices are covered and overhung by immense masses of detached rock, that seem scattered at random on the hill tops and on the sides of the acclivities. If the glacial theory of Agassiz be correct, then the icebergs that were anchored here were thickly laden with mighty boulders from the North. Be this as it may, the rocky masses are lying here in wonderful confusion.

Before you approach near enough to the well to see the flames, your ears are saluted with the roaring sound similar to that which Ross Brown describes as peculiar to the Geysers in Iceland. It seems to be due chiefly to the rush of gas from the depths below, but may be in part from the flame itself as it rises high in the air.

Like most great curiosities, this well suffers from surrounding circumstances. There is no good object near with which it may be compared as to height. Added to this, the hills all around it are from six hundred to a thousand feet in height, affording as a back ground rocks and shrubs and stunted trees, that tend to diminish its effect on the eye and imagination.

The well was of course bored for oil. It had reached a depth of some five hundred feet, when the column of gas, that must be immense, rushed up and became ignited from the furnace of the engine. Soon, of course, the derrick, engine house, and fixtures were consumed, and the engine itself a wreck. The top of the conductor which emerges from the pit, being of wood, was burned off, when an attempt was made to fill up the pit with earth and extinguish the flames. This proved a failure, as the pressure of the gas was too great to be easily filled up.

As it is seen at present, the gas rushes through the loose earth in a thousand jets, and the result is that a column of flame constantly emerges from the pit equal to its size, which is, perhaps, eight feet square. This column rises to a height of from fifty to one hundred feet, varying every few seconds from the minimum to the maximum height. The pillar is not regular in form, but rough and jagged. Sometimes it is divided, and sends its tongues of flame out in every direction. As it reaches its greatest height, the top of the flame leaps off and is extinguished. This is the appearance in daylight. At night, and surrounded by the darkness, its appearance must be awfully grand and imposing.

I am inclined to think that there is some oil mingled with the product of the well, inasmuch as every three or four seconds a cloud of dark smoke rolls up with the flames; and is swept to its very summit, when it disappears.

Some visitors compute the height at one hundred and fifty feet. This is probably correct at some periods, as the day I visited it, the air was damp and unfavorable to its reaching its greatest height.

The roaring sound is constant, and almost resembles the sound of distant thunder. The climate in the neighbourhood is very mild and summer-like. The buds on the shrubs are expanding and the grass green and fresh as in April, while the very ice on the river has melted and disappeared.

The well has been burning about three weeks, with no apparent diminution in its power, or in the quantity of gas, so that at present it bids fair to afford light to the people for some time to come.

Although the fire is surrounded on all sides by hills of such lofty proportions, yet at night the light is seen at a great distance. At Franklin it lights up the southern horizon with a bright, tremulous glow.

This light assumed a very strange appearance one evening last week. It was somewhat cloudy, and in addition to the usual ruddy glow, the light appeared to concentrate itself into a bright lance-like figure about four or five degrees in length, that remained stationary about midway between the horizon and the zenith, where it continued all the evening. — Meadville (Pa.) CHARLES LAMB.

MR. FITZGERALD thinks it necessary, because he writes about Lamb, to affect to be Lambish, just as persons writing about Carlyle are often absurd enough to be Carlylish, and to disburse on "the great fact of the man Carlyle." Because Lamb loved rambling on without any method but the turns of his own humor, Mr. Fitzgerald rambles on about Lamb without any method at all. "Is it fanciful," he says, "to suppose that a treatment a little fitful and rambling would be almost in keeping with Lamb's own nature, which might have shrunk from the more formal honours of official biography?" We should say it is fanciful, — quite fanciful, — in any one to whom the "fitful and rambling" treatment is not the natural and fitting literary expression, which it was to Lamb. Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's fitfulness and rambliness are a little like an elderly spinster's girlish ways, — like Merry Pecksniff's early fascinations. When Mr. Pecksniff showed Martin Chuzzlewit round his new home, he just opened the bedroom door where the Miss Pecksniffs slept, and said to Martin, "Birds, flowers, you see, Martin, — such things as girls love!" but the birds were, says the biographer, limited to a lame sparrow, which had been captured and imprisoned in an old cage expressly for the occasion. This is a little the effect left upon us by Mr. Fitzgerald's Lambishness in discoursing about Lamb. He seems to say, "Bookstalls, folios, bindings, oddities, you see, dear readers, such things as Lamb loved," and then to put on quaintish, sly freaks of manner, the tears-and-smiles mood, to tread daintily with no visible occasion for dainty treading, to fall into ecstasies about nothing particular because it was Lamb's way, and fall out of them again with difficulty in anything but Lamb's way, and all because in talking about Lamb he wants to be Lambish, instead of forming any connected or distinct conception of him and his genius. Thus, for example:—

"Even over the stall-keepers themselves, their calling exercises a chastening influence. They are generally simple men, rarely gripping. So with those who explore the stalls. They have a special eye, a quick glance that runs along the shelves; which as it lights on the peculiar rusted back—say the tarnished but mellow 'bit' of old French red morocco—kindles with an eagle glance. So with their touch, which is almost tender, opening with a familiar but cautious reverence, and laying the book back softly, not ramming it violently between its fellows, to the certain abrasion of its sides, as rude heretics do. After all, it is a good and redeeming toleration in those who watch over public buildings, bridge parapets, and the like, who suffer the humble professors of this craft, and allow to their shelves wall space. This is a redeeming feature in our hard, practical age; and who shall say that it is not a warm, pleasant, and appropriate furniture—like ivy for a wall—for the outside of inns of court, for the long stretch of the Quai Voltaire, and the bases of the Academy pillars in gay Paris? It gives a subdued monastic or scholastic air, that tells of quiet men and gentle scholars—gentle scholars, like Walter Scott, Lamb, and a hundred others."

We suppose the value of that must be that Mr. Fitzgerald thinks it the sort of thing Lamb would have said. Certainly it does not strike us as at all true of modern bookstall-keepers, bookstall frequenters, or bookstall permitters. In London, bookstalls, even, if they have this softening influence on the hard culture of the day, have seldom now any privilege of access to places where other and vulgarer stalls are not also allowed. Then, speaking of Lamb's appearances in Hone's Every-Day Book, Mr. Fitzgerald gets into a rapture about nothing, and says:—

"He is 'brought out' by an allusion to Sir

Jeffrey Dunstan, whom he had met and seen at his dwelling. 'A strong odour of burnt bones, I remember, blending with the scent of horse-flesh reeking into dogs' meat, and only relieved a little by the breathings of a few brick-kilns, made up the atmosphere.' This is one of Lamb's wonderful 'gaperings' of oddness; and even the quaint position of the words 'I remember' is worthy of study."

What there is quaint or 'worthy of study' in the position of the words 'I remember' we are quite unable to see. Lamb himself would probably have regarded 'study' of that point as decidedly imbecile. Or again;—

"A correspondent, Tim Tims, gossiping about the ass brings out Lamb again to plead for this suffering servant. 'Nature did prudently in furnishing him with a tegument impervious to ordinary stripes. . . . His back offers no mark to a puny foeman. To a common whip or switch his side presents an absolute insensibility. . . . His jerkin is well fortified. . . . Contemplating this natural safeguard, his fortified exterior, it is with pain I view the sleek, foppish, combed, and curried person of this animal, as he is transmuted and disnaturalized at watering-places, &c., where they affect to make a palfrey of him. Fie on all such sophisticating! It will never do, Master Groom. Something of his honest, shaggy exterior will peep up in spite of you—his good, rough, native pine-apple coating.' Pine-apple coating! How truly after Lamb's mind, the deceit in suggesting an agreeable image, which, on a second's reflection, shows us quite a different idea. Nothing, too, is more remarkable in him than his airy and special use of the '&c.'"

This is indeed indulging in forced raptures over deep no-meanings. "Airy use of the &c." because Lamb, instead of putting "at watering-places, places of amusement, sight-seeing places, and the like," shortens down his meaning, as a good essayist should, with an "&c." Nor do we imagine that Lamb, even if warned by Mr. Fitzgerald that he had been very subtle about the pine-apple coating of the ass, would have been able to take credit for really meaning it. If he did mean to suggest, and then balk his readers of, the agreeable idea of the taste of pine-apple in using the illustration of "pine-apple coating" to express the hardness of the ass's skin, we do not see the humour of the freak. What was more in his mind perhaps was to suggest the value of the ass, by the strong shag coat nature had given to him and to the pine-apple alike. But to us this sort of forced critical rapture over an imaginary touch that no one would really care about even if it were seriously meant, has rather a tendency to provoke, — if anything could provoke us with Lamb, — than to heighten our regard for him. The only respectable criticisms we have found in this book are, first, the suggestion of a certain analogy between Dickens's and Lamb's treatment of old childish recollections, — like Noah's arks, for instance, — and next the observation, not perhaps very recondite, that in the title of Lamb's essay on "The Decay of Beggars in the Metropolis," "there is an art and significance in the choice of the word 'decay'; it is the key to the whole essay that follows, conveying, as it were, that mendicancy was one of the choice blessings and pleasant things of life, decaying away just as the old artificial fountains in the old squares of London were being bricked up and abolished." This is a just but surely rather obvious remark, considering that Lamb called his essay expressly "A Complaint of the Decay of Beggars in the Metropolis." Mr. Fitzgerald's book affords us, on the whole, but a small net profit of respectable criticism, for 229 pages of rambling matter, though we readily admit that a certain considerable proportion of the space is taken up with extracts — often good — from the more scattered writings of Lamb, which are not always easy to lay your hand upon. Still, even this benefit is sadly diluted by artificial raptures; for, Mr. Fitzgerald, while doing his very best to screw up his mind into the quaint simplicities of "Lamb the frolic and the gentle," succeeds only in attaining a very awkward and far from frolicsome simplesse.

A real study of Lamb, — not an étude, if what Mr. Fitzgerald has written be an étude, — illustrating the different kinds of his humour and his pathos, and their relation to each other, would have been a fine subject for an essay, though there are not many perhaps who could adequately work it out. Leigh Hunt used to say of Lamb that he had a head worthy of Aristotle, but a great disinclination to exert the powerful understanding which he really possessed. We believe a great secret of his humour will be found in this remark. Lamb saw clearly the inference to which reason on all sorts of subjects led, but deliberately shied at the light as a horse would shy at a sudden stream of light through the gap in a fence, and took to defending some arbitrary view cherished by old and dear associations instead. Nevertheless the gleam of light from which he turns away with such mock disgust is never absent from his mind, and he writes, not like Dr. Johnson, a downright earnest defence of what is old-fashioned or unreasonable, but a plea for it that is the more humorous because you see at every point that he is resolutely painting out the rational background which he dislikes and is trying to ignore at every touch. Thus his "Complaint of the Decay of Beggars in the Metropolis," is humorous by that very emphasis and grandeur of encomium on the fast vanishing mendicants which betrays his knowledge of the truth behind. It is the fertility of the resource which he lavishes in excluding the truth, and excluding it by a picture intended to charm the eye far more than the reality he is seeking to paint out, which betrays to us that he is all the time smiling to himself at his own ingenuity, nay, indirectly painting his own mental smile, while professing to be busy on praise of the mendicants. Thus he says of the beggar, "He is the only man in the universe who is not obliged to study appearances. The ups and downs of the world concern him no longer. He alone continueth in one stay. . . . No man troubleth him with questioning his religion or politics. He is the only free man in the universe." Or again, of the beggar who had lost his lower limbs, and used to push himself about on his wheeled machine, "He seemed earth-born, an Antæus, and to suck in fresh vigour from the soil which he neighboured. He was a grand fragment, — as good as an Elgin marble. The nature which should have recruited his left legs and thighs was not lost, but only retired into his upper parts, and he was half a Hercules." The amused knowledge betrayed throughout this most humorous essay that its author was staying off unwelcome general truths by charming pictures of his own wayward and capricious preferences for things as they are, is the secret of its humour. Lamb said of himself very happily, that "the impressions of infancy had burnt into him, and he resented the impertinences of manhood." It was this resentment of the impertinences of manhood, combined with a clear though averted understanding of what manhood had forced upon him, that created the double current in his mind requisite to all humour.

Another and probably even richer source of Lamb's humour was allied to this just so far as all sorts of intellectual waywardness have the same root. Just as his fancy rebelled against the rational view of a subject, glanced aside from it, and suggested mock reason after mock reason for rejecting it, so even when there was no room for a rebellion of this sort, his mind was fertile beyond expression in detecting oblique ways out of common-places, — back ways, side ways, even blind alleys leading from common-places anywhither or nowhither, as the case might be. He says of a pun, "It is a pistol let off at the ear," to startle the mind. And the reason why he was so good a punster was, that his mind was always starting aside, like a bow bent, from the rigid matter-of-fact views of things. He was, he said, "not a matter-of-fact man, but a matter-of-lie man," and certainly his mind had a wonderful felicity in detecting any opportunity of escaping, at an acute angle as it were, from the ordinary line of thought. Mr. Percy Fitzgerald has half-spoiled his most brilliant pun. When the Highgate omnibus conductor called out, "All full inside?" Lamb, who was half asleep in his corner, woke up to stammer out, "Well, I can't answer for the other gentlemen, but that last piece of pudding at Mrs. Gilman's did the business for me." The attraction of puns to him was this sudden and violent diversion they afforded from the beaten track. His brilliant answer to a superior at the India House, who complained that he always came late, "Well, that is very true, but then I always go away early," was a diversion of exactly the same character. Yet this happy zigzag impulse in his intellect, implied the clearest possible insight into the straight line of thought by the very eagerness of his desire to deviate from it. And this is in fact proved by his criticisms of poetry and dramatic art, some of the finest in the language. Here his sympathies acted with his reason, instead of tempting him into capricious rebellion. There are bits of Shakespearian criticism, — such as that on Malvolio, — which Coleridge scarcely equalled and never surpassed, and criticisms on actors of the day such as no living man can write.

Yet after all perhaps his highest humour, the humour by which he will be best remembered, is the humour of his occasional wild moods, on which sufficient stress is seldom laid. When people talk of his quaintness, and his dainty choice of words, and so forth, they suggest a sort of tame dry humour. Now Lamb's humour was very far from dry. In its happiest moments it was a sort of passion, to which he throws the reins and lets it carry him fast and far. Even in the great essay on the origin of roast pig, one could almost imagine that the main conception had been first suggested by the old gentleman in small clothes who used to throw the vegetable marrows over the wall to Mrs. Nickleby as an expression of his adoration. Or take Lamb's conduct to the unfortunate stamp distributor, who expressed his belief that Milton was "a very clever man," whereupon Lamb, half dozing till then before the fire, — he had dined, not without wine, it is true, — jumped up, lighted a bed-candle, and calling out, "Let me have a look at that gentleman's phrenological developments," walked round the unfortunate man, amidst Wordsworth's shocked exclamations of "Charles! my dear Charles!" and even, when forced into the next room, continued to sing audibly,

"Diddle diddle dumpling, my son John Went to bed with his breeches on,"

— as expressive, we suppose, of the stamp distributor's very coarse and inappropriate clothing for the absolute nakedness of his mind on the subject of Milton. There is the same wildness of humour about this story of Mr. Fitzgerald's: —

"Quite in the same way is his humorous treatment of the poet whose friend had submitted some newly published verses to his inspection. He was to meet the gentleman at dinner, and the poems were shown to Lamb a little before the author's arrival. When he came, he proved to be empty and conceited. During dinner Lamb fell into the delightful drollery of saying, now and again, 'That reminds me of some verses I wrote when I was very young,' and then quoted a line or two, which he recollected, from the gentleman's book, to the latter's amazement and indignation. Lamb, immensely diverted, capped it all by introducing the first lines of Paradise Lost 'Of man's first disobedience,' as also written by himself, which actually brought the gentleman on his feet bursting with rage. He said he had sat by and allowed his own 'little verses' to be taken without protest, but he could not endure to see Milton pillaged."

And the letter to Mr. P. G. Patmore, — the one nugget in that gentleman's voluminous reminiscences published some eleven years ago, — which Mr. Fitzgerald has copied from that work, is the perfection of wild, unbridled humour, starting off at all sorts of tangents, but keeping up a pace that no mere dainty or quaint humourist ever even conceived: —

"CHARLES LAMB TO P. G. PATMORE.

"Dear P. — I am so poorly! I have been to a funeral, where I made a pun, to the consternation of the rest of the mourners. And we had wine. I can't describe to you the howl which the widow set up at proper intervals.

Dash could, for it was not unlike what he makes. . . . Dash is frightful this morning. He whines and stands up on his hind legs. He misses Becky, who is gone to town. I took him to Barnet the other day, and he couldn't eat his victuals after it. Pray God his intellects be not slipping. Mary is gone out for some soles. I suppose it's no use to ask you to come and partake of 'em; else there's a steam vessel. . . . Oh, I am so poorly! I waked it at my cousin's the bookbinder's, who is now with God; or if he is not, it's no fault of mine. We hope the Frank wines do not disagree with Mrs. Patmore. By the way, I like her. Did you ever taste frogs? Get them, if you can. They are like little Lilliput rabbits, only a thought nicer. Christ, how sick I am! — not of the world, but of the widow's shrub. She's sworn under £6,000, but I think she perjured herself. She howls in E la, and I comfort her in B flat. You understand music? If you haven't got Ma-singer, you have nothing to do but go to the first bibliothèque you can light upon at Boulogne, and ask for it (Gifford's edition), and if they haven't got it, you can have Athalie, par Monsieur Racine, and make the best of it. But that 'Old Law' 's delicious. 'No shrimps!' (That's in answer to Mary's question about how the soles are to be done.) I am uncertain where this wandering letter may reach you. What you mean by Poste Restante, God knows. Do you mean I must pay the postage? So I do, to Dover. We had a merry passage with the widow at the Commons. She was howling — part howling and part giving directions to the proctor — when crash! down went my sister through a crazy chair, and made the clerks grin, and I grinned, and the widow tittered — and then I knew that she was not inconsolable. Mary was more frightened than hurt. She'd make a good match for any body (by she, I mean the widow).

'If he bring but a relict away
He is happy, nor heard to complain.'

SHENSTONE

RUSSIA TO PRUSSIA.

No, Sir, my Brother, be content
To leave alone those Duchies;
Think not, from Denmark though you rent,
To keep them in your clutches.
It suited me to let you split
Your neighbour's realm asunder,
And from his crown detach a bit:
But now — hands off the plunder!

You chose to do a wicked thing,
'Twas not my cue to stop it.
You slew the Danes and robbed their King;
Must yield the prey: so drop it.
You stole, whilst I the theft surveyed,
What you shall hold no longer.
Denmark the weaker you have made;
Must not make Prussia stronger.

Proctor has got a wen growing out at the nape of his neck, which his wife wants him to have cut off; but I think it rather an agreeable excrescence — like his poetry — redundant. Hone has hanged himself for debt. Godwin was taken up for picking pockets. Becky takes to bad courses. Her father was blown up in a steam machine. The coroner found it Insanity. I should not like him to sit on my letter. Do you observe my direction? Is it Gallic? — Classical? Do try and get some frogs. You must ask for 'grenouilles' (green eels). They don't understand 'frogs,' though it's a common phrase with us. If you go through BuMoign (Boulogne), inquire if old Godfrey is living, and how he got home from the Crusades. He must be a very old man now. If there is anything new in politics or literature in France, keep it till I see you again, for I'm in no hurry. Chatty-Briant (Chateaubriand) is well, I hope. I think I have no more news; only give both our loves ('all three,' says Dash) to Mrs. Patmore, and bid her get quite well, as I am at present, bating qualms, and the grief incident to losing a valuable relation. "C. L."

"Londres, July 19, 1827."

It is ill work refining upon the secret of the humour in such mad fun as this, and we will not taper it off into common-place by any comment of our own. We take leave of Mr. Fitzgerald, not without a feeling of gratitude that he has led us to return once again to the most charming of essayists, though we cannot say that his somewhat histrionic raptures have, in any other way than by reminding us of Lamb once more, increased the charm of that freshest, and sweetest, and even (in spite of its pathos) gayest corner of English literature.

Thanksgiving for the spoil and slain,
As bound in pious duty,
You rendered, half; at least, in vain:
You must restore the booty.
Meanwhile remains a little bill,
Whose dread you'll hardly smother.
Thank One for slaughter if you will,
You'll have to pay another.

For bloodshed and expense you've naught
To show your angry nation,
Whose discontent may give you thought,
But gives me no vexation.
Now see to BISMARCK what you owe:
A bubble: and how hollow!
He to the deuce had better go,
And you as well might follow.

Punch.

THE BURIAL OF THE DANE

Blue gulf all around us,
Blue sky overhead,
Muster all on the quarter,
We must bury the dead!

It is but a Danish sailor,
Rugged of front and form;
A common son of the fore-castle,
Grizzled with sun and storm.

His name, and the strand he hailed from,
We know — and there's nothing more!
But perhaps his mother is waiting
On the lonely Island of Fohr.

Still, as he lay there dying,
Reason drifting awreck,
" 'Tis my watch," he would mutter,
" I must go upon deck!"

Aye, on deck — by the foremast! —
But watch and look-out are done;
The Union-Jack laid o'er him,
How quiet he lies in the sun!

Slow the ponderous engine,
Stay the hurrying shaft!
Let the roll of the ocean
Cradle our giant craft —
Gather around the grating,
Carry your messmate aft!

Stand in order, and listen
To the holiest pages of prayer!
Let every foot be quiet,
Every head be bare —
The soft trade-wind is lifting
A hundred locks of hair.

Our captain reads the service,
(A little spray on his cheeks,)
The grand old words of burial,
And the trust a true heart seeks —
" We therefore commit his body
To the deep" — and, as he speaks,

Launched from the weather railing,
Swift as the eye can mark,
The ghastly, shotted hammock
Plunges, away from the shark,
Down, a thousand fathoms,
Down into the dark!

A thousand summers and winters
The stormy Gulf shall roll
High o'er his canvas coffin, —
But, silence to doubt and dole!
There's a quiet harbor somewhere
For the poor a-weary soul.

Free the fettered engine,
Speed the tireless shaft!
Loose to gallant and topsail,
The breeze is fair abaft!

Blue sea all around us,
Blue sky bright o'erhead —
Every man to his duty!
We have buried our dead.

THE STATUE.

BY KATE PUTNAM.

EREWHILE it seemed a cumbrous block
Whose even surface, blank as pure,
Betokened but the barren rock,
Strong, not to do, but to endure.
Its dull, impassive calm revealed
No sign of Action's noble strife:
No great, imprisoned soul appealed
With silent prayer for larger life.

Yet evermore the sculptor wrought,
Until, beneath his moulding hand,
The image of a growing thought
Within the marble seemed to stand
At first, the rugged lines declared
A steady patience firm as Fate:
The impress of a will, prepared
The certain future to await.

But slowly, with a subtle change,
A deep and passionate desire
Wrought through the features' finer range,
To kindle them with sentient fire.
A sudden thrill of longing shook
Its pulses through that hungry gaze;
Like one whose mute, imploring look
The spirit's inmost need betrays.

So towered the statue's empty pride:
A mind, a heart, within it born;
Yet, for the quickening soul denied,
Its beauty void, its strength forlorn.
Still seemed the blind, uplifted eyes
Promethean lightnings to beseech!
The breathless, parted lips' surprise
To wait the final gift of speech.

More wan and worn, the artist's face
Each day above his idol bent:
As if that strangely conscious grace
With stolen life were eloquent.
As if, while surely, hour by hour,
Expression in the marble grew,
The finger of a mightier Power,
Fashioned the human face anew.

At length, to last expression wrought,
Instinct with prophecy divine,
It stood, a grand, embodied thought;
A God within a mortal shrine.
With Earth's expiring pulses thrilled,
Achieving so the glorious goal —
Life's sacrifice by Death fulfilled —
The statue held the sculptor's soul!

THE CLAVERINGS.

CHAPTER I.

JULIA BRABAZON.

THE gardens of Clavering Park were removed some three hundred yards from the large, square, sombre-looking stone mansion which was the country-house of Sir Hugh Clavering, the eleventh baronet of that name; and in these gardens, which had but little of beauty to recommend them, I will introduce my readers to two of the personages with whom I wish to make them acquainted in the following story. It was now the end of August, and the parterres, beds, and bits of lawn were dry, disfigured, and almost ugly, from the effects of a long drought. In gardens to which care and labour are given abundantly, flower-beds will be pretty, and grass will be green, let the weather be what it may; but care and labour were but scantily bestowed on the Clavering Gardens, and everything was yellow, adust, harsh, and dry. Over the burnt turf towards a gate that led to the house, a lady was walking, and by her side there walked a gentleman.

"You are going in, then, Miss Brabazon," said the gentleman, and it was very manifest from his tone that he intended to convey some deep reproach in his words.

"Of course I am going in," said the lady. "You asked me to walk with you, and I refused. You have now waylaid me, and therefore I shall escape, — unless I am prevented by violence." As she spoke she stood still for a moment, and looked into his face with a smile which seemed to indicate that if such violence were used, within rational bounds, she would not feel herself driven to great anger.

But though she might be inclined to be playful, he was by no means in that mood. "And why did you refuse me when I asked you?" said he.

"For two reasons, partly because I thought it better to avoid any conversation with you."

"That is civil to an old friend."

"But chiefly," and now as she spoke she drew herself up, and dismissed the smile from her face, and allowed her eyes to fall upon the ground; "but chiefly because I thought that Lord Ongar would prefer that I should not roam alone about Clavering Park with any young gentleman while I am down here; and that he might specially object to my roaming with you, were he to know that you and I were — old acquaintances. Now I have been very frank, Mr. Clavering, and I think that that ought to be enough."

"You are afraid of him already, then?"

"I am afraid of offending any one whom I love, and especially any one to whom I owe any duty."

"Enough! indeed it is not. From what you know of me do you think it likely that that will be enough?" He was now standing in front of her, between her and the gate, and she made no effort to leave him.

"And what is it you want? I suppose you do not mean to fight Lord Ongar, and that if you did you would not come to me."

"Fight him! No; I have no quarrel with him. Fighting him would do no good."

"None in the least; and he would not fight if you were to ask him; and you could not ask him without being false to me."

"I should have had an example for that, at any rate."

"That's nonsense, Mr. Clavering. My falsehood, if you should choose to call me false, is of a very different nature, and is pardonable by all laws known in the world."

"You are a jilt, — that is all."

"Come, Harry, don't use hard words," and she put her hand kindly upon his arm.

"Look at me, such as I am, and at yourself, and then say whether anything but misery could come of a match between you and me. Our ages by the register are the same, but I am ten years older than you by the world. I have two hundred a year, and I owe at this moment six hundred pounds. You have, perhaps, double as much, and would lose half of that if you married. You are an usher at a school."

"No, madam, I am not an usher at a school."

"Well, well, you know I don't mean to make you angry."

"At the present moment, I am a school-master, and if I remained so, I might fairly look forward to a liberal income. But I am going to give that up."

"You will not be more fit for matrimony because you are going to give up your profession. Now Lord Ongar has—heaven knows what—perhaps sixty thousand a year."

"In all my life I never heard such effrontery,—such barefaced shameless worldliness."

"Why should I not love a man with a large income?"

"He is old enough to be your father."

"He is thirty-six, and I am twenty-four."

"Thirty-six!"

"There is the Peerage for you to look at. But, my dear Harry, do you not know that you are perplexing me and yourself too, for nothing? I was fool enough when I came here from Nice, after papa's death, to let you talk nonsense to me for a month or two."

"Did you or did you not swear that you loved me?"

"Oh, Mr. Clavering, I did not imagine that your strength would have condescended to take such advantage over the weakness of a woman. I remember no oaths of any kind, and what foolish assertions I may have made, I am not going to repeat. It must have become manifest to you during these two years that all that was a romance. If it be a pleasure to you to look back to it, of that pleasure I cannot deprive you. Perhaps I also may sometimes look back. But I shall never speak of that time again; and you, if you are as noble as I take you to be, will not speak of it either. I know you would not wish to injure me."

"I would wish to save you from the misery you are bringing on yourself."

"In that you must allow me to look after myself. Lord Ongar certainly wants a wife, and I intend to be true to him,—and useful."

"How about love?"

"And to love him, sir. Do you think that no man can win a woman's love, unless he is filled to the brim with poetry, and has a neck like Lord Byron, and is handsome like your worship? You are very handsome, Harry, and you, too, should go into the market and make the best of yourself. Why should you not learn to love some nice girl that has money to assist you?"

"Julia!"

"No, sir; I will not be called Julia. If you do, I will be insulted, and leave you instantly. I may call you Harry, as being so much younger,—though we were born in the same month, and as a sort of cousin. But I shall never do that after to-day."

"You have courage enough, then, to tell me that you have not ill-used me?"

"Certainly I have. Why, what a fool you would have me be! Look at me, and tell me whether I am fit to be the wife of such a one as you. By the time you are entering the world, I shall be an old woman, and shall have lived my life. Even if I were fit to be your mate when we were living here together, am I fit, after what I have done and seen during the last two years? Do you think it would really do any good to any one if I were to jilt, as you call it, Lord Ongar, and tell them all,—your cousin, Sir Hugh, and my sister, and your father,—that I was going to keep myself up, and marry you when you were ready for me?"

"You mean to say that the evil is done."

"No, indeed. At the present moment I owe six hundred pounds, and I don't know where to turn for it, so that my husband may not be dunned for my debts as soon as he has married me. What a wife I should have been for you;—should I not?"

"I could pay the six hundred pounds for you with money that I have earned myself, though you do call me an usher; and perhaps would ask fewer questions about it than Lord Ongar will do with all his thousands."

"Dear Harry, I beg your pardon about the usher. Of course, I know that you are a fellow of your college, and that St. Cuthbert's, where you teach the boys, is one of the grandest schools in England; and I hope you'll be a bishop; nay,—I think you will, if you make up your mind to try for it."

"I have given up all idea of going into the church."

"Then you'll be a judge. I know you'll be great and distinguished, and that you'll do it all yourself. You are distinguished already. If you could only know how infinitely I should prefer your lot to mine!

Oh, Harry, I envy you! I do envy you! You have got the ball at your feet, and the world before you, and can win everything for yourself."

"But nothing is anything without your love."

"Psha! Love, indeed. What could I do for you but ruin you? You know it as well as I do; but you are selfish enough to wish to continue a romance which would be absolutely destructive to me, though for a while it might afford a pleasant relaxation to your graver studies. Harry, you can choose in the world. You have divinity, and law, and literature, and art. And if debarred from love now by the exigencies of labour, you will be as fit for love in ten years' time as you are at present."

"But I do love now."

"Be a man, then, and keep it to yourself. Love is not to be our master. You can choose, as I say; but I have had no choice, — no choice but to be married well, or to go out like a snuff of a candle. I don't like the snuff of a candle, and, therefore, I am going to be married well."

"And that suffices?"

"It must suffice. And why should it not suffice? You are very uncivil, cousin, and very unlike the rest of the world. Everybody compliments me on my marriage. Lord Ongar is not only rich, but he is a man of fashion, and a man of talent."

"Are you fond of race-horses yourself?"

"Very fond of them."

"And of that kind of life?"

"Very fond of it. I mean to be fond of everything that Lord Ongar likes. I know that I can't change him, and, therefore, I shall not try."

"You are right there, Miss Brabazon."

"You mean to be impertinent, sir; but I will not take it so. This is to be our last meeting in private, and I won't acknowledge that I am insulted. But it must be over now, Harry; and here I have been pacing round and round the garden with you, in spite of my refusal just now. It must not be repeated, or things will be said which I do not mean to have ever said of me. Good-by, Harry."

"Good-by, Julia."

"Well, for that once let it pass. And remember this; I have told you all my hopes, and my one trouble. I have been thus open with you because I thought it might serve to make you look at things in a right light. I trust to your honour as a gentleman to repeat nothing that I have said to you."

"I am not given to repeat such things as those."

"I'm sure you are not. And I hope you will not misunderstand the spirit in which they have been spoken. I shall never regret what I have told you now, if it tends to make you perceive that we must both regard our past acquaintance as a romance, which must, from the stern necessity of things, be treated as a dream which we have dreamt, or a poem which we have read."

"You can treat it as you please."

"God bless you, Harry; and I will always hope for your welfare, and hear of your success with joy. Will you come up and shoot with them on Thursday?"

"What, with Hugh? No; Hugh and I do not hit it off together. If I shot at Clavering I should have to do it as a sort of head-keeper. It's a higher position, I know, than that of an usher, but it doesn't suit me."

"Oh, Harry! that is so cruel! But you will come up to the house. Lord Ongar will be there on the thirty-first; the day after to-morrow, you know."

"I must decline even that temptation. I never go into the house when Hugh is there, except about twice a year on solemn invitation — just to prevent there being a family quarrel."

"Good-by, then," and she offered him her hand.

"Good-by, if it must be so."

"I don't know whether you mean to grace my marriage?"

"Certainly not. I shall be away from Clavering, so that the marriage bells may not wound my ears. For the matter of that, I shall be at the school."

"I suppose we shall meet some day in town."

"Most probably not. My ways and Lord Ongar's will be altogether different, even if I should succeed in getting up to London. If you ever come to see Hermione here, I may chance to meet you in the house. But you will not do that often, the place is so dull and unattractive."

"It is the dearest old park."

"You won't care much for old parks as Lady Ongar."

"You don't know what I may care about as Lady Ongar; but as Julia Brabazon I will now say good-by for the last time." Then they parted, and the lady returned to the great house, while Harry Clavering made his way across the park towards the rectory.

Three years before this scene in the gardens at Clavering Park, Lord Brabazon had died at Nice, leaving one unmarried daughter, the lady to whom the reader has just been introduced. One other daughter he had, who was then already married to Sir Hugh Clavering, and Lady Clavering was the Hermione of whom mention has already been made. Lord Brabazon, whose peerage had descended to him in a direct line from the times of the Plantagenets, was one of those unfortunate nobles of whom England is burdened with but few, who have no means equal to their rank. He had married late in life, and had died without a male heir. The title which had come from the Plantagenets was now lapsed; and when the last lord died, about four hundred a year was divided between his two daughters. The elder had already made an excellent match, as regarded fortune, in marrying Sir Hugh Clavering; and the younger was now about to make a much more splendid match in her alliance with Lord Ongar. Of them I do not know that it is necessary to say much more at present.

And of Harry Clavering it perhaps may not be necessary to say much in the way of description. The attentive reader will have already gathered nearly all that should be known of him before he makes himself known by his own deeds. He was the only son of the Reverend Henry Clavering, rector of Clavering, uncle of the present Sir Hugh Clavering, and brother of the last Sir Hugh. The Reverend Henry Clavering, and Mrs. Clavering his wife, and his two daughters, Mary and Fanny Clavering, lived always at Clavering Rectory, on the outskirts of Clavering Park, at a full mile's distance from the house. The church stood in the park, about midway between the two residences. When I have named one more Clavering, Captain Clavering, Captain Archibald Clavering, Sir Hugh's brother, and when I shall have said also that both Sir Hugh and Captain Clavering were men fond of pleasure and fond of money, I shall have said all that I need now say about the Clavering family at large.

Julia Brabazon had indulged in some reminiscence of the romance of her past poetic life when she talked of cousinship between her and Harry Clavering. Her sister was the wife of Harry Clavering's first cousin, but between her and Harry there was no relationship whatever. When old Lord Brabazon had died at Nice she had come to Clavering Park, and had created some astonishment among those who knew Sir Hugh by making good her footing in his establishment. He was not the man to take up a wife's sister, and make his house her home, out of charity or from domestic love. Lady Clavering, who had been a handsome woman and fashionable withal, no doubt may have had some influence; but Sir Hugh was a man much prone to follow his own courses. It must be presumed that Julia Brabazon had made herself agreeable in the house, and probably also useful. She had been taken to London through two seasons, and had there held up her head among the bravest. And she had been taken abroad, — for Sir Hugh did not love Clavering Park, except during six weeks of partridge shooting; and she had been at Newmarket with them, and at the house of a certain fast hunting duke with whom Sir Hugh was intimate; and at Brighton with her sister, when it suited Sir Hugh to remain alone at the duke's; and then again up in London, where she finally arranged matters with Lord Ongar. It was acknowledged by all the friends of the two families, and indeed I may say of the three families now — among the Brabazon people, and the Clavering people, and the Courton people, — Lord Ongar's family name was Courton, — that Julia Brabazon had been very clever. Of her and Harry Clavering together no one had ever said a word. If any words had been spoken between her and Hermione on the subject, the two sisters had been discreet enough to manage that they should go no further. In those short months of Julia's romance Sir Hugh had been away from Clavering, and Hermione had been much occupied in giving birth to an heir. Julia had now lived past her one short spell of poetry, had written her one sonnet, and was prepared for the business of the world.

CHAPTER II.

HARRY CLAVERING CHOOSES HIS PROFESSION.

HARRY CLAVERING might not be an usher, but, nevertheless, he was home for the holidays. And who can say where the usher ends and the schoolmaster begins? He, perhaps, may properly be called an usher, who is hired by a private schoolmaster to assist himself in his private occupation, whereas Harry Clavering had been selected by a public body out of a hundred candidates, with much real or pretended reference to certificates of qualification. He was certainly not an usher, as he was paid three hundred a year for his work, — which is quite beyond the mark of ushers. So much was certain; but yet the word stuck in his throat and made him uncomfortable. He did not like to reflect that he was home for the holidays.

But he had determined that he would never come home for the holidays again. At Christmas he would leave the school at which he had won his appointment with so much trouble, and go into an open profession. Indeed he had chosen his profession, and his mode of entering it. He would become a civil engineer, and perhaps a land surveyor, and with this view he would enter himself as a pupil in the great house of Beilby and Burton. The terms even had been settled. He was to pay a premium of five hundred pounds and join Mr. Burton, who was settled in the town of Stratton, for twelve months before he placed himself in Mr. Beilby's office in London. Stratton was less than twenty miles from Clavering. It was a comfort to him to think that he could pay this five hundred pounds out of his own earnings, without troubling his father. It was a comfort, even though he had earned that money by "ushering" for the last two years.

When he left Julia Brabazon in the garden, Harry Clavering did not go at once home to the rectory, but sauntered out all alone into the park, intending to indulge in reminiscences of his past romance. It was all over, that idea of having Julia Brabazon for his love; and now he had to ask himself whether he intended to be made permanently miserable by her worldly falseness, or whether he would borrow something of her worldly wisdom, and agree with himself to look back on what was past as a pleasurable excitement in his boyhood. Of course we all know that really permanent misery was in truth out of the question. Nature had not made him physically or mentally so poor a creature as to be incapable of a cure. But on this occasion he decided on permanent misery. There was about his heart, — about his actual anatomical heart, with its internal arrangement of valves and blood-vessels, — a heavy dragging feeling that almost amounted to corporeal pain, and which he described to himself as agony. Why should this rich, debauched, disreputable lord have the power of taking the cup from his lip, the one morsel of bread which he coveted from his mouth, his one ingot of treasure out of his coffer? Fight him! No, he knew he could not fight Lord Ongar. The world was against such an arrangement. And in truth Harry Clavering had so much contempt for Lord Ongar, that he had no wish to fight so poor a creature. The man had had delirium tremens, and was a worn-out miserable object. So at least Harry Clavering was only too ready to believe. He did not care much for Lord Ongar in the matter. His anger was against her; — that she should have deserted him for a miserable creature, who had nothing to back him but wealth and rank!

There was wretchedness in every view of the matter. He loved her so well, and yet he could do nothing! He could take no step towards saving her or assisting himself. The marriage bells would ring within a month from the present time, and his own father would go to the church and marry them. Unless Lord Ongar were to die before then by God's hand, there could be no escape, — and of such escape Harry Clavering had no thought. He felt a weary, dragging soreness at his heart, and told himself that he must be miserable for ever, — not so miserable but what he would work, but so wretched that the world could have for him no satisfaction.

What could he do? What thing could he achieve so that she should know that he did not let her go from him without more thought than his poor words had expressed? He was perfectly aware that in their conversation she had had the best of the argument, — that he had talked almost like a boy, while she had talked quite like a woman. She had treated him de haut on bas with all that superiority which youth and beauty give to a young woman over a very young man. What could he do? Before he returned to the rectory, he had made up his mind what he would do, and on the following morning Julia Brabazon received by the hands of her maid the following note: —

"I think I understood all that you said to me yesterday. At any rate, I understand that you have one trouble left, and that I have the means of curing it." In the first draft of his letter he said something about ushering, but that he omitted afterwards. "You may be assured that the enclosed is all my own, and that it is entirely at my own disposal. You may also be quite sure of good faith on the part of the lender. — H. C." And in this letter he enclosed a cheque for six hundred pounds. It was the money which he had saved since he took his degree, and had been intended for Messrs. Beilby and Burton. But he would wait another two years, — continuing to do his ushering for her sake. What did it matter to a man who must, under any circumstances, be permanently miserable?

Sir Hugh was not yet at Clavering. He was to come with Lord Ongar on the eve of the partridge-shooting. The two sisters, therefore, had the house all to themselves. At about twelve they sat down to breakfast together in a little upstairs chamber adjoining Lady Clavering's own room, Julia Brabazon at that time having her lover's generous letter in her pocket. She knew that it was as improper as it was generous, and that, moreover, it was very dangerous. There was no knowing what might be the result of such a letter should Lord Ongar even know that she had received it. She was not absolutely angry with Harry, but had, to herself, twenty times called him a foolish, indiscreet, dear, generous boy. But what was she to do with the cheque? As to that, she had hardly as yet made up her mind when she joined her sister on the morning in question. Even to Hermione she did not dare to tell the fact that such a letter had been received by her.

But in truth her debts were a great torment to her; and yet how trifling they were when compared with the wealth of the man who was to become her husband in six weeks! Let her marry him, and not pay them, and he probably would never be the wiser. They would get themselves paid almost without his knowledge, perhaps altogether without his hearing of them. But yet she feared him, knowing him to be greedy about money; and, to give her such merit as was due to her, she felt the meanness of going to her husband with debts on her shoulder. She had five thousand pounds of her own; but the very settlement which gave her a noble dower, and which made the marriage so brilliant, made over this small sum in its entirety to her lord. She had been wrong not to tell the lawyer of her trouble when he had brought the paper for her to sign; but she had not told him. If Sir Hugh Clavering had been her own brother there would have been no difficulty, but he was only her brother-in-law, and she feared to speak to him. Her sister, however, knew that there were debts, and on that subject she was not afraid to speak to Hermione.

"Hermie," said she, "what am I to do about this money that I owe? I got a bill from Colclugh's this morning."

"Just because he knows you're going to be married; that's all."

"But how am I to pay him?"

"Take no notice of it till next spring. I don't know what else you can do. You'll be sure to have money when you come back from the Continent."

"You couldn't lend it me; could you?"

"Who? I? Did you ever know me have any money in hand since I was married? I have the name of an allowance, but it is always spent before it comes to me, and I am always in debt."

"Would Hugh — let me have it?"

"What, give it you?"

"Well, it wouldn't be so very much for him. I never asked him for a pound yet."

"I think he would say something you wouldn't like if you were to ask him; but, of course, you can try it if you please."

"Then what am I to do?"

"Lord Ongar should have let you keep your own fortune. It would have been nothing to him."

"Hugh didn't let you keep your own fortune."

"But the money which will be nothing to Lord Ongar was a good deal to Hugh. You're going to have sixty thousand a year, while we have to do with seven or eight. Besides, I hadn't been out in London, and it wasn't likely I should owe much in Nice. He did ask me, and there was something."

"What am I to do, Hermie?"

"Write and ask Lord Ongar to let you have what you want out of your own money. Write to-day, so that he may get your letter before he comes."

"Oh, dear! oh, dear! I never wrote a word to him yet, and to begin with asking him for money!"

"I don't think he can be angry with you for that."

"I shouldn't know what to say. Would you write it for me, and let me see how it looks?"

This Lady Clavering did; and had she refused to do it, I think that poor Harry Clavering's cheque would have been used. As it was, Lady Clavering wrote the letter to "My dear Lord Ongar," and it was copied and signed by "Yours most affectionately, Julia Brabazon." The effect of this was the receipt of a cheque for a thousand pounds in a very pretty note from Lord Ongar, which the lord brought with him to Clavering, and sent up to Julia as he was dressing for dinner. It was an extremely comfortable arrangement, and Julia was very glad of the money, — feeling it to be a portion of that which was her own. And Harry's cheque had been returned to him on the day of its receipt. "Of course I cannot take it, and of course you should not have sent it." These words were written on the morsel of paper in which the money was returned. But Miss Brabazon had torn the signature off the cheque, so that it might be safe, whereas Harry Clavering had taken no precaution with it whatever. But then Harry Clavering had not lived two years in London.

During the hours that the cheque was away from him, Harry had told his father that perhaps, even yet, he might change his purpose as to going to Messrs. Beilby and Burton. He did not know, he said, but he was still in doubt. This had sprung from some chance question which his father had asked, and which had seemed to demand an answer. Mr. Clavering greatly disliked the scheme of life which his son had made. Harry's life hitherto had been prosperous and very creditable. He had gone early to Cambridge, and at twenty-two had become a fellow of his college. This fellowship he could hold for five or six years without going into orders. It would then lead to a living, and would in the meantime afford a livelihood. But, beyond this, Harry, with an energy which he certainly had not inherited from his father, had become a schoolmaster, and was already a rich man. He had done more than well, and there was a great probability that between them they might be able to buy the next presentation to Clavering, when the time should come in which Sir Hugh should determine on selling it. That Sir Hugh should give the family living to his cousin was never thought probable by any of the family at the rectory; but he might perhaps part with it under such circumstances on favourable terms. For all these reasons the father was very anxious that his son should follow out the course for which he had been intended; but that he, being unenergetic and having hitherto done little for his son, should dictate to a young man who had been energetic, and who had done much for himself, was out of the question. Harry, therefore, was to be the arbiter of his own fate. But when Harry received back the cheque from Julia Brabazon, then he again returned to his resolution respecting Messrs. Beilby and Burton, and took the first opportunity of telling his father that such was the case.

After breakfast he followed his father into his study, and there, sitting in two easy-chairs opposite to each other, they lit each a cigar. Such was the reverend gentleman's custom in the afternoon, and such also in the morning. I do not know whether the smoking of four or five cigars daily by the parson of a parish may now-a-day be considered as a vice in him, but if so, it was the only vice with which Mr. Clavering could be charged. He was a kind, soft-hearted, gracious man, tender to his wife, whom he ever regarded as the angel of his house, indulgent to his daughters, whom he idolized, ever patient with his parishioners, and awake, — though not widely awake, — to the responsibilities of his calling. The world had been too comfortable for him, and also too narrow; so that he had sunk into idleness. The world had given him much to eat and drink, but it had given him little to do, and thus he had gradually fallen away from his early purposes, till his energy hardly sufficed for the doing of that little. His living gave him eight hundred a year; his wife's fortune nearly doubled that. He had married early, and had got his living early, and had been very prosperous. But he was not a happy man. He knew that he had put off the day of action till the power of action had passed away from him. His library was well furnished, but he rarely read much else than novels and poetry; and of late years the reading even of poetry had given way to the reading of novels. Till within ten years of the hour of which I speak, he had been a hunting parson, — not hunting loudly, but following his sport as it is followed by moderate sportsmen. Then there had come a new bishop, and the new bishop had sent for him, — nay, finally had come to him, and had lectured him with blatant authority. "My lord," said the parson of Clavering, plucking up something of his past energy, as the colour rose to his face, "I think you are wrong in this. I think you are specially wrong to interfere with me in this way on your first coming among us. You feel it to be your duty, no doubt; but to me it seems that you mistake your duty. But, as the matter is one simply of my own pleasure, I shall give it up." After that Mr. Clavering hunted no more, and never spoke a good word to any one of the bishop of his diocese. For myself, I think it as well that clergymen should not hunt; but had I been the parson of Clavering, I should, under those circumstances, have hunted double.

Mr. Clavering hunted no more, and probably smoked a greater number of cigars in consequence. He had an increased amount of time at his disposal, but did not, therefore, give more time to his duties. Alas! what time did he give to his duties? He kept a most energetic curate, whom he allowed to do almost what he would with the parish. Every-day services he did prohibit, declaring that he would not have the parish church made ridiculous; but in other respects his curate was the pastor. Once every Sunday he read the service, and once every Sunday he preached, and he resided in his parsonage ten months every year. His wife and daughters went among the poor, — and he smoked cigars in his library. Though not yet fifty, he was becoming fat and idle, — unwilling to walk, and not caring much even for such riding as the bishop had left to him. And, to make matters worse, — far worse, he knew all this of himself, and understood it thoroughly. "I see a better path, and know how good it is, but I follow ever the worse." He was saying that to himself daily, and was saying it always without hope.

And his wife had given him up. She had given him up, not with disdainful rejection, nor with contempt in her eye, or censure in her voice, not with diminution of love or of outward respect. She had given him up as a man abandons his attempts to make his favourite dog take the water. He would fain that the dog he loves should dash into the stream as other dogs will do. It is, to his thinking, a noble instinct in a dog. But his dog dreads the water. As, however, he has learned to love the beast, he puts up with this mischance, and never dreams of banishing poor Ponto from his hearth because of this failure. And so it was with Mrs. Clavering and her husband at the rectory. He understood it all. He knew that he was so far rejected; and he acknowledged to himself the necessity for such rejection.

"It is a very serious thing to decide upon," he said, when his son had spoken to him.

"Yes; it is serious, — about as serious a thing as a man can think of; but a man cannot put it off on that account. If I mean to make such a change in my plans, the sooner I do it the better."

"But yesterday you were in another mind."

"No, father, not in another mind. I did not tell you then, nor can I tell you all now. I had thought that I should want my money for another purpose for a year or two; but that I have abandoned."

"Is the purpose a secret, Harry?"

"It is a secret, because it concerns another person."

"You were going to lend your money to some one?"

"I must keep it a secret, though you know I seldom have any secrets from you.

That idea, however, is abandoned, and I mean to go over to Stratton to-morrow, and tell Mr. Burton that I shall be there after Christmas. I must be at St. Cuthbert's on Tuesday."

Then they both sat silent for a while, silently blowing out their clouds of smoke. The son had said all that he cared to say, and would have wished that there might then be an end of it; but he knew that his father had much on his mind, and would fain express, if he could express it without too much trouble, or without too evident a need of self-reproach, his own thoughts on the subject. "You have made up your mind, then, altogether that you do not like the church as a profession," he said at last. "I think I have, father."

"And on what grounds? The grounds which recommend it to you are very strong. Your education has adapted you for it. Your success in it is already ensured by your fellowship. In a great degree you have entered it as a profession already, by taking a fellowship. What you are doing is not choosing a line in life, but changing one already chosen. You are making of yourself a rolling stone."

"A stone should roll till it has come to the spot that suits it."

"Why not give up the school if it irks you?"

"And become a Cambridge Don, and practise deportment among the undergraduates."

"I don't see that you need do that. You need not even live at Cambridge. Take a church in London. You would be sure to get one by holding up your hand. If that, with your fellowship, is not sufficient, I will give you what more you want."

"No, father — no. By God's blessing I will never ask you for a pound. I can hold my fellowship for four years longer without orders, and in four years' time I think I can earn my bread."

"I don't doubt that, Harry."

"Then why should I not follow my wishes in this matter? The truth is, I do not feel myself qualified to be a good clergyman."

"It is not that you have doubts, is it?"

"I might have them if I came to think much about it, — as I must do if I took orders. And I do not wish to be crippled in doing what I think lawful by conventional rules. A rebellious clergyman is, I think, a sorry object. It seems to me that he is a bird fouling his own nest. Now, I know I should be a rebellious clergyman."

"In our church the life of a clergyman is as the life of any other gentleman,—within very broad limits."

"Then why did Bishop Proudie interfere with your hunting?"

"Limits may be very broad, Harry, and yet exclude hunting. Bishop Proudie was vulgar and intrusive, such being the nature of his wife, who instructs him; but if you were in orders I should be very sorry to see you take to hunting."

"It seems to me that a clergyman has nothing to do in life unless he is always preaching and teaching. Look at Saul,"—Mr. Saul was the curate of Clavering—"he is always preaching and teaching. He is doing the best he can; and what a life of it he has. He has literally thrown off all worldly cares,—and consequently everybody laughs at him, and nobody loves him. I don't believe a better man breathes, but I shouldn't like his life."

At this point there was another pause, which lasted till the cigars had come to an end. Then, as he threw the stump into the fire, Mr. Clavering spoke again. "The truth is, Harry, that you have had, all your life, a bad example before you."

"No, father."

"Yes, my son;—let me speak on to the end, and then you can say what you please. In me you have had a bad example on one side, and now, in poor Saul, you have a bad example on the other side. Can you fancy no life between the two, which would fit your physical nature which is larger than his, and your mental wants which are higher than mine? Yes, they are, Harry. It is my duty to say this, but it would be unseemly that there should be any controversy between us on the subject."

"If you choose to stop me in that way"—

"I do choose to stop you in that way. As for Saul, it is impossible that you should become such a man as he. It is not that he mortifies his flesh, but that he has no flesh to mortify. He is unconscious of the flavour of venison, or the scent of roses, or the beauty of women. He is an exceptional specimen of a man, and you need no more fear, than you should venture to hope, that you could become such as he is."

At this point they were interrupted by the entrance of Fanny Clavering, who came to say that Mr. Saul was in the drawing-room. "What does he want, Fanny?" This question Mr. Clavering asked half in a whisper, but with something of comic humour in his face, as though partly afraid that Mr. Saul should hear it, and partly intending to convey a wish that he might escape Mr. Saul, if it were possible.

"It's about the iron church, papa. He says it is come,—or part of it has come,—and he wants you to go out to Cumberly Green about the site."

"I thought that was all settled."

"He says not."

"What does it matter where it is? He can put it anywhere he likes on the Green. However, I had better go to him." So Mr. Clavering went. Cumberly Green was a hamlet in the parish of Clavering, three miles distant from the church, the people of which had got into a wicked habit of going to a dissenting chapel near to them. By Mr. Saul's energy, but chiefly out of Mr. Clavering's purse, an iron chapel had been purchased for a hundred and fifty pounds, and Mr. Saul proposed to add to his own duties the pleasing occupation of walking to Cumberly Green every Sunday morning before breakfast, and every Wednesday evening after dinner, to perform a service and bring back to the true flock as many of the erring sheep of Cumberly Green as he might be able to catch. Towards the purchase of this iron church Mr. Clavering had at first given a hundred pounds. Sir Hugh, in answer to the fifth application, had very ungraciously, through his steward, bestowed ten pounds. Among the farmers, one pound nine and eightpence had been collected. Mr. Saul had given two pounds; Mrs. Clavering gave five pounds; the girls gave ten shillings each; Henry Clavering gave five pounds;—and then the parson made up the remainder. But Mr. Saul had journeyed thrice painfully to Bristol, making the bargain for the church, going and coming each time by third-class, and he had written all the letters; but Mrs. Clavering had paid the postage, and she and the girls between them were making the covering for the little altar.

"Is it all settled, Harry?" said Fanny, stopping with her brother, and hanging over his chair. She was a pretty, gay-spirited girl, with bright eyes and dark brown hair, which fell in two curls behind her ears.

"He has said nothing to unsettle it."

"I know it makes him very unhappy."

"No, Fanny, not very unhappy. He would rather that I should go into the church, but that is about all."

"I think you are quite right."

"And Mary thinks I am quite wrong."

"Mary thinks so, of course. So should I too, perhaps, if I were engaged to a clergyman. That's the old story of the fox who had lost his tail."

"And your tail isn't gone yet?"

"No, my tail isn't gone yet. Mary thinks that no life is like a clergyman's life. But, Harry, though mamma hasn't said so, I'm sure she thinks you are right. She won't say so as long as it may seem to interfere with anything papa may choose to say; but I'm sure she's glad in her heart."

"And I am glad in my heart, Fanny. And as I'm the person most concerned, I suppose that's the most material thing." Then they followed their father into the drawing-room.

"Couldn't you drive Mrs. Clavering over in the pony chair, and settle it between you," said Mr. Clavering to his curate. Mr. Saul looked disappointed. In the first place, he hated driving the pony, which was a rapid-footed little beast, that had a will of his own; and in the next place, he thought the rector ought to visit the spot on such an occasion. "Or Mrs. Clavering will drive you," said the rector, remembering Mr. Saul's objection to the pony. Still Mr. Saul looked unhappy. Mr. Saul was very tall and very thin, with a tall thin head, and weak eyes, and a sharp, well-cut nose, and, so to say, no lips, and very white teeth, with no beard, and a well-cut chin. His face was so thin that his cheekbones obtruded themselves unpleasantly. He wore a long rusty black coat, and a high rusty black waistcoat, and trousers that were brown with dirty roads and general ill-usage. Nevertheless, it never occurred to any one that Mr. Saul did not look like a gentleman, not even to himself, to whom no ideas whatever on that subject ever presented themselves. But that he was a gentleman I think he knew well enough, and was able to carry himself before Sir Hugh and his wife with quite as much ease as he could do in the rectory. Once or twice he had dined at the great house; but Lady Clavering had declared him to be a bore, and Sir Hugh had called him "that most offensive of all animals, a clerical prig." It had therefore been decided that he was not to be asked to the great house any more. It may be as well to state here, as elsewhere, that Mr. Clavering very rarely went to his nephew's table. On certain occasions he did do so, so that there might be no recognized quarrel between him and Sir Hugh; but such visits were few and far between.

After a few more words from Mr. Saul, and a glance from his wife's eye, Mr.

Clavering consented to go to Cumberly Green, though there was nothing he liked so little as a morning spent with his curate. When he had started, Harry told his mother also of his final decision. "I shall go to Stratton to-morrow and settle it all."

"And what does papa say?" asked the mother.

"Just what he has said before. It is not so much that he wishes me to be a clergyman, as that he does not wish me to have lost all my time up to this."

"It is more than that, I think, Harry," said his elder sister, a tall girl, less pretty than her sister, apparently less careful of her prettiness, very quiet, or, as some said, demure, but said to be good as gold by all who knew her well.

"I doubt it," said Harry, stoutly. "But, however that may be, a man must choose for himself."

"We all thought you had chosen," said Mary.

"If it is settled," said the mother, "I suppose we shall do no good by opposing it."

"Would you wish to oppose it, mamma?" said Harry.

"No, my dear. I think you should judge for yourself."

"You see I could have no scope in the church for that sort of ambition which would satisfy me. Look at such men as Locke, and Stephenson, and Brassey. They are the men who seem to me to do most in the world. They were all self-educated, but surely a man can't have a worse chance because he has learned something. Look at old Beilby with a seat in Parliament, and a property worth two or three hundred thousand pounds! When he was my age he had nothing but his weekly wages."

"I don't know whether Mr. Beilby is a very happy man or a very good man," said Mary.

"I don't know, either," said Harry; "but I do know that he has thrown a single arch over a wider span of water than ever was done before, and that ought to make him happy." After saying this in a tone of high authority, befitting his dignity as a fellow of his college, Harry Clavering went out, leaving his mother and sisters to discuss the subject which to two of them was all-important. As to Mary, she had hopes of her own, vested in the clerical concerns of a neighbouring parish.

CHAPTER III.

LORD ONGAR.

On the next morning Harry Clavering rode over to Stratton, thinking much of his misery as he went. It was all very well for him, in the presence of his own family, to talk of his profession as the one subject which was to him of any importance; but he knew very well himself that he was only beguiling them in doing so. This question of a profession was, after all, but dead leaves to him,—to him who had a canker at his heart, a perpetual thorn in his bosom, a misery within him which no profession could mitigate! Those dear ones at home guessed nothing of this, and he would take care that they should guess nothing. Why should they have the pain of knowing that he had been made wretched for ever by blighted hopes? His mother, indeed, had suspected something in those sweet days of his roaming with Julia through the park. She had once or twice said a word to warn him. But of the very truth of his deep love,—so he told himself,—she had been happily ignorant. Let her be ignorant. Why should he make his mother unhappy? As these thoughts passed through his mind, I think that he revelled in his wretchedness, and made much to himself of his misery. He sucked in his sorrow greedily, and was somewhat proud to have had occasion to break his heart. But not the less, because he was thus early blighted, would he struggle for success in the world. He would show her that, as his wife, she might have had a worthier position than Lord Ongar could give her. He, too, might probably rise the quicker in the world, as now he would have no impediment of wife or family. Then, as he rode along, he composed a sonnet, fitting to his case, the strength and rhythm of which seemed to him, as he sat on horseback, to be almost perfect. Unfortunately, when he was back at Clavering, and sat in his room with the pen in his hand, the turn of the words had escaped him.

He found Mr. Burton at home, and was not long in concluding his business. Messrs. Beilby and Burton were not only civil engineers, but were land surveyors also, and land valuers on a great scale. They were employed much by Government upon public buildings, and if not architects themselves, were supposed to know all that architects should do and should not do. In the purchase of great properties Mr. Burton's opinion was supposed to be, or to have been, as good as any in the kingdom, and therefore there was very much to be learned in the office at Stratton. But Mr. Burton was not a rich man like his partner, Mr. Beilby, nor an ambitious man. He had never soared Parliamentwards, had never speculated, had never invented, and never been great. He had been the father of a very large family, all of whom were doing as well in the world, and some of them perhaps better, than their father. Indeed, there were many who said that Mr. Burton would have been a richer man if he had not joined himself in partnership with Mr. Beilby. Mr. Beilby had the reputation of swallowing more than his share wherever he went.

When the business part of the arrangement was finished Mr. Burton talked to his future pupil about lodgings, and went out with him into the town to look for rooms. The old man found that Harry Clavering was rather nice in this respect, and in his own mind formed an idea that this new beginner might have been a more auspicious pupil, had he not already become a fellow of a college. Indeed, Harry talked to him quite as though they two were on an equality together; and, before they had parted, Mr. Burton was not sure that Harry did not patronize him. He asked the young man, however, to join them at their early dinner, and then introduced him to Mrs. Burton, and to their youngest daughter, the only child who was still living with them. "All my other girls are married, Mr. Clavering; and all of them married to men connected with my own profession." The colour came slightly to Florence Burton's cheeks as she heard her father's words, and Harry asked himself whether the old man expected that he should go through the same ordeal; but Mr. Burton himself was quite unaware that he had said anything wrong, and then went on to speak of the successes of his sons. "But they began early, Mr. Clavering; and worked hard,—very hard indeed." He was a good, kindly, garrulous old man; but Harry began to doubt whether he would learn much at Stratton. It was, however, too late to think of that now, and everything was fixed.

Harry, when he looked at Florence Burton, at once declared to himself that she was plain. Anything more unlike Julia Brazazon never appeared in the guise of a young lady. Julia was tall, with a high brow, a glorious complexion, a nose as finely modelled as though a Grecian sculptor had cut it, a small mouth, but lovely in its curves, and a chin that finished and made perfect the symmetry of her face. Her neck was long, but graceful as a swan's, her bust was full, and her whole figure like that of a goddess. Added to this, when he had first known her, had been all the charm of youth. When she had returned to Clavering the other day, the affianced bride of Lord Ongar, he had hardly known whether to admire or deplore the settled air of established womanhood which she had assumed. Her large eyes had always lacked something of rapid glancing sparkling brightness. They had been glorious eyes to him, and in those early days he had not known that they lacked aught; but he had perceived, or perhaps fancied, that now, in her present condition, they were often cold, and sometimes almost cruel. Nevertheless he was ready to swear that she was perfect in her beauty.

Poor Florence Burton was short of stature, was brown, meagre, and poor-looking. So said Harry Clavering to himself. Her small hand, though soft, lacked that wondrous charm of touch which Julia's possessed. Her face was short, and her forehead, though it was broad and open, had none of that feminine command which Julia's look conveyed. That Florence's eyes were very bright, — bright and soft as well, he allowed; and her dark brown hair was very glossy; but she was, on the whole, a mean-looking little thing. He could not, as he said to himself on his return home, avoid the comparison, as she was the first girl he had seen since he had parted from Julia Brabazon.

"I hope you'll find yourself comfortable at Stratton, sir," said old Mrs. Burton.

"Thank you," said Harry, "but I want very little myself in that way. Anything does for me."

"One young gentleman we had took a bedroom at Mrs. Pott's, and did very nicely without any second room at all. 'Don't you remember, Mr. B.; it was young Granger.'"

"Young Granger had a very short allowance," said Mr. Burton. "He lived upon fifty pounds a year all the time he was here."

"And I don't think Scarness had more when he began," said Mrs. Burton. "Mr. Scarness married one of my girls, Mr. Clavering, when he started himself at Liverpool. He has pretty nigh all the Liverpool docks under him now. I have heard him say that butcher's meat did not cost him four shillings a week all the time he was here. I've always thought Stratton one of the reasonablest places anywhere for a young man to do for himself in."

"I don't know, my dear," said the husband, "that Mr. Clavering will care very much for that."

"Perhaps not, Mr. B.; but I do like to see young men careful about their spendings. What's the use of spending a shilling when sixpence will do as well? and sixpence saved, when a man has nothing but himself, becomes pounds and pounds by the time he has a family about him."

During all this time Miss Burton said little or nothing, and Harry Clavering himself did not say much. He could not express any intention of rivalling Mr. Scarness's economy in the article of the butcher's meat, nor could he promise to content himself with Granger's solitary bedroom. But as he rode home he almost began to fear that he had made a mistake. He was not wedded to the joys of his college hall, or the college common room. He did not like the narrowness of college life. He doubted whether the change from that to the oft-repeated hospitalities of Mrs. Burton might not be too much for him. Scarness's four shillings'-worth of butcher's meat had already made him half sick of his new profession, and though Stratton might be the "reasonablest place anywhere for a young man," he could not look forward to living there for a year with much delight. As for Miss Burton, it might be quite as well that she was plain, as he wished for none of the delights which beauty affords to young men.

On his return home, however, he made no complaint of Stratton. He was too strong-willed to own that he had been in any way wrong, and when early in the following week he started for St. Cuthbert's, he was able to speak with cheerful hope of his new prospects. If ultimately he should find life in Stratton to be unendurable, he would cut that part of his career short, and contrive to get up to London at an earlier time than he had intended.

On the 31st of August Lord Ongar and Sir Hugh Clavering reached Clavering Park, and, as has been already told, a pretty little note was at once sent up to Miss Brabazon in her bedroom. When she met Lord Ongar in the drawing-room, about an hour afterwards, she had instructed herself that it would be best to say nothing of the note; but she could not refrain from a word. "I am much obliged, my lord, by your kindness and generosity," she said, as she gave him her hand. He merely bowed and smiled, and muttered something as to his hoping that he might always find it as easy to gratify her. He was a little man, on whose behalf it certainly appeared that the Peerage must have told a falsehood; it seemed so at least to those who judged of his years from his appearance. The Peerage said that he was thirty-six, and that, no doubt, was in truth his age, but any one would have declared him to be ten years older. This look was produced chiefly by the effect of an elaborately dressed jet black wig which he wore. What misfortune had made him bald so early, — if to be bald early in life be a misfortune, — I cannot say; but he had lost the hair from the crown of his head, and had preferred wiggy to baldness. No doubt an effort was made to hide the wiggishness of his wigs, but what effect in that direction was ever made successfully? He was, moreover, weak, thin, and physically poor, and had, no doubt, increased this weakness and poorness by hard living. Though others thought him old, time had gone swiftly with him, and he still thought himself a young man. He hunted, though he could not ride. He shot, though he could not walk. And, unfortunately, he drank, though he had no capacity for drinking! His friends at last had taught him to believe that his only chance of saving himself lay in marriage, and therefore he had engaged himself to Julia Brabazon, purchasing her at the price of a brilliant settlement. If Lord Ongar should die before her, Ongar Park was to be hers for life, with thousands a year to maintain it. Courton Castle, the great family seat, would of course go to the heir; but Ongar Park was supposed to be the most delightful small country-seat anywhere within thirty miles of London. It lay among the Surrey hills, and all the world had heard of the charms of Ongar Park. If Julia were to survive her lord, Ongar Park was to be hers; and they who saw them both together had but little doubt that she would come to the enjoyment of this clause in her settlement. Lady Clavering had been clever in arranging the match; and Sir Hugh, though he might have been unwilling to give his sister-in-law money out of his own pocket, had performed his duty as a brother-in-law in looking to her future welfare. Julia Brabazon had no doubt that she was doing well. Poor Harry Clavering! She had loved him in the days of her romance. She, too, had written her sonnets. But she had grown old earlier in life than he had done, and had taught herself that romance could not be allowed to a woman in her position. She was highly born, the daughter of a peer, without money, and even without a home to which she had any claim. Of course she had accepted Lord Ongar, but she had not put out her hand to take all these good things without resolving that she would do her duty to her future lord. The duty would be doubtless disagreeable, but she would do it with all the more diligence on that account.

September passed by, hecatombs of partridges were slaughtered, and the day of the wedding drew nigh. It was pretty to see Lord Ongar and the self-satisfaction which he enjoyed at this time. The world was becoming young with him again, and he thought that he rather liked the respectability of his present mode of life. He gave himself but scanty allowances of wine, and no allowance of anything stronger than wine, and did not dislike his temperance. There was about him at all hours an air which seemed to say, "There; I told you all that I could do it as soon as there was any necessity." And in these halcyon days he could shoot for an hour without his pony, and he liked the gentle courteous badinage which was bestowed upon his courtship, and he liked also Julia's beauty. Her conduct to him was perfect. She was never pert, never exigent, never romantic, and never humble. She never bored him, and yet was always ready to be with him when he wished it. She was never exalted; and yet she bore her high place as became a woman nobly born and acknowledged to be beautiful.

"I declare you have quite made a lover of him," said Lady Clavering to her sister. When a thought of the match had first arisen in Sir Hugh's London house, Lady Clavering had been eager in praise of Lord Ongar, or eager in praise rather of the position which the future Lady Ongar might hold; but since the prize had been secured, since it had become plain that Julia was to be the greater woman of the two, she had harped sometimes on the other string. As a sister she had striven for a sister's welfare, but as a woman she could not keep herself from comparisons which might tend to show that after all, well as Julia was doing, she was not doing better than her elder sister had done. Hermione had married simply a baronet, and not the richest or the most amiable among baronets; but she had married a man suitable in age and wealth, with whom any girl might have been in love. She had not sold herself to be the nurse, or not to be the nurse, as it might turn out, of a worn-out debauché. She would have hinted nothing of this, perhaps have thought nothing of this, had not Julia and Lord Ongar walked together through the Clavering groves as though they were two young people. She owed it as a duty to her sister to point out that Lord Ongar could not be a romantic young person, and ought not to be encouraged to play that part.

"I don't know that I have made anything of him," answered Julia. "I suppose he's much like other men when they're going to be married." Julia quite understood the ideas that were passing through her sister's mind, and did not feel them to be unnatural.

"What I mean is, that he has come out so strong in the Romeo line, which we hardly expected, you know. We shall have him under your bedroom window with a guitar like Don Giovanni."

"I hope not, because it's so cold. I don't think it likely, as he seems fond of going to bed early."

"And it's the best thing for him," said Lady Clavering, becoming serious and carefully benevolent. "It's quite a wonder what good hours and quiet living have done for him in so short a time. I was observing him as he walked yesterday, and he put his feet to the ground as firmly almost as Hugh does."

"Did he indeed? I hope he won't have the habit of putting his hand down firmly as Hugh does sometimes."

"As for that," said Lady Clavering, with a little tremor, "I don't think there's much difference between them. They all say that when Lord Ongar means a thing he does mean it."

"I think a man ought to have a way of his own."

"And a woman also, don't you, my dear? But, as I was saying, if Lord Ongar will continue to take care of himself he may become quite a different man. Hugh says that he drinks next to nothing now, and though he sometimes lights a cigar in the smoking-room at night, he hardly ever smokes it. You must do what you can to keep him from tobacco. I happen to know that Sir Charles Poddy said that so many cigars were worse for him even than brandy."

All this Julia bore with an even temper. She was determined to bear everything till her time should come. Indeed she had made herself understand that the hearing of such things as these was a part of the price which she was to be called upon to pay. It was not pleasant for her to hear what Sir Charles Poddy had said about the tobacco and brandy of the man she was just going to marry. She would sooner have heard of his riding sixty miles a day, or dancing all night, as she might have heard had she been contented to take Harry Clavering. But she had made her selection with her eyes open, and was not disposed to quarrel with her bargain, because that which she had bought was no better than the article which she had known it to be when she was making her purchase. Nor was she even angry with her sister. "I will do the best I can, Hermy; you may be sure of that. But there are some things which it is useless to talk about."

"But it was as well you should know what Sir Charles said."

"I know quite enough of what he says, Hermy,—quite as much, I daresay, as you do. But, never mind. If Lord Ongar has given up smoking, I quite agree with you that it's a good thing. I wish they'd all give it up, for I hate the smell of it. Hugh has got worse and worse. He never cares about changing his clothes now."

"I'll tell you what it is," said Sir Hugh to his wife that night; "sixty thousand a year is a very fine income, but Julia will find she has caught a Tartar."

"I suppose he'll hardly live long; will he?"

"I don't know or care when he lives or when he dies; but, by heaven, he is the most overbearing fellow I ever had in the house with me. I wouldn't stand him here for another fortnight,—not even to make her all safe."

"It will soon be over. They'll be gone on Thursday."

"What do you think of his having the impudence to tell Cunliffe,"—Cunliffe was the head keeper;—"before my face, that he didn't know anything about pheasants! 'Well, my lord, I think we've got a few about the place,' said Cunliffe. 'Very few,' said Ongar, with a sneer. Now, if I haven't a better head of game here than he has at Courton, I'll eat him. But the impudence of his saying that before me!"

"Did you make him any answer?"

"There's about enough to suit me," I said. Then he skulked away, knocked off his pins. I shouldn't like to be his wife; I can tell Julia that."

"Julia is very clever," said the sister.

The day of the marriage came, and everything at Clavering was done with much splendour. Four bridesmaids came down from London on the preceding day; two were already staying in the house, and the two cousins came as two more from the rectory. Julia Brabazon had never been really intimate with Mary and Fanny Clavering, but she had known them well enough to make it odd if she did not ask them to come to her wedding and to take a part in the ceremony. And, moreover, she had thought of Harry and her little romance of other days. Harry, perhaps, might be glad to know that she had shown this courtesy to his sisters. Harry, she knew, would be away at his school. Though she had asked him whether he meant to come to her wedding, she had been better pleased that he should be absent. She had not many regrets herself, but it pleased her to think that he should have them. So Mary and Fanny Clavering were asked to attend her at the altar. Mary and Fanny would both have preferred to decline, but their mother had told them that they could not do so. "It would make ill-feeling," said Mrs. Clavering; "and that is what your papa particularly wishes to avoid."

"When you say papa particularly wishes anything, mamma, you always mean that you wish it particularly yourself," said Fanny. "But if it must be done, it must; and then I shall know how to behave when Mary's time comes."

The bells were rung lustily all the morning, and all the parish was there, round about the church, to see. There was no record of a lord ever having been married in Clavering church before; and now this lord was going to marry my lady's sister. It was all one as though she were a Clavering herself. But there was no ecstatic joy in the parish. There were to be no bonfires, and no eating and drinking at Sir Hugh's expense,—no comforts provided for any of the poor by Lady Clavering on that special occasion. Indeed, there was never much of such kindnesses between the lord of the soil and his dependants. A certain stipulated dole was given at Christmas for coals and blankets; but even for that there was generally some wrangle between the rector and the steward. "If there's to be all this row about it," the rector had said to the steward, "I'll never ask for it again." "I wish my uncle would only be as good as his word," Sir Hugh had said, when the rector's speech was repeated to him. Therefore, there was not much of real rejoicing in the parish on this occasion, though the bells were rung loudly, and though the people, young and old, did cluster round the churchyard to see the lord lead his bride out of the church. "A puir feckless thing, tottering along like,—not half the makings of a man. A stout lass like she could a'most blow him away wi' a puff of her mouth." That was the verdict which an old farmer's wife passed upon him, and that verdict was made good by the general opinion of the parish.

But though the lord might be only half a man, Julia Brabazon walked out from the church every inch a countess. Whatever price she might have paid, she had at any rate got the thing which she had intended to buy. And as she stepped into the chariot which carried her away to the railway station on her way to Dover, she told herself that she had done right. She had chosen her profession, as Harry Clavering had chosen his; and having so far succeeded, she would do her best to make her success perfect. Mercenary! Of course she had been mercenary. Were not all men and women mercenary upon whom devolved the necessity of earning their bread?

Then there was a great breakfast at the park,—for the quality,—and the rector on this occasion submitted himself to become the guest of the nephew whom he thoroughly disliked.

VESTIGIA RETRORSUM.

WHITE-THROATED swans and sedges of the mere

Still float, still quiver, on the shining stream;
And underneath an antique bridge I hear
Smooth waters lapping slowly, and their gleam

Frets the cold dark wherein my boat is moor'd:
Nor overheard the storied elms of June
Forget to murmur, nor to welcome noon
With quiet: save when some stray breeze, allured

By fragrance of the central avenue,
Creeps, cooling ever, down the elastic arch,

And through branch'd cliffs and green inwoven shelves

Lets in fresh glimpses of the sultry blue.

So year by year regardless Nature blooms;

So year by year, for all the far-off tombs

Of those who loved them, these impassive courts

Lay their calm shadows on the grateful sward:

No change is here, nor any peace is marr'd

Save ours, who, pausing in life's midday march,

Miss the dear souls of all these fair resorts,
And find instead our own forgotten selves.

RELIGIO SPENSERI.

THERE is a great external resemblance between Spenser and Ariosto. It would be quite correct to call them scholar and master. Spenser's direct borrowings from the 'Orlando Furioso' may be seen in Warton's Treatise on the 'Fairy Queen;' and very possibly a minute comparison of the two poems might enable us to extend the list.* Ariosto's 'Alcina' has furnished hints for both Spenser's 'Duessa' and his 'Acrasia;' his 'Bradamante' is the evident prototype of the 'Britomart' of the English poet; and what we may call the stage properties of the 'Orlando Furioso'—its magic horns, shields, &c.,—reappear in fresh hands in the pages of the 'Fairy Queen.' The general plan, also, of Spenser's poem bears marks of Ariosto's influence. Though not so irregular, it still reminds us of the 'Orlando Furioso' by its divided interest, and by the long intervals during which its hero is lost to our view. Spenser mixes allegory with literal narrative far more frequently than does his master; but Ariosto's celebrated fourteenth canto is a perfect example of such a mixture, and one which evidently had a great effect upon his pupil. Again, Spenser has imitated Ariosto (as he has Boiardo and Pulci) by generally commencing his cantos with two stanzas of moral reflections. And the metres of the two poems present a strong superficial resemblance, broken as they each are into stanzas, instead of being divided into regular couplets, or flowing in blank verse. Yet, notwithstanding this apparent likeness, there is a deep and essential difference between these two poets. Ariosto's genius is comic and humorous; it costs him an effort to be serious. Spenser's is grave and pathetic. Ariosto's delight is in the grotesque and the surprising; Spenser's in the beautiful and the sublime. Nay (since the structure of a poem is to its subject as body is to soul), we may see how much the minds of the Italian and English poets really differ, even by comparing the light bounding measure in which the former sports before us, with the stately march of the verse which conveys to us the deep and solemn thoughts of the latter.† Warton, therefore, is perfectly right when he says, that 'the genius of each was entirely different.' He might have added that the circumstances under which each wrote were very different also; that it was one thing to have Sir Philip Sidney for your friend and patron, and another the princes of Este; that the poet who devised complimentary strains to Queen Elizabeth was better off than he who was expected to do the like honor to Lucrezia Borgia; and, above all, that the fellow-subject of Richard Hooker could drink in the faith at the fountain-head, while, to the Italian of Leo the Tenth's day, it came polluted by all the corruptions of fourteen centuries. It is the diversity produced by this last cause between Spenser and Ariosto which strikes me as so instructive, that it is worth while to devote a few pages to its illustration. And I do so the more readily for this reason. The 'Orlando Furioso' and the 'Fairy Queen' are both long poems. Very few people engaged in the serious business of life have, or perhaps ought to have, leisure to study them. Those of us, then, who read them in our youth, and have not quite forgotten them in our age, may do a friend here and there a service by pointing out to him passages in them which he will be all the better for reading. And if there is a fine poem in existence to which the famous maxim, 'The Half is more than the Whole,' applies, it is the 'Fairy Queen,'—even in its present state. For if you read about half the extant portion, it will leave a much grander impression on your mind, than if you went conscientiously through the whole. Only it must be a selected half. Some stanzas here, several cantos there, omitting least in the first book, most in the fifth, and of the fragment of the seventh nothing. While saying this, I think especially of you two dear ladies, sitting with whom, in spring, by a lake more beautiful than that beside which Philomena sang (you remember the picture in the International Exhibition?) I talked of our favourite poets. Far better read, of far more cultivated taste, than most of us, and appreciating Spenser admirably, I think you yet each confessed that you had never succeeded in reading his 'Fairy Queen' through. It is for you, and such as you, that I propose to extract from Spenser a few religious passages which it may be you never read, which you would, I know, rejoice to read again, and which, I think, fully prove my assertion. By way of contrast, I shall set beside them some of the few stanzas in which Ariosto treads on sacred ground, translated to the best of my ability.*

* I think Warton does not notice Spenser's exquisite translation of the 14th and 15th stanzas of the 10th canto of Tasso's 'Gerusalemme Liberata.' It is to be found in the Second Book of the 'Fairy Queen' (canto 12, stanzas 74, 75), and, if possible, exceeds the beauty of the original.

The extracts from Ariosto will show us how deep was the decay of true religion in Italy at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and how fatally such decay hinders the development of the highest order of poetry: as, on the other hand, my selections from Spenser, while reflecting the glorious revival of faith at the Reformation, will exhibit to us how, whithersoever the healing waters flow, there the noblest outgrowths of the mind are seen to flourish.

I am not, therefore, about to institute a comparison between Spenser and Ariosto so much as poets, but rather to cite them as witnesses to the religious condition of their respective countries; bearing yet in mind that a true and living faith must ever be the noblest element in a poem designed to reflect human life; and that therefore to prove its presence or absence in any given work, is not indeed to assign that poem's place as high or low in the first or second rank, but is yet most truly to determine in which of the two it should be classed.

For the information of readers whose acquaintance with the poets is less extensive than yours, I should premise that we have at least as good a right to expect religious sentiments in the 'Orlando Furioso' as in the 'Fairy Queen.' The plan of the latter proposes to exhibit twelve principal virtues; each embodied in the hero of a separate book, and triumphing in his person over the opposing vices. Spenser was enabled, by being a true poet, to clothe this somewhat uninviting skeleton with the fairest features, to enrobe it in the most gorgeous garments of abundant descriptive riches, and to wreath it with the loveliest flowers of poetry. But it was because he was not only a poet, but a Christian, that Spenser laid his foundation-stone in religion — made his first book a representation of holiness, and took care to refer all the succeeding virtues to the same source; whereas I fear that many a later English poet, engaged on a similar scheme, would have impersonated Truth, Justice, &c., in its divisions, with the slightest possible reference to the All-True, the All-Just; and with none whatever to the only way in which His fallen creatures can be restored to partake in His perfections.

Now, the 'Orlando Furioso' professes to depict how the Christendom of the eighth century fought for its very existence against the Saracen. Of this mighty struggle it makes Charlemagne the Christian champion; following the traditions which ascribed to him his grandsire's exploits as well as his own. There could be no more splendid subject for a Christian epic. Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered' has the disadvantage of recording an aggressive war undertaken by the subjects of the Prince of Peace. But the Moors, whom the earlier Charles 'hammered' on the bloody field of Poitiers, fell in a combat which they provoked themselves: and Charles Martel and his brave Christian followers fought to save the rest of Europe from sharing the fate of Spain. If, then, such a theme as this fails to inspire a really great poet; if his work is Christian in form, but Pagan in spirit; if his Christian heroes and heroines show small superiority in goodness over their rivals who follow the false Prophet; if, while the rude attempts of the old romancers expand in his hands into tales of enchanting beauty, he has let their devout spirit evaporate, and leave scarce a trace behind; if, in a word, he treats his great nominal subject with indifference, and puts his whole strength into romantic stories, delightful indeed, but having the slightest possible connection with his theme — we can only acquit the poet, if at all, at the expense of his times; and suppose that, while they supplied no examples of patriotism and religion by which he could conjecture how defenders of the faith should feel, they were such as to quench their flames within his own breast. I think any student of Guicciardini would consider this a correct description of Italy in Ariosto's days. Read in what state Luther found the clergy when he visited Rome; read the history of the Popes in whose days Ariosto flourished; and, though you will still regret, you will cease to marvel that there is so little soul in all the beautiful forms which meet you in his enchanted forests, so little earnest feeling about anything—just a touch here and there, hiding as if in fear of the mocking gaze of his contemporaries—in all the marvellous play of fancy, the prodigal variety of incident which delight us in the 'Orlando Furioso.' There is in Spenser—the first but one in order of time of the great names of English literature—that unworn freshness, that susceptibility to new impressions, that earnest sincerity, not yet frightened by the scorn of the careless into concealing its serious thoughts, which distinguish a great nation's youth. Ariosto, the latest but one of the great Italian poets, sings as one all whose illusions have been destroyed, and who knows that there is no need for him to feign that they exist, since the worn-out nation to which he sings has long out-lived its own. The following pretty description of Ariosto in Goethe's somewhat dull 'Torquato Tasso' strikes me as, in one respect, even more applicable to Spenser than to its object, for the 'Wisdom' which speaks from the 'golden clouds' of the 'Fairy Queen' is far more worthy of the name than that which occasionally resounds from those of the 'Orlando Furioso':—

"Even as Nature covers o'er the riches

Of her deep bosom with a gay green robe,
So wraps he all things which can give to man
Honour and love, in fable's flowery garment.
Contentment, Wisdom, and Experience, Taste, the mind's strength, pure sense of the true Good,

These in his songs seem to us spiritual beings;
And yet, in personal form, as if reposing
'Neath flowering trees, all covered by a snow
Of blossoms lightly-floated; crowned with roses,
And strangely sported round in their wild play
By little magic Cupids. Them beside
The spring of super-affluent Plenty flows,
Revealing fishes gay and marvellous.
Rare birds the air, strange herds fill grove and plain;

A roguish spirit lurks half-bid within
The bushes: Wisdom's sentences sublime
Sound ever and anon from golden cloud;
Madness meantime seems here and there to stir
The chords of a well-tuned lute, yet keeps
In fairest measure still its music wild."

Goethe's 'Torquato Tasso,' act i. scene 4.

Let us proceed to our comparison of the two as religious poets. One of the prettiest of Ariosto's tales is his story of Isabella and Zerbino. Isabella is the beautiful young daughter of the Moorish King of Galicia, with whom Zerbino, Prince of Scotland, falls in love at a tournament. Not daring to ask her father's consent to their marriage, Zerbino, himself detained at the wars, employs a friend to steal away for him the wilking Isabella from her home. The attempt succeeds; but the galley of the fugitives is wrecked on the coast of France, where Isabella falls into the hands of robbers, who immerse her in their gloomy cave, intending to sell her, when opportunity offers, as a slave. She is delivered from their hands by Roland (Orlando) himself, who slays her captors and sets her free. Some time after, he has the pleasure of restoring her to her faithful lover. Zerbino, having had tidings of her loss at sea, has long mourned her as dead, and is himself on the point of being put to death under a false accusation, when Roland appears and rescues him. He then crowns his benefits by uniting him to the lady of his heart. But the happiness of the wedded pair is doomed to be of short duration. The terrible madness which gives its title to the poem seizes soon after on their benefactor, upon his discovery of the fair Angelica's infidelity. Zerbino comes with Isabella to the spot where, at the sight of Angelica's name carved with Medor's on the trees, Roland had flung armour, clothing, and even his renowned sword Durindana, away. Seeing his good horse Brigiadore grazing masterless beside them, and learning the sad calamity which has befallen his patron, Zerbino collects the arms together, hanging them like a trophy on a tree, and writes beneath, "The armour of the Paladin Roland." At this very moment the fierce Saracen Mandricard, who has long claimed Durindana from Roland, comes up and snatches it from the tree. Zerbino draws his own sword to win back his benefactor's; but is unable to hinder the aggressor from bearing off the weapon in triumph, and receives such grievous wounds in the attempt that he shortly after expires by a fountain-side. The following stanzas contain his pathetic farewell to his young wife:—

77.

"She knows not what to do except lament
In vain, and Heaven and fortune call unkind, Unjust. 'Ah, wherefore,' said she, 'when I bent
My sails for sea, could I no drowning find?'

Zerbino, with his fading eyes intent
Upon her, heard her grief with sadder mind
Than all that sharp and mighty agony Had wrought, which now to death had brought him nigh.

78.

"So, dearest life," he said, "when I am gone, Mayst thou still love me, as my grief of heart
Is all because I leave thee here alone
Without a guide; not that with life I part.
For if my latest breathing hour had flown
In place secure, I had not felt this smart;
But, joyful in my lot, and satisfied,
A happy man in thy loved arms had died.

79.

"Yet since, unjust and hard, my destiny
Wills that I leave thee, knowing not to whom,
By these dear lips, these eyes, I swear to thee,
By this bright hair which bound my soul, to gloom
Of the unknown abyss I hopelessly Betake me, where, what else soe'er my doom,
The thought of thee thus left shall far outweigh
All other torments, be they what they may."

80.

"Then downward her tear-sprinkled face declining,
Her lips upon Zerbino's lips she pressed,
Now fading like a rose which, lonely pining,
No timely hand has gathered and caressed,
Which waxes dim where dark leaves shade entwining;
And said, while bitter anguish shook her breast,
'Oh, never think, my life, that thou canst take
That last sad parting step, and I forsake.

81.

"Nay, fear not that, dear heart; my steadfast mind
Is fixed to follow thee to heaven or hell.
Fit is it both our souls depart — both find
The unknown road — together endless dwell.
For soon as I thine eyelids, death-inclined,
Behold, shall either slay me anguish fell,
Or, found too weak, lo! here I promise thee
To-day this sword my breast from grief shall free."

83.

"Zerbino strengthened his weak voice to say:
'I pray thee, mine own goddess, and implore
By that prevailing love, so proved the day
When thou for me didst quit thy father's shore —
Yea, I command thee, if command I may,
Live while it pleases God, and never more Let any chance in thee oblivion move,
That I have loved thee well as man can love.'"

When, after more words of unavailing affection, the hapless prince expires in Isabella's arms, her passionate grief makes her forget his last request, and she is on the point of killing herself, when a hermit, on his way for water to the fount, opposes himself to her rash design.

88.

"That reverend man, by nature prudent made,
By grace with goodness gifted, and beside
All filled with charity, and well arrayed
With eloquence and good examples, tried
By efficacious reasonings to persuade True patience to that hopeless-mourning bride;
And like a glass set women in her view
From out each Testament, both Old and New.

89.

"And then he showed her how no true content
Was to be found except in God alone;
And how with swift departure came and went
All other hopes, light and deceptive known;
And by his words he won her that intent
So obstinate and cruel to disown,
And will instead her life's remaining days
To consecrate her God to serve and praise.

90.

"Not that her will was ever to forsake
Either that love so great she bare her lord,
Or yet his dead remains; but hers to make Them wheresoe'er she stayed, or went to ward,
And night and day, them with her still to take.
The hermit's aid (strong for his years) restored,
With hers, Zerbino to his sad steed, and they
On through those forests wandered many a day."
'Orlando Furioso,' canto xxiv.

Their destination is a monastery in Provence; on their way towards which retreat they encounter for their misfortune the proud Saracen, Rodomonte. He is charmed by Isabella's beauty, and seeks at once to dissuade her from her purpose. The good monk only excites his rage by arguing on the other side; and when he refuses to obey Rodomonte by deserting his charge, the Saracen flies at him fiercely, and we read, after other insults, that 6.

"Then like a vice he grasped his neck (so grew His fury), and when times some two or three
He round had whirled him, high in air he threw
From off himself, and flung him towards the sea.
What then became of him I never knew,
So cannot say; but fame speaks variously,
For some that he was dashed to pieces tell,
Left head from foot no more discernible:

"But others that, though three miles off and more,

He reached the sea, fell in, and there was drowned,

Because he knew not how to swim ; his store
Of prayers and orisons all useless found :
Others that him an aiding saint up bore
With visible hand until he touched the ground.
Whichever of these tales may be the true,
With him my history has no more to do."

Having thus got her only protector out of the way, Rodomonte vainly tries to persuade, and then threatens to force, Isabella to marry him. She (resolved to die a thousand deaths sooner than betray her fidelity to her dead husband's memory and to her recent vows) devises a plan which is to constrain the Saracen to take her life himself. She tells him that she knows how to prepare a decoction of a certain herb, which will make whatever is bathed in it invulnerable for one month ; and she offers to get it ready for him, if he will promise to abandon his suit. Rodomonte gives the promise, secretly intending to break it. Isabella collects the herbs, boils them, and then, smearing her own neck with their juice, bids the Saracen try his sword upon it. He incautiously obeys her, and severs her head from it by the stroke.

"It made three bounds, and thence a voice right clear

Issuing was heard Zerbino's name to say ;
To follow whom, escaping from the fear
Of that proud Moor, she found so rare a way.
Soul, that didst hold thy plighted faith more
dear,

And chastity (a name in this our day
So much unknown it half a stranger seems),
Than thy young life, than all thy youth's fresh dreams ;

26.

"Depart in peace, so beautiful and blest !
Might but my verse prove such in force as I
Would strive to make it, to that art address
Which so can deck our speech and beautify.
As that through myriad years the world possess
With thy renown should hear thy glory high !
Depart in peace to sit enthroned above ;
Nor rest uncopied here thy faithful love.

27.

"On that incomparable, wondrous deed,
From heaven the world's Creator gazing down,
Said : 'I commend thee more than her who freed
From Tarquin by her death the Roman town ;
And therefore will I make a law, decreed 'Mid those my laws which change from Time
disown,
Which by the waves inviolate I swear
No force of future ages shall impair.

28.

" 'I will that each who in the after time
May bear thy name be fair, of noble strain,
Be wise and courteous, and of thought sublime,
And brightest crown of truest virtue gain ;
That writers may find cause in every clime
That worthy name's high glories to sustain ;
That Pindus, Helicon, Parnassus round,
Isabel, Isabel may still resound.'

29.

"God spake, and made the air around serene,
And o'er the sea unwonted stillness shed.
To the third heaven, departing back unseen,
That spirit chaste to her Zerbino sped."
'Orlando Furioso,' canto xxix.

There is no other passage in Ariosto so touching as the farewells of the unhappy pair in the six first stanzas I have quoted. But they are, after all, but what a pagan poet might have written. Zerbino's anguish on parting from his bride is relieved by no consoling hope of a happy meeting with her hereafter. The under-current of meaning in his speech to her, is Vale in æternum, vale. And her reply to him exhibits a love, stronger indeed than death ; but neither raised nor purified by approaching contact with the invisible world.

The hermit's consolations to Isabella have about them a certain air of professional commonplace, which scarcely prepares one for their efficacy ; and when we find Ariosto narrate that reverend monitor's sad fate in so ludicrous a manner, we may judge of his respect for the clergy as a body, by his treating the death of one of them — undergone, too, in the path of duty — with no greater seriousness. His young heroine's death calls forth a burst of genuine admiration from her poet ; and there is a touch of honest indignation in Ariosto's contrast of her faithfulness to her vows with the vices of his own day, in the 25th stanza. But surely there is great, if unintentional, profaneness in the 27th and 28th. They make the Most High, by acknowledging that the end justifies the means, applaud the breach of His own laws ; for Isabella compasses self-destruction by untruth. She is thus, if a saint at all, one of the Romish, as opposed to the Christian pattern : but indeed it is the standard of pagan Rome by which Ariosto tries her — the standard of conformity to an external rule, not of inward holiness ; and he evidently feels that he cannot praise her more highly than by allowing her to have excelled a Roman matron. Thus also she dies a martyr much more for Zerbino than for Christ. One of the most eloquent of French divines (Mas-ailon, if I remember right) describes the model wife as "ne partageant son cœur qu'entre Jesus Christ et son époux." I think some texts I could quote forbid us to accept this definition; but, at any rate, Massillon meant the division to be in very different proportions to Ariosto's. Zerbino is Isabella's earthly deity; and her poet knows of no other heaven for her than his society above. Lastly, the compliment to the Isabellas of Ariosto's day, with which the divine speech concludes—besides the irrelevance of its occurrence there at all—throws an air of unreality over what has gone before, and seems (when one considers what were too probably the persons so complimented) a ludicrous reward for Isabella's self-devotion. Would it be too severe to say that the crown befits the martyr?

I shall not contrast any story from Spenser with this tale, though the patient endurance of his Amoret under equally trying circumstances might be compared with it in many points. But the discussion on suicide in the first book of the 'Fairly Queen' will supply us with a strong proof of the differences we are in search of. In its ninth canto, its hero, the Red-Cross knight, encounters Despair;—not, as Bunyan's pilgrims found him, a giant to enthrall by force; but a subtle arguer, hard to refute by reasoning, and whose words have a persuasive power,—to some minds irresistible. The knight falls in with him just where such a spectre might be looked for in his path. Not when innocent and devout he sets off under the guidance of Una (Truth) to slay the Dragon; nor yet when, having been misled by Duessa (Falsehood), he sojourns in the House of Pride; but when he is retracing his steps to the right path, and preparing once more to resume his holy enterprise. Spenser's fine description of Despair's ghastly looks, and the gloomy cave in which he dwelt, will be found in the 33d and three following stanzas. It is said to have been the first passage in the 'Fairly Queen' which excited Sir Philip Sidney's admiration. Despair is standing over a new-made victim, when the Red-Cross Knight comes up and charges him with his crime. Despair defends the deed, and then proceeds:

XXXIX.

"Who travels by the weary wandering way,
To come unto his wish'd home in haste,
And meets a flood, that doth his passage stay,
Is not great grace to help him over-past,

Or free his feet that in the mire stick fast?
Most envious man, that griev'st at neighbour's good,
And fond, that joyest in the woe thou hast,
Why wilt not let him pass, that long hath stood Upon the bank, yet wilt thyself not pass the flood?

XLI.

"He there does now enjoy eternal rest
And happy ease, which thou dost want and crave,
And farther from it daily wanderest:
What if some little pain the passage have,
That makes frail flesh to fear the bitter wave?
Is not short pain well born that brings long ease,
And lays the soul to sleep in quiet grave?
Sleep after toil, port after stormy seas,
Ease after war, death after life, does greatly please."

XLI.

"The knight much wondered at his sudden wit,
And said, 'The term of life is limited,
Nè may a man prolong nor shorten it;
The soldier may not move from watchful
sted,
Nor leave his stand until his captain bed.'
'Who life did limit by Almighty doom,' Quoth he, 'knows best the terms established;
And he that points the centinel his room,
Doth license him depart at sound of morning droom."

XLII.

"Is not His deed what ever thing is done
In heaven and earth? Did not He all create
To die again? All ends that was begun;
Their times in His eternal book of fate
Are written sure, and have their certain date.
Who then can strive with strong necessity,
That holds the world in His still changing state,
Or shun the death ordained by destiny?
When hour of death is come, let none ask whence nor why."

XLIII.

"The longer life I note the greater sin;
The greater sin, the greater punishment;
All those great battles which thou boasts to win,
Through strife, and bloodshed, and avengement,
Now praised, hereafter dear thou shalt repent;
For life must life, and blood must blood repay.
Is not enough thy evil life forespent?"

For he that once hath missed the right way,
The farther he doth go, the farther he doth stray.

XLIV.

"Then do no farther go, no farther stray,
But here lie down, and to thy rest betake,
Th' ill to prevent that life ensuen may;
For what hath life that may it loved make,
And gives nor rather cause it to forsake?
Fear, sickness, age, loss, labour, sorrow, strife,
Pain, hunger, cold, that makes the heart to quake,
And ever-fickle fortune rageth rife;
All which, and thousands more, do make a loathsome life."

In the two next stanzas Despair employs a stronger argument, by reminding the knight of his recent fall, concluding with —

XLVII.

"Is not He just, that all this doth behold
From highest heaven, and bears an equal eye?
Shall He thy sins up in His knowledge fold,
And guilty be of thine impiety?
Is not His law, Let every sinner die?
Die shall all flesh? What then must needs be done,
Is it not better to do willingly,
Than linger till the glass be all outrun?
Death is the end of woes: die soon, O fairy's son."

The knight's resolution is shaken by these words. Despair presses his advantage, and puts a dagger into his hand. But Una snatches it away, and restores him to better thoughts, as she exclaims —

LIII.

"Come, come away, frail, silly fleshly wight,
Ne let vain words bewitch thy manly heart,
Ne devilish thoughts dismay thy constant spright:
In heavenly mercies hast thou not a part?
Why shouldst thou then despair, that chosen art?
Where justice grows, there grows eke greater grace,
The which doth quench the brand of hellish
smart,
And that accursed handwriting doth deface:
Arise, sir knight, arise, and leave this cursed place."

'Fairy Queen,' book i. canto 9.

There is something in the mournful cadences which enumerate the ills of life in stanzas 40 and 44, which reminds us that Spenser was a contemporary of the writer of the most famous of soliloquies. But the question which could only be proposed, not solved, by the irresolute Prince of Denmark, receives an answer here. The grand old Pythagorean argument against suicide, put by Plato into the mouth of the dying Socrates, was never better stated than in four lines of the 41st stanza. It is one which no Theist can possibly evade; and yet Ariosto's heroine, as we have just seen, takes no account of it. There is great ar-too, in Despair's rejoinder, wherein he tries to lull all sense of individual responsibility to sleep by turning Providence into Fate.

In the 47th and following stanzas we find the temptation to despair of pardon urged with a keen feeling, that worse far than all the ills of this life is the sense of sin unforgiven. They supply a fine and unexpected illustration of the apostolic saying, that "the strength of sin is the law," by using its terrors to drive the conscience-stricken sufferer to the commission of a yet greater crime. And where shall we look for better consolation under these terrors than that supplied by the 58d stanza, where the same promise which unlocks the prison-door of Bunyan's pilgrims, proves mighty in Una's hand for her knight's deliverance? There are but few poets of any age or nation in whom we find statements of, or references to, distinctively Christian truth, such as we find in Spenser and Shakespeare. By them it is looked on as a thing which they have never doubted themselves, which they can conceive no sane man doubting — no more to be argued about than the sun which lights us, or the air we breathe. By too many so called Christian poets it is either passed by in silence, or referred to as that which forms the creed of other men, to be contemplated with interest, perhaps with respect, by the thoughtful mind, but not embraced by it as its own; whilst others go farther, and substitute for it, as Ariosto does, a revived Paganism under Christian names.

Let us select for our next comparison the terrestrial paradise of the 'Orlando Furioso'; setting beside it Spenser's 'Vision of the Heavenly Jerusalem.' The paladin As-tolpho, having learned the art of guiding that Hippogryph, which bears such a conspicuous part in the strange adventures of Ariosto's poem, traverses many foreign lands on his winged steed. At last he reaches the mouth of the infernal regions; but, turning from its dismal darkness — as we must applaud Ariosto for making him do, when we think of the comparison his further progress in those regions would have provoked — he reaches the earthly paradise, preserved in undiminished beauty, far out of the range of mortal footsteps.

49.

"Sapphire and ruby, topaz, pearl, and gold,
The diamond, jacinth, and the chrysolite,
Alone could match the flowers which there unfold

Beneath the zephyr's breath to charm the sight.

There is the grass so green that earthly mould
So clothed would show than emeralds more bright ;

Nor is the foliage of the trees less fair, While ever-teeming fruit and flowers they bear.

50.

"Amid the branches tiny birds, all blue,
White, red, and green, and yellow, ceaseless sing.

There clearer are than crystal to the view
Calm lakes and brooklets gently murmuring.
There a sweet breeze which always seems to woo,

After one fashion, with unwearied wing
So constant fans the air, that noisome heat
Can find no entrance to that safe retreat.

51.

"And ever from the herbes, the fruits, and flowers,

It softly stole the diverse scents away,
And of the mingling of their odorous powers
Made sweetness, steeped wherein the spirit lay.

A palace rose amidst the plain, whose towers Seemed all ablaze with flames in lambent play ;

Such light and splendour wrapt it all around
In glow more radiant than on earth is found.

54.

"In that glad mansion's shining entrance-hall
An aged man to Astolph's sight appeared,
Whose mantle's red and gown's pure white, with all

Vermil and milk to match them, had not feared.

His hairs were white ; and round his mouth to fall

Down to his breast, thick parting, white his beard

And such he seemed in venerable guise
As one of saints elect in paradise.

55.

"With cheerful aspect to the Paladin,
Who reverent had dismounted him, he said :

'Oh, baron, hither by decree divine
To the terrestrial paradise up-spied ;
Though not by thee thy journey's true design,
Nor thy desire's true end, as yet is read ;
Believe yet from the northern hemisphere
Not without mystery high thy journey here.'

57.

Nor yet the old man ceased until (high source Of wonder to the Duke!) in accents plain
His name to him discovering, Astolph wist
There stood before him the Evangelist ;

58.

"That John so dear to the Redeemer's heart,
Of whom amidst the brethren went abroad
The saying, He in death should have no part ;
The which was cause why spake the Son of God

To Peter, saying : Wherefore troubled start,
If I have willed that here he make abode
Until my coming ? Though ' he shall not die '
He said not, that he meant to signify.

59.

Here was he taken up ; fit comrades here
He found ; here Enoch first from earth ascended ;

With him abides Elijah the great seer,
Both whose long day no closing eve has ended :

Here shall they joy in endless springtide clear,
Never by noxious air from earth offended,
Till trump angelic shall give signal loud
Of Christ's return, enthroned on dazzling cloud.

The next morning early, St. John summons Astolpho to a conference, and reveals to him the misfortune which has befallen Roland : —

63.

"Your Roland, to whom God at birth hour gave,

With highest courage, highest puissance,
Granting, beyond all mortal use, that glaive Should never wound him, no, nor dart, nor lance ;

Because Him pleased to set him thus to save
His holy faith from every foul mischance,
As He for Hebrews' help did Samson mould
Against the Philistines in days of old :

64.

"Rendered has this your Roland to his Lord
For such high gifts an evil recompense ;
For when the faithful needed most his sword,
Then was it drawn the least in their defence.
So had of pagan dame the love abhorred
Blinded his eyes and dulled his every sense,
That impious, cruel, he times two and more
His Christian cousin sought to slay before.

65.

"And God for this has madness sent on him,
Such that his garments he away has cast :
And bid such darkness all his mind bedim,
That all men else have from his knowledge past

And most himself. When pride o'erflowed
the brim
In Nabuchodonosor, him at last
We read, so God for seven years punished,
While like an ox on grass and hay he fed.

66.

"But since than that proud Babylonian's sin Much less hath Roland's been, three months are set

All this transgression of the Paladin
By will divine to purge away; nor yet
For other purpose entrance here to win,
Had the Redeemer suffered without let Thy journey, were it not from us to learn How unto Roland may his wits return."

'Orlando Furioso,' canto xxxiv.

To effect this (the Apostle goes on to say) they must ascend to the moon, where the great Paladin's wits will be found amongst other lost earthly things. He places As-tolpho beside him in the fiery chariot of Elijah, and its mighty steeds quickly bear them to the lunar regions. There he displays to him the strange storehouse of things good and bad which have disappeared from our world. And having seen the Fates spinning the threads of mortal lives, and repossessed himself of a large portion of his own sense, which had escaped him unawares, Astolpho returns to earth with the phial which holds Roland's wholly lost wits, and which is to restore its great defender to the Faith.

There is inimitable wit, which no one can fail to be struck with (imbittered a little by the poet's own disappointments), in his famous catalogue of the earth's lost treasures.*
And there is a liquid sweetness which delights us in his description of the happy region from whence the knight ascends to the moon. But this must not blind us to the fact that Ariosto's terrestrial paradise is, after all, a mere garden of material delights
— more innocent, but not more heavenly, than Alcina's. Contrast it with the spiritual beauty of Dante's, where we encounter some high mystery at each step we take, and where the air we breathe is so full of foretastes of heaven that it seems but natural when the poet's flight to the true heaven above begins from such holy ground. Or, again, compare the later Italian poet's conception of St John with that of the earlier
— the beloved Apostle allowed as a privilege to remain "at home in the body, but absent from his Lord," until the last day!
employed by Ariosto as the exhibitor of the lunar marvels to Astolpho; and made

(as he is in the description of their visit to the Fates) the flatterer of Ariosto's patron!
Set beside this Dante's simple and affectionate mention of St John: —

"Questi è colui, che giacque sopra'l petto
Del nostro Pellicano, e questi fue Di su la croce al grande uficio eletto."
'Paradiso,' canto 25.

(This is the man, who lay upon that breast Whose life-blood feeds us; this who from the cross

Was chosen to fulfil the great behest.)

Remember the almost indignant repudiation by the St. John of Dante of the inviolous privilege, seen for him by the earthly-minded in his Saviour's words. You will then see something of the change wrought by two centuries in the religious state of Italy.
The elder poet wings his strong flight aloft, and soars (grace-aided) without external help, till he reaches the heaven of heavens:
the younger bard borrows Elijah's "chariot of fire and horses of fire" for his hero, and, even with their help, only succeeds in lifting him to the moon!

Let us now turn to Spenser's vision of the New Jerusalem. After the Red-Cross knight's deliverance by Prince Arthur from the House of Pride, where he abode, amongst it and the six other deadly sins, at first a guest, at last a captive; and after his escape from Despair, he is guided by Una to the House of Holiness. The canto which rehearses their visit, opens with the following stanza, as precise in its definition of grace and free-will as the tenth article of the Church of England: —

I.

"What man is he that boasts of fleshly might,
And vain assurance of mortality,
Which all, so soon as it doth come to fight Against spiritual foes, yields by-and-by,
Or from the field most cowardly doth fly?
Ne let the man ascribe it to his skill —
That thorough grace hath gained victory.
If any strength we have, it is to ill;
But all the good is God's, both power and eke will."

Una and the knight are admitted through the "strait and narrow" entrance to Holiness by its porter Humility. Led in by Zeal and Reverence, they are welcomed by the mistress of the mansion and her three daughters, Fidelia, Speranza, and Charissa.
The first of these is thus described: —

XLII.

"She was arrayed all in lily-white,
And in her right hand bore a cup of gold,

* I much regret that want of space forbids me to insert it.

With wine and water filled up to the height,
In which a serpent did himself enfold,
That horror made to all that did behold;
But she no whit did change her constant mood :

And in her other hand she fast did hold
A book that was both signed and sealed with blood,

Wherein dark things were writ, hard to be understood."

Introduced by her and by her sister to Repentance (mark the admirable exactness of Spenser's theological teaching), and having passed some time in his painful but salutary company, Charity leads the knight (now perfectly healed) to make Mercy's acquaintance.

"To whom the careful charge of him she gave,
To lead aright that he should never fall
In all his ways through this wide world's wave,
That Mercy in the end his righteous soul might save."

Mercy leads him to a "holy hospital," where she introduces him to her seven "Beadmen." Each of these seven has charge of one of those good works which, found in, or inferred from that marvellous conclusion of the 25th chapter of St. Matthew, which in every age since it was spoken has never ceased to procure alms for the needy, have been known for many centuries as the seven works of mercy. There is a solemn pathos in Spenser's description of these two, which he ranks as the fifth and sixth, the last good offices to the dying and the dead :—

XLI.

"The fifth had charge six persons to attend,
And comfort those in point of death which lay;
For them most needeth comfort in the end,
When sin, and hell, and death do most dismay
The feeble soul departing hence away.
All is but lost that living we bestow,
If not well ended at our dying day.
O man! have mind of that last bitter throw;
For as the tree does fall, so lies it ever low.

XLII.

"The sixth had charge of them now being dead,
In seemly sort their corse to engrave,
And deck with dainty flowers their spousal bed,
That to their heavenly spouse both sweet and brave
They might appear, when he their souls shall save.

The wondrous workmanship of God's own mould,
Whose face he made all beasts to fear, and gave
All in his hand, even dead we honour should.
Ah, dearest God, me grant I dead be not defouled!"

The knight shares the "Beadmen's" holy toils, till, prepared for the contemplative by the active life, he is led by Mercy up the steep hill on whose summit Contemplation dwells. That "godly aged sire" demands of Mercy to what end they come.

I.

"'What end,' quoth she, should cause us take such pain,
But that same end which every living wight Should make his mark, high heaven to attain?
Is not from hence the way that leadeth right To that most glorious house, that glisteneth bright
With burning stars and ever-living fire, Whereof the keys are to thy hand beight
By wise Fidelia? She doth thee require To show it to this knight, according his desire.'

LI.

"'Thrice happy man,' said then the father grave,
'Whose staggering steps thy steady hand doth lead,
And shows the way his sinful soul to save: Who better can the way to heaven aread Than thou thyself, that wast both born and bred
In heavenly throne, where thousand angels shine?
Thou dost the prayers of the righteous seed Present before the Majesty Divine,
And His avenging wrath to clemency incline.

LII.

"'Yet sith thou bidst, thy pleasure shall be done.
Then come, thou man of earth, and see the way
That never yet was seen of Fairy's son,
That never leads the traveller astray;
But, after labours long and sad delay, Brings them to joyous rest and endless bliss.
But first thou must a season fast and pray,
Till from her bands the spright assoiled is,
And have her strength recured from frail infirmities.'

LIII.

"That done, he leads them to the highest mount;
Such one as that same mighty man of God, That blood-red billows, like a walled front

On either side departed with his rod,
Till that his army dry-foot through them
yod,
Dwelt forty days upon, where, writ in stone
With bloody letters, by the hand of God,
The bitter doom of death and baleful moan
He did receive, whiles flashing fire about him shone.

LIV.

"Or like that sacred hill, whose head full high,
Adorned with fruitful olives all around,
Is, as it were, for endless memory
Of that dear Lord, who oft thereon was found,
For ever with a flowering garland crowned;
Or like that famous mount, that is for aye
Through famous poets' verse each where renowned,
On which the thrice three learned ladies play
Their heavenly notes, and make full many a lovely lay.

LV.

"From thence far off he unto him did shew
A little path, that was both steep and long,
Which to a goodly city led his view,
Whose walls and towers were builded high and strong
Of pearl and precious stone, that earthly tongue
Cannot describe, nor wit of man can tell;
Too high a ditty for my simple song,
The city of the great King might it well,
Wherein eternal peace and happiness doth dwell.

LVI.

"As he thereon stood gazing, he might see
The blessed angels to and fro descend
From highest heaven, in gladsome company,
And with great joy unto that city wend,
As commonly as friend doth with his friend;
Whereat he wondered much, and gan inquire,
What stately building durst so high extend
Her lofty towers unto the starry sphere,
And what unknown nation there ompeopled were.

LVII.

"'Fair knight,' quoth he, 'Hierusalem that is,
The new Hierusalem that God has built,
For those to dwell in that are chosen His,
His chosen people, purged from sinful guilt,
With piteous blood which cruelly was spilt
On cursed tree, of that unspotted Lamb,
That for the sins of the world was kilt;
Now are they saints in all that city sam,
More dear unto their God than younglings to their dam.'"

The Red-Cross knight owns that all the terrestrial grandeurs which before charmed his mind, wax dim before this heavenly vision. The old man assures him that he himself shall win a glorious place and name among the inhabitants of that fair city.

The knight answers thus:—

LXII.

"'Unworthy wretch,' quoth he, 'of so great
grace,
How dare I think such glory to attain?'
'These that have it attained were in like case,'
Quoth he, 'as wretched, and lived in like pain.'
'But deeds of arms must I at last be fain,
And ladies' loves to leave, so dearly bought?'
'What need of arms where peace doth aye remain,'
Said he, 'and battles none are to be fought?
As for loose loves are vain, and vanish into nought.'

LXIII.

"'O! let me not,' quoth he, 'return again:
Back to the world whose joys so fruitless are;
But let me here for aye in peace remain,
Or straightway on that last long voyage fare,
That nothing may my present hope impair.'
'That may not be,' said he, 'nor mayst thou yet
Forego that royal maid's bequeathed care,
Who did her cause into thy hand commit,
Till from her cursed foe thou have her freely quit.'"

'Fair Queen,' book i. canto 10.

Of the poetry of this fine passage I feel I can safely leave my readers to judge. How sublimely the 53d stanza seems to echo back the thunders of Sinai! And how exquisite the contrast between its terrors and the calm beauty of the Gospel, in the affectionate reference to the Mount of Olives in the succeeding one! How perfect are the touches of the three short stanzas which set before us the heavenly city, rather suggested than described, seen towering in serene glory high above all the turmoil of earth!—And, turning to our more immediate subject; the scriptural language of the whole, and the evident appropriation of the religious truths it conveys by the mind which wrote it, speak well for the faith alike of writer and of readers. The knight's preparation for the vision, the means whereby he attains to it, and, above all, its effect upon his own mind, bespeak a familiarity with truth, not speculative, but practical, on the part of Spenser, which many a professed theologian might envy. There is in the mixture of faith and unbelief in the knight's replies, in the 62d stanza, to the encouraging promise of an abundant entrance into the heavenly Jerusalem, a transcript of the experience of many—may we not say of all? Who has not, like him, one moment doubted whether its glories can indeed be within his own reach, and perhaps shrunk back the next, half-unwilling, from the sacrifices which he begins to see that their attainment must cost him? Again, how natural to the human heart (so we learn even from the conduct of the apostles on the Holy Mount) is the desire of the knight's now wholly-convinced mind, expressed in the last stanza, to go out of the world in ceasing to be of the world! To abandon Action altogether for Contemplation, and abide away on the mount of vision, gazing on the goodly prospect, instead of plunging into the waves of this troublesome world, to fight our way across to its possession! Well for us if we have found a monitor like the Red-Cross knight's, to recall to us the claims of that work, the doing which is the preparation appointed to us for our inheritance. Happy if we descend, as he does, with renewed vigour to the conflict which awaits us all! For so his victory over the terrible dragon on the third day of battle may be a type of ours.

There are no such lessons to be learned from converse with Ariosto's glorified saints; there is nothing to satisfy the deepest desires of man in the paradise in which they dwell, or the truths they are commissioned to reveal. Who can hesitate to ascribe this essential difference between poets so alike in many things, to that open English Bible which was a century later to inspire a humble tinker's prose descriptions with a sublimity almost equal to that of this fine passage in Spenser?

Let us proceed to institute a final, and, in some respects, a closer comparison between the two poets, by setting the principal allegory of the one over against that which the other has wrought out most fully.

In the fourteenth canto of the 'Orlando Furioso,' Paris is besieged by a Saracen army, and in great danger of being taken. Charlemagne has recourse to the aid of Heaven. He makes devout supplication himself, and causes many masses to be offered "by priests and friars, both black and white and gray." The Almighty hears his prayer, and despatches the archangel Michael to his aid. That heavenly messenger is to seek out first Silence and then Discord; to convey with the former's aid reinforcements to Paris, unobserved by the Moorish army; and to send the latter amongst the besieging host to embroil their leaders, and create a diversion in favour of the Christians. The archangel departs at once upon his errand.

"Where'er the archangel Michael turns his wing,
Off flee the clouds and leave the sky serene;
And brightness girds him with a golden ring,
Like lightning-flashes in night's darkness seen.
The heavenly courier onward journeying,
Whither alighting he may surest ween
That foe of speech (his foremost aim) to find,
Still as he flies revolves with eager mind.

79.

"He ponders o'er where he may haunt, where dwell;
And all his doubtful thoughts agree at last
That he is to be found in church and cell
Of monks and cloistered friars, who, to cast
Speech out of doors, where'er at sound of bell
They meet for singing psalms, or break their fast,
Or sleep,—in every room in very deed
Have 'Silence' written up most plain to read.

80.

"Weening to find him there, he swifter plied
His golden wings; there too he surely thought
Fair Peace to see with Quiet at her side,
And Charity abiding still: chance taught
Him to a cloistered pile his course to guide
The which for Silence, friendship never sought;
There, asking for him, he this answer heard:
'All that of him now dwells here is the word.'

81.

"Nor Piety nor Quiet meets his gaze,
Nor Love nor Peace there, nor Humility;
Truly they dwelt there once in bygone days,
Then chased them out Wrath, Avarice,
Gluttony,
Pride, Cruelty, Sloth, Envy: in amaze
The Angel stands so great a change to see;
And while that hideous squadron in review
He passed, he 'mongst them Discord also knew.

82.

"Her whom the Eternal Father bade him find Next after Silence; seeking whom the road
By dark Avernus he had tracked in mind,
Deeming that she amid the damned abode;
In this new hell instead he found her shrined
'Mid mass and holy office ill-bestowed:

Believe who can? to Michael it seems strange
To find whom seeking he thought far to range.

83.

"He knew her by her hundred-coloured dress,
Fashioned of stripes unequal, infinite;
Her covering now, anon by step or stress
Of wind laid open, unsewn, gaping quite;
Her hairs, some gold, some silver, black this tress,
That gray, seemed all among themselves to fight;
Some plaited, some by ribbon bound, good store
Streamed on her shoulders, some her breast fell o'er.

84.

"She had her bosom full and eke her hands
With procurations and with premonitions,
Inquiries, and great packets tied with bands
Of glosses, consults, legal expositions;
Through which the worldly wealth of poor men stands
Safe in no town from ceaseless subdivisions;
Behind, before, each side of her, like flies,
Swarmed Proctors, Advocates, and Notaries."

Michael calls Discord and sends her to stir up strife among the Saracens; but first he asks her if she knows where he can find the other object of his search, Silence.
Discord answers that she never saw him, but that her comrade Fraud has been in his company, and may know where he lives.
Fraud is thus described:—

87.

"Pleasing her face, and decent her attire, Humble her glance, and her deportment
grave,
So lowly, kind her speech, ye might admire
That Angel who the salutation gave;
All else deformed and hideous; but the liar
Her uglier parts concealed beneath the wave Of garment long and wide, and 'neath its fold
A poisoned knife was ever in her hold.

88.

"Of her the Angel questioneth what way
Silence to find behoveth him to take;
Said Fraud: 'Elsewhere and here in earlier day
Amid the virtues was he used to make
His home with Benedict in abbey's gray,
And new, nor yet Elijah's rule forsake:
And in the schools full many an hour to pass
In days of Archyte and Pythagoras.

89.

"But in right path his footsteps to retain Arc here nor sages nor yet saints: and he
To various wickedness has gone amain
From ways he used to walk of honesty.
First went he out by night with lovers vain,
And next with thieves to work each villany;
In Treason's haunts he often doth abide—Nay, I have marked him o'en by Murder's side!

90.

"With coiners of false money in some nook Obscure, his custom is to make repair;
His home, his company, so oft forsook
For new—to find him lucky chance it were.
Yet have I hope to teach thee how to look
For him; at midnight if thou take due care
To reach the house of Sleep, discovered
He needs must be, since there he makes his bed."

'Orlando Furioso,' canto xiv.

The Angel finds Silence, and by his aid guides the reinforcements safe to Paris.
Discord does her appointed work for a season; but is caught by her taskmaster in the 37th canto, neglecting it for a yet more congenial task:—

37.

"Unto that monastery, where he first
Got sight of Discord, on swift pinion hieing,
He found her seated in its chapter cursed,
Her arts amid its new elections plying,
Rejoicing as she saw good things used worst,
The brethren's missals at their heads sent flying:
The Angel caught her by the hair, and blows
And kicks he dealt to her without repose.

38.

"And then the handle of a cross he brake
Upon her back and arms, and eke her head, 'Mercy!' cried loud the wretch; and, as she spake,
Embraced the heavenly Nuncio's knees with dread.
Her Michael left not till he saw her take Flight to the King of Afric's camp: thus sped,
He warned her: 'Look for direr fate designed thee,
If e'er again without that camp I find thee.'
'Orlando Furioso,' canto xxvii.

Now we must call this an admirable allegory, thoroughly well sustained. Unquestionably, Spenser found it a most instructive model. What can be cleverer than its personification of Discord and Fraud?
Where shall we find an instance of more pungent satire than that implied on the degenerate monks of Ariosto's day, by his significant exclusion of Silence from their monasteries; and by Discord's permanent abode in that convent which she is so loath to leave and so eager to return to? — But, returning to the subject of our present inquiry, what shall we say to the religious aspect of this allegory? Is there any reverence of tone in the whole passage proving that Ariosto wrote it with serious belief in divine and angelic interpositions? To my mind, their introduction reads like a mere attempt to vary what is technically called the machinery of the poem,—replacing for a while the agency of good and evil fairies, of enchanters and their works, by aid of a higher nature; but not a whit more effectual, and treated of in a spirit of no more reverent credence, than theirs. I am far from thinking a poem profane because it satirises monks. The worst of all ways of promoting the interests of true religion, is to insist on defending the faults of the so-called religious. But when I find that Ariosto depicts the Deity as seemingly aroused by the importunity of mortals to give a command, of the fulfilment or non-fulfilment of which he takes no further heed — when I find that he represents “Michael the archangel,” the especial guardian of the Church, as wholly ignorant of what goes on in her sacred buildings — I cannot help seeing that he is only setting before us the old gods of Olympus, and Hermes their messenger, under new names. Most of all, when in the two last stanzas St. Michael boxes Discord's ears, and conducts himself after a fashion so altogether undignified and unangelic, we may surely be excused for taking a second look to see whether we have not been reading by mistake the exploits of an evil angel? Alas, we exclaim, for the change wrought by two centuries since Dante! Where be those glorious angels who move in their unearthly grandeur so majestically through the Divina Commedia? He before whom, advancing over Styx, the evil spirits fled; at whose touch the gates of Dis flew open? Or he, that “Bird of God,” with whose white wings for sails the mystic bark, with its freight of souls, flew across Ocean to the far Purgatorial shore? So rapid was the decay of thought in all its noblest elements in Italy. Spenser's theory of guardian angels,* as expressed in the best-known passage in his poem — a theory not borrowed from Ariosto, not even from Dante, but from a yet higher source, the Holy Scriptures — is a very different one.

* See ‘Fairy Queen,’ book II. canto 8, stanzas 1, 2.

But we must hasten on to the consideration of that allegory which, concluding all that is left to us of the “Fairy Queen,” forms the crowning glory of that great poem. The two cantos which contain it are a fragment of a lost book on Constancy. Their aim is to teach us the subjection of all earthly things to change, and the predestined end to which “all the changes and chances of this mortal life” are tending. Spenser has chosen to clothe this idea in forms borrowed from Greek mythology; his use of which, though lacking the exact scholarship and classical correctness of Milton, has yet, especially in these cantos, a grandeur peculiarly its own. The chief personage in his allegory is Mutability or Change, one of those mighty Titans who strive to wrest Jove's empire from him. Her first attempt to gain dominion is made on earth, and proves successful; so that earthly things, at the first good, perfect, and immortal, become under her sway subject to evil and to death. The poet records this, exclaiming —

“O piteous work of Mutability!
By which we all are subject to that curse,
And death instead of life have sucked from our nurse.”

“Fairy Queen,” book vii. canto 6, stanza 6.

Growing bolder by success, Change next aims at sovereignty over heavenly things. Of these she first attempts the moon, where she boldly mounts, and bids Cynthia relinquish to her the guidance of her chariot. Her demand is indignantly refused; and the conflict which ensues between the two goddesses produces an eclipse, which, darkening the face of nature, disquiets the hearts not only of men but gods. Mercury is sent down by Jupiter to learn the cause of the disturbance; but the Titaness shows him no respect, and declares her purpose to seize the throne of Jove himself, and rule thenceforth over gods as well as men. In prosecution of this claim she ascends forthwith to the highest heavens, and prefers it boldly before Jove himself. The god hears her, and grasps his thunderbolt, but forbears to hurl it after a glance at her lovely face. “Such sway doth beauty even in heaven bear.” He hears mildly her appeal from his adverse decision to what she styles the higher tribunal of the great and awful goddess Nature; and he does not disallow it. Thereupon the scene changes to earth, where the gods are assembled to hear the arbitrator's decision, upon fair Arlo Hill (near Spenser's Irish home), of whose beauty he here makes affectionate mention.

Mutability boldly pleads her cause before

"This great-grandmother of all creatures bred,
Great Nature, ever young, yet full of eld;
Still moving, yet unmoved from her sted;
Unseen of any, yet of all beheld."

Her first object is to prove that the four elements, earth, water, air, and fire, are all her subjects; this she does by showing that they are each in a state of perpetual change; and therefore, she argues, the claims of Neptune, Juno, &c., to rule over them are evidently false. She next desires Nature to call the Seasons and Months as witnesses to the wide extent of her sway. They appear according to her wish. First Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter, each with suitable garb and emblems. Then the Months, each with the sign of the zodiac that belongs to it; March leads the procession and February closes it, according to the old reckoning. When this world-famous band of witnesses has gone by (none of Spenser's descriptions is, or deserves to be, better known) —

"There came the Day and Night,
Riding together both with equal pace,
Th' one on a palfrey black, the other white."

Next come "the Hours, fair daughters of high Jove;" and after them the two most important witnesses of all present themselves, Life and Death: —

XLVI.

"And after all came Life, and lastly Death:
Death with most grim and griesly visage seen,
Yet is he naught but parting of the breath;
Ne ought to see, but like a shade to ween,
Unbodied, unsouled, unheard, unseen."

When this last and most awful witness has gone by, Mutability demands of Nature whether she has not succeeded in making good her first claim — that to undisputed sovereignty over earth. Jove makes answer to this, that Time indeed changes all earthly things, but is himself subject to the gods, who, thus ruling over Time, rule Change herself. Change replies to this by an absolute denial, and proceeds to declare the subjection of the gods themselves to her resistless might. She argues that the moon's changes, the changes of the planets and their influences, prove their presiding deities her subjects. Jove himself, she goes on to say, was born as Cretan legends tell us; and whatsoever has had a beginning, and so undergone the change from not being to being, is born the subject of Mutability. The four last stanzas of the 7th canto contain the end of the Titaness's speech, and Nature's final award: —

LVI.

"Then since within this wide great universe
Nothing doth firm and permanent appear,
But all things lost and turned by transverse:
What then should let, but I aloft should rear
My trophy, and from all the triumph bear?
Now judge then (O thou greatest goddess true!)
According as thyself dost see and hear,
And unto me addoom that is my due;
That is the rule of all, all being ruled by you."

LVII.

"So having ended, silence long ensued,
Ne Nature to or fro spake for a space,
But with firm eyes affixed, the ground still viewed.
Meanwhile all creatures, looking in her face,
Expecting th' end of this so doubtful case,
Did hang in long suspense what would ensue,
To whether side should fall the sovereign
place.
At length she, looking up with cheerful view,
The silence brake, and gave her doom in speeches few:

LVIII.

"I well consider all that ye have said,
And find that all things steadfastness do hate
And changed be: yet being rightly weighed,
They are not changed from their first estate,
But by their change their being do dilate;
And turning to themselves at length again,
Do work their own perfection so by fate:
Then over them Change doth not rule and reign;
But they reign over Change, and do their states maintain."

LIX.

"Cease therefore, daughter, further to aspire,
And thee content thus to be ruled by me:
For thy decay thou seek'st by thy desire;
But time shall come that all shall changed be,
And from thenceforth none no more change shall see.
So was the Titaness put down and whist,
And Jove confirmed in his imperial see.
Then was that whole assembly quite dismiss,
And Nature's self did vanish whither no man wist."

'Fairy Queen,' book vii. canto 7.

The canto closes with the breaking-up of that august assembly; but the mournful truth which it has illustrated with such varied beauty, that "the creature" has been "made subject to vanity," and also Nature's augury of the fulfilment of the "hope" in which it was so subjected, were designed to be echoed in clearer strains in the succeeding canto. These two stanzas were intended to commence it:—

I.

"When I bethink me on that speech whylear,
Of Mutability, and well it weigh;
Me seems, that though she all unworthy were
Of the heaven's rule, yet very sooth to say
In all things else she bears the greatest sway.
Which makes me loathe this state of life so tickle,
And love of things so vain to cast away;
Whose flowering pride, so fading and so fickle,
Short Time shall soon cut down with his consuming sickle.

II.

"Then 'gin I think on that which Nature said
Of that same time when no more Change shall be,
But steadfast rest of all things firmly stayed
Upon the pillours of eternity,
That is contrair to Mutability.
For all that moveth doth in Change delight:
But thenceforth all shall rest eternally
With Him that is the God of Sabbath hight:
O that great Sabbath God, graunt me that Sabbath sight."
'Fairy Queen,' book viii. canto 8 (imperfect).

And with these two stanzas a mightier will than ours has chosen that Spenser's great work should end. They are to us the last of the 'Fairy Queen.'

My extracts from this greatest of Spenser's allegories have been necessarily brief. To do it justice, it should be read as a whole. It is throughout magnificent; almost Homeric in its combined sublimity and simplicity. Its wealth of imaginative riches is, even for Spenser, astonishing; doubly so, when we recollect the prodigal variety of the descriptions he has scattered with lavish hand through the preceding books. The germ of one of the grandest things in the English language, Milton's Death, is discernible in the 46th stanza, so sublime in its spectral terrors. — Above all, how marked is the contrast between this allegory and Ariosto's! Who can compare the two without feeling convinced that if the dust which now sleeps in the Benedictine Church at Ferrara once enshrined the richest fancy that ever endowed a poet, a yet deeper sense of beauty thrilled the brain, and far nobler pulsations stirred the heart, while he awaited the resurrection in our great

West Minster, beneath Spenser's simple tomb! We saw how Ariosto, in his allegory, dealt with the holiest names in a thoroughly pagan spirit. We have now seen Spenser produce one far nobler by an exactly reversed process. From its proposed subject, we might have expected only to find in it the commonplaces of heathen poets on the changeful and disappointing character of earthly things, cast by genius into a new and striking shape. But Spenser is not content with doing this; nor does he cease until he has let in a radiance borrowed from revelation upon the ever-shifting forms and ruins of Time. Ariosto lays the foundations of his allegory in the heaven of heavens, and yet does not succeed in producing any religious impression on his reader's mind. Spenser lays his on the fabled Olympus, but stays not till, having extracted deep truths from the lips of its inhabitants, he can end it by echoing the lofty strains in which prophets and apostles bid us look forward to "the rest which remaineth for the people of God."

And how noble these two concluding stanzas are in themselves! Could even Spenser's genius have devised a fitter close for his great poem? How well the lament of the first over the fleeting nature of earthly joys (uttered doubtless from the bitter depths of its author's own experience) befits the last lines of a poem which has all along treated "the glories of our birth and state" as "shadows" of better and more "substantial things" than themselves! And how magnificent is the Sursum Corda of the second! composed, it might seem, fresh from the perusal of St. Augustine's noble commentary on the opening verses of the second chapter of Genesis. How does it stir our hearts by its solemn harmonies, as it calls us to avert our eyes from the fading glories of earth, that we may fix them steadfastly on the brightening splendours of "the day of restitution of all things!"

Thinking of these two stanzas, and of all the others which have been, like them, witnessing to us the religious superiority of Spenser's England over Ariosto's Italy, who would not earnestly hope that they express, not alone the faith of the age in which their writer flourished, but the unfeigned confession also of the faith which filled his own heart? that so his Master, cutting short his beautiful poem at the line in which he so earnestly supplicates a share in the true rest of the people of God, may seem to have signified His gracious acceptance of his prayer, by reserving it for Himself to add unto it the last Amen: so be it.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

A VISIT TO THE BIG TREES.

WE were in San Francisco, the Golden City of California, the paradise of North Pacificans, and there were many wonders to be seen — gold and silver mines, where hundreds of tons of quartz rock are crushed daily, and millions of dollars extracted yearly; the cinnabar mine of New Almaden, which supplies quicksilver to the whole world; Yo Semite, the loveliest of valleys, where, amongst the grand mountains of the Sierra Nevada, a river leaps down from a height of 2700 feet, and forms the waterfall of the Bridal Veil, the highest in the world. There were geysers, caves, the islands of the sea-lions, and the "Mammoth Trees;" there was a Russian fleet in the harbour, "the Beautiful Menkin" at the Theatre, and the "Living Skeleton" at the Museum. We were fairly bewildered by the multiplicity of strange sights awaiting our curious eyes, uncertain which to choose. After mature deliberation, we decided to bend our steps in the first place to the Mammoth Tree Grove, in Calaveras county, about 150 miles east of San Francisco, on the western slope of the Sierra Nevada. We went on board the Cornelia, accordingly, one evening, and steamed all night up the San Joaquin, a tributary of the Sacramento — a narrow muddy stream, running in a most tortuous channel through an extensive marshy delta. The tall reeds which covered the flat expanse were on fire for miles, almost to the water's edge, and we made our way through a sea of flame and smoke, the whole country being lighted up by the vast conflagration. At eight o'clock the following morning we reached Stockton city, and then took the stage-wagon for Columbia, fifty-eight miles distant, and thirteen from the Big Tree Valley. The first portion of the road lay along a broad rich valley, brought almost entirely under the plough, where the undisturbed stubbles told of a fertility unknown in the Old World; for so generous is the soil, that luxuriant crops spring up in the second year without the labour of man, the grain shaken out in the gathering of the first harvest being sufficient for the succeeding one, a "volunteer crop." Although it was past mid-winter — the end of January — the weather was bright and warm as the most genial May; rows of oleanders and heliotropes bloomed in the gardens, ignorant of wintry cold, and strawberries ripened on the sunniest slopes.

Towards evening we began to ascend the lowest swells of the Sierra Nevada, and entered a country less luxuriantly fertile than the Stockton Valley, and met with numerous monuments of the old "placer" diggings in the shape of "flumes," or wooden aqueducts for bringing water to the mines, and flats where thickly-massed boulders of granite and quartz, uncovered by the miner's work, told of streams which ran there in times gone by, and brought down the golden gravel discovered in the ancient bed. As night closed in we passed through the town of Sonora, and six miles more brought us to Columbia, where we stayed the night at a rough hotel, kept by a Welshman named Morgan.

As the stage did not run beyond this, we hired a buggy and pair and drove over to "Murphy's," a mining town thirteen miles distant, and thenceforward through a picturesque hilly country, where grew in scattered clusters many species of pine, the arbutus, and white jessamine, with evergreen oaks, whose boughs bore numerous branches of mistletoe. The road wound higher and higher up the slopes of the Sierra Nevada, and at dusk we reached the valley of the Mammoth Tree Grove, 4000 feet above the sea. The weather continued fine and the sky cloudless, but at this height the evening air was sharp and frosty, and a thin carpet of snow covered the ground. After a short drive through a forest of lofty pines, we came in sight of the hotel; and 100 yards in front of it, guarding on each side the entrance to its grounds, grew two of the giant trees. These, named "The Sentinels," although by no means the largest, are very handsome, and of sufficient magnitude to strike the stranger with astonishment, for their height is over 300 feet, and their diameter about 20 feet. At Sperry & Perry's hotel at Murphy's, where we had dined, we had been informed that the hotel at the Mammoth Tree Grove, also kept by Sperry & Perry, or Perry & Sperry, was closed for the winter; but Mr. Sperry or Mr. Perry (it is impossible to say which) kindly offered to accompany us and open the house for our accommodation, and we carried him along with us in our buggy. It was sunset when we got in, and Sperry or Perry hastened to prepare supper, whilst we had a look in the twilight at The Sentinels and the "Big Tree," so called par excellence, although it is not the greatest amongst the giants. Its huge trunk now lies mutilated on the ground, having been felled a few years ago, as we were told, to furnish material for walking-sticks, which were eagerly bought by curiosity-hunters.

Five men were set to work on it, and it took them twenty-five days to accomplish the task! It was hopeless to attempt to cut it down with axes, and it was therefore bored with augers, and the intermediate spaces sawn through, and, finally, a wedge and battering-ram were required to effect the fall of the severed trunk, which stood firmly perpendicular when completely cut through. The stump measures 96 feet in circumference at the base; and the top, cut smooth and even, is 25 feet in diameter, without reckoning the bark, which is about 3 feet more. Upon it is built a round wooden house—a ball-room it is called; and a circular room nearly 10 yards in diameter is no mean dancing saloon. It is said that thirty-two people have danced here in four different sets at the same time, and theatrical performances have been given on the expansive top of this wonderful stump. Near the stump lies a section of the trunk; and some idea of the size of this may be gained from the fact that the writer, a man of 5 ft. 11 in., could barely touch the centre at the smaller end, standing on tiptoe, while at the larger he could in the same manner touch a point about one-third of the whole diameter. The rest of the vast fallen trunk, 302 feet long, had been dressed level, and seemed like a broad terrace-walk, with two bowling alleys made on it side by side. The amount of timber in this tree is calculated at 500,000 cubic feet! and its age estimated from the annual rings at 3000 years! Before we had sufficiently inspected and wondered at the Big Tree it became dark, and we entered the hotel, where Mr. Sperry or Perry had supper ready for us, and in the evening told us the history of the Great Trees.

They were not discovered until the year 1850, when a Mr. Dowd, who was out hunting, was led by a herd of deer which he was following into the Big Tree Valley. He stopped as one enchanted, feeling like Gulliver when lost in the field of barley in Brobdingnag—the deer were forgotten, and he gazed with utter astonishment on monsters of vegetation such as he had never even dreamed of as existing in the world. He told his companions of his adventure on his return, but all laughed at his story as a barefaced attempt to impose upon their credulity; and it was with the greatest difficulty he succeeded in inducing some of them to accompany him to the spot, and verify his statements by actual inspection and measurement.

The newly-discovered trees, called Washingtonia gigantea by Americans, and Wel- lingtonia gigantea by Englishmen, puzzled the botanists sorely. Some declared them to be a species of cedar, which they certainly closely resemble; others, again, considered them to be of the family of the Taxodia; while Professor Lindley doubted whether a new order would not have to be made for them; and it still appears undecided to what order they properly belong. The seed has been largely exported, and young Wellingtonias may be seen gracing many an English lawn. Yet, strange to say, although the seed grows readily, and the trees flourish with rich luxuriance wherever they have been planted, both here and in America, they are, in the natural order of things, limited to two tiny valleys about fifty miles apart. Not a single tree of the kind, except those which have been lately planted by the hand of man, is known to exist out of the Calaveras and Mariposa valleys. They have never spread from their quiet nooks in the Sierra Nevada, and have remained hidden in its recesses for hundreds, perchance thousands, of years, until discovered in the manner related.

We turned out early next morning into the fresh frosty air, and after breakfast wandered about the grove for several hours, amid a scene of wonders, the mere description of which we should have laughed at as a traveller's tale. There are about one hundred trees of this species, of every age and size, intermingled with various kinds of pines, yews, and deciduous shrubs, and all standing within an area of about fifty acres.

The younger ones are singularly graceful and handsome, but those of mature growth—a few thousand years old perhaps—are a little withered at the top. The enormous trunks are bare and branchless for from 100 to 180 feet, and the boughs seem small in proportion to the central stem.

The effect of the mighty columns rising thickly round, and towering on high, some burnt hollow, in whose cavities a company of soldiers might almost find shelter; others uninjured, solid and massive, the largest and the oldest of living organisms on earth, monuments of ages past, when there were giants in the land, is almost awesome. The great sugar-pines of 800 feet high, and 10 or 12 feet diameter, kings of the forest elsewhere, seemed mere dwarfs beside those Wellingtonias; and as we walked about, pigmy and insignificant, we half expected to see the strange forms of extinct giants of the animal world, the mammoth or the mastodon of ages still more remote, come crashing through the timber, or the pterodactyl winging its way amongst the colossal vegetation. There stood the "Mother of the Forest," withered and bare, her full height 327 feet, her girth 78 feet without the bark, for this had been removed from 116 feet of the lower portion of the trunk, and the scaffolding erected for the purpose still stood round the tree. This outer shell thus removed is now put up, we believe, in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. Thus the two finest trees growing when the forest was first discovered have both been wantonly destroyed for the gratification of curiosity-lovers. There is, however, a still greater than these, decayed and fallen — a stupendous ruin lying half-buried in the ground. It appears to have been destroyed by the fire which has evidently devastated the grove years ago, for many of the standing trees are partially charred, and this one has been burnt into a hollow shell. At the base its girth is 112 feet, and we walked inside the tunnel through the trunk for 200 feet with our hats on. Great must have been the fall of the "Father of the Forest;" and numerous large trees have been overthrown or broken off by it when it crashed to the ground. 300 feet from the root it snapped in two, and the upper portion of it has decayed away, and almost all trace of it has disappeared; but at the point of fracture, or 200 feet from the base, its circumference is 54 feet (18 feet diameter). According, therefore, to the average taper of the other trees, the unbroken stem must have been at least 435 feet high — more than twice the height of the Monument, 95 feet higher than the great chimney at Saltaire, and 30 feet higher than the top of the cross which crowns the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral!

The fresh ripe cones of the Wellingtonias strewn the ground, and of these we gathered a plentiful stock; and then, having sufficiently gratified our curiosity, we took to our buggy once more, and on the following day regained that luxurious city San Francisco.

USES OF DECAY.

SUMMER, as rich in shadows as in suns,
Spreads her thick foliage thicker every day;
She is most bounteous; her free spirit shuns
To give and take away.

But thou, grave Autumn, dealest otherwise:
Creating noble colour, and withal
Rifling the woods that bear it, till our eyes
Can penetrate them all.

And then, what hidden wonders do we see!
What half-forgotten glimpses of our past,
Veil'd since the spring, though each dismantled tree
Peer out again at last!

Love them or hate, we cannot but behold:
Gable, and church, grey turret and blue hill,
Or bran-new horror built with recent gold —
All are before us still.

So, if the great sea ebb, full many a wreck
Above the branching coral grimly towers;
Full many a ragged skeleton on deck
Lies deep in iving flowers.

So, when the mists of life rise up, and poise
Along the crumbling edges of the grave,
What quick regrets, what keen remember'd joys,

The weak heart has to brave!

Yes, thou canst show us some things; canst betray
The gaunt square mansion or the ruin'd wall;

Thou, Autumn, dost it for us every day;
And Memory is thy thrall.

But, not the baring of the summer trees,
Nor dying down of tall obstructive flowers,
Nor poise of mists above the yellow leas,
Nor glow of sunset hours, —

Not all that thou canst do or we can dream,
Wins for our purblind souls this one poor bliss —

To see beyond and through the things that seem,

To that which only Is.

Arthur Munby.

PART XII. — CHAPTER XLI.

THE result of Miss Marjoribanks's wise precaution and reticence was that Sir John Richmond and the Doctor and Colonel Chilley were all on Mr. Ashburton's committee. They might not agree with his principles; but then when a man does not state any very distinct principles, it is difficult for any one, however well disposed, to disagree with him; and the fact that he was the man for Carlingford was so indisputable, that nobody attempted to go into the minor matters. "Mr. Ashburton is a gentleman known to us all," Sir John said, with great effect, in his nomination speech; and it was a sentence which went to the hearts of his audience. The other candidate had been a long time from home, and it was longer still since anybody in Carlingford could be said to have been benefited by his residence there. He had had all his things down from town, as Mr. Holden, the upholsterer, pithily remarked — and that made a great difference to start with. As for Mr. Ashburton, though it is true nobody knew what he thought about Reform or the Income Tax, everybody knew that he lived at the Firs, and was supplied in a creditable way by George Street tradesmen. There was no mystery whatever about him. People knew how much he had a year, and how much he paid for everything, and the way in which his accounts were kept, and all about him. Even when he had his wine direct from the growers (for naturally his own county could not supply the actual liquor), it was put in Carlingford bottles, and people knew the kinds he had, and how much, and a hundred agreeable details. And then, "he was a gentleman as was always ready to give his advice," as some of the people said. All this furnished an immense body of evidence in his favour, and made Sir John's remark eloquent. And then Carlingford, as a general rule, did not care the least in the world about Reform. There were a few people who had once done so, and it was remarked in Grove Street that Mr. Tozer had once been in a dreadful state of mind about it. But he was quite tranquil on the subject now, and so was the community in general. And what was really wanted, as Lucilla's genius had seen at a glance, was not this or that opinion, but a good man.

But at the same time it would be vain to deny that Miss Marjoribanks looked forward to a possible visit from Mr. Cavendish with a certain amount of anxiety. She was not frightened, for she knew her own powers; but she was a little excited and stimulated by the idea that he might come in at any minute, bringing back a crowd of recollections with him; and it was a perpetual wonder to her how he would take the inevitable difference, whether he would accept it as natural, or put on the airs of an injured man. Lucilla did not go out the two afternoons after her meeting with Mrs. Woodburn, partly that she might not miss him if he called — for it was better to have it over; but Mr. Cavendish did not come on either of these days. After that, of course, she did not wait for him any longer. But on the third or fourth day, when she was in Miss Brown's photographing room (the eldest Miss Brown was not married, and was a mother to the younger girls, and always enthusiastic about sitters), Mr. Ashburton called about business, and Thomas came to fetch Miss Marjoribanks. She was sitting with the greatest good-nature for half-a-dozen pictures, knowing in her secret heart all the time that she would look a perfect fright, and that all Carlingford would see her grinning with imbecile amiability out of the hazy background of Miss Brown's Cartes. Lucilla knew this, and had hitherto avoided the process with success; but now she gave in; and as the Major was there, of course they talked of the coming election, which, indeed, at present was almost the only topic of conversation in Grange Lane.

"Of course, you are on Mr. Ashburton's committee," said Lucilla; "you must be, or going to be, after what you said the other day at lunch —"

"What did I say?" asked Major Brown, with an air of dismay; for to tell the truth, his heart inclined a little towards poor Mr. Cavendish, who was an old neighbour, and to whom Major Brown could not but think the Marjoribanks and others had behaved rather cruelly. But then in these electioneering matters one never knows what one may have done to compromise one's self without meaning it; and the Major was a little anxious to find out what he had said.

"Dear Major Brown," said Lucilla, seriously, "I am so sorry if you did not mean it. I am sure it was that as much as anything that influenced Mr. Ashburton. He was turning it all over in his mind, you know, and was afraid the people he most esteemed in Carlingford would not agree with him, and did not know what to do; and then you said, What did it matter about opinions, if it was a good man? — that was what decided him," said Miss Marjoribanks, with sad yet gentle reproachfulness. "I am so sorry if you did not mean what you said —"

"Good heavens! I don't remember saying anything of the sort," said Major Brown. "I—I am sure I never thought of influencing anybody. It is true enough about a good man, you know; but if I had imagined for an instant that any one was paying attention—— By George! it was you that said it, Lucilla—I remember now."

"Please don't make fun of me," said Miss Marjoribanks, "as if anybody cared what I say about politics. But I know that was what decided poor Mr. Ashburton. Indeed, he told me so; and when he finds you did not mean anything——"

"But, good heavens!—I—I did mean something," cried the accused, with dismay. And he grew quite inarticulate in his confusion, and red in the face, and lost his head altogether, while Lucilla sat calmly looking on with that air of virtue at once severe and indulgent, which pities, and blames, and hopes that perhaps there is not so much harm done as might have been expected. This was the position of affairs when Thomas came to say that Miss Marjoribanks was wanted, as she had told him to do when her candidate came; for, to be sure, it was only next door. It was terrible to hear the soft sigh she gave when she shook hands with Major Brown. "I hope he will not feel it so much as I think; but I should be afraid to tell him," said Lucilla; and she went away, leaving the good man in a state of bewilderment and embarrassment and doubt, which would have been much more unpleasant if he had not felt so flattered at the same time. "I never meant to influence anybody, I am sure," he said, with a comical mixture of complacency and dismay, when Lucilla was gone. "I have always said, papa, that you don't think enough of the weight people give to your opinion," Miss Brown replied, as she gave the final bath to her negatives; and they both left off work with a certain glow of comforted amour propre, and the most benevolent sentiments towards Mr. Ashburton, who, to tell the truth, until he got his lesson from Miss Marjoribanks, had never once thought about the opinion of Major Brown.

He was sitting with aunt Jemima when Lucilla came in, and talking to her in a steady sort of a way. Nothing could have made Mr. Ashburton socially attractive, but still there are many people to whom this steady sort of talk is more agreeable than brilliancy. When a man is brilliant there is always a doubt in some minds whether he is trustworthy, or sincere, or to be relied upon; but an ordinary common-sense sort of talker is free from such suspicion. Mr. Ashburton was very sorry to hear that Mrs. John Marjoribanks had bad nights, and suggested that it might be nervous, and hoped that the air of Carlingford would do her good, and was very glad to hear that her son was getting on so well in India; and aunt Jemima could not help approving of him, and feeling that he was a person of substance and reflection, and not one of those fly-away young men who turn girls' heads, and never mean anything. Lucilla herself gained something in Mrs. John's eyes from Mr. Ashburton's high opinion; but at the same time it was quite clear that he was not thinking of anything sentimental, but was quite occupied about his election, as a man of sense should be. Lucilla came in with a fine bloom on her cheeks, but still with a shade of that sadness which had had so great an effect upon Major Brown. She had taken off her hat before she came in, and dropped into her chair with an air of languor and fatigue which was quite unusual to her. "It makes such a difference in life when one has something on one's mind," said Lucilla, and she sighed, as was but natural; for though that did not effect the energy of her proceedings, she knew and remembered at moments of discouragement how seldom one's most disinterested exertions are appreciated at the end.

"You want your lunch, my dear," said Mrs. John.

"Perhaps I do," said Miss Marjoribanks, with a mournfully affectionate smile. "I have been sitting to Maria Brown. She has taken six, and I am sure they are every one more hideous than the other; and they will go all over England, you know, for the Browns have hosts of people belonging to them; and everybody will say, 'So that is Miss Marjoribanks.' I don't think I am vain to speak of," said Lucilla, "but that sort of things goes to one's heart."

"These amateurs are terrible people," said Mr. Ashburton, in his steady way; "and photographs are a regular nuisance. For my part——"

"Don't say that," said Miss Marjoribanks. "I know what you are going to say; and you must sit to her, please. I have said already she must do one of you; and I will tell you presently about the Major. But wait and talk to aunt Jemima a little, for I am so tired," said Lucilla. She was lying back negligently in her seat, with that air of languor which so many young ladies excel in, but which was for her a novel indulgence. Her hand hung over the arm of her chair as if there was no longer any force in it. Her head fell back, her eyes were half closed; it was a moment of abandonment to her sensations, such as a high-principled young woman like Miss Marjoribanks seldom gives away to. But Lucilla went into it conscientiously, as into everything she did, that she might regain her strength for the necessary duties that were before her.

And it was at this moment that Thomas appeared at the door with a suspicion of a grin appearing at the corners of his sober mouth, and announced Mr. Cavendish, who came in before an ordinary woman would have had time to open her eyes. This was the moment he had chosen for his first visit; and yet it was not he who had chosen it, but fate, who seemed to have in this respect a spite against Lucilla. It was not only the embarrassing presence of his rival, but the fact that neither of the two people in the room knew or had ever seen Mr. Cavendish, that put a climax to the horror of the situation. She alone knew him, and had to take upon herself to present and introduce him, and bridge over for him the long interval of absence, and all this with the sense of being in the enemy's interest, and to a certain extent false to Mr. Cavendish! Lucilla rose at once, but she was not a woman to make pretences. She did not throw off all in a moment her fatigue, and dash into spasmodic action. She held out her hand silently to Mr. Cavendish, with a look which spoke only affectionate satisfaction in a friend's return. She did not even speak at all for the first moment, but contented herself with a look, which indeed, if he had been younger and less preoccupied, would no doubt have touched his very heart.

"So you have really come back," she said. "I am so glad! after all that people said about your being married and dead and ever so many stupid things. Oh! don't look at me, please. It doesn't matter with a gentleman, but I know as well as if you had told me that you think me dreadfully gone off!"

"I entertain such a profane idea!" said Mr. Cavendish; but he was considerably embarrassed, and he was a great deal stouter, and altogether different from what he used to be, and he had not the light hand of his youth for a compliment. And then he sat down on the chair Thomas had given him; and he looked uncomfortable, to say the least of it; and he was getting large in dimensions and a little red in the face, and had by no means the air of thinking that it didn't matter for a gentleman. As for Miss Marjoribanks, it would be impossible to say what mists of illusion dropped away from her mind at the sight of him. Even while she smiled upon the new-comer, she could not but ask herself, with momentary dismay — Had she really gone off as much in the same time?

"I have been looking for you," Miss Marjoribanks resumed; "I waited in for you Tuesday and Wednesday, and it is so odd you should have come just at this minute. Aunt Jemima, this is Mr. Cavendish, whom you have heard so much about — and don't go, please, Mr. Ashburton — you two must know each other. You will be hearing of each other constantly; and I suppose you will have to shake hands or something on the hustings — so it will be much the best to begin it here."

But the two candidates did not shake hands: they bowed to each other in an alarming way, which did not promise much for their future brotherliness, and then they both stood bolt upright and stared at Miss Marjoribanks, who had relapsed, in the pleasantest way in the world, into her easy-chair.

"Now, please sit down and talk a little," said Lucilla; "I am so proud of having you both together. There never has been anybody in the world that I have missed so much as you — you knew that when you went away, but you didn't mind. Mr. Ashburton is very nice, but he is of no use to speak of in an evening," said Miss Marjoribanks, turning a reflective glance upon her own candidate with a certain sadness; and then they both laughed as if it was a joke; but it was no joke, as one of them at least must have known.

"Lucilla," said Mrs. John, with consternation, "I never heard anybody talk as you do; I am sure Mr. Ashburton is the very best of society, and as for Mr. Cavendish!"

"Dear aunt Jemima," said Lucilla, "would you mind ringing the bell? I have been sitting to Maria Brown, and I am almost fainting. I wish you gentlemen would sit to her; it would please her, and it would not do you much harm; and then for your constituents, you know!"

"I hope you don't wish me to look like one of Maria Brown's photographs to my constituents," said Mr. Cavendish; but "then I am happy to say they all know me pretty well." This was said with a slight touch of gentlemanly spite, if there is such a thing; for, after all, he was an old power in Carlisle, though he had been so long away.

"Yes," said Lucilla, reflectively, "but you are a little changed since then; a little perhaps — just a little — stouter, and" —

"Gone off?" said Mr. Cavendish, with a laugh; but he felt horribly disconcerted all the same, and savage with Miss Marjoribanks, and could not think why "that fellow" did not go away. What had he to do in Lucilla's drawing-room? what did he mean by sitting down again and talking in that measured way to the old lady, as if all the ordinary rules of good breeding did not point out to him that he should have gone away and left the field clear?

"Oh, you know it does not matter for a gentleman," said Lucilla; and then she turned to Mr. Ashburton — "I am sure the Major wants to see you, and he thinks that it was he who put it into your head to stand. He was here that day at lunch, you know, and it was something he said" —

"Quite true," said Mr. Ashburton in his business way. "I shall go to see him at once. Thank you for telling me of it, Miss Marjoribanks; I shall go as soon as I leave here."

And then Mr. Cavendish laughed. "This is what I call interesting," he said. "I hope Mr. Ashburton sees the fun; but it is trying to an old friend to hear of that day at lunch, you know. I remember when these sort of allusions used to be pleasant enough; but when one has been banished for a thousand years" —

"Yes," said Lucilla, "one leaves all that behind, you know — one leaves ever so many things behind. I wish we could always be twenty, for my part. I always said, you know, that I should be gone off in ten years."

"Was it the only fib you ever told that you repeat it so?" said Mr. Cavendish; and it was with this pretty speech that he took her down-stairs to the well-remembered luncheon. "But you have gone off in some things when you have to do with a prig like that," he said in her ear, as they went down together, "and cast off old friends. It was a thing a fellow did not expect of you."

"I never cast off old friends," said Miss Marjoribanks. "We shall look for you on Thursday, you know, all the same. Must you go, Mr. Ashburton? when lunch is on the table? But then, to be sure, you will be in time at the Browns'," said Lucilla, sweetly, and she gave the one rival her hand while she held the arm of the other, at the door of the dining-room, in which Mr. Ashburton had gallantly deposited aunt Jemima before saying good-by. They were both looking a little black, though the gloom was moderate in Mr. Ashburton's case; but as for Lucilla, she stood between them a picture of angelic sweetness and goodness, giving a certain measure of her sympathy to both — Woman the Reconciler, by the side of those other characters of Inspirer and Consoler, of which the world has heard. The two inferior creatures scowled with politeness at each other, but Miss Marjoribanks smiled upon them both. Such was the way in which she overcame the difficulties of the meeting. Mr. Ashburton went away a little annoyed, but still understanding his instructions, and ready to act upon them in that businesslike way he had, and Mr. Cavendish remained, faintly reassured in the midst of his soreness and mortification, by at least having the field to himself and seeing the last (for the present) of his antagonist — which was a kind of victory in its way.

"I thought I knew you better than to think you ever would have any thing to do with that sort of thing," said Mr. Cavendish. "There are people, you know, whom I could have imagined — but a prig like that." He became indeed quite violent, as aunt Jemima said afterwards, and met with that lady's decided disapproval, as may be supposed.

"Mr. Ashburton is very well bred and agreeable," Mrs. John said, with emphasis. "I wish all the young men I see nowadays were as nice."

"Young men!" said Mr. Cavendish. "Is that what people call young nowadays? And he must be insane, you know, or he would never dream of representing a town without saying a single word about his principles. I daresay he thinks it is original," said the unhappy man. He thought he was pointing out his rival's weakness to Lucilla, and he went on with energy — "I know you better than to think you can like that milk-and-water sort of thing."

"Oh, I don't pretend to know anything about politics," said Lucilla. "I hear you gentlemen talk, but I never pretend to understand. If we were not to leave you that all to yourselves, I don't know what you could find to do," Miss Marjoribanks added compassionately; and as she spoke she looked so like the Lucilla of old, who had schemed and plotted for Mr. Cavendish, that he could not believe in her desertion in his heart.

"That is a delusion like the going off," he said. "I can't believe you have gone over to the enemy. When I remember how I have been roving about all those ten years, and how different it might have been, and whose fault it all was" —

This Mr. Cavendish said in a low voice, but it did not the less horrify aunt Jemima, who felt prepared for any atrocity after it. She would have withdrawn, in justice to her own sense of propriety; but then she thought it was not impossible that he might propose to Lucilla on the spot, or take her hand or something, and for propriety's sake she stayed.

"Yes," said Lucilla — and her heart did for one little moment give a faint thump against her breast. She could not help thinking what a difference it might have made to him, poor fellow, had he been under her lawful and righteous sway these ten years. But as she looked at him it became more and more apparent to Miss Marjoribanks that Mr. Cavendish had gone off, whatever she herself might have done. The outlines of his fine figure had changed considerably, and his face was a little red, and he had the look of a man whose circumstances, spiritual and temporal, would not quite bear a rigid examination. As she looked at him her pity became tinged by a certain shade of resentment, to think that after all it was his own fault. She could not, notwithstanding her natural frankness of expression, say to him — "You foolish soul, why didn't you marry me somehow, and make a man of yourself?" Lucilla carried honesty very far, but she could not go as far as that. "Yes," she said, turning her eyes upon him with a sort of abstract sympathy, and then she added softly — "Have you ever seen Her again?" with a lowering of her voice.

This interesting question, which utterly bewildered aunt Jemima, drove Mr. Cavendish wild with rage. Mrs. John said afterwards that she felt a shiver go through her as he took up the carving-knife, though it was only to cut some cold beef. He grew white all at once, and pressed his lips tightly together, and fixed his eyes on the wall straight before him. "I did not think, after what I once said to you, Miss Marjoribanks, that you would continue to insult my judgment in that way," he said, with a chill which fell upon the whole table, and took the life out of everything, and dimmed the very fire in the chimney. And after that the conversation was of a sufficiently ordinary description until they went back again into the drawing-room, by which time Mr. Cavendish seemed to have concluded that it was best to pocket the affront.

"I am going to begin my canvass to-morrow," he said. "I have not seen anybody

yet. I have nobody but my sister to take me in hand, you know. There was once a time when it might have been different" — and he gave Lucilla a look which she thought on the whole it was best to meet.

"Yes," said Miss Marjoribanks, with cruel distinctness, "there was a time when you were the most popular man in Grange Lane — everybody was fond of you. I remember it as if it had been yesterday," said Lucilla, with a sigh.

"You don't give a man much encouragement, by Jove!" said the unlucky candidate. "You remember it like yesterday! It may be vanity, but I flatter myself I shall still be found the most popular man in Grange Lane."

Miss Marjoribanks sighed again, but she did not say anything. On the contrary she turned to aunt Jemima, who kept in the background an alarmed and alert spectator, to consult her about a shade of wool — and just then Mr. Cavendish, looking out of the window, saw Major Brown conducting his rival through his garden, and shaking hands with him cordially at the door. This was more than the patience of the other candidate could bear. A sudden resolution, hot and angry, as are the resolutions of men who feel themselves to have a failing cause, came into his mind. He had been badgered and baited to such an extent (as he thought) that he had not time to consider if it was wise or not. He, too, had sat to Maria Brown, and commanded once the warmest admiration of the household. He thought he would put it to the test, and see if after all his popularity was only a thing to be remembered like yesterday — and it was with this intention that he bade a hurried good-by to Lucilla, and rushing out, threw himself at once upon the troubled waves of society, which had once been as smooth as glass to the most popular man in Grange Lane.

CHAPTER XLII.

MR. CAVENDISH thought he had been an object of admiration to Maria Brown, as we have said. He thought of it with a little middle-aged complacency, and a confidence that this vague sentiment would stand the test he was about to apply to it, which did honour to the freshness of his heart. With this idea it was Miss Brown he asked for as he knocked at the Major's door; and he found them both in the drawing-room, Maria with gloves on to hide the honourable stains of her photography, which made her comparatively useless when she was out of her "studio"—and her father walking about in a state of excitement, which was, indeed, what Mr. Cavendish expected. The two exchanged a guilty look when they saw who their visitor was. They looked as people might well look who had been caught in the fact and did not know how to get over it. They came forward, both of them, with a cowardly cordiality and eagerness to welcome him—"How very good of you to come to see us so soon!" Miss Brown said, and fluttered and looked at her father, and could not tell what more to say. And then a dead pause fell upon them—such a pause as not unfrequently falls upon people who have got through their mutual greetings almost with an excess of cordiality. They stopped short all at once, and looked at each other, and smiled, and made a fatal conscious effort to talk of something. "It is so good of you to come so soon," Miss Brown repeated; "perhaps you have been to see Lucilla," and then she stopped again, slightly tremulous, and turned an appealing gaze to her papa.

"I have come to see you," said Mr. Cavendish, plucking up all his courage. "I have been a long time gone, you know, but I have not forgotten Carlingford; and you must forgive me for saying that I was very glad to hear I might still come to see—Miss Brown. As for Lydia?" said the candidate, looking about him with a smile.

"Ah, Lydia," said her sister, with a sigh, "her eldest is eight, Mr. Cavendish. We don't see her so often as we should like—marriage makes such a difference. Of course it is quite natural she should be all for her own family now."

"Quite natural," said Mr. Cavendish, and then he turned to the Major. "I don't think there are quite so many public changes as I expected to see. The old Rector always holds out, and the old Colonel; and you have not done much that I can see about the new paving. You know what I have come home about, Major; and I am sure I can count upon you to support me," the candidate said, with a great deal more confidence than he felt in his voice.

Major Brown cleared his throat; his heart was moved by the familiar voice, and he could not conceal his embarrassment. "I hope nothing will ever occur," he said, "to make any difference in the friendly feelings—I am sure I shall be very glad to welcome you back permanently to Carlingford. You may always rest assured of that," and he held out his hand. But he grew red as he thought of his treachery, and Maria, who was quaking over it, did not even try to say a word to help him—and as for Mr. Cavendish, he took up his position on the arm of the sofa, as he used to do. But he had a slim youthful figure when he used to do it, and now the attitude was one which revealed a certain dawning rotundity, very different, as Maria afterwards said, from one's idea of Mr. Cavendish. He was not aware of it himself, but as these two people looked, their simultaneous thought was how much he had changed.

"Thank you, you are very kind," said Mr. Cavendish. "I have been a little lazy, I am afraid, since I came here; but I expect my agent down to-night, and then, I hope, you'll come over to my place and have a talk with Woodburn and Centum and the rest about it. I am a poor tactician, for my part. You shall contrive what is best to be done, and I'll carry it out. I suppose I may expect almost to walk over," he said. It was the confidence of despair that moved him. The more he saw that his cause was lost, the more he would make it out that he was sure to win—which is not an unusual state of mind.

"I—I don't know, I am sure," said poor Major Brown. "To tell the truth, I—though I can safely say my sympathies are always with you, Cavendish—I—have been so unfortunate as to commit myself, you know. It was quite involuntary, I am sure, for I never thought my casual expression of opinion likely to have any weight."

"Papa, never will perceive the weight that is attached to his opinion," said Miss Brown.

"I was not thinking of it in the least, Maria," said the modest Major; "but the fact is, it seems to have been that that decided Ashburton to stand; and after drawing a man into such a thing, the least one can do is to back him out in it. Nobody had an idea then, you know, that you were coming back, my dear fellow. I assure you, if I had known"—

"But even if you had known, you know you never meant it, papa," said Maria. And Mr. Cavendish sat on the arm of the sofa, and put his hands deep into his pockets, and dropped his upper lip, and knit his eyebrows a little, and listened to the anxious people excusing themselves. He did not make any answer one way or another. He was terribly mortified and disappointed, and it went against his pride to make any further remonstrances. When they had done, he got down off his seat and took his right hand out of his pocket and offered it to Miss Brown, who, putting her own into it, poor soul! with the remembrance of her ancient allegiance, was like to cry.

"Well," he said, "if that is the case, I suppose I need not bother you any longer. You'll give me your good wishes all the same. I used to hear of Ashburton sometimes, but I never had the least idea he was so popular. And to tell the truth, I don't think he's any great things to brag of — though I suppose it's not to be expected I should appreciate his qualities," Mr. Cavendish added, with a laugh. As for Miss Brown, it was all she could do to keep from crying as he went away. She said she could see, by the way he left the drawing-room, that he was a stricken deer; and yet, notwithstanding this sympathetic feeling, she could not but acknowledge, when Miss Marjoribanks mentioned it, that to have been such a handsome man, he was inconceivably gone off.

Mr. Cavendish went up Grange Lane with his hands in his pockets, and tried to think that he did not care; but he did care all the same, and was very bitter in his mind over the failure of friends and the vanity of expectations. The last time he had walked past those garden walls he had thought himself sure of the support of Carlingford, and the personal esteem of all the people in all the houses he was passing. It was after the Archdeacon had broken down in his case against the man whom he called an adventurer, and when Mr. Cavendish felt all the sweetness of being a member of an oligarchy, and entitled to the sympathy and support of his order. Now he went along the same path with his hat over his ears and his hands in his pockets, and rage and pain in his heart. Whose fault was it that his friends had deserted him and Carlingford knew him no more? He might as well have asked whose fault it was that he was getting stout and red in the face, and had not the same grace of figure nor ease of mind as he used to have? He had come very near to settling down and becoming a man of domestic respectability in this quiet place, and he had just escaped in time, and had laughed over it since, and imagined himself, with much glee, an old fogie looking after a lot of children. But the fact is that men do become old fogies even when they have no children to look after, and lose their figure and their elasticity just as soon and perhaps a little sooner in the midst of what is called life than in any milder scene of enjoyment. And it would have been very handy just now to have been sure of his election without paying much for it. He had been living fast, and spending a great deal of money, and this, after all, was the only real ambition he had ever had; and he had thought within himself that if he won he would change his mode of life, and turn over a new leaf, and become all at once a different man. When a man has made such a resolution, and feels not only that a mere success but a moral reformation depends upon his victory, he may be permitted to consider that he has a right to win; and it may be divined what his state of mind was when he had made the discovery that even his old friends did not see his election to be of any such importance as he did, and could think of a miserable little bit of self-importance or gratified vanity more than of his interests — even the women who had once been so kind to him! He had just got so far in his thoughts when he met Mr. Centum, who stared for a moment, and then burst into one of his great laughs as he greeted him. "Good Lord! Cavendish, is this you? I never expected to see you like that!" the banker said, in his coarse way. "You're stouter than I am, old fellow; and such an Adonis as you used to be!" Mr. Cavendish had to bear all this without giving way to his feelings, or even showing them any more than he could help it. Nobody would spare him that imbecile suggestion as to how things used to be. To be growing stouter than Centum without Centum's excuse of being a well-to-do house-holder and father of a family, and respectable man from whom stoutness was expected, was very bitter to him; but he had to gulp it down, and recollect that Centum was as yet the only influential supporter, except his brother-in-law, whom he had in Carlingford.

"What have you been doing with yourself since you came that nobody has seen you?" said Mr. Centum. "If you are to do any good here, you know we shall have to look alive."

"I have been ill," said the unfortunate candidate, with a little natural loss of temper. "You would not have a man to trudge about at this time of year in all weathers when he is ill."

"I would not be ill again, if I were you, till it's all over," said Mr. Centum. "We shall have to fight every inch of our ground; and I tell you that fellow Ashburton knows what he's about — he goes at everything in a steady sort of way. He's not brilliant, you know, but he's sure" — "Brilliant!" said Mr Cavendish, "I should think not. It is Lucilla Marjoribanks who is putting him up to it. You know she had an old grudge at me."

"Oh, nonsense about Lucilla," said Mr. Centum. "I can tell you Ashburton is not at all a contemptible adversary. He is going to work in the cunningest way — not a woman's sort of thing; and he's not a ladies'-man like you," the banker added, with a laugh.

"But I am afraid you can't go in for that sort of thing as you used to do, Cavendish. You should marry, and settle, and become a steady member of society, now you've grown so stout." This was the kind of way in which he was addressed even by his own supporter, who uttered another great laugh as he went off upon his busy way. It was a sort of thing Mr. Cavendish was not used to, and he felt it accordingly. To be sure he knew that he was ten years older, and that there were several things which he could not do with the same facility as in his youth. But he had saved up Carlingford in his imagination as a spot in which he would always be young, and where nobody should find out the difference; and instead of that, it was precisely in Carlingford that he was fated to hear how changed he was, with a frankness which only old friends would have been justified in using. As for Lucilla Marjoribanks, she was rather better looking than otherwise, and absolutely had not gone off. It did not occur to Mr. Cavendish that this might be because Lucilla at present was not still so old as he had been ten years ago, in the period which he now considered his youth. He was rather disposed, on the contrary, to take a moral view, and to consider that it was her feminine incapacity for going too far, which had kept years and amusements from having their due effect upon Miss Marjoribanks. And, poor fellow, he had gone too far. He had not been as careful in his life as he might have been had he stayed at Carlingford; and now he was paying the penalty. Such was the edifying state of mind which he had come to when he reached the top of Grove Street. And there a waft of soft recollections came across his mind. In the absence of all sympathy he could not help turning back to the thought of the enchantress of old who used to sing to him, and listen to him, and storm at him. Probably he would have ended by strolling along the familiar street, and canvassing for Mr. Lake's vote, which would have done him no good in Carlingford, but just then Dr. Marjoribanks stopped in his brougham. The Doctor was looking very strange that morning, though nobody had particularly remarked it — perhaps because he smoothed his countenance when he was out of the brougham, which was his refuge when he had anything to think about. But he stopped suddenly to speak to Mr. Cavendish, and perhaps he had not time to perform that ceremony. He looked dark and cloudy, and constrained, and as if he forced himself to speak; which, to be sure, under the circumstances, was not so very strange.

"I am very glad to see you," the Doctor said, "though you were a day too late you know. Why didn't you give us warning before we all went and committed ourselves? If we had known that you were coming" —

"Ah, that's what old Brown said," said Mr. Cavendish, with a slight shrug of his shoulders; which was imprudent, for the Major was not so old as the Doctor, and besides was a much less important man in Grange Lane.

"So you have been to see old Brown," said Dr. Marjoribanks, in his dry way. "He always was a great admirer of yours. I can't wish you luck, you know, for if you win we lose" —

"Oh, I don't want you to wish me luck. I don't suppose there can be much comparison between my chance and that of a new man whom nobody ever heard of in my time," said the candidate for Carlingford. "I thought you Scotchmen, Doctor, always liked to be on the winning side."

"We've a way of making our side the winning side," said Dr. Marjoribanks, grimly, for he was touchy where his nationality was concerned. "Health all right, I hope?" he added, looking at Mr. Cavendish with that critical medical glance which shows that a verbal response is quite unnecessary. This time there was in the look a certain insinuation of doubt on the subject, which was not pleasant. "You are getting stout, I see," Dr. Marjoribanks added — not laughing, but as if that too was poor Mr. Cavendish's fault.

"Yes, I'm very well," he answered, curtly; but the truth was that he did not feel sure that he was quite well after he had seen the critical look in Dr. Marjoribanks's eye.

"You young men always go too fast," said the Doctor, with a strange little smile; but the term at least was consolatory; and after that Dr. Marjoribanks quite changed his tone. "Have you heard Woodburn talking of that great crash in town?" he said —“that India house, you know—I suppose it’s quite true?”

“Quite true,” said Mr. Cavendish, promptly, and somehow he felt a pleasure in saying it. “I got all the particulars to-day in one of my letters—and lots of private people involved, which is always the way with these old houses,” he added, with a mixture of curiosity and malice—“widows, and all sorts of superannuated folks.”

“It’s a great pity,” said the Doctor: “I knew old Linchfield once, the chief partner—I am very sorry to hear it’s true;” and then the two shook hands, and the brougham drove on. As for Mr. Cavendish, he made up his mind at once that the Doctor was involved, and was not sorry, and felt that it was a sort of judicial recompense for his desertion of his friends. And he went home to tell his sister of it, who shared in his sentiments. And then it was not worth while going out any more that day—for the electioneering agent, who knew all about it, was not coming till the last train. “I suppose I shall have to work when he is here,” Mr. Cavendish said. And in the mean time he threw himself into an easy-chair. Perhaps that was why he was getting so stout.

And in the mean time the Doctor went on visiting his patients. When he came back to his brougham between his visits, and went bowling along in that comfortable way, along the familiar roads, there was a certain glumness upon his face. He was not a demonstrative man, but when he was alone you could tell by certain lines about the well-worn cordage of his countenance whether all was right with the Doctor; and it was easy to see just at this moment that all was not right with him. But he did not say anything about it when he got home; on the contrary, he was just at usual, and told his daughter all about his encounter with Mr. Cavendish. “A man at his time of life has no right to get fat—it’s a sort of thing I don’t like to see. And he’ll never be a ladies’ man no more, Lucilla,” said the Doctor, with a gleam of humour in his eye.

“He is exactly like George the Fourth, papa,” said Miss Marjoribanks; and the Doctor laughed as he sat down to dinner. If he had anything on his mind he bore it like a hero, and gave no sign; but then, as Mrs. John very truly remarked, when a man does not disclose his annoyances they always tell more upon him in the end.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THERE were a great many reasons why this should be a critical period in Miss Marjoribanks’s life. For one thing, it was the limit she had always proposed to herself for her term of young-ladyhood; and naturally, as she outgrew the age for them, she felt disposed to put away childish things. To have the control of society in her hands was a great thing; but still the mere means, without any end, was not worth Lucilla’s while—and her Thursdays were almost a bore to her in her present stage of development. They occurred every week, to be sure, as usual; but the machinery was all perfect, and went on by itself, and it was not in the nature of things that such a light adjunct of existence should satisfy Lucilla, as she opened out into the ripeness of her thirtieth year. It was this that made Mr. Ashburton so interesting to her, and his election a matter into which she entered so warmly, for she had come to an age at which she might have gone into Parliament herself had there been no disqualification of sex; and when it was almost a necessity for her to make some use of her social influence. Miss Marjoribanks had her own ideas in respect to charity, and never went upon ladies’ committees, nor took any further share than what was proper and necessary in parish work; and when a woman has an active mind, and still does not care for parish work, it is a little hard for her to find a “sphere.” And Lucilla, though she said nothing about a sphere, was still more or less in that condition of mind which has been so often and so fully described to the British public—when the ripe female intelligence, not having the natural resource of a nursery and a husband to manage, turns inwards, and begins to “make a protest” against the existing order of society, and to call the world to account for giving it no due occupation—and to consume itself. She was not the woman to make protests, nor to claim for herself the doubtful honours of a false position; but she felt all the same that at her age she had outlived the occupations that were sufficient for her youth. To be sure, there were still the dinners to attend to, a branch of human affairs worthy of the weightiest consideration, and she had a house of her own, as much as if she had been half-a-dozen times married; but still there are instincts which go even beyond dinners, and Lucilla had become conscious that her capabilities were greater than her work. She was a Power in Carlingford, and she knew it; but still there is little good in the existence of a Power unless it can be made use of for some worthy end.

She was coming up Grange Lane rather late one evening, pondering upon these things—thinking within herself compassionately of poor Mr. Cavendish, a little in the same way as he had been thinking of her, but from the opposite point of view. For Lucilla could not but see the antithesis of their position, and how he was the foolish apprentice who had chosen his own way and was coming to a bad end, while she was the steady one about torride by in her Lord Mayor's coach. And Miss Marjoribanks was thinking at the same time of the other candidate, whose canvass was going on so successfully; and that, after the election and all the excitement was over, she would feel a blank. There could be no doubt she would feel a blank—and Lucilla did not see how the blank was to be filled up as she looked into the future; for, as has been said, parish work was not much in her way, and for a woman who feels that she is a Power, there are so few other outlets. She was a little disheartened as she thought it all over. Gleams of possibility, it is true, crossed her mind, such as that of marrying the member for Carlingford, for instance, and thus beginning a new and more important career; but she was too experienced a woman not to be aware by this time, that possibilities which did not depend upon herself alone had better not be calculated upon. And there did occur to her, among other things, the idea of making a great Experiment which could be carried out only by a woman of genius—of marrying a poor man, and affording to Carlingford and England an example which might influence unborn generations. Such were the thoughts that were passing through her mind when, to her great surprise, she came up to her father, walking up Grange Lane over the dirty remains of the snow—for there was a great deal of snow that year. It was so strange a sight to see Dr. Marjoribanks walking that at the first glance Lucilla was startled, and thought something was the matter; but, of course, it all arose from a perfectly natural and explainable cause.

"I have been down to see Mrs. Chiley," said the Doctor; "she has her rheumatism very bad again; and the horse has been so long out that I thought I would walk home. I think the old lady is a little upset about Cavendish, Lucilla. He was always a pet of hers."

"Dear Mrs. Chiley! she is not very bad, I hope?" said Miss Marjoribanks.

"Oh no, she is not very bad," said the Doctor, in a dreary tone. "The poor old machine is just about breaking up, that is all. We can cobble it this once, but next time perhaps"—

"Don't talk in such a disheartening way, papa," said Lucilla. "I am sure she is not so very old."

"We're all pretty old, for that matter," said the Doctor; "we can't run on for ever, you know. If you had been a boy like that stupid fellow, Tom, you might have carried on my practice, Lucilla—and even extended it, I shouldn't wonder," Dr. Marjoribanks added, with a little grunt, as who should say that is the way of the world.

"But I am not a boy," said Lucilla, mildly; "and even if I had been, you know, I might have chosen another profession. Tom never had any turn for medicine that I ever heard of"—

"I hope you know pretty well about all the turns he ever had with that old—woman," said the Doctor, pulling himself up sharply, "always at your ear. I suppose she never talks of anything else. But I hope you have too much sense for that sort of thing, Lucilla. Tom will never be anything but a poor man if he were to live a hundred years."

"Perhaps not, papa," said Lucilla, with a little sigh. The Doctor knew nothing about the great social experiment which it had entered into Miss Marjoribanks's mind to make for the regeneration of her contemporaries and the good of society, or possibly he might not have distinguished Tom by that particular title. Was it he, perhaps, who was destined to be the hero of a domestic drama embodying the best principles of that Moral Philosophy which Lucilla had studied with such success at Mount Pleasant? She could not ask herself the question, for things had not as yet come to that point, but it gleamed upon her mind as by a side-light.

"I don't know how you would get on if you were poor," said the Doctor. "I don't think that would suit you. You would make somebody a capital wife, I can say that for you, Lucilla, that had plenty of money and a liberal disposition like yourself. But poverty is another sort of thing, I can tell you. Luckily you're old enough to have got over all the love-in-a-cottage ideas—if you ever had them," Dr. Marjoribanks added. He was a worldly man himself, and he thought his daughter a worldly woman; and yet, though he thoroughly approved of it, he still despised Lucilla a little for her prudence, which is a paradoxical state of mind not very unusual in the world.

"I don't think I ever had them," said Lucilla—"not that kind of poverty. I know what a cottage means; it means a wretched man, always about the house with his feet in slippers, you know—what poor dear Mr. Cavendish would come to if he was poor"—

The Doctor laughed, though he had not seemed up to this moment much disposed for laughing. "So that is all your opinion of Cavendish," he said; "and I don't think you are far wrong either; and yet that was a young fellow that might have done better," Dr. Marjoribanks said reflectively, perhaps not without a slight prick of conscience that he had forsaken an old friend.

"Yes," said Lucilla, with a certain solemnity—"but you know, papa, if a man will not when he may"—And she sighed, though the Doctor, who had not been thinking of Mr. Cavendish's prospects in that light, laughed once more; but it was a sharp sort of sudden laugh without much heart in it. He had most likely other things of more importance in his mind.

"Well, there have been a great many off and on since that time," he said, smiling rather grimly. "It is time you were thinking about it seriously, Lucilla. I am not so sure about some things as I once was, and I'd rather like to see you well settled before—It's a kind of prejudice a man has," the Doctor said abruptly, which, whatever he might mean by it, was a dismal sort of speech to make.

"Before what, papa?" asked Lucilla, with a little alarm.

"Tut—before long, to be sure," he said, impatiently. "Ashburton would not be at all amies if he liked it and you liked it; but it's no use making any suggestions about those things. So long as you don't marry a fool"—Dr. Marjoribanks said, with energy. "I know—that is, of course, I've seen what that is; you can't expect to get perfection, as you might have looked for perhaps at twenty; but I advise you to marry, Lucilla. I don't think you are cut out for a single woman, for my part."

"I don't see the good of single women," said Lucilla, "unless they are awfully rich; and I don't suppose I shall ever be awfully rich. But, papa, so long as I can be a comfort to you"—

"Yes," said the Doctor, with that tone which Lucilla could remember fifteen years ago, when she made the same magnanimous suggestion, "but I can't live for ever, you know. It would be a pity to sacrifice yourself to me, and then perhaps next morning find that it was a useless sacrifice. It very often happens like that when self-devotion is carried too far. You've behaved very well, and shown a great deal of good sense, Lucilla—more than I gave you credit for when you commenced—I may say that; and if there was to be any change, for instance"—

"What change?" said Lucilla, not without some anxiety; for it was an odd way of talking, to say the least of it; but the Doctor had come to a pause, and did not seem disposed to resume.

"It is not so pleasant as I thought walking over this snow," he said. "I can't give that up, that I can see. And there's more snow in the air if I'm any judge of the weather. There—go in—go in; don't wait for me;—but mind you make haste and dress, for I want my dinner. I may have to go down to Mrs. Chiley again to-night."

It was an odd way of talking, and it was odd to break off like this; but then, to be sure, there was no occasion for any more conversation, since they had just arrived at their own door. It made Lucilla uneasy for the moment, but while she was dressing she managed to explain it to herself, and to think, after all, it was only natural that her papa should have seen a little into the movement and commotion of her thoughts; and then poor dear old Mrs. Chiley being so ill, who was one of his own set, so to speak. He was quite cheerful later in the evening, and enjoyed his dinner, and was even more civil than usual to Mrs. John. And though he did not come up to tea, he made his appearance afterwards with a flake of new-fallen snow still upon his rusty grey whiskers. He had gone to see his patient again, notwithstanding the silent storm outside. And his countenance was a little overcast this time, no doubt by the late walk, and the serious state Mrs. Chiley was in, and his encounter with the snow.

"Oh yes, she is better," he said. "I knew she would do this time. People at our time of life don't go off in that accidental kind of a way. When a woman has been so long used to living, it takes her a time to get into the way of dying. She might be a long time thinking about it yet, if all goes well"—

"Papa, don't speak like that!" said Lucilla. "Dying! I can't bear to think of such a thing. She is not so very old."

"Such things will happen whether you can bear to think of them or not," said the Doctor. "I said you would go down and see her to-morrow. We've all held out a long time — the lot of us. I don't like to think of the first gap myself, but somebody must make a beginning, you know."

"The Chileys were always older than you," said Mrs. John. "I remember in poor Mrs. Marjoribanks's time; — they were quite elderly then, and you were just beginning. When my Tom was a baby" —

"We were always of the same set," said the Doctor, interrupting her without hesitation. "Lucilla, they say Cavendish has got hold of the Rector. He has made believe to be penitent, you know. That is cleverer than anything you could have done. And if he can't be won back again it will be serious, the Colonel says. You are to try if you can suggest anything. It seems," said the Doctor, with mingled amusement and satire, and a kind of gratification, "that Ashburton has great confidence in you."

"It must have been the agent," said Lucilla. "I don't think any of the rest of them are equal to that. I don't see, if that is the case, how we are to win him back. If Mr. Ashburton had ever done anything very wicked, perhaps" —

"You are safe to say he is not penitent anyhow," said Dr. Marjoribanks, and he took his candle and went away with a smile. But either Mr. Ashburton's good opinion of Lucilla, or some other notion, had touched the Doctor. He was not a man who said much at any time, but when he bade her good-night, his hand drooped upon Lucilla's shoulder, and he patted it softly, as he might have patted the head of a child. It was not much, but still it was a good deal from him. To feel the lingering touch of her father's hand caressing her, even in so mild a way, was something quite surprising and strange to Miss Marjoribanks. She looked up at him almost with alarm, but he was just then turning away with his candle in his hand. And he seemed to have laid aside his gloom, and even smiled to himself as he went up-stairs. "If she had been the boy instead of that young ass," he said to himself. He could not have explained why he was more than ordinarily hard just then upon the innocent, far-distant Tom, who was unlucky, it is true, but not exactly an ass, after all. But somehow it struck the Doctor more than ever how great a loss it was to society and to herself that Lucilla was not "the boy." She could have continued, and perhaps extended, the practice, whereas just now it was quite possible that she might drop down into worsted-work and tea-parties like any other single woman — while Tom, who had carried off the family honours, and was "the boy" in this limited and unfruitful generation, was never likely to do anything to speak of, and would be a poor man if he were to live for a hundred years. Perhaps there was something else behind that made the Doctor's brow contract a little as he crossed the threshold of his chamber, into which, no more than into the recesses of his heart, no one ever penetrated; but it was the lighter idea of that comparison, which had no actual pain in it, but only a kind of humorous discontent, which was the last articulate thought in his mind as he went to his room and closed his door with a little sharpness as he always did, upon the outside world.

Aunt Jemima, for her part, lingered a little with Lucilla down-stairs. "My dear, I don't think my brother-in-law looks well to-night. I don't think Carlingford is so healthy as it is said to be. If I were you, Lucilla, I would try and get your papa to take something," said Mrs. John, with anxiety, "before he goes to bed."

"Dear aunt Jemima, he never takes anything. You forget he is a doctor," said Miss Marjoribanks. "It always puts him out when he has to go out in the evening; and he is sad about Mrs. Chiley, though he would not say so." But nevertheless Lucilla knocked at his door when she went up-stairs. And the Doctor, though he did not open, growled within with a voice which reassured his dutiful daughter. "What should I want, do you think, but to be left quiet?" the Doctor said. And even Mrs. John, who had waited at his door, with her candle in her hand, to hear the result, shrank within at the sound and was seen no more. And Miss Marjoribanks, too, went to her rest, with more than one subject of thought which kept her awake. In the first place, the Rector was popular in his way, and if he chose to call all his forces to rally round a penitent, there was no saying what might come of it; and then Lucilla could not help going back in the most illogical manner to her father's caress, and wondering what was the meaning of it. Meantime the snow fell heavily outside, and wrapped everything in a soft and secret whiteness. And amid the whiteness and darkness, the lamp burned steadily outside at the garden-gate, which pointed out the Doctor's door amid all the closed houses and dark garden-walls in Grange Lane — a kind of visible succour and help always at hand for those who were suffering. And though Dr. Marjoribanks was not like a young man making a practice, but had perfect command of Carlingford, and was one of the richest men in it, it was well known in the town that the very poorest, if in extremity, in the depths of the wildest night that ever blew, would not seek help there in vain. The bell that had roused him when he was young, still hung near him in the silence of his closed-up house when he was old, and still could make him spring up, all self-possessed and ready, when the enemy death had to be fought with. But that night the snow cushioned the wire outside, and even made white cornices and columns about the steady lamp, and the Doctor slept within, and no one disturbed him; for except Mrs. Chiley and a few chronic patients, there was nothing particularly amiss in Carlingford, and then it was Dr. Rider whom all the new people went to, the people who lived in the innumerable new houses at the other end of Carlingford, and had no hallowing tradition of the superior authority of Grange Lane.

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE talk of this evening might not have been considered of any importance to speak of, but for the extraordinary and most unlooked-for event which startled all Carlingford next morning. Nobody could believe that it was true. Dr. Marjoribanks's patients waited for him, and declared to their nurses that it was all a made-up-story, and that he would come and prove that he was not dead. How could he be dead? He had been as well as he ever was that last evening. He had gone down Grange Lane in the snow, to see the poor old lady who was now sobbing in her bed, and saying it was all a mistake, and that it was she who ought to have died. But all those protestations were of no avail against the cold and stony fact which had frightened Thomas out of his senses, when he went to call the Doctor. He had died in the night without calling or disturbing anybody. He must have felt faint, it seemed, for he had got up and taken a little brandy, the remains of which still stood on the table by his bedside; but that was all that anybody could tell about it. They brought Dr. Rider, of course; but all that he could do was to examine the strong, still frame, old, and yet not old enough to be weakly, or to explain such sudden extinction, which had ceased its human functions. And then the news swept over Carlingford like a breath of wind, though there was no wind even on that silent snowy day to carry the matter. Dr. Marjoribanks was dead. It put the election out of people's heads, and even their own affairs for the time being; for had he not known all about the greater part of them — seen them come into the world and kept them in it — and put himself always in the breach when the pale Death approached that way? He had never made very much boast of his friendliness or been large in sympathetic expressions, but yet he had never flinched at any time, or deserted his patients for any consideration. Carlingford was sorry, profoundly sorry, with that true sorrow which is not so much for the person mourned as for the mourner's self, who feels a sense of something lost. The people said to themselves, Whom could they ever find who would know their constitution so well, and who was to take care of So-and-so if he had another attack? To be sure Dr. Rider was at hand, who felt a little agitated about it, and was conscious of the wonderful opening, and was very ready to answer, "I am here;" but a young doctor is different from an old one, and a living man all in commonplace health and comfort is not to be compared with a dead one, on the morning at least of his sudden ending. Thank heaven, when a life is ended there is always that hour or two remaining to set straight the defective balances, and do a hasty late justice to the dead, before the wave sweeps on over him and washes out the traces of his steps, and lets in the common crowd to make their thoroughfare over the grave.

"It cannot be the Doctor," Mrs. Chiley said, sobbing in her bed, "or else it has been in mistake for me. He was always a healthy man and never had anything the matter with him — and a great deal younger than we are, you know. If anything has happened to him it must have been in mistake for me," said the poor old lady, and she was so hysterical that they had to send for Dr. Rider, and she was thus the first to begin to build the new world on the foundations of the old, little as she meant it. But for the moment everything was paralysed in Grange Lane, and canvassing came to a standstill, and nothing was discussed but Dr. Marjoribanks — how he was dead, though nobody could or would believe it; and how Lucilla would be left, and who her trustees were, and how the place could ever get used to the want of him, or would ever look like itself again without his familiar presence. It was by way of relieving their minds from the horror of the idea, that the good people rushed into consultations what Lucilla would do. It took their minds a little off the ghastly imagination of that dark room with the snow on the window, and the late moonlight trying to get into the darkness, and the white rigid face inside, as he was said to have been found. It could not but make a terrible change to her — indeed, through her it could not but make a great change to everybody. The Doctor's house would, of course, be shut up, which had been the most hospitable house in Carlingford, and things would drop into the unsatisfactory state they used to be in before Miss Marjoribanks's time, and there would no longer be anybody to organize society. Such were the ideas the ladies of Grange Lane relapsed into by way of delivering themselves from the pain of their first realization of what had happened. It would make a great change. Even the election and its anticipated joys could not but change character in some respects at least, and there would be nobody to make the best of them; and then the question was, What would Lucilla do? Would she have strength to "make an effort," as some people suggested; or would she feel not only her grief, but her downfall, and that she was now only a single woman, and sink into a private life, as some others were inclined to believe.

Inside the house, naturally, the state of affairs was sad enough. Lucilla, notwithstanding the many other things she had had to occupy her mind, was fond of her father, and the shock overwhelmed her for the moment. Though she was not the kind of woman to torture herself with thinking of things that she might have done, still at the first moment the idea that she ought not to have left him alone — that she should have sat up and watched or taken some extraordinary unusual precaution — was not to be driven away from her mind. The reign of reason was eclipsed in her as it often is in such an emergency. She said it was her fault in the first horror. "When I saw how he was looking, and how he was talking, I should never have left him," said Lucilla, which indeed was a very natural thing to say, but would have been an utterly impossible one to carry out, as she saw when she came to think of it. But she could not think of it just then. She did not think at all that first long snowy, troubled day, but went about the house, on the bedroom floor, wringing her hands like a creature distracted. "If I had only sat up," she said; and then she would recall the touch of his hand on her shoulder, which she seemed still to be feeling, and cry out, like all the rest of the world, that it could not be true. But, to be sure, that was a state of feeling that could not last long. There are even's for which something higher than accident must be held accountable, were one ever so ready to take the burden of affairs on one's own shoulders; and Lucilla knew, when she came to herself, that if she had watched ever so long or so closely, that could have had no effect upon the matter. After a while the bewildering sense of her own changed position began to come upon her, and roused her up into that feverish and unnatural activity of thought which, in some minds, is the inevitable reaction after the unaccustomed curb and shock of grief. When she had got used to that dreadful certainty about her father, and had suddenly come with a leap to the knowledge that she was not to blame, and could not help it, and that though he was gone, she remained, it is no censure upon Lucilla to say that her head became immediately full of a horror and confusion of thoughts, an involuntary stir and bustle of plans and projects, which she did all she could to put down, but which would return and overwhelm her whether she chose it or not. She could not help asking herself what her new position was, thinking it over, so strangely free and new and unlimited as it seemed. And it must be recollected that Miss Marjoribanks was a woman of very active mind and great energies, too old to take up a girl's fancy that all was over because she had encountered a natural grief on her passage, and too young not to see a long future still before her. She kept her room, as was to be expected, and saw nobody, and only moved the household and superintended the arrangements in a muffled way through Thomas, who was an old servant, and knew "the ways" of the house; but notwithstanding her seclusion and her honest sorrow, and her perfect observance of all the ordinary restraints of the moment, it would be wrong to omit all mention of this feverish bustle of thinking which came into Lucilla's mind in her solitude. Of all that she had to bear, it was the thing that vexed and irritated and distressed her the most — as if, she said to herself indignantly, she ought to have been able to think of anything! And the chances are that Lucilla, for sheer duty's sake, would have said, if anybody had asked, that of course she had not thought of anything as yet; without being aware that the mere shock, and horror, and profound commotion had a great deal more to do than anything else in producing that fluttering crowd of busy, vexatious speculations which had come, without any will of hers, into her heart.

It looked a dreadful change in one way as she looked at it without wishing to look at it in the solitude of her own room, where the blinds were all down, and the snow sometimes came with a little thump against the window, and where it was so dark that it was a comfort when night came, and the lamp could be lighted. So far as Carlingford was concerned, it would be almost as bad for Miss Marjoribanks as if she were her father's widow instead of his daughter. To keep up a position of social importance in a single woman's house, unless as she had herself lightly said so short a time since, she were awfully rich, would be next to impossible. All that gave importance to the centre of society—the hospitable table, the open house—had come to an end with the Doctor. Things could no more be as they had once been, in that respect at least. She might stay in the house, and keep up to the furthest extent possible to her its old traditions; but even to the utmost limit to which Lucilla could think it right to go it could never be the same. This consciousness kept gleaming upon her as she sat in the dull daylight, behind the closed blinds, with articles of mourning piled about everywhere, and the grey dimness getting into her very eyes, and her mind distressed by the consciousness that she ought to have been unable to think; and the sadness of the prospect altogether was enough to stir up a reaction, in spite of herself, in Miss Marjoribanks's mind.

And on the other side she would no doubt be very well off, and could go wherever she liked, and had no limit, except what was right and proper and becoming, to what she might please to do. She might go abroad if she liked, which perhaps is the first idea of the modern English mind when anything happens to it, and settle wherever she pleased, and arrange her mode of existence as seemed good in her own eyes. She would be an heiress in a moderate way, and aunt Jemima was by this time absolutely at her disposal, and could be taken anywhere; and at Lucilla's age it was quite impossible to predict what might not happen to a woman in such a position. When these fairer possibilities gleamed into Lucilla's mind, it would be difficult to describe the anger and self-disgust with which she reproached herself—for perhaps it was the first time that she had consciously failed in maintaining a state of mind becoming the occasion; and though nobody but herself knew of it, the pain of the accusation was acute and bitter. But how could Miss Marjoribanks help it?—the mind travels so much quicker than anything else, and so far, and makes its expeditions in such subtle, stealthy ways. She might begin by thinking of her dear papa, and yet before she could dry her eyes might be off in the midst of one of these bewildering speculations. For everything was certain now so far as he was concerned; and everything was so uncertain, and full of such unknown issues for herself. Thus the dark days before the funeral passed by—and everybody was very kind. Dr. Marjoribanks was one of the props of the place, and all Carlingford bestirred itself to do him the final honours; and all her friends conspired how to save Lucilla from all possible trouble, and help her over the trial; and to see how much he was respected was the greatest of all possible comforts to her, as she said.

Thus it was that among the changes that everybody looked for, there occurred all at once this change which was entirely unexpected, and put everything else out of mind for the moment. For to tell the truth, Dr. Marjoribanks was one of the men who, according to external appearance, need never have died. There was nothing about him that wanted to be set right, no sort of loss, or failure, or misunderstanding, so far as anybody could see. An existence in which he could have his friends' dinner every week, and a good house, and good wine, and a very good table, and nothing particular to put him out of his way, seemed in fact the very ideal of the best life for the Doctor. There was nothing in him that seemed to demand anything better, and it was confusing to try to follow him into that which, no doubt, must be in all its fundamentals a very different kind of world. He was a just man and a good man in his way, and had been kind to many people in his lifetime—but still he did not seem to have that need of another rectifying completer existence which most men have. There seemed no reason why he should die—a man who was so well contented with this lower region in which many of us fare badly, and where so few of us are contented. This was a fact which exercised a very confusing influence, even when they themselves were not aware of it, on many people's minds. It was hard to think of him under any other circumstances, or identify him with angels and spirits—which feeling on the whole made the regret for him a more poignant sort of regret.

And they buried him with the greatest signs of respect. People from twenty miles off sent their carriages, and all the George Street people shut their shops, and there was very little business done all day. Mr. Cavendish and Mr. Ashburton walked side by side at the funeral, which was an affecting sight to see; and if anything more could have been done to show their respect which was not done, the corporation of Carlingford would have been sorry for it. And the snow still lay deep in all the corners, though it had been trampled down all about the Doctor's house, where the lamp was not lighted now of nights; for what was the use of lighting the lamp, which was a kind of lighthouse in its way, and meant to point out succour and safety for the neighbours, when the physician himself was lying beyond all hope of succour or aid? And all the Grange Lane people retired in a sympathetic, awe-stricken way, and decided, or at least the ladies did, to see Lucilla next day, if she was able to see them, and to find out whether she was going to make an effort, or what she meant to do. And Mrs. Chiley was so much better that she was able to be up a little in the evening, though she scarcely could forgive herself, and still could not help thinking that it was she who had really been sent for, and that the Doctor had been taken in mistake. And as for Lucilla, she sat in her room and cried, and thought of her father's hand upon her shoulder—that last unusual caress which was more touching to think of than a world of words. He had been fond of her and proud of her, and at the last moment he had showed it. And by times she seemed to feel again that lingering touch, and cried as if her heart would break: and yet, for all that, she could not keep her thoughts steady, nor prevent them from wandering to all kinds of profane out-of-door matters, and to considerations of the future, and estimates of her own position. It wounded her sadly to feel herself in such an inappropriate state of mind, but she could not help it; and then the want of natural light and air oppressed her sorely, and she longed for the evening, which felt a little more natural, and thought that at last she might have a long talk with aunt Jemima, who was a kind of refuge in her present loneliness, and gave her a means of escape at the same time from all this bustle and commotion of unbecoming thoughts.

This was enough surely for any one to have to encounter at one time; but that very night another rumour began to murmur through Carlingford—a rumour more bewildering, more incredible still, than that of the Doctor's death, which the town had been obliged to confirm and acknowledge, and put its seal to. When the thing was first mentioned, everybody (who could find it in their heart to laugh) laughed loud in the face of the first narrator with mingled scepticism and indignation. They asked him what he meant by it, and ridiculed and scoffed at him to his face. "Lucilla will be the richest woman in Grange Lane," people said; "everybody in Carlingford knows that." But after this statement had been made, the town began to listen. It was obliged to listen, for other witnesses came in to confirm the story. It never might have been found out while the Doctor lived, for he had a great practice, and made a great deal of money; but now that he was dead, nothing could be hid. He was dead, and he had made an elaborate will, which was all as just and righteous as a will could be; but after the will was read, it was found out that everything named in it had disappeared like a bubble. Instead of being the richest, Dr. Marjoribanks was one of the poorest men in Carlingford, when he shut his door behind him on that snowy night. It was a revelation which took the town perfectly by storm, and startled everybody out of their senses. Lucilla's plans, which she thought so wicked, went out all of a sudden, in a certain dull amaze and dismay, to which no words could give any expression. Such was the second inconceivable reverse of fortune which happened to Miss Marjoribanks, more unexpected, more incomprehensible still than the other, in the very midst of her most important activities and hopes.

STUART MILL ON MIND AND MATTER.*

A NEW SONG.

AIR — "Roy's Wife of Aldivalloch."

*Stuart Mill, on Mind and Matter,
All our old Beliefs would scatter :
Stuart Mill exerts his skill
To make an end of Mind and Matter.*

The self-same tale I've surely heard,
Employed before, our faith to batter :
Has David Hume again appeared,
To run a-muck at Mind and Matter ?

*David Hume could Mind and Matter
Ruthlessly assault and batter :
Those who Hume would now exhume
Must mean to end both Mind and Matter.*

Now Mind, now Matter, to destroy,
Was oft proposed, at least the latter :
But David was the daring boy
Who fairly floored both Mind and Matter.

*David Hume, both Mind and Matter,
While he lived, would boldly batter :
Hume to Mill bequeathed by Will His favourite feud with Mind and Matter.*

Men think they see the Things that be ;
But Truth is coy, we can't get at her ;
For what we spy is all my eye,
And isn't really Mind or Matter.

*Hume and Mill on Mind and Matter
Sweat that others merely smatter :
Sense reveals that Something feels,
But tells no tale of Mind or Matter.*

Against a stone you strike your toe ;
You feel 'tis sore, it makes a clatter :
But what you feel is all you know
Of toe, or stone, or Mind, or Matter.

*Mill and Hume of Mind and Matter
Wouldn't leave a rag or tatter :
What although we feel the blow ?
That doesn't show there's Mind or Matter.*

*"Matter, then, may be defined a Permanent Possibility of Sensation." — Mill's Examination of Hamilton, p. 198.

"The belief I entertain that my mind exists, when it is not feeling, nor thinking, nor conscious of its own existence, resolves itself into the belief of a Permanent Possibility of these states." "The Permanent Possibility of feeling, which forms my notion of myself." — Ibid., pp. 206, 206.

We meet and mix with other men ;
With women, too, who sweetly chatter :
But mayn't we here be duped again,
And take our thoughts for Mind and Matter ?

*Sights and sounds like Mind and Matter,
Fairy forms that seem to chatter,
May be gleams in Fancy's dreams
Of Men and Women, Mind and Matter.*

Successive feelings on us seize
(As thick as falling hail-stones patter),
The Chance of some return of these,
Is all we mean by Mind or Matter.

*Those who talk of Mind and Matter
Just a senseless jargon patter :
What are We, or you, or he ? — Dissolving views, not Mind or Matter.*

We're but a train of visions vain,
Of thoughts that cheat, and hopes that flatter :
This hour's our own, the past is flown ;
The rest unknown, like Mind and Matter.

*Then farewell to Mind and Matter ;
To the winds at once we scatter
Time and Place, and Form and Space
And You and Me, and Mind and Matter,*

We banish hence Reid's Common Sense ;
We laugh at Dugald Stewart's blatter ;
Sir William, too, and Mansel's crew,
We've done for You, and Mind and Matter.

*Speak no more of Mind and Matter :
Mill with mud may else bespatter
All your schools of silly fools,
That dare believe in Mind or Matter.*

But had I skill, like Stuart Mill,
His own position I could shatter :
The weight of Mill, I count as Nil —
If Mill has neither Mind nor Matter.

*Mill, when minus Mind and Matter,
Though he make a kind of clatter,
Must himself just mount the Shelf,
And there be laid with Mind and Matter.*

I'd push my logic further still (Though this may have the look of satire) :
I'd prove there's no such man as Mill, —
If Mill disproves both Mind and Matter.

*If there's neither Mind nor Matter,
Mill's existence, too, we shatter :
If you still believe in Mill,
Believe as well in Mind and Matter.*

THE TIMES ON AMERICAN TRADE.

A SINGULAR controversy has lately arisen between the Times and some of its commercial correspondents, which is not the less important though it may be impossible to arrive at a certain conclusion. The Times insists that the trade with the United States is absorbing English capital to an extent which threatens soon to lead to a pressure, and possibly to a genuine crisis, such as has not been witnessed for nearly ten years. The American merchants, on the other hand, show, or attempt to show, that the balance of our exports to their country over the imports during the last few months is extremely small; that the trade, though rapidly augmented, is thoroughly sound; and that there never was less occasion for commercial alarm. After the most careful consideration of the returns which relate to the commerce of the country, it is by no means easy to ascertain the exact truth as to the figures in dispute. It is undoubtedly true, as the Times maintains, that there has recently been a great expansion of the export trade to the American ports. On the other hand, it is equally true that the arrivals of cotton have been largely in excess of the import of former years, and that to some considerable extent the remaining balance has been made good by the importation of American securities. Without entering into the fruitless controversy as to the precise amount of the debt which is running up against America, we may assume that it is not very far from being represented by the amount of imported bonds. Though the great impulse to this trade began two or three months ago, there is no flow of bullion either way between the two countries, nor any very distinct trace of an equivalent operation through the channel of any third country. Whatever America may owe us is clearly a debt of which payment is not at present very urgently demanded; and though, in part, this may be due to the fact that credits are unexpired, it is probably attributable in much greater measure to the considerable amount of Federal bonds and other American securities which has been purchased in England since the establishment of peace. This, of course, has only the effect of changing the form, without diminishing the amount, of national indebtedness; but it must not be forgotten that, if a tendency now exists to invest in Transatlantic securities, it may work for some time before it supplies us with as large a total as was always held in England before the civil war. Moreover, the excess of exports over imports is not yet supposed by the most gloomy prophets to exceed seven or eight millions; and it is a fair observation that, while the City prophet of the Times sees no cause for alarm in a foreign loan recently announced for about the same amount, he need scarcely be frightened out of his senses by trading operations on a corresponding scale. It is noticeable that foreign loans, which may be rational investments for surplus capital, have a far more serious influence on our Money-market than the application of an equal sum of money to domestic enterprise or foreign trade; and yet it always happens that the Times, which watches with so much jealousy—and, we may add, with so much reason—the progress of joint-stock speculation and export trade, has never a word to say against the wildest proposals for putting British capital into the hands of foreign Governments whose solvency is measured by promised rates of interest of the most extravagant kind. It is probably this one-sided view of the transactions of the Exchange that has produced much of the unbelief with which the warnings of the Times City articles have been recently received. They are palpably over-strained in attributing the most tremendous possible consequences to the absorption of what cannot be considered a very vast amount of capital; and many traders who know that the American trade is going on very smoothly, and to all appearance very profitably, at present, have jumped to the opposite conclusion, that there is nothing in the present state of commerce to call for any special degree of watchfulness. It may turn out that in this theory they are wandering further on one side of the truth than the Times has done on the other, and certainly excessive confidence is a more dangerous temper than excessive caution.

The fact seems to be that the really important point has been lost sight of, or at any rate kept in the back-ground, by both parties to the discussion. They have wasted their ingenuity and their power of assertion in the endeavour to determine the precise amount of the adverse balance, when the real danger is not at all that a moderate temporary outlay of this kind will prove more than English capital is able to provide for. At the most, if we assume American trade to be thoroughly sound, there is only an investment of a few millions in safe hands, and it will need something more than this to derange the whole course of English commerce. But, in the midst of all the wrangling about a secondary point, the real question of which the importance cannot be exaggerated is wholly overlooked. What the ultimate issue of the present activity of commerce may be depends mainly on the position in which our American debtors may find themselves before the year is over. If no part of the foreign and internal activity of American traders is due to the enormous expansion of their currency; if they have emerged from the war with a solid basis of capital capable of supporting a traffic twice as large as that which existed before the first shot was fired; if the exhaustion of the South and the feverish speculation of the North involve no elements of weakness; if there is no risk that trade may collapse as soon as the attempt shall be made to bring back the currency to par; if, in short Mr. McCULLOCH is entirely wrong in warning his countrymen against the existing tendency to inflation; then we may rest assured that nothing will shake the foundations of American commerce, and that the profits on our exports will well repay us for locking up a little of the aggregate national capital for a short time in American ventures. We do not observe, however, that any of the vindicators of American merchants put the case as high as this. All they do say is, that at present remittances come as satisfactorily and rapidly as could be desired; that the profits on all sides have been large; that, in spite of the duties, the American people have found the money to purchase and consume unheard-of quantities of European goods; and that no indication of immediate financial weakness is discernible. All this may be perfectly true, and yet an American crisis may be brewing all the more rapidly for the present appearance of universal prosperity. And the great danger for England is the probability, approaching to certainty, that we shall become so extensively and so intimately engaged on American account as to preclude all hope of localising any commercial disturbance, and sustaining our own financial position in spite of any disasters that may occur elsewhere. The very fact that, with a circulation enormously beyond anything which has ever existed before, the premium on gold has stood, ever since the peace, at no more than 50 per cent. is the reverse of encouraging. An excessive currency can only be absorbed in this way by an excessive trade, and reaction follows as inevitably upon excess in this as in other matters. The stability of American markets would be much better secured if gold bore a premium more in proportion to the actual amount of superfluous notes; and it is impossible to contemplate the restrictive operations which Mr. McCULLOCH is, properly enough, bent upon, without grave doubts whether American trade will come safely through the ordeal. The trial cannot be avoided by any policy, and there is much sense in the determination of the Finance Minister to grapple with the risk at once, instead of waiting for a time when the commerce of his country may be still more inflated, and allowing the evils which follow in the train of a mock-prosperity to be aggravated, as they must be, by every day's delay.

If it were only certain that we should escape the consequences of any monetary disturbance in America, the course of affairs there might be watched with the placid interest with which we ordinarily contemplate the struggles and disasters of our friends; but there has been no example of a general commercial crisis in the United States which has not been severely felt also in the English markets. It is in the possible consequences of such a calamity that the only serious danger need be feared from the expansion of our trade with the United States; and, however much the Times may have erred in supposing that England was unable to bear the weight of a prosperous trade on the scale recently carried on, it would be a much more fatal error on the part of our merchants if they should assume that, after all she has gone through, and with all the difficulties yet to be mastered, America is not now in a very critical financial position. It is clearly not well for this country to stimulate the already unprecedented activity of American importers, or to cast in its lot too completely with a neighbour so peculiarly situated: and, with the fullest admission of the completeness of the answers to some of the reasonings of the Times, it must be owned that the conclusion was not very erroneous. If not precisely for the reason assigned, still as a matter of fact, it is just now the most prudent course to keep transactions with America within moderate bounds; and the Times may well be thanked for giving a wholesome warning, even by those who utterly dissent from its somewhat extravagant picture of the present condition of our American trade.

THE TRIUMPH OF IDEAS.

THERE is strength, then, in ideas after all. Never, perhaps, in the history of the world did an idea gain so rapid, complete, and visible a triumph as that which was consummated at Washington on the 19th December. One of the many depressing signs around us which observers watch with alarm, is the apparent decay, or rather temporary paralysis, of the faith in ideas. In the new search for intellectual realism people doubt audibly—witness the Pall Mall Gazette of Thursday, on the French Press—whether thought is stronger than armies, whether an idea has, simply because it is great, the power of making itself effective. They do not despise thought, they do not many of them deny that it would be well if it were stronger than bayonets, but they question its effectiveness, its power to cloth itself in flesh and bones, and do great things in the world. Freedom is better than tyranny; but, after all, French freedom has battled for a hundred years only to be suppressed by the peasants of France. Pauperism is an evil; but, after all, the ideas of the social thinkers of Europe have not perceptibly diminished pauperism. Ignorance is bad; but, after all, crime varies in the ratio of population, and not in that of education and enlightenment. Is it worth while to fight for a great idea, and with vast pain and expenditure of energy and self-sacrifice to accelerate its diffusion one little hairbreadth, when, after all, it may never grow strong enough to affect the welfare of mankind? Ideas must grow, and for growth there must be soil, and there is as yet no such thing, but only sand. Enthusiasts waste their lives in preaching co-operation, and co-operation is good; but to be effective, it needs a lower class aware that self-sacrifice is essential to its success—and there is no such class. Why strive and toil, and it may be perish, to advance a principle which after all may never be more than abstract? Is it not better, or even nobler, says the modern Archimedes, to become wise one's-self, but never apply wisdom, to study the lever, but never build a catapult, to play the part of the intellectual Sadducee, seeing the wrong and the right and commenting thereon, but otherwise well content to know that sugar is sweet, and that one has sugar? Or better still, to do all that, and also what little good comes to hand easily, and leave principles to take of themselves; punish the beadle who starves the pauper, but level no stroke at pauperism? Now, as ever, ideas seem "to the wise," that is to those who want results, a "stumbling-block," and "to the Greeks," that is to Saturday Reviewers, who want everything to conduct itself in a highly cultured way, mere "foolishness."

The advocates of this "philosophy of common sense" which after all is only utilitarianism degraded from a creed into an opinion, always seem to us to omit one great datum from their calculation. Souls always accrete themselves bodies of some kind, though not necessarily the fittest bodies. Great ideas do not always triumph only by percolation; if they did, enthusiasts might well despair, for no generation would ever witness the realization of its own greatest thoughts. The labour of sending a new thought requiring the assent of millions before it can be effective through those millions of hostile and unreceptive minds would daunt the imagination of the thinkers of to-day, as it did those of the same class in the century before Christ, and again during the Renaissance. Individuals dislike planting oaks till the only oaks planted in Europe for timber are those planted by States, or by nobles who expect their families to endure like States. Let posterity judge, is the wish of the dreamer, rarely that of the man intent on diffusing a real idea. He wants to see it succeed, and, if he cannot see it, turns aside, as Comte did, to plunge into himself till he becomes a mere dreamer of dreams. Fortunately for mankind, the first property of an idea, that is of a thought with fructifying power, a thought for which men can be martyrs, is to accrete to itself weapons not its own, to use causes and dominate classes, and as it were dye acts, with all which it has little or no connection. The French idea of equality won its way not by percolation, but because there was in the France of 1789 no road to justice and physical comfort but through it. The idea of Free Trade by itself would never have won the battle, for the English masses are not free-traders yet, but it drew to itself the desire for cheaper food, and so used the "big loaf" as to come out triumphant. It will be triumphant in America, when it has found a similar weapon, and all who support it assist the day when the search for such a weapon shall be successful. We remember reading once an account in an American magazine, how far accurate we know not, of the way in which education triumphed in Rhode Island. The rulers there, middle-class, well-to-do men, would not have the idea, declared it expensive and visionary, fought it on the ground of economy, suc-

cooded year after in preventing its taking to itself a body in the shape of a legislative Act. The suffrage, however, was wide, and one fine morning Rhode Island found itself in presence of an imminent agrarian law. The idea had found its weapon, opposition died instantly away, and the common schools of Rhode Island are amongst the best in the Union. The truth would seem to be that conviction, or as most men following an Oriental model call it, faith, is in itself power, and that a minority once fully imbued with a principle can and does lead a majority anxious for something very different, but convinced against their will, or rather with their will and against their prejudices. Conviction gives the power to convince, and as we see every day in theological life and the life of scientific enthusiasts, faith is an effluent power as much as fire or electricity, or many other of the physical forces. Even inferior men, once possessed of it, can dominate superior men, and those who are not statesmen can lead masses, who are seeking far different results, direct to the one the enthusiasts have desired.

The recent illustration is, we believe, the most wonderful, or at least the most visible, yet recorded. On the 19th December Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, announced officially that the constitutional amendments abolishing slavery and enabling Congress to make that abolition effectual, had been signed by twenty-seven States, and had consequently become part of the Federal Constitution. It is not yet six years since John Brown died on the gallows, saying, "God sees that I am of more use to hang than for any other earthly purpose." He was the first abolitionist who died fighting the slave power, and in his death was one more illustration of the "worn out" truth that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church. It is impossible to conceive a cause more triumphant than that of slavery was when that old man, after kissing the negro child — thick-lipped child, with yellow whites to its eyes — walked quietly up to the gallows surrounded by an execrating soldiery. The institution, fenced in by the active love of eight millions who could slay or be slain for it, by the reverence of twenty millions more, who when the national existence was in question hardly dared to touch it, by the silent respect of probably five-sixths of the rulers of earth, who felt slavery an outpost of their own dominion, seemed beyond all human attack. The most sanguine dreamer only hoped that time and civilization might in their slow development gradually ameliorate the curse. The "wise" defended it, the "Greeks," — always wiser than the wise, as the Saturday Review is wiser than the Record, — thought John Brown's attempt a foolish waste of life, and yet as the fanatic body gave up its soul, slavery, to end which John Brown had given his body and offered his soul, died too. In all history nothing is more certain than that from John Brown's "mad" attempt sprang secession. "These men, then, can fight," said the South, "can die for their wild fanaticism, are not cowards, but madmen;" and from that moment, as Calhoun had prophesied, the South saw in separation the only chance for its beloved institution. It seceded, and the "idea" so long contemned, and derided, and despised, leaped up armed. Its advocates, by no means able men as a rule, were still the only men who saw, what the statesmen could not see, that in slavery was the root of the evil, that it or the Union must die, that in it lay the death warrant of Republican institutions. Alone decided amidst the rushing crowd, these men were always foremost, and always therefore guided the else vacillating rush. Reluctantly, defiantly almost, another idea, the thirst for empire, always armed and always ready for battle, placed its armies at the disposal of a nobler thought, and to secure a geographical gain worked out a moral victory. A half convinced President proclaimed to a partly convinced army and an unconvinced people that he accepted an idea he had not made, that not because it stood condemned of God, not because it was in itself the sum and aggregate of all human wickedness, but because it was opposed to a glorious dream — the dream of a continent set apart for the peaceful progress of humanity — slavery should die. And he did die, die of hard blows, and blood shed, and brave men put to flight, and strong men sent to the gallows — Captain Gordon, e. g. — and all those things which are done only by power clothed in flesh and dressed in armour. The idea had become flesh, had dressed itself in armour, and struck — this abstract and lightly ungentelemanly thing, as the Pall Mall Gazette would say — terrible physical blows, as social equality has also struck, as religious freedom may strike, as democracy, one of the grandest, if one of the most imperfect ideas which ever visited man, will yet strike, at recalcitrant power. In 1859 abolition was John Brown. In 1865 it was John Brown followed by a million of armed and drilled Anglo-Saxons, intent doubtless on many ends, but fulfilling in their own despite always the end that to John Brown was living, when as he walked—slightly slouching, possibly—to the gallows he kissed that thick-lipped child.

And so it will always be. It is hard even for trained thinkers intent upon their work to explain precisely why a true idea always wins—except indeed by saying what to-day is an argument only with the Record, and the Record's bitterest antagonist, that the Judge of all the earth can do only right, and that He is irresistible—but the fact remains. Great ideas have strength. Let the strongest man in Europe try a fall with the Emperor Napoleon and he will be beaten, will possibly end his days in rowing a boat under the lash through the bayous of Cayenne. Nevertheless, as sure as the idea of freedom is higher than the idea of authority, so surely will Napoleonism pass away, leaving only the trace a beacon light leaves when it flashes on a quagmire or a rock. Nothing on earth at this moment seems so invincible as English pauperism. It is protected by the faith of the strongest people that ever lived, by the impregnable earth wall of human ignorance, by a wretched perversion of the words of the Son of God, and it will fall nevertheless, fall till its defence will seem, not to our "sons" or our posterity, but to us, a momentary aberration which volumes will be written to explain. Ideas are stronger than armies, for they can not only produce armies, as the idea which led to the Crusades did, but they can borrow armies, as the idea which produced Abolition did, and as the idea which demands justice in Jamaica will do. These good Tories think they will have a majority upon that question, which is really an "idea,"—the right of the British subject with pigment in his cuticle to the same measure as the British subject without pigment—and their view, though an improbable one, is of course a possible one. What then? The Sadducees may say the true policy is to see that the people of Jamaica are oppressed, and be silent lest there should be a fuss about it, and uncultivated people say things pleasing to the Almighty but not to Oxford, and the Sadducees will be for their ends in the right. And the idea will march on nevertheless, till it meets some day, and at no long day, the flesh, beautiful or hideous, which will clothe it with the required physical power, and the Sadducees will cower first of all, and acknowledge, "Lo! here is Truth armed." Fighting her is not my business, but concession. Why fight with expediencies which have become strong? Whence the flesh is to come we know not, possibly from some low greed for gain which only the negro can secure to us, but come it will at last, and then the idea clothed and visible will rule with the tyrannical sway all Anglo-Saxon ideas assume. Meanwhile it is well for the few who have not lost the capacity for intellectual faith to march on, carrying their idea over an ever widening range until at last the body is found, careless of those who satirize them as fanatics, dangerous to those who denounce them as evil men, firm even against those who, seeing as clearly as themselves, will lend no hand to help because the workmen reek so with their toil. Was ever enthusiast yet so silly as he who first put a seed into the ground and expected the rotten mite to grow?

THE GOVERNMENT OF COLOURED RACES IN COLONIES.

* PERHAPS nothing so much illustrates the careless hand-to-mouth state of political opinion in England as the utter ignorance of two-thirds of the people, and the utter indifference of nearly the whole other third, as to the principles on which alien and dissimilar races ought to be governed. Whoever at any time thinks at all on the subject of civil government must think on this. But the fact is that, in England, very few people ever do think of the theory of government. We pride ourselves on our "practical" character and habits. We rejoice that we are not as other nations are, theorists and formalists. We have shaped, rather than designed, a form of government which altogether suits our disposition and our wants, but which is so full of modifications, inconsistencies, checks and counter-checks, that we should wholly despair of making it intelligible to an enlightened citizen of those nations which rejoice in the elaborate enunciation of first principles, and the rigid formularies of codified constitutions. We do not care very much about first principles. We fashion for ourselves a Parliament and Government, and refashion them as we feel the need of change. But we leave to a select few, whether natives or foreigners, the duty of explaining, criticizing, and formalizing what we have done.

This so-called "practical" character of our minds has made most of us wholly indifferent, if not blind, to one of the greatest problems which can puzzle the ingenuity of statesmen. For certainly no question can well be more puzzling than this: — "How ought subject alien races to be governed?" Even when the unexpected flash of a Jamaica rebellion or tumult startles us, we fail to recognize in the event a symptom which we ought long since to have studied and examined. We had a graver warning in the Indian mutiny; smaller ones in disturbances at St. Vincent's and Antigua. The Indian mutiny was put down, but it flared long enough to startle the whole of England with its unwonted blaze. The riots at St. Vincent's and Antigua were also put down, though not in a very satisfactory or honourable way; for the one required the intervention of French troops, and the other left vestiges of greater alarm on the minds of those who had been assailed than of those who disturbed the public peace. The final suppression of the first, and the comparative obscurity of the latter insurrections deadened inquiry and thought in England. "Practical" men took it for granted that, if such outbreaks did occur, some means would be found to put them down. So all concern was dissipated, men ceased to think on the subject, and its important bearings on the relations, not only of England, but of other European countries, to other multifarious races were soon lost sight of.

Yet, even in an age in which intelligent artisans allow themselves to be persuaded by a powerful demagogue that there was a time in the history of England when the right of voting for members of Parliament was possessed by all yearly tenants of houses (as that phrase is now understood), it may not be impossible to convince some persons that the question which we have propounded, even if difficult of solution, is worthy of consideration. To us, as a people, it is one of urgent importance. To others — for example, Holland, France, Spain, and the United States — it is only of less importance because their coloured and alien subjects are less numerous than ours. But it is important to all Europe and to the European races in North America, because both Europe and America will, every succeeding year, have greater intercourse with this motley herd of dissimilar populations. In England we see little of these races. A Lascar at a crossing, an old negro servant preserved as a relic by an only half-ruined Jamaica family, are objects which excite occasional sympathy or liking or pity in the mind of the worldly Londoner. A negro preacher or law student occasionally falls in our way; but it would hardly be accurate to say that either of these specimens is generally calculated to excite sympathy or liking beyond the unctuous pale of Exeter Hall. As a rule, English people out of London see little either of the Eastern or the African races. They do not know what it is to grow up with, and in close proximity to, a race of different origin, manners, thoughts, intellect, from themselves, and bearing on their bodies the strong ineradicable signs of this hereditary difference. Not only are the races different in all other characteristics, but they have the two signal marks of distinction — a distinct feature and a distinct colour. Of this contiguity of populations nothing is known in England, as it is known in the East Indies, in the West Indies, and the Southern States of the American Federation. But something distantly resembling it is known in our larger towns. There, mixed up with our own native artisans, is a large body of Irish immigrants — different indeed in race, lineament, and religion, but not different in colour or language. Such dissimilarity as does exist, though fruitful in small disputes, and inimical to fusion, does not prevent a general harmony of existence and occasional intermarriages. It gives, however, a peculiar, and perhaps not a desirable, character to the life of those districts in which the two races are found together. There is a great deal of Celtic impulse, of Celtic warmth, of Celtic mobility, and Celtic quickness, together with a certain degree of Celtic insincerity and want of truth, thrown, in casual and unadjusted proportions, into mixture with this dull stolid obstinacy of the lower Englishman. The result is not, on the whole, particularly pleasing. But then there is this to be remembered. Both the races thus brought together in frequent collision and only partial combination are of the lowest and poorest class. All the temptations and all the irritations of poverty are common to both. And the result could hardly be expected to be pleasing. When the Irish become disproportionately numerous (which they have a faculty of becoming), their characteristics give a decided tone and colour to the suburb or district. What that tone and that colour are, magistrates, vestry-men, and parish officers can best define. Whatever they are (and they are not unmixedly bad) they illustrate — partially, indeed, imperfectly, and suggestively — what it is to deal with a whole population of which not one-half or two thirds, but eight or nine-tenths, are as dissimilar and as alien from the governing race as the great Author of mankind can make his creatures.

Does it ever occur to mere loungers in a London club, laying down the law with a positiveness of assertion that makes men of experience and knowledge dumb with amazement, that there are not only inherent but increasing difficulties in the way of governing these dusky populations? That such is the case will be testified by every Englishman who returns from official, professional, or commercial life in India or the West Indies. It is natural that the feeling of nationality, and the desire of vindicating it, should in every people be intensified and exasperated by the presence of another, and that a dominant, race; and we must not be surprised if the mixed races who make up the population of British India—Hindoos, Mussulmans, and what not—should gradually learn from the incumbent sway of England the dreamy notion of a united Indian People. It may take generations to give the vision body and form; but whether it ever will—or will within any assignable period of time—become a reality, depends, according to all trustworthy accounts, much more upon Englishmen, English officers civil and military, and English residents, than on the natives themselves. "As long as we prove ourselves worthy to govern and capable of governing so long shall we continue to govern. From the moment we betray the slightest consciousness of incapacity, from that moment our raj is doomed." Such is the testimony of those who know India best and longest. And what they mean is this:—In order to govern an Eastern people, you must not shirk the outward and visible signs of governing. You must not appear to fear them, or to fear anything. You must not allow the people to take liberties with you. You must not allow them to jostle you in the streets, as they now do in Bombay. You must assert your authority in ways which might be thought strange in England. "If," say they, "you treat a Bombay man or a Bengalee as you would treat an Englishman of the lower class, you do not conciliate him; you simply affront his pride. You are of the governing race; yet you allow him to push and jostle you as he would push or jostle some wretched Pariah. He knows you do not permit this through pure affection. Therefore, he infers, you do it through fear. That simple suspicion of fear on your part is a loss equal to the loss of a great battle. It destroys the feeling of veneration, which is an instinct of the Oriental. It saps the innate submissiveness of the natives, and stimulates a rebellious contempt which one day may be fatal."

This doctrine, if it has some followers, has many opponents in England. All the religious world is opposed to it. It is apparently opposed to the teaching of the Gospel. It is not readily reconcilable with those texts which inculcate humility, long-suffering, and turning the cheek to the smiter. But, if this be so, and if India can not be retained by a precise adhesion to the most pacific texts of the New Testament, some rather embarrassing questions present themselves. If India were Christian—that is, if the people of India admitted the obligation of Christian precepts—of course every English officer of every kind might be expected to deal with them as he would deal with his own countrymen at home. But not only is this not the case now, but there seems no chance of its ever being the case. There are, and probably will continue to be, conversions, more or less genuine, to Christianity all over the peninsula. But to suppose that the mass of the Mussulman and Hindoo population will ever profess Christianity of the English Protestant type is simply one of those expectations on which no statesman would ever think of acting. And so long as they remain Mussulmans or Hindoos, so long will their awe and obedience be ensured by those virtues on the part of their masters which, though co-existent with many Christian qualities, are not themselves specially and eminently typical of the Christian character. To hold out-numbering foes at bay, to preserve a haughty and imperious demeanour amid treacherous and rebellious subjects, to forego not one jot of merited severity even when all around is ominous of danger and perfidy, these are the virtues which awe the Eastern mind; but they are not the virtues most specially inculcated in the Epistles of St. James or St. John. And we fear that those virtues which are most specially enjoined by the last-named Apostle are signally calculated to excite in the Eastern mind feelings as opposed as well can be to awe, reverence, and submission.

With regard to the negroes, a superficial contrast is established between them and the natives of India by the readiness with which the former have learned to profess Christianity. It must be remembered that the negroes who are known to us as Christians had no choice but between Christianity and Paganism. No other religion, at the time of their conversion, was known to them. At this day it is an open question whether Mahometanism, whenever it does compete with Christianity in Central and even in Western Africa, does not compete successfully. Certainly the superior tribes, the more warlike races — those of whom, because they are the more warlike, we see the least in our own colonies — are for the most part Mahometans. These men will die rather than be sold as slaves. Our own negroes became Christians after they had become slaves. And there was much in the Christianity popularly taught by the missionaries to the negroes which was likely to engage the sympathies of the latter. Compassionateness and long-suffering were qualities calculated to gain the hearts of men living in bondage. Subsequently, after the days of bondage, the negro found particular attractions in the doctrines which his Baptist teachers love to dwell on, without qualification or limitation — namely, the equality of all men; the duty of calling no man "master;" in fine, all those doctrines which are generally known as those of Christian socialism. Preached to men endowed with no power of reflection, but gifted with an amount of self-conceit which no other race of human beings ever possessed, and with a love of lazy devotion, they naturally inflated their self-importance until it broke down the barriers of ancient customs, manners, and feelings. The negro, civilly free and religiously exalted, began, like all other races, to dream of a nationality for his own colour. He was the equal of the white man. Why should he work for the white man? Why should he be governed by the white man? Such, we are informed on good authority, are the questions with which the negroes of our West India colonies season their social gatherings. Neither identity of language nor identity of creed has broken down the barrier between the white race and the black race. Both have made the negroes fanatical democrats of the socialist type. Though speaking the same tongue and living under the same laws, they have very few sympathies with white men. The black man craves an equality which the white man will not concede. The white man avows a superiority which the modern negro will not admit. The gulf widens deeper between them every day. A strong external power keeps the two elements together. It compels them in appearance to maintain a genuine harmony. In truth, it only compels them to keep a long truce. But how long will this truce last? And is this government? Can any sort of recognised polity be said to exist where two dissimilar races, of the most opposite natures, are kept from flying at one another only by a Power three thousand miles away? And that they cannot be so kept apart forever, this Jamaica outbreak shows.

Many persons who speak with a personal knowledge of the West Indies say that events have long been moving up to this catastrophe; that it was long foreseen; that it was a mere question of sooner or later; that the conflict was simply postponed by tact and management; and that it will again be repeated at no distant day. We have not experience or knowledge sufficient to affirm or deny these allegations. But we feel assured of this. If there is any truth in them, two things are clear. First, that there can be no public opinion in the West Indies; only heated passion in two hostile camps. Next, that to attempt to govern the West Indies on the principles of Exeter Hall would be as unfair to our white brethren as to govern them on the principles of Colonel Hobbes, Colonel Whitfield, and the West India ensigns would be cruel to our black subjects. Who shall discover the true art of governing the two races? The French treat their free blacks as aliens, amenable to police protection and police supervision. But this cannot now be even tried in English colonies. Such are the fruits of a government founded on a public opinion of the narrowest metropolitan pretensions. The two races are becoming intolerant of each other, and there is no powerful dispassionate mediator between them possessing the requisite knowledge of local habits, relations, and prejudices.

BELGIAN BONE CAVES.

THE explorations of the Belgian bone caves, which have been carried on for some time past by MM. Van Beneden and Dupont, have been referred to several times in the pages of THE READER. We have now to lay before our readers an account of the progress of the work up to the end of November last, and for this purpose we make use of a report recently presented by M. Dupont to the Belgian Minister of the Interior. We may premise that all the bone caves in this locality furnish indisputable evidence of one fact — viz., that the cave-dwellers were destroyed by a sudden inundation, which covered the whole of Belgium and the North of France, the evidences of which M. Dupont finds in the limon of Hesbaye and the yellow clay of the fields, and in the peculiar arrangement of the débris in the caverns. The cave at present under examination was discovered in May last, and is situated on the banks of the river Lesse, opposite the hamlet of Chaleux, about a mile and a half from the well-known Furfooz cave.

At an epoch long before that of its habitation by man, this cavern was traversed by a thermal spring. It is well lighted, is easy of access, and its situation is most picturesque. The number of objects found in this cave is enormous, and would appear to point to an extended period of occupation by these primitive people. The grand trou de Chaleux, as M. Van Beneden has proposed to call it, has also been subjected to the inundation, but the contents have been preserved almost intact, and this circumstance gives a value to the discoveries which was to some extent wanting in the Furfooz caves. According to M. Dupont's theory, the former inhabitants of the cave, warned by the dangerous cracks in the walls and ceiling, suddenly abandoned their dwelling-place, leaving behind them their tools, ornaments, and the remains of their meals. Soon afterwards the roof and sides fell in, and the pieces thus detached covered the floor. In this manner the remains have been preserved from the action of the waters, and have remained undisturbed until the present day. The unfortunate inhabitants doubtless saw in this occurrence the manifestation of a superior power, since the cavern does not appear to have been inhabited after this period, only a few worked flints and bones, probably the result of an occasional visit, having been discovered on the upper surface of the cavern.

An important point seems to be established by M. Dupont's researches — viz., the extended commercial relations of these primitive peoples. The flint which was used for the manufacture of their implements is not that of Belgium, but, according to M. de Mortillet, was brought from Touraine. Several specimens of fossil shells, most of which had been perforated, probably for the purpose of being strung together, and worn as ornaments, were collected, and were submitted to M. Nyst, the well-known palæontologist. He recognized most of them as belonging to the calcaire grossier of Courtagnon, near Rheims. Two species belonged to the department of Seine-et-Oise. Some fragments of jet and a few sharks' teeth were from the same locality. "We cannot therefore deny," says M. Dupont, "the relations of these men with Champagne, whilst there is no evidence to show their connexion with Hainaut and the province of Liège, which could have also furnished them with their flint."

Amongst other objects brought to light during the excavations was the forearm of an elephant, which appears to be that of the mammoth of Siberia, an animal which did not exist in Belgium at that epoch. "When we reflect that, till within a comparatively short time, these bones were looked upon as those of a race of giants, and gifted with miraculous powers, we cannot be surprised that our inhabitants of the caverns of the Lesse, whose civilization may be compared to that of those African nations who are sunk in the darkest depths of fetichism, attributed similar properties to those enormous bones which were placed as a fetich near their hearth."

Judging from the quantity of bones found in the cavern, the principal food of these cave-dwellers was the flesh of the horse. M. Dupont collected 937 molar teeth belonging to this animal, a number which corresponds to about forty heads, supposing each set of teeth to be complete. The marrow seems to have been in great request, all the long bones having been broken, so as to extract it. Most of them retain traces of incisions made by their flint tools. The large number of bones of water rats would also lead us to suppose that they formed a part of the food of these people, as did the badger, hair, and boar.

The number of objects obtained from this cavern is greater than that obtained from the whole of the caves previously explored. Of worked flints, in various stages of manufacture, 30,000 were collected. Besides these, M. Dupont obtained several cubic metres of bones of all kinds, the horses' teeth already mentioned, and a vast quantity of miscellaneous articles.

The facts acquired by the excavations at Chaleux, combined with those obtained at the Furfooz caves, form a striking picture of the early ages of man in Belgium. "These ancient people and their customs re-appear, after having been forgotten for thousands of years, and like the fabulous bird in whose ashes are found the germs of a new life, antiquity becomes regenerated from its own débris. We see them in their dark, subterranean dwellings surrounding the hearth, which is protected by the supernatural power of immense fantastically-shaped bones, engaged in patiently making their flint tools and utensils of reindeer horn, in the midst of pestilential emanations from the animal remains, which their indifference allowed them to retain in their dwelling. The skins of wild beasts, having the hair removed, were stitched together by the aid of their sharpened flints and ivory needles, and served as clothing. We see them pursuing wild animals armed with arrows and lances tipped with a barb of flint. We take part in their feasts, where a horse, bear, or reindeer, replaces, on days when their hunting has been successful, the tainted flesh of the rat, their only resource against famine. Their trading extended as far as the regions now forming part of France, from whose inhabitants they obtained shells, jet, with which they delight to ornament themselves, and the flint which is so valuable to them. But a falling-in of the roof drives them from their principal dwelling, in which lie buried the objects of their faith and their domestic utensils, and they are forced to seek another habitation.

. . . We know nothing certain of the relation of these people with those of earlier times. Had they ancestors in this country? The great discoveries of our illustrious compatriot Schmerling, and those which Professor Malaise has made at Engihoul, seem to prove that the men whose traces I have brought to light on the Leese did not belong to the indigenous races of Belgium, but were the only successors of the more ancient population. I have even met with certain evidences of our primordial ancestors at Chaleux, but the trail was lost as soon as found. Our knowledge of these ancestors stops short at this point."

We have given in the above abstract an account of the most important features in M. Dupont's report, which is of great interest. We trust that these explorations, which have been carried on at the expense of the Government, will be continued.

THE DODO.

We presume that most of our readers have seen the picture of an odd-looking bird, bearing a very odd name—the Dodo. Old travellers state that this curious creature once existed in great numbers in Mauritius. It was about the height of a large turkey, but very much more bulky, weighing fifty pounds, or more. This unwieldy bird was mounted on stout dumpy legs, and its wings were mere rudiments of those of gans, so that it is not likely it ever made any attempt at flight. Its head was large, with a long and very stout beak, curved at the tip like that of the petrel. It is represented as destitute of a tail, properly speaking, but furnished with a plume of curling feathers, somewhat like those of the ostrich, on the hinder part of the back. Several good paintings of this bird, by Dutch artists, are in existence: one in the British Museum, one at the Hague, another at Berlin, and another at Vienna. Mention is also made of the exhibition of a living specimen in London, about 1640. But notwithstanding all these evidences of the existence of such a bird, the fact would have been doubted, had not some remains of it confirmed its truth. These remains were but very few. A head in the Museum at Copenhagen, a head and a foot in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford, and a foot in the British Museum, attested that a bird unlike any known existing species, and resembling, in some degree, the paintings mentioned, had actually furnished those remains, and been the subject from which the portraits were taken. Several of the early voyagers who visited the island now called Mauritius spoke of these birds, and not only feasted on their flesh during their sojourn there, but salted them in numbers for their sea-stock. It is stated that they sometimes took as many as forty of them at a single hunt. Neither tradition nor history records their existence in this island after it had received the name of l'Isle de France. If the Dutch, on abandoning the island, left any there, they were probably exterminated by the Maroons, who were its only inhabitants till the French settled there. No naturalist formed part of the crews of the various ships which touched here during the existence of the Dodo, and the accounts given of it are vague and unsatisfactory. Tastes must not be disputed; and we may therefore receive as of equal value the accounts of those who extol and those who decry the flesh of the Dodo. The difference between an old gander and a Michaelmas gosling is sufficient to prove that both may have been right in their statements.

After the island had resumed its name, Mauritius, diligent inquiry was made both as to the traditional existence of the Dodo, or of the actual existence of any remains of it; but both were alike fruitless, though distinguished naturalists, both Creole and European, undertook the search. So great was the interest in the history of this non-descript bird, that about twenty years ago, a large volume, compiled with vast labor, and illustrated with elaborately-executed engravings, was published on it by Mr. Strickland; and this volume was the means of assuring Mr. Clark that the bones he has lately discovered were really and truly those of the Mauritian Dodo, Didus ineptus.

Mr. Clark, during a very long residence here, had made many inquiries and researches, in order to learn something more about the Dodo than was already known generally, or to find some remnants of it, but without success.

On Dr. Ayres's last visit to Mahébourg he conversed with Mr. Clark about the Dodo, and asked whether by digging round the ruins of the old Dutch settlement, there might not be a chance of meeting with some remains? Mr. Clark did not see any probability of success in that quarter, as these dwellings were situated on a spot where nothing would be likely to bury itself in the earth, of which the surface is every year swept completely by the water which flows from the mountains; but he said he thought a likely spot to contain such remains would be alluvial deposits. A few days after, Mr. Clark remarked that some marshes in the vicinity of Mahébourg were likely to furnish these coveted remains; but having neither time nor means at his disposal, he did not undertake the search, though bearing in mind his impression on the subject. The commencement of the railway works, with their numerous cuttings at various heights, gave hopes to Mr. Clark that some remains might be discovered; but his inquiries from those employed there on this subject failed to elicit any information.

About two months ago, Mr. Gaston de Bissy caused to be dug from a marsh on his property, known as "La Mare aux Songes," the alluvium contained in it, to use as manure. After digging two or three feet, the men came in contact with bones of tortoises and deer, the former in vast numbers. As soon as Mr. Clark heard of this, he went to Mr. de Bissy and stated to him what had long been his opinion as to the position in which Dodos' bones might be found, requesting him to give orders to the diggers to lay by carefully whatever bones they might turn up. Mr. de Bissy was much pleased with the chance of making so interesting a discovery, and at once ordered that Mr. Clark's request should be fulfilled. Mr. Clark visited the estate many times, but without obtaining any satisfactory intelligence. He at length engaged two men to enter the dark-colored water, about three feet deep, and feel in the soft mud at the bottom with their feet. In a short time he had the inexpressible satisfaction of finding a broken tarsus, an entire tibia and part of another. He at once commenced operations in earnest, and has been fortunate enough to find every important bone of that remarkable bird, including cranium, upper and lower mandibles of bill, cervical and dorsal vertebrae, ribs, coracoid bones, scapulae and clavicle, sternum, humerus, ulna, pelvis, femur, tibia and tarsometatarsus, so that an experienced person can well build a Dodo from these remains, the toes being the only part wanting.

The skull of this bird is of amazing thickness, and the cerebral cavity very small. The beak of great strength and solidity, as are the condyles of the lower mandible. Some of the cervical vertebrae are more than two inches in diameter, and of very elaborate structure. The sternum, of which the form shows a strong resemblance to that of the pigeon tribe, in some specimens is more than five inches wide and seven long. The keel is a quarter of an inch thick, and about an inch deep in the deepest part, which is at the centre; and the sternum is there three-quarters of an inch in thickness, but it thins off to a sharp edge at the margin. The humerus is less than four inches in length, and the shaft only about three-eighths of an inch in diameter, and the ulna under three inches, and less than a quarter of an inch in thickness. Some femurs are nearly seven inches long and more than an inch in diameter, the tibiae nine inches long, and the upper condyles two inches in diameter. The tarsometatarsi are of very solid bone, and have been found in greater numbers than any others. They are about the length of those of a good-sized turkey, but more than twice the thickness. Only two or three craniums have been found, with a few fragments. The paucity of these remains, as compared with other parts of the frame, may very possibly arise from the numerous apertures in the head, into which roots insinuate themselves, thus disintegrating the structure. The upper mandible of the bill has suffered from the same cause, and only two tolerably perfect specimens of that organ have been obtained, while the under mandibles are numerous; but only three or four have been found in which both rami remained attached. The tip of one upper mandible is two inches in depth, and an inch in thickness. The vertebrae are very strong, and show that the spinal cord was fully double the size of that of the turkey.

In only one instance has the presence of a fragment of the furcula been found attached to the coracoid bone, but several have the scapula united to them.

These bones present a great diversity of colours. Those which were found near the springs in the marsh are nearly of their original hue. Some found alongside of a large bois-denatée tree were nearly of the colour of that wood, and many others are nearly as black as ebony.

The quantity of tortoise bones found here is truly astonishing; they would more than fill a large cart. Some of the femurs are more than three inches in diameter. Mr. Clark believes that these bones belong to two species of tortoise.

Several flamingo bones, including humerus, ulna, radius, tibia and tarsometatarsus, have been found, but not a single femur. Two upper mandibles and one lower of that singularly formed bird prove the identity of other bones found in juxtaposition with them.

Bones of the egret curlew, moor-hen and sand-lark have been found in great numbers, and many deer's bones, including a skull with horns attached, and the jaw of an old sow, of great strength but very small size, have also been turned up.

It is remarkable that the bones of the tortoises and deer were found in the comparatively compact peaty soil, overlying the soft mud which contains the bones of the dodo, of which none are found in the upper stratum. This accounts for none of the latter having been discovered by those who were digging for manure.

Mr. Clark deposited the first specimens of dodo's bones he obtained in the Museum at the Royal College, as well as those of the flamingo, the existence of which in Mauritius was remembered by the parents of persons now living. He has also sent a complete set of dodo's bones to Professor Owen, for the British Museum.

It is probable that a search in marshes of this nature in Reunion and Rodrigues, might lead to the discovery of remains of the large extinct birds believed to have been indigenous in and peculiar to those islands.

"La Mare aux Sonehs" is a spot singularly propitious for the haunt of the animals of which the bones have been found there. A sheltered glen, clothed with thick wood in the memory of persons still living, with two springs in it, and so near the sea as to be a convenient refuge in stormy weather for flamingoes and curlews.

Several other marshes have been tried for such remains as those contained in it, but thus far without any success.

FITZ-DANDO'S LAMENT.

Ye good bivalves, ye savoury molluscs,
Ye living titbits, born of Ocean's mud,
Still toothsome when Time's hand hath drawn our tusks,

Regenerators bland of aged blood :
I gaze on ye in fish-shops with such eye
As might poor swain view lofty maiden's brow.

O lovely, but alas for me too high !
Three halfpence each — so much are natives
now !

Ye oysters, how is it you've grown so dear,
In price ascending ever more and more,
Up up aloft as year rolls after year ?
Scarce are ye now, so plentiful of yore ?
An oyster famine ! What's the cause of that ?
Of ocean foes some sages talk to me
That prey upon you and devour your spat,
Of stormy waves that wash it out to sea.

They tell me how you perish, left to freeze
In rigorous winter by an ebbing tide,
But you had always chances such as these,
When ye were cheap and common, to abide.

It is but in relation that you've grown Less numerous, not absolutely few ;
There are more mouths that gape — alas ! my own
But waters — now than once there were for you.

For you, but not for you alone ; for meat,
And all besides that smokes upon the board ;
Fish, fowl, eggs, butter too ; things good to eat
Exceed what moderate incomes can afford.
Increase of population must be fed ;
Our numbers with prosperity extend :
Where, if we keep on going thus ahead,
Will this prosperity, ye oysters, end ?

Will ye become as costly as the pearls
Torn by the diver from your kind, a prey
To decorate the brows of splendid girls ?
And girls, oh how expensive, too, are they !
Ah, no more natives for the frugal swain,
No possibility of married life !
Oysters are for the rich — and he's insane
Who, rolling not in riches, takes a wife.

PART IX.—CHAPTER XXXII.

MORNING AT THE PRIORY.

SEWELL was awoke from a sound and heavy sleep by the Chief Baron's valet asking if it was his pleasure to see his lordship before he went down to Court, in which case there was not much time to be lost.

"How soon does he go?" asked Sewell, curtly.

"He likes to be on the Bench by eleven exactly, sir, and he has always some business in Chamber first."

"All that tells me nothing," my good friend. "How much time have I now to catch him before he starts?"

"Half an hour, sir. Forty minutes at most."

"Well, I'll try and do it. Say I'm in my bath, and that I'll be with him immediately."

The man was not well out of the room when Sewell burst out into a torrent of abuse of the old Judge and his ways—"His inordinate vanity, his consummate conceit, to imagine that any activity of an old worn-out intellect like his could be of service to the public! If he knew but all, he is just as useful in his nightcap as in his wig, and it would be fully as dignified to sleep in his bed as in the Court of Exchequer." While he poured forth this invective, he dressed himself with all possible haste; indeed his ill-temper stimulated his alacrity, and he very soon issued from his room, trying to compose his features into a semblance of pleasure on meeting with his host.

"I hope and trust I have not disturbed you unreasonably," said the Judge, rising from the breakfast-table as Sewell entered. "I know you arrived very late, and I'd have given you a longer sleep if it were in my power."

"An old soldier, my lord, knows how to manage with very little. I am only sorry if I have kept you waiting."

"No man ever kept me waiting, sir. It is a slight I have yet to experience."

"I mean, my lord, it would have grieved me much, had I occasioned you an inconvenience."

"If you had, sir, it might have reacted injuriously upon yourself."

Sewell bowed submissively, for what he knew not; but he surmised that as there was an opening for regret, there might also be a reason for gratitude; he waited to see if he were right.

"My telegram only told you that I wanted you; it could not say for what," continued the Judge, and his voice still retained the metallic ring the late irritation had lent it. "There has been a contested question between the Crown and myself as to the patronage to an office in my Court. I have carried my point. They have yielded. They would have me believe that they have submitted out of deference to myself personally, my age, and long services. I know better, sir. They have taken the opinion of the Solicitor-General in England, who, with no flattering sentiments to what is called 'Irish law,' has pronounced against them. The gift of the office rests with me, and it is my intention to confer it upon you."

"Oh, my lord, I have no words to express my gratitude!"

"Very well, sir, it shall be assumed to have been expressed. The salary is one thousand a-year. The duties are almost nominal."

"I was going to ask, my lord, whether my education and habits are such as would enable me to discharge these duties?"

"I respect your conscientious scruple, sir. It is creditable and commendable. Your mind may, however, be at ease. Your immediate predecessor passed the last thirteen years at Tours, in France, and there was never a complaint of official irregularity till, three years ago, when he came over to afford his substitute a brief leave of absence, he forgot to sign his name to certain documents—a mistake the less pardonable that his signature formed his whole and sole official drudgery."

It was on Sewell's lips to say, "that if he had not signed his name a little too frequently in life, his difficulties would not have been such as they now were."

"I am afraid I did not catch what you said, sir," said the Judge.

"I did not speak, my lord," replied he, bowing.

"You will see, therefore, sir, that the details of your official life need not deter you, although I have little doubt the Ministerial press will comment sharply upon your absence, if you give them the opportunity, and will reflect severely upon your unfitness if they can detect a flaw in you. Is there anything, therefore, in your former life to which these writers can refer—I will not say disparagingly—but unpleasantly?"

"I am not aware, my lord, of anything."

"Of course, sir, I could not mean what might impugn your honour or affect your fame. I spoke simply of what soldiers are, perhaps, more exposed to than civilians—the lighter scandals of society. You apprehend me?"

"I do, my lord; and I repeat that I have a very easy conscience on this score: for though I have filled some rather responsible stations at times, and been intrusted with high functions, all my tastes and habits have been so domestic and quiet—I have been so much more a man of home than a man of pleasure—that I have escaped even the common passing criticisms bestowed on people who are before the world."

"Is this man—this Sir Brook Fossbrooke—one likely to occasion you any trouble?"

"In the first place, my lord, he is out of the country, not very likely to return to it; and secondly, it is not in his power—not in any man's power—to make me a subject for attack."

"You are fortunate, sir; more fortunate than men who have served their country longer. It will scarcely be denied what I have contributed to the public service, and yet, sir, I have been arraigned before the bar of that insensate jury they call Public Opinion, and it is only in denying the jurisdiction I have deferred the trial."

Sewell responded to the vain-glorious outburst by a look of admiring wonder, and the Judge smiled a gracious acceptance of the tribute.

"I gather, therefore, sir, that you can accept this place without fear of what scandal or malignity may assail you by."

"Yes, my lord, I can say as much with confidence."

"It is necessary, sir, that I should be satisfied on this head. The very essence of the struggle between the Crown and myself is in the fact that my responsibility is pledged, my reputation is in bond for the integrity and the sufficiency of this officer, and I will not leave to some future biographer of the Irish Chief Barons of the Exchequer the task of apology for one who was certainly not the least eminent of the line."

"Your lordship's high character shall not suffer through me," said Sewell, bowing respectfully.

"The matter, then, is so far settled; perhaps, however, you would like to consult your wife? She might be averse to your leaving the army."

"No, my lord. She wishes—she has long wished it. We are both domestic in our tastes, and we have always been looking to the time when we could live more for each other, and devote ourselves to the education of our children."

"Commendable and praiseworthy," said the Judge, with a half grunt, as though he had heard something of this same domesticity and home-happiness, but that his own experience scarcely corroborated the report. "There are certain steps you will have to take before leaving the service; it may, then, be better to defer your public nomination to this post till they be taken?"

This, which was said in question, Sewell answered at once, saying, "There need be no delay on this score, my lord; by this day week I shall be free."

"On this day week, then, you shall be duly sworn in. Now, there is another point—I throw it out simply as a suggestion—you will not receive it as more if you are indisposed to it. It may be some time before you can find a suitable house or be fully satisfied where to settle down. There is ample room here; one entire wing is unoccupied. May I beg to place it at your disposal?"

"Oh, my lord, this is really too much kindness. You overwhelm me with obligations. I have never heard of such generosity."

"Sir, it is not all generosity—I reckon much on the value of your society. Your companionable qualities are gifts I would secure by a 'retainer.'"

"In your society, my lord, the benefits would be all on my side."

"There was a time, sir—I may say it without boastfulness—men thought me an agreeable companion. The three Chiefs, as we were called from our separate Courts, were reputed to be able talkers. I am the sole survivor; and it would be a gain to those who care to look back on the really great days of Ireland, if some record should remain of a time when there were giants in the land. I have myself some very curious materials—masses of letters and such like—which we may turn over some winter's evening together."

Sewell professed his delight at such a prospect, and the Judge then suddenly bethinking himself of the hour—it was already nigh eleven—arose. "Can I set you down anywhere? are you for town?" asked he.

"Yes, my lord; I was about to pay my mother a visit."

"I'll drop you there; perhaps you would convey a message from me, and say how grateful I should feel if she would give us her company at dinner—say seven o'clock. I will just step up to say good-bye to my grand-daughter, and be with you immediately."

Sewell had not time to bethink him of all the strange events which a few minutes had grouped around him, when the Chief Baron appeared, and they drove off.

As they drove along, their converse was most agreeable. Sewell's attentive manner was an admirable stimulant, and the old Judge was actually sorry to lose his companion, as the carriage stopped at Lady Lendrick's door.

"What on earth brought you up, Dudley?" said she, as he entered the room where she sat at breakfast.

"Let me have something to eat, and I'll tell you," said he, seating himself at table, and drawing towards him a dish of cutlets. "You may imagine what an appetite I have, when I tell you whose guest I am."

"Whose?"

"Your husband's."

"You! at the Priory! and how came that to pass?"

"I told you already I must eat before I talk. When I got down stairs this morning I found the old man just finishing his breakfast, and instead of asking me to join him, he entertained me with the siege of Derry, and some choice anecdotes of Lord Bristol and 'the Volunteers.' This coffee is cold."

"Ring and they'll bring you some."

"If I am to take him as a type of Irish hospitality as well as Irish agreeability, I must say I get rid of two delusions together."

"There's the coffee. Will you have eggs?"

"Yes, and a rasher along with them. You can afford to be liberal with the larder, mother, for I bring you an invitation to dine."

"At the Priory?"

"Yes; he said seven o'clock."

"Who dines there?"

"Himself and his grand-daughter and I make the company, I believe."

"Then I shall not go. I never do go when there's not a party."

"He's safer, I suppose, before people?"

"Just so. I could not trust to his temper under the temptation of a family circle. But what brought you to town?"

"He sent for me by telegraph — just, too, when I had the whole county with me, and was booked to ride a match I had made with immense trouble. I got his message — 'Come up immediately.' There was not the slightest reason for haste, nor for the telegraph at all. The whole could have been done by letter, and replied to at leisure, besides" —

"What was it then?"

"It is a place he has given me — a magistracy of something in his Court, that he has been fighting the Castle people about for eighteen years, and to which, heaven knows if he has the right of appointment this minute."

"What's it worth?"

"A thousand a-year net. There were pickings — at least the last man made a good thing of them — but there are to be no more. We are to inaugurate, as the newspapers say, a reign of integrity and incorruptibility."

"So much the better."

"So much the worse," say I. "My motto is, Full batta and plenty of loot; and it's every man's motto, only that every man is not honest enough to own it."

"And when are you to enter upon the duties of your office?"

"Immediately. I'm to be sworn in — there's an oath, it seems — this day week, and we're to take up our abode at the Priory till we find a house to suit us."

"At the Priory?"

"Yes. May I light a cigarette, mother? only one. He gave the invitation most royally. A whole wing is to be at our disposal. He said nothing about the cook or the wine-cellar, and these are the very ingredients I want to secure."

She shook her head dubiously, but made no answer.

"You don't think, then, that he meant to have us as his guests?"

"I think it unlikely."

"How shall I find out? It's quite certain I'll not go live under his roof — which means his surveillance — without an adequate compensation. I'll only consent to being bored by being fed."

"House-rent is something, however."

"Yes, mother, but not everything. That old man would be inquiring who dined with me, how late he stayed, who came to supper, and what they did afterwards. Now, if he take the whole charge of us, I'll put up with a great deal, because I could manage a little 'pied à terre' somewhere about Kingstown or Dalkey, and 'carry on' pleasantly enough. You must find out his intentions, mother, before I commit myself to an acceptance. You must indeed."

"Take my advice, Dudley, and look out for a house at once. You'll not be in his three weeks."

"I can submit to a great deal when it suits me, mother," said he, with a derisive smile, and a look of intense treachery at the same time.

"I suppose you can," said she, nodding an assent. "How is she?"

"As usual," said he, with a shrug of the shoulders.

"And the children?"

"They are quite well. By the way, before I forget it, don't let the Judge know that I have already sent in my papers to sell out. I want him to believe that I do so now in consequence of his offer."

"It is not likely we shall soon meet, and I may not have an opportunity of mentioning the matter."

"You'll come to dinner to-day, won't you?"

"No."

"You ought, even out of gratitude on my account. It would be only commonly decent to thank him."

"I couldn't."

"Couldn't what? Couldn't come, or couldn't thank him?"

"Couldn't do either. You don't know, Dudley, that whenever our intercourse rises above the common passing courtesies of mere acquaintanceship, it is certain to end in a quarrel. We must never condemn or approve. We must never venture upon an opinion, lest it lead to a discussion, for discussion means a fight."

"Pleasant, certainly — pleasant and amiable too!"

"It would be better, perhaps, that I had some of that happy disposition of my son," said she, with a cutting tone, "and could submit to whatever suited me."

He started as if he had seen something, and, turning on her a look of passionate anger, began — "Is it from you that this should come?" Then suddenly recollecting himself, he subdued his tone, and said, "We'll not do better by losing our tempers. Can you put me in the way to raise a little money? I shall have the payment for my commission in about a fortnight; but I want a couple of hundred pounds at once."

"It's not two months since you raised five hundred."

"I know it, and there's the last of it. I left Lucy ten sovereigns when I came away, and this twenty pounds is all that I now have in the world."

"And all these fine dinners and grand entertainments that I have been told of — what was the meaning of them?"

"They were what the railway people call preliminary expenses, mother. Before one can get fellows to come to a house where there is play there must be a sort of easy style of good living established that all men like: excellent dinners and good wine are the tame elephants, and without them you'll not get the wild ones into your 'com-pound.'"

"And to tell me that this could pay!"

"Ay, and pay splendidly. If I had three thousand pounds in the world to carry on with, I'd see the old Judge and his rotten place at Jericho before I'd accept it. One needs a little capital, that's all. It's just like blockade-running — you must be able to lose three for one you succeed with."

"I see nothing but ruin — disreputable ruin — in such a course."

"Come down and look at it, mother, and you'll change your mind. You'll own you never saw a better ordered society in your life — the beau idéal of a nice country house on a small scale. I admit our chef is not a Frenchman, and I have only one fellow out of livery; but the thing is well done, I promise you. As for any serious play, you'll never hear of it — never suspect it — no more than a man turning over Leech's sketches in a dentist's drawing-room suspects there's a fellow getting his eye-tooth extracted in the next room."

"I disapprove of it all, Dudley. It is sure to end ill."

"For that matter, mother so shall I! All I have asked from Fate this many a year is, a deferred sentence — a long day, my lord — a long day!"

"Tell Sir William I am sorry I can't dine at the Priory to-day. It is one of my cruel-headache days. Say you found me looking very poorly. It puts him in good-humour to hear it; and if you can get away in the evening, come in to tea."

"You will think of this loan I want — won't you?"

"I'll think of it, but I don't know what good thinking will do." She paused, and after a few minutes' silence said, "If you really are serious about taking up your abode at the Priory, you'll have to get rid of the grand-daughter."

"We could marry her off easily enough."

"You might, and you mightn't. If she marry to Sir William's satisfaction he'll leave her all he has in the world."

"Egad, he must have a rare taste in a son-in-law if he likes the fellow I'd promote to the place."

"You seem to forget, Dudley, that the young lady has a will of her own. She's a Lendrick too."

"With all my heart, mother. She'll not be a match for Lucy."

"And would she?"

"Ay would she," interrupted he, "if her pride as a woman — if her jealousy, was touched. I have made her do more than that when I wounded her self-love!"

"You are a very amiable husband, I must say."

"We might be better, perhaps, mother;

but I suspect we are pretty much like our neighbours. And it's positive you won't come to dinner?"

"No! certainly not."

"Well, I'll try and look in at tea-time. You'll not forget what I spoke of. I shall be in funds in less than three weeks."

She gave a little incredulous laugh as she said good-bye. She had heard of such pledges before, and knew well what faith to attach to them.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

EVENING AT THE PRIORY.

THE Chief Baron brought his friend Haire back from Court to dine with him. The table had been laid for five, and it was only when Sewell entered the drawing-room that it was known Lady Lendrick had declined the invitation. Sir William heard the apology to the end; he even waited when Sewell concluded, to see if he desired to add anything more, but nothing came.

"In that case," said he at length, "we'll order dinner." That his irritation was extreme needed no close observation to detect, and the bell-rope came down with the pull by which he summoned the servant.

The dinner proceeded drearily enough. None liked to adventure on a remark which might lead to something unpleasant in discussion, and little was spoken on any side. Sewell praised the mutton, and the Chief Baron bowed stiffly. When Haire remarked that the pale sherry was excellent, he dryly told the butler to "fill Mr. Haire's glass;" and though Lucy, with more caution, was silent, she did not escape, for he turned towards her and said, "We have not been favoured with a word from your lips, Miss Lendrick; I hope these neuralgic headaches are not becoming a family affection."

"I am perfectly well, sir," said she, with a smile.

"It is Haire's fault, then," said the Judge, with one of his malicious twinkles of the eye — "all Haire's fault if we are dull. It is ever so with wits, Colonel Sewell; they will not perform to empty benches."

"I don't know whom you call a wit," began Haire.

"My dear friend, the men of pleasantry and happy conceits must no more deny the reputation that attaches to them than must a rich merchant dishonour his bill; nor need a man resent more being called a Wit, than being styled a Poet, a Painter, a Chief Baron, or" — here he waved his hand towards Sewell, and bowing slightly, added — "a Chief Registrar to the Court of Exchequer."

"Oh, have you got the appointment?" said Haire to the Colonel. "I'm heartily glad of it. I'm delighted to know it has been given to one of the family."

"As I said a while ago," said the Judge, with a smile of deeper malice, "these witty fellows spare nobody! At the very moment he praises the sherry he disparages the host. Why should not this place be filled by one of my family, Haire? I call upon you to show cause."

"There's no reason against it. I never said there was. Nay, I was far from satisfied with you on the day you refused my prayer on behalf of one belonging to you."

"Sir, you are travelling out of the record," said the Judge, angrily.

"I can only say," added Haire, "that I wish Colonel Sewell joy with all my heart; and if he'll allow me, I'll do it in a bumper."

"A reason fair to drink his health again! That's not the line. How does it go Lucy? Don't you remember the verse?"

"No, sir; I never heard it."

"A reason fair — a reason fair.' I declare I believe the newspapers are right. I am losing my memory. One of the scurrilous rascals t'other day said, they saw no reason Justice should be deaf as well as blind. Haire, was that yours?"

"A thousand a-year," muttered Haire to Sewell.

"What is that, Haire?" cried the old Judge. "Do I hear you aright? You utter one thousand things just as good every year?"

"I was speaking of the Registrar's salary," said Haire, half testily.

"A thousand a-year is a pittance — a mere pittance, sir, in a country like England. It is like the place at a window to see a procession. You may gaze at the passing tide of humanity, but must not dare to mix in it."

"And yet papa went half across the globe for it," said Lucy, with a flushed and burning cheek.

"In your father's profession the rewards are less money, Lucy, than the esteem and regard of society. I have ever thought it wise of our rulers not to bestow titles on physicians, but to leave them the unobtrusive and undistinguished comforters of every class and condition. The equal of any — the companion of all."

It was evident that the old Judge was eager for discussion on anything. He had tried in vain to provoke each of his guests, and he was almost irritable at the deference accorded him.

"Do I see you pass the decanter, Colonel Sewell? Are you not drinking any wine?"

"No, my Lord."

"Perhaps you like coffee? Don't you think, Lucy, you could give him some?"

"Yes, sir. I shall be delighted."

"Very well. Haire and I will finish this magnum, and then join you in the drawing-room."

Lucy took Sewell's arm and retired. They were scarcely well out of the room when Sewell halted suddenly, and in a voice so artificial that, if Lucy had been given to suspectfulness, she would have detected at once, said, "Is the Judge always as pleasant and as witty as we saw him to-day?"

"To-day he was very far from himself; something, I'm sure, must have irritated him, for he was not in his usual mood."

"I confess I thought him charming; so full of neat reply, pleasant apropos, and happy quotation."

"He very often has days of all that you have just said, and I am delighted with them."

"What an immense gain to a young girl—I mean to one whose education and tastes have fitted her for it—to be the companion of such a mind as his! Who is this Mr. Haire?"

"A very old friend. I believe he was a schoolfellow of grandpapa's."

"Not his equal, I suspect, in ability or knowledge."

"Oh, nothing like it; a most worthy man, respected by every one, and devotedly attached to grandpapa, but not clever."

"The Chief, I remarked, called him witty," said Sewell, with a faint twinkle in his eye.

"It was done in jest. He is fond of fathering on him the smart sayings of the day, and watching his attempts to disown them."

"And Haire likes that?"

"I believe he likes grandpapa in every mood he has."

"What an invaluable friend! I wish to heaven he could find such another for me. I want—there's nothing I want more than some one who would always approve of me."

"Perhaps you might push this fidelity further than grandpapa does," said she, with a smile.

"You mean that it might not always be so easy to applaud me."

She only laughed and made no effort to disclaim the assertion.

"Well," said he, with a sigh, "who knows but if I live to be old and rich I may be fortunate enough to have such an accommodating friend? Who are the other inmates here? I ask because we are going to be domesticated also."

"I heard so this morning."

"I hope with pleasure, though you haven't said as much."

"With pleasure certainly; but with more misgiving than pleasure."

"Pray explain this."

"Simply that the very quiet life we lead here would not be endurable by people who like the world, and whom the world likes. We never see any one, we never go out, we have not even those second-hand glances at society that people have who admit gossiping acquaintances; in fact, regard what you have witnessed to-day as a dinner-party, and then fashion for yourself our ordinary life."

"And do you like it?"

"I know nothing else, and I am tolerably happy. If papa and Tom were here I should be perfectly happy."

"By Jove! you startle me," said he, throwing away the unlighted cigar he had held for some minutes in his fingers; "I didn't know it was so bad."

"It is possible he may relax for you and Mrs. Sewell; indeed, I think it more than likely that he will."

"Ay, but the relaxation might only be in favour of a few more like that old gent we had to-day. No, no—the thing will never work. I see it at once. My mother said we could not possibly stand it three weeks, and I perceive it is your opinion too."

"I did not say so much," said she, smiling.

"Joking apart," said he, in a tone that assuredly bespoke sincerity, "I couldn't stand such a dinner as we had to-day very often. I can bear being bullied, for I was brought up to it. I served on Rolfe's staff in Bombay for four years, and when a man has been an aide-de-camp he knows what being bullied means; but what I could not endure is that outpouring of conceit mingled with rotten recollections. Another evening of it would kill me."

"I certainly would not advise your coming here at that price," said she, with a gravity almost comical.

"The difficulty is how to get off. He appears to me to resent as an affront everything that differs from his own views."

"He is not accustomed to much contradiction."

"Not to any at all!"

The energy with which he said this made her laugh heartily, and he half smiled at the situation himself.

"They are coming up-stairs," said she; "will you ring for tea? — the bell is beside you."

"Oh, if they're coming I'm off. I promised my mother a short visit this evening. Make my excuses if I am asked for;" and with this he slipped from the room and went his way.

"Where's the Colonel, Lucy? has he gone to bed?"

"No, sir, he has gone to see his mother; he had made some engagement to visit her this evening."

"This new school of politeness is too liberal for my taste. When we were young men, Haire, we would not have ventured to leave the house where we had dined without saluting the host."

"I take it we must keep up with the spirit of our time."

"You mistake, Haire — it is the spirit of our time is in arrears. It is that same spirit lagging behind, and deserting the post it once occupied, makes us seem in default. Let us have the cribbage-board, Lucy. Haire has said all the smart things he means to give us this evening, and I will take my revenge at the only game at which I am his master. Haire, who reads men like a book, Lucy," continued the Chief, as he dealt the cards, "says that our gallant friend will rebel against our humdrum life here. I demur to the opinion — what say you?" But he was now deep in his game, and never heeded the answer.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

SEWELL'S TROUBLES.

"A LETTER for you by the post, sir, and his lordship's compliments to say he is waiting breakfast," were the first words which Sewell heard, the next morning.

"Waiting breakfast! Tell him not to wait — I mean, make my respects to his lordship, and say I feel very poorly to-day — that I think I'll not get up just yet."

"Would you like to see Dr. Beattie, sir? — he's in the drawing-room."

"Nothing of the kind. It's a complaint I caught in India; I manage it myself. Bring me up some coffee and rum in about an hour, and mind don't disturb me on any account till then. What an infernal house!" muttered he, as the man withdrew. "A subaltern called up for morning parade has a better life than this. Nine o'clock only! What can this old ass mean by this pretended activity? Upon whom can it impose? Who will believe that it signifies a rush whether he lay abed till noon or rose by daybreak?" A gentle tap came to the door, but as he made no reply there came after a pause another a little louder. Sewell still preserved silence, and at last the sound of retiring footsteps along the corridor. Not if I know it," muttered he to himself as he turned round and fell off asleep again.

"The coffee, sir, and a dispatch; shall I sign the receipt for you?" said the servant, as he reappeared about noon.

"Yes; open the window a little and leave me."

Leaning on his arm he tore open the envelope and glanced at the signature — Lucy. He then read, "Send down Eccles or Beattie by next train; he is worse." He read and re-read this at least half-a-dozen times over before he bethought him of the letter that lay still unopened on the bed. He now broke the seal; it was also from his wife, dated the preceding evening, and very brief: —

"DEAR DUDLEY, — Mr. Trafford has had a severe fall. Crescy balked at the brook and fell afterwards. Trafford was struck on the head as he rose by Mr. Creagh's horse. It is feared the skull is fractured. You are much blamed for having asked him to ride a horse so much under his weight. All have refused to accept their bets but Kinahela the grocer. I have written to Sir H. Trafford, and I telegraphed to him Dr. Tobin's opinion, which is not favourable. I suppose you will come back at once: if not, telegraph what you advise to be done. Mr. Balfour is here still, but I do not find he is of much use. The veterinary decided Crescy should be shot, as the plate bone, I think be called it, was fractured; and as he was in great pain I consented. I hope I have done right. — Yours truly,

"LUCY SEWELL."

"Here's a go! a horse I refused four hundred and fifty for on Tuesday last! I am a lucky dog, there's no denying it. I didn't know there was a man in Europe could have made that horse balk his fence. What a rumpus to make about a fellow getting a 'cropper.' My share of the disaster is a deuced deal the worst. I'll never chance on such a horse again. How am I to find either of these men?" muttered he, as he took up the telegram. He rang the bell violently, and scarcely ceased to pull at it till the servant entered.

"Where does Dr. Eccles live?"

"Sir Gilbert, sir?"

"Ay, if he be Sir Gilbert."

"Merrion Square, sir," said the man reproachfully, for he thought it rather hard to ignore one of the great celebrities of the land.

"Take this note to him, that I'll write now, and if he be from home go to the other man — what's his name? — Beattie."

"Dr. Beattie is coming to dinner to-day, sir," said the servant, thinking to facilitate matters.

"Just do as I tell you, my good fellow, and don't interrupt. If I am to take up my quarters here, you'll all of you have to change some of your present habits." As he spoke, he dashed off a few hasty lines, addressing them to Sir Gilbert Eccles or Dr. Beattie. Ask if it's 'all right;' that will be sufficient reply; and now, send me my bath." As he proceeded with his dressing — a very lengthy affair it always was — he canvassed with himself whether or not he ought to take the train and go down to the country with the Doctor. Possibly few men in such circumstances would have given the matter a doubt. The poor fellow who had incurred the mishap had been, at his instance, acting for him. Had it not been for Sewell's pressing this task upon him, Trafford would at that moment have been hale and hearty. Sewell knew all this well; he read the event just as nineteen out of every twenty would have read it, but having done so, he proceeded to satisfy himself why all these reasonings should give way to weightier considerations.

First of all, it would not be quite convenient to let the old Judge know anything of these doings in the country. His strait-laced notions might revolt at races and betting rings. It might not be perhaps decorous that a registrar of a high court should be the patron of such sports. These were prudential reasons, which he dilated on for some time. Then came some others more sentimental. It was to a house of doctors and nurses, and gloom and sorrow, he should go back. All these were to him peculiarly distasteful. He should be tremendously 'bored' by it all, and being 'bored' was to him whatever was least tolerable in life. It was strange that there was one other reason stronger than all these — a reason that really touched him in what was the nearest thing in his nature to heart. He couldn't go back and look at the empty loose-box where his favourite horse once stood, and where he was never to stand more. Crescy — the animal he was so proud of — the horse he counted on for who knows what future triumphs — the first steeple-chase horse, he felt convinced, in Ireland, if not in the kingdom — such strength, such power in the loins, such square joints, such courage, should he ever see united again? If there was anything in that man's nature that represented affection, he had it for this horse. He knew well to what advantage he looked when on his back — he knew what admiration and envy it drew upon him to see him thus mounted. He had won him at billiards from a man who was half-broken-hearted at parting with him, and who offered immense terms rather than lose him.

"He said, I'd have no luck with him," muttered Sewell, now in his misery — "and, confound the fellow, he was right. No, I can't go back to look at his empty stall. It would half kill me."

It was very real grief all this; he was as thoroughly heart-sore as it was possible for him to be. He sorrowed for what nothing in his future life could replace to him; and this is a very deep sorrow.

Trafford's misfortune was so much the origin and cause of his own disaster, that he actually thought of him with bitterness. The man who could make Crescy balk! What fate could be too hard for him?

Nor was he quite easy in his mind about that passage in his wife's letter stating that men would not take their bets. Was this meant as reflecting upon him? Was it a censure on him for making Trafford ride a horse beneath his weight? "They get up some stupid cry of that sort," muttered he, "as if I am not the heaviest loser of all. I lose a horse that was worth a score of Traffords."

When dressed, Sewell went down to the garden and lit his cigar. His sorrow had grown calmer, and he began to think that in the new life before him he should have had to give up horses and sport of every kind. "I must make my book now on this old fellow, and get him to make me his heir. He cares little for his son, and he can be made to care just as little for his granddaughter. That's the only game open to me — a dreary life it promises to be, but it's better than a jail."

The great large wilderness of a garden, stretching away into an orchard at the end, was in itself a place to suggest sombre thoughts — so silent and forsaken did it all appear. The fruit lay thick on the ground uncared for — the artichokes, grown to the height of shrubs, looked monsters of uncouthness; and even in the alleys flower-seeds had fallen and given birth to flowers, which struggled up through the gravel and hung their bright petals over the footway. There was in the neglect, the silence, the uncared-for luxuriance of the place, all that could make a moody man moodier; and as he knocked off the great heads of the tall hollyhocks, he thought, and even said aloud, "This is about as much amusement as such a spot offers."

"Oh no, not so bad as that," said a laughing voice, and Lucy peeped over a laurel-hedge with a rake in her hand, and seemed immensely amused at his discomfiture.

"Where are you? — I mean, how is one to come near you?" said he, trying to laugh, but not successfully.

"Go round yonder by the fish-pond, and you'll find a wicket. This is my garden, and I till it myself."

"So!" said he, entering a neat little enclosure, with beds of flowers and flowering shrubs, "this is your garden?"

"Yes — what do you think of it?"

"It's very pretty — it's very nice. I should like it larger, perhaps."

"So would I; but, being my own gardener, I find it quite big enough."

"Why don't the Chief give you a gardener? — he's rich enough surely."

"He never cared for gardening himself. Indeed, I think it is the wild confusion of foliage here that he likes. He said to me one day, 'In my old garden a man loses himself in thought. In this trimly kept place one is ever occupied by the melon-frame or the forcing-house.'"

"That's the dreadful thing about old people; they are ever for making the whims and crotchets of age the rules of life to others. I wonder you bear this so well."

"I didn't know that I bore anything," said she, with a smile.

"That's true slave doctrine, I must say; and when one does not feel bondage, there's no more to be said."

"I suspect I have a great deal more freedom than most girls; my time is almost all my own, to dispose of as I will. I read or play or walk or work as I feel inclined. If I wish to occupy myself with household matters, I am the mistress here."

"In other words, you are free to do everything that is not worth doing — you lead the life of a nun in a convent, only that you have not even a sister nun to talk to."

"And which are the things you say are worth doing?"

"Would you not care to go out into the world, to mix in society, to go to balls, theatres, fêtes, and such like? would you not like to ride? I don't mean it for flattery, but would you not like the admiration you would be sure to meet — the sort of homage people render to beauty, the only tribute the world ever paid freely, — are all these not worth something?"

"I am sure they are: they are worth a great deal to those who can enjoy them with a happy heart; but remember, Colonel Sewell, I have a father living in exile, simply to earn a livelihood, and I have a brother toiling for his bread in a strange land; is it likely I could forget these, or is it likely that I could carry such cares about with me, and enjoy the pleasures you tell of?"

"Oh! as for that, I never met the man nor woman either that could bring into the world a mind unburdened by care. You must take life as it is. If I was to wait for a heart at ease before I went into society, I'd have to decline a few dinner-parties. Your only chance of a little respite, besides, is at your age. The misfortunes of life begin a light drizzle, but become a regular downpour when one gets to my time of life. Let me just tell you what this morning brought forth. A letter and then a telegram from my wife, to tell me that my favourite horse — an animal worth five hundred pounds if he was worth five shillings — the truest, bravest, best horse I ever backed — has just been killed by a stupid fellow I got to ride for me. What he did to make the horse refuse his leap, what magic he used, what conjuring trick he performed, I can't tell. With me it was enough to show him his fence, and if I wanted it I couldn't have held him back. But this fellow, a dragoon too, and the crack rider of his regiment, contrives to discourage my poor beast, then rushes him at the jump at half speed. I know it was a wide-ish brook, and they tumbled in, and my horse smashed his blade-bone — of course there was nothing for it but to shoot him."

"How sad! I am really sorry for you."

"And all this came of the old Judge's message, the stupidity of sending me five words in a telegram, instead of writing a proper note, and saying what he wanted. But for that I'd have stayed at home, ridden my horse, won my match, and spared myself the whole disaster."

"Grandpapa is often very hasty in his decisions, but I believe he seldom sees cause to revoke them."

"The old theory, 'the king can do no wrong,'" said Sewell, with a saucy laugh; "but remember he can often do a deal of mischief incidentally, as it were — as on the present occasion."

"And the rider, what of him? did he escape unhurt?" said she, eager to avoid unpleasant discussion.

"The rider! my dear young lady," said he, with affected slowness — "the rider came to grief. What he did, or how he did it, to throw my poor horse down, is his own secret, and, from what I hear, he is likely to keep it. No, no, don't look so horrified — he's not killed, but I don't suspect he's a long way off it. He got a smashing fall at a fence I'd have backed myself to ride with my hands tied. Ay, and to have my good horse back again, I'd ride in that fashion to-morrow."

"And the poor fellow, where is he now?"

"The poor fellow is receiving the very sweetest of Mrs. Sewell's attentions. He is at my house — in all likelihood in my room — not that he is very conscious of all the favours bestowed upon him."

"Oh, don't talk with that pretended indifference. You must be, you cannot help being, deeply sorry for what has happened."

"There can be very little doubt on that score. I've lost such a horse as I never shall own again."

"Pray think of something besides your horse. Who was he? what's his name?"

"A stranger — an Englishman; you never heard of him; and I wish I had never heard of him!"

"What are you smiling at?" said she, after a pause, for he stood as though reflecting, and a very strange half-smile moved his mouth.

"I was just thinking," said he gravely, "what his younger brother ought to give me; for this fellow was an elder son, and heir to a fine estate too."

She turned an indignant glance towards him, and moved away. He was quickly after her, however, and laying his hand on her arm, said good-humouredly, "Come, don't be angry with me. I'm sorry, if you like — I'm very sorry for this poor fellow. I won't say that my own loss does not dash my sorrow with a little anger — he was such a horse! and the whole thing was such a blunder! as fair a brook — with a high bank, it's true — but as fair a fence as ever a man rode at, and ground like this we're walking over to take off from."

"Is he in danger?"

"I believe so; here's what my wife says. Oh, I haven't got the letter about me, but it comes to this, I was to send down one of the best doctors by the first train, telling him it was a case of compression or concussion, which is it? And so I have despatched Beattie, your grandfather's man. I suppose there's no better?"

"But why have you not gone back yourself? he was a friend, was he not?"

"Yes, he was what people would call a friend. I'm like the hare in the fable, I have many friends; but if I must be confidential, I'll tell you why I did not go. I had a notion just as likely to be wrong as right, that the Chief would take offence at his Registrar being a sporting character, and that if I were to absent myself just now, he'd find out the reason, whereas by staying here I could keep all quiet, and when Beattie came back I could square him."

"You could what?"

"A thousand pardons for my bit of slang; but the fact is, just as one talks French when he wants to say nothings, one takes to slang when one requires to be shift. I meant to say, I could manage to make the Doctor hold his tongue."

"Not if grandpapa were to question him."

Sewell smiled, and shook his head in dissent.

"No, no. You're quite mistaken in Dr. Beattie; and what's more, you're quite mistaken in grandpapa too, if you imagine that he'll think the better of you for forgetting the claims of friendship."

"There was none."

"Well, of humanity, then! It was in your cause this man suffered, and it is in your house he lies ill. I think you ought to be there also."

"Do you think so?"

"I'm sure of it. You know the world a great deal better than I do, and you can tell what people will say of your absence, but I think it requires no knowledge of more than one's own nature to feel what is right and proper here."

"Indeed!" said he reflectively.

"Don't you agree with me?"

"Perhaps — that is, in part. I suppose what you mean about the world is, that there will be some scandal afloat, the 'young wife' story, and all that sort of balderdash?"

"I really do not understand you."

"You don't?"

"No. Certainly not. What do you mean?"

"Possibly you did not understand me.

Well, if I am to go, there's no time to be lost. It's four o'clock already, and the last train leaves at five forty. I will go."

"You are quite right."

"You'll make my excuses to the Chief. You'll tell him that my wife's message was so alarming, that I could not delay my departure. Beattie will probably be back to-morrow, and bring you news of us."

"Won't you write a few lines?"

"I'm not sure, — I'll not promise. I'm a bad penman, but my wife will write, I've no doubt. Say all sorts of affectionate and dutiful things to the Chief for me; tell him I went away in despair at not being able to say good-bye; he likes that style of thing, doesn't he?"

"I don't think he cares much for 'that style of thing,'" said she, with a saucy smile.

"What a capital mimic you are! Do you know I am just beginning to suspect that you are, for all your quiet simplicity of manner, a deuced deep one? Am I right?"

She shook her head, but made no reply.

"Not that I'd like you the less for it," said he, eagerly; "on the contrary, we'd understand each other all the better; there's nothing like people talking the same language, eh?"

"I hope you'll not lose your train," said she, looking at her watch; "I am half-past four."

"A broad hint," said he, laughing; bye-bye — à bientôt."

CHAPTER XXXV.

BEATTIE'S RETURN.

THE old Chief sat alone in his dining-room over his wine. If somewhat fatigued by the labours of the day — for the Court had sat late — he showed little of exhaustion; still less was he, as his years might have excused, drowsy or heavy. He sat bolt upright in his chair, and by an occasional gesture of his hand, or motion of his head, seemed as though he were giving assent to some statement he was listening to, or making his comments on it as it proceeded.

The post had brought a letter to Lucy just as dinner was over. It bore the postmark "Cagliari," and was in her brother's hand, and the old man, with considerate kindness, told her to go to her room and read it. "No, my dear child," said he as she arose to leave the room; "no! I shall not be lonely — where there is memory, there are troops of friends. Come back and tell me your news when you have read your letter."

More than an hour passed over, and he sat there heedless of time. A whole long life was passing in review before him, not connectedly, or in due sequence of events, but in detached scenes and incidents. Now it was some stormy night in the old Irish House, when Flood and Grattan exchanged their terrific denunciations and insults — now it was a brilliant dinner at Ponsonby's, with all the wits of the day — now he was leading the famous Kitty O'Dwyer, the beauty of the Irish Court, to her carriage, amid such a murmur of admiration as made the progress a triumph — or again it was a raw morning of November, and he was driving across the Park to be present at Curran's meeting with Egan.

A violent ring of the hall bell startled him, and before he could inquire the cause a servant had announced Dr. Beattie.

"I thought I might be fortunate enough to catch you before bed-hour," said the Doctor, "and I knew you would like to hear some tidings of my mission."

"You have been to — Where have you been?" said the old Judge, embarrassed between the late flood of his recollections and the sudden start of his arrival.

"To Killaloe, to see that poor fellow who had the severe fall in the hurdle race."

"Ay — to be sure — yes. I remember all now. Give me a moment, however." He nodded his head twice or thrice, as if concurring with some statement, and then said, "Go on, sir; the Court is with you."

Beattie proceeded to detail the accident and the state of the sufferer — of whom he pronounced favourably — saying that there was no fracture, nor anything worse than severe concussion. "In fact," said he, "were it an hospital case, I'd say there was very little danger."

"And do you mean to tell me, sir," said the Judge, who had followed the narrative with extreme attention, "that the man of birth and blood must succumb in any conflict more readily than the low born?"

"It's not the individual I was thinking of, so much as his belongings here. What I fear for in the present case is what the patient must confront every day of his convalescence."

Seeing that the Judge waited for some explanation, Beattie began to relate that, as he had started from Dublin the day before, he found himself in the same carriage with the young man's mother, who had been summoned by telegraph to her son's bedside.

"I have met," said he, "in my time, nearly all sorts and conditions of people. Indeed, a doctor's life brings him into contact with more maladies of nature and temperament than diseases of material origin; but anything like this woman I never saw before. To begin: she combined within herself two qualities that seem opposed to each other—a most lavish candour on the score of herself and her family, and an intense distrust of all the rest of mankind. She told me she was a baronet's wife—how she had married him—where they lived—what his estate was worth—how this young fellow had become, by the death of a brother, the heir to the property—and how his father, indignant at his extravagance, had disentailed the estate, to leave it to a younger son if so disposed. She showed at times the very greatest anxiety about her son's state; but at other moments just as intense an eagerness to learn what schemes and intrigues were being formed against him—who were the people in whose house he then was—what they were—and how he came there. To all my assurances that they were persons in every respect her son's equals, she answered by a toss of the head or a saucy half laugh. 'Irish?' asked she. 'Yes, Irish.' 'I thought so,' rejoined she; 'I told Sir Hugh I was sure of it, though he said there were English Sewells.' From this instant her distrust broke forth. All Ireland had been in a conspiracy against her family for years. She had a brother, she said it with a shiver of horror, who was cruelly beaten by an attorney in Cork for a little passing pleasantry to the man's sister; he had kissed her, or something of the kind, in a railroad carriage; and her cousin—poor dear Cornwallis Merivale—it was in Ireland he found that creature that got the divorce against him two years ago. She went on to say that there had been a plot against her son, in the very neighbourhood where he now lay ill, only a year ago—some intrigue to involve him in a marriage, the whole details of which she threatened me with the first time we should be alone.

"Though at some moments expressing herself in terms of real affection and anxiety about her poor son, she would suddenly break off to speculate on what might happen from his death. 'You know, Doctor, there is only one more boy, and if his life lapsed, Holt and the Holt estate goes to the Carringtons.'"

"An odious woman, sir—a most odious woman; I only wonder why you continued to travel in the same carriage with her."

"My profession teaches great tolerance," said the Doctor, mildly.

"Don't call tolerance, sir, what there is the better word for, subserviency. I am amazed how you endured this woman."

"Remember—it is to be remembered—that in my version of her I have condensed the conversation of some hours, and given you, as it were, the substance of much talking; and also, that I have not attempted to convey what certainly was a very perfect manner. She had no small share of good looks, a very sweet voice, and considerable attraction in point of breeding."

"I will accept none of these as alleviations, sir; her blandishments cannot blind the Court."

"I will not deny their influence upon myself," said Beattie, gently.

"I can understand you, sir," said the Judge, pompously. "The habits of your profession teach you to swallow so much that is nauseous in a sweet vehicle, that you carry the same custom into morals."

Beattie laughed so heartily at the analogy that the old man's good-humour returned to him, and he bade him continue his narrative.

"I have not much more to tell. We reached the house by about eleven o'clock at night, and my fellow-traveller sat in the carriage till I announced her to Mrs. Sewell. My own cares called me to the sick-room, and I saw no more of the ladies till this morning, just before I came away."

"She is then domesticated there. She has taken up her quarters at the Sewells' house?"

"Yes. I found her maid, too, had taken possession of Colonel Sewell's dressing-room, and dispossessed a number of his chattels to make room for her own."

"It is a happy thing, a very happy thing for me, that I have not been tried by these ordeals," said the Judge, with a long-drawn breath. "I wonder how Colonel Sewell will endure it."

"I have no means of knowing; he arrived late at night, and was still in bed and asleep when I left."

"You have not told me these people's name?"

"Trafford—Sir Hugh Beechan Trafford of Holt-Trafford, Staffordshire."

"I have met the man, or rather his father, for it was nigh fifty years ago—an old family, and of Saxon origin; and his wife—who was she?"

"Her name was Merivale: her father, I think, was Governor of Madras."

"If so, sir, she has hereditary claims for impertinence and presumption. Sir Ulysses Merivale enjoyed the proud distinction of being the most insolent man in England. It is well that you have told me who she was, Beattie, for I might have made a very fatal blunder. I was going to write to Sewell to say, 'As this is a great issue, I would advise you to bring down your mother, "special,"' but I recall my intention. Lady Lendrick would have no chance against Lady Trafford. Irish insolence has not the finish of the English article, and we put an alloy of feeling in it that destroys it altogether. Will the young man recover?"

"He is going on favourably, and I see nothing to apprehend, except, indeed, that the indiscretions of his mother may prejudice his case. She is very likely to insist on removing him; she hinted it to me as I took my leave."

"I will write to the Sewells to come up here at once. They shall evacuate the territory, and leave her in possession. As persons closely connected with my family, they must not have this outrage put upon them." He rang the bell violently, and desired the servant to request Miss Lendrick to come to him.

"She is not very well, my lord, and has gone to her room. She told Mrs. Beales to serve your lordship's tea when you were ready for it."

"What is this? What does all this mean?" said the old Judge, eagerly; for the idea of any one presuming to be ill without duly apprising him—without the preliminary step of ascertaining that it could not inconvenience him—was more than he was fully prepared for.

"Tell Mrs. Beales I want her," said he, as he rose and left the room. Muttering angrily as he went, he ascended the stairs and traversed the long corridor which led to Lucy's room; but before he had reached the door the housekeeper was at his side.

"Miss Lucy said she'd like to see your lordship, if it wasn't too much trouble, my lord."

"I am going to see her. Ask her if I may come in."

"Ycs, my lord," said Mrs. Beales from the open door. "She is awake."

"My own dear grandpapa," said Lucy, stretching out her arms to him from her bed, "how good and kind of you to come here!"

"My dear, dear child," said he, fondly;

"tell me you are not ill; tell me that it is a mere passing indisposition."

"Not even so much, grandpapa. It is simply a headache. I was crying, and I was ashamed that you should see it; and I walked out into the air; and I came back again, trying to look at ease; and my head began to throb and to pain me so, that I thought it best to go to bed. It was a letter I got—a letter from Cagliari. Poor Tom has had the terrible fever of the island. He said nothing about it at first, but now he has relapsed. There are only three lines in his own hand—the rest is from his friend. You shall see what he says. It is very short, and not very hard to read."

The old man put on his spectacles and read—

"My very dear Lucy."

"Who presumes to address you in this way? Brook Fossbrooke! What! is this the man who is called Sir Brook Fossbrooke? By what means have you become so intimate with a person of his character?"

"I know nothing better, nothing more truly noble and generous, than his character," said she, holding her temples as she spoke, for the pain of her head was almost agony. "Do read on—read on, dearest grandpapa."

He turned again to the letter, and read it over in silence till he came to the few words in Tom's hand, which he read aloud:—"Darling Lu—I shall be all right in a week. Don't fret, but write me a long—long"—he had forgotten the word "letter," "and love me always."

She burst into tears as the old man read the words, for by some strange magic, the syllables of deep affection, uttered by one unmoved, smite the heart with a pang that is actual torture. "I will take this letter down to Beattie, Lucy, and hear what he says of it," said the old man, and left the room.

"Read this, Beattie, and tell me what you say to it," said the Chief Baron, as he handed the Doctor Sir Brook's letter. "I'll tell you of the writer when you have read it."

Beattie read the note in silence, and as he laid it on the table said, "I know the man, and his strange old-fashioned writing would have recalled him without his name."

"And what do you know of him, sir?" asked the Judge, sternly.

"I can tell you the story in three words: He came to consult me one morning, about six or eight months ago. It was about an insurance on his life—a very small sum he wanted to raise, to go out to this very place he writes from. He got to talk about the project, and I don't exactly know how it came about—I forget the details now—but it ended by my lending him the money myself."

"What, sir! do you combine usury with physic?"

"On that occasion I appear to have done so," said Beattie, laughing.

"And you advanced a sum of money to a man whom you saw for the first time, simply on his showing that his life was too insecure to guarantee repayment?"

"That puts the matter a little too nakedly."

"It puts it truthfully, sir, I apprehend."

"If you mean that the man impressed me so favourably that I was disposed to do him a small service, you are right."

"You and I, Beattie, are too old for this impulsive generosity—too old by thirty years! After forty, philanthropy should take a chronic form, and never have paroxysms. I think I am correct in my medical language."

"Your medicine pleases me more than your morality," said Beattie, laughing; "but to come back to this Sir Brook—I wish you had seen him."

"Sir, I have seen him, and I have heard of him, and if not at liberty to say what I have heard of him, it is quite enough to state that my information cannot corroborate your opinion."

"Well, my lord, the possibility of what I might hear will not shake the stability of what I have seen. Remember that we doctors imagine we read human nature by stronger spectacles than the laity generally."

"You imagine it, I am aware, sir; but I have met with no such instances of acuteness amongst your co-professionals as would sustain the claim; but why are we wandering from the record? I gave you that letter to read that you might tell me, is this boy's case a dangerous one?"

"It is a very grave case, no doubt? this is the malaria fever of Sardinia—bad enough with the natives, but worse with strangers. He should be removed to better air at once if he could bear removal."

"So is it ever with your art," said the Judge, in a loud declamatory voice. "You know nothing in your difficulties but a piteous entreaty to the unknown resources of nature to assist you. No, sir; I will not hear your defence; there is no issue before the Court. What sort of practitioners have they in this island?"

"Rude enough, I can believe."

"Could a man of eminence be found to go out there and see him?"

"A man in large practice could not spare the time; but there are men of ability who are not yet in high repute; one of these might be possibly induced."

"And what might the expense be?"

"A couple of hundred—say three hundred pounds, would perhaps suffice."

"Go up-stairs and see my grand-daughter. She is very nervous and feverish; calm her mind so far as you are able; say that we are concerting measures for her brother's benefit; and by the time you shall come down again I will have made up my mind what to do."

Beattie was a valued friend of Lucy's, and she was glad to see him enter her room, but she would not suffer him to speak of herself; it was of poor Tom alone she would talk. She heard with delight the generous intentions of her grandfather, and exclaimed with rapture, "This is his real nature, and yet it is only by the little foibles of his temper that the world knows him; but we, Doctor, we, who see him as he is, know how noble-hearted and affectionate he can be!"

"I must hasten back to him," said Beattie, after a short space; "for should he decide on sending out a doctor, I must lose no time, as I must return to see this young fellow at Killaloe to-morrow."

"Oh, in my greater anxieties I forgot him! How is he?—will he recover?"

"Yes, I regard him as out of danger—that is, if Lady Trafford can be persuaded not to talk him into a relapse."

"Lady Trafford! who is she?"

"His mother: she arrived last night."

"And his name is Trafford, and his Christian name Lionel!"

"Lionel Wentworth Trafford. I took it from his dressing-case when I prescribed for him."

Lucy had been leaning on her arm as she spoke, but she now sank slowly backwards and fainted.

It was a long time before consciousness came back, and even then she lay voiceless and motionless; and, though she heard what Beattie said to her, unable to speak to him, or intimate by a gesture that she heard him.

The Doctor needed no confidences—he read the whole story. There are expressions in the human face which have no reference to physical ills; nor are they indications of bodily suffering. He who asked, "Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased?" knew how hopeless was his question; and this very despair it is—this sense of an affliction beyond the reach of art—gives a character to the expression which the doctor's eye never fails to discriminate from the look worn by malady.

As she lay there motionless, her large eyes looking at him with that expression in which eagerness struggles against debility, he saw how he had become her confidant.

"Come, my dear child," said he, taking her hand between both his own, "you have no occasion for fears on this score—so far I assure you, on my honour."

She gave his hand a slight, a very slight, pressure, and tried to say something, but could not.

"I will go down now, and see what is to be done about your brother;" she nodded, and he continued, "I will pay you another visit to-morrow early, before I leave town, and let me find you strong and hearty; and remember, that though I force no confidences, Lucy, I will not refuse them if you offer."

"I have none, sir—none," said she, in a voice of deep melancholy.

"So that I know all that is to be known?" asked he.

"All, sir," said she, with a trembling lip.

"Well, accept me as a friend whom you may trust, my dear Lucy. If you want me I will not fail you; and if you have no need of me, there is nothing that has passed to-day between us ever to be remembered—you understand me?"

"I do, sir. You will come to-morrow—won't you?"

He nodded assent, and left her.

EVENING HYMN.

HELP me, my God and King,
Rightly Thy praise to sing,
And Thee for everything
Ever adore :

For all Thy light to-day,
Lighting my darksome way,
With its celestial ray
Going before :

For that rich heavenly food
Feast of Thy flesh and blood,
Life, strength, and healthful mood
Quick'ning in me :

And for my safe retreat
From the world's storm and heat,
Under Thy mercy-seat
Hiding in Thee.

Lord, in Thy loving voice
Let my cold heart rejoice ;
Oh, may my ready choice
Make Thee my Guest ! *

Sombre the night, and drear,
Oh, let me find Thee near,
My fainting soul to cheer
With quiet rest !

On that dear breast of Thine
May I my head recline,
And may that touch divine
Thrill through my soul !

Cleansing away all dross,
Counting all else but loss,
May I Thy sacred Cross
Take for my goal !

Strong in the strength of God,
Freed from my sinful load,
Daily to tread the road Leading to Thee.

Shield, sword, and helmet — Thine,
Strength, courage, aid — divine,
Only this body — mine ;
So let it be.

Keen be the fight below,
Hard be the tempter's blow,
Nothing can overthrow Whom Thou dost keep.

Waiting Thy great behest,
I lay me down to rest ;
Calm Thou my troubled breast,
Grant me sweet sleep.

NUNC EST BIBENDUM.

HUNGARIAN wine, Hungarian wine,
('Twas thus mellifluous GLADSTONE sang)
Thy hue is bright, thy tone is fine,
And suited to an English tongue.
And if thy names are slightly hard,
They'll soon be learned by pensive BULL ;
When on each vinous merchant's card,
He reads thy titles clear and full.

The Badasconyer's good as needs,
'Tis free from acid, white, and dry ;
The Pesther Steinbruch, flowing, pleads
It's just the thing to wet your eye.
The Szamorodny's dry Tokay,
The Ruszta is a rich white flood ;
And when the Hock pours bright and gay,
It cools the brain and warms the blood.

Red Adelberger Ofner, thou,
The oftener drunk the more art loved ;
To thee, full Menes, let me bow,
For what I mean is, " much approved."
Erlaure, the man who likes not thee,
Gives me small promise of his wits ;
Now to my lips, my bright, my free,
My proud, my glowing Carlovitz !

More, many more I call to mind,
Which soon shall household words be made,
Now Austria hath her Treaty signed,
And vowed to something like Free Trade.
The House shall know its Leader's choice
When GLADSTONE's self with GLADSTONE dines ;
And I will bid you all rejoice,
O Thirsty Souls ; in Hungary wines.

From Fraser's Magazine.

MR. CARLYLE.*

THE conclusion of the History of Frederick the Great, the most elaborate of Mr. Carlyle's books, appears to afford a good opportunity, not only for reviewing that work as a whole, but for making some observations on the other works of its author, and on the general characteristics of his literary career, which has now been extended over upwards of forty years. The following list of the books contained in Messrs. Chapman and Hall's collected edition is curious in itself, and will appear, upon examination, to throw very considerable light upon the nature of his career:—

Translation of Wilhelm Meister	1824
Life of Schiller	1825
Translations from Tieck, &c.	1827
Four vols. of Miscellaneous Essays	1827-40
Sartor Resartus	1831
French Revolution	1840(?)
Chartism	1840
Hero-Worship	1840
Past and Present	1843
Cromwell	1845-48 or '9
Latter-day Pamphlets	1850
Life of Sterling	1851
Frederick the Great	1858-65

These works naturally fall into three main divisions. The first set includes the translations from the German, the Life of Schiller, and a considerable number of the more important miscellaneous essays, which also relate to German authors. Sartor Resartus is, as it were, the final result and personal application of these studies. The next set includes Chartism, Hero-Worship, Past and Present, and the Latter-day Pamphlets. Cromwell's Letters and Speeches and the History of Frederick II. form the third class; and the Life of Sterling stands by itself, and has an interest of its own. It throws greater light than all the rest on the personal history, feelings, and character of its author.

* 1. Works of Thomas Carlyle. London: Chapman and Hall. 1848.

2. History of Frederick II., called Frederick the Great. By Thomas Carlyle. London: Chapman and Hall. 1838-63. Six volumes.

Between these three sets of books there is a real and close connexion; and well as they are, no doubt, known to most of our readers, we will try to point out what it is.

The earliest works of all, the Life of Schiller and the German translations, must, no doubt, have been written when their author was quite a young man, and it is easy to see from them what a revelation German literature was to him. His reviews of Goethe, Novalis, and others, but especially his reviews of Richter, are those of an admiring student and disciple; and though there was that in him which there never yet was in any German whatever (if so wide a proposition may be permitted to any human creature), it is abundantly clear that not merely his style, but the whole tone and temper of his mind and cast of his opinions, were most deeply influenced by these studies. It would appear that they were the foundation on which rested his fundamental theories about life and its affairs, his religion, if the word be used in a wide untechnical sense.

Sartor Resartus is the nearest approach which he has ever made to a systematic statement upon this subject. He was, however, too much of an Englishman, and far too deeply imbued with the busy and practical spirit of the age in which he lived, to rest satisfied with the mere investigation or organization of principles. Practice was to the full as valuable to Mr. Carlyle as theory, and the problem which specially engaged his attention, and on which he brought his general theories to bear, was pre-eminently practical. It was the great social and political problem of the age. How ought England to be governed, and for what purposes? and above all, how ought the great question as to the condition of the poor to be dealt with? The History of the French Revolution no doubt forced these thoughts upon his mind, and he expressed them in what we have described as the second class of his works—Chartism, Hero-Worship, Past and Present, and afterwards in the Latter-day Pamphlets. It is obvious enough, and has been repeated almost ad nauseam, that these works, with the exception of the Latter-day Pamphlets only state, and that not in the most satisfactory manner, a problem which they do not even attempt to solve. It is obvious enough to every impartial reader, that no one could feel this more deeply than their author. He admits continually, in a thousand forms, that he has not the special knowledge which will enable him to make specific suggestions; he expresses in various ways his contempt for such suggestions, and his belief that the disease over which he laments is too deep to be reached by any 'Morrison's Pill' remedy, and he maintains that it is to be cured only by a radical change in the whole spirit of our lives and institutions. This seems to form the point of connection between the second and third class of his works. In his histories, he reflects that others have had to deal with modifications of the same problem, and that, for practical purpose, example and sympathy are of far greater efficacy than mere theory; hence he takes up historically the great problem which had fascinated him. How did Cromwell govern this country? How did Frederick play his part as king, and elevate Prussia into a great nation, not by leaving it to itself, but by the most active and persistent government? The Letters and Speeches of Cromwell and the History of Frederick are the answers to these questions.

Such appears to us to be, in general terms, the relation between Mr. Carlyle's different writings. They disclose, first, his general principles and views; next, his estimate of the political and social condition of his own time and country; and lastly, his conception, thrown into the narrative form, of the true path to be taken, and of the conditions under which better things may be hoped for. Of course it would be highly pedantic to affect to make any marked distinction between these different classes of writings. Each book has its own object and its own unity; and their author is much too considerable a writer, and far too great an artist, to neglect that fact in order to strain them so as to subserve any special purpose. Still this general vein does run through them all, and does give them a general unity. At all events, it affords a convenient classification for the purpose of making some observations—first, on Mr. Carlyle's general principles; secondly, on his view of the social and political condition of the country; and thirdly, on his view of the light thrown upon it by those passages of history which he has treated in detail, and specially by his History of Frederick the Great.

First, then, let us shortly consider the nature and chief articles of Mr. Carlyle's general creed. It is expressed over and over again in almost everything that he has written, and is embodied in his very style and habitual terms of expression in a manner as vivid and impressive as it is unsystematic. Sartor Resartus, perhaps, approaches more closely to a systematic exposition of it than any other of his works. His chief and fundamental tenet may be described in a single word. He is a Transcendentalist. He utterly rebelled in his youth, and down to the present time has persisted in his rebellion, against the ruling doctrines of the age, the doctrine, namely, which reduces knowledge to experience generalized, and morality to a system of utilitarianism, and which supplies kindred explanations of religion, beauty, and the other objects by which the human feelings are most deeply stirred. Nothing can exceed the scorn with which he repudiates, satirizes, caricatures, and tramples on these doctrines whenever he has reason to speak of them. Perhaps the best and raciest explosion of this sort to be found in his works is his summary of the pig-philosophy in the Latter-day Pamphlets. Even those unhappy persons who (like the present reviewer to some extent) hold these pernicious doctrines, must enjoy the manner in which they are handled. The passage is well known, but too much to our purpose to be left unquoted, as it exhibits to perfection the nature of the views from which its author revolts, and the sentiment under the influence of which he revolts against them.

1. 'The universe, as far as swine conjecture can go, is an immeasurable swine-trough, consisting of solids and liquids, and other contrasts and kinds; especially consisting of attainable and unattainable, the latter in immensely larger proportion for most pigs.'

2. 'Moral evil is unattainability of pig's wash; moral good attainability of ditto.'

4. 'Define the whole duty of pigs. It is the mission of universal pighood, and the duty of all pigs, at all times, to diminish the quantity of unattainable, and increase that of attainable. All knowledge, and device, and effort, ought to be directed thither, and thither only; pig science, pig enthusiasm and devotion, have this one aim. It is the whole duty of pigs.'

5. 'Pig-poetry ought to consist of the universal recognition of the excellence of pig's-wash and ground barley, and the felicity of pigs whose trough is in order and who have had enough. Hrrumph!

7. 'Who made the pig? Unknown; perhaps the pork-butcher.' (There is a perfectly sublime humour in this, especially when we consider that it has nothing to do with the subject).

8. 'Have you law and justice in Pigdom? Pigs of observation have discerned that there is or was once supposed to be a thing called justice. Undeniably, at least there is a sentiment in pig-nature called indignation, revenge, &c., which, if one pig provoke another, comes out in a more or less destructive manner: hence, laws are necessary, amazing quantities of laws. For quarrelling is attended with loss of blood, of life, or, at any rate, with frightful effusion of the general stock of hog's-wash, and ruin (temporary ruin) to large sections of the universal swine's-trough: wherefore, let justice be observed that so quarrelling be avoided.

9. 'What is justice? Your own share of the general swine's-trough, not any portion of my share.

10. 'But what is my share? Ah, there, in fact, lies the grand difficulty. . . . My share is on the whole whatever I can contrive to get without being hanged or sent to the huiks.'

We have made this long extract because it sets in the clearest light Mr. Carlyle's contempt of the character of the system which he has to attack and protest against. Democracy and Utilitarianism, and all things connected with or related to them, are in his eyes the giant evil of the day, against which he is always, and in all legitimate ways, to make war. He carries on the war not by argument or by set refutation, but by ridicule, by irony, by indignant denunciation and counter assertion. It would be waste of time and space to attempt to give any analysis or compressed account of the attacks which he makes upon these views. Sartor Resartus, or at least the three chapters on the Everlasting No, the Centre of Indifference, and the Everlasting Yea, are a short history of the course by which his mind arrived at its settled principles. Herr Teufelsdröckh revolts against the established creed of his country, and falls fast into a state of indifferent dissatisfaction and terror. He then becomes calm: 'Suppose the worst is true,—suppose I am to die and be damned. I will take it at least like a man, and not tremble before it like a cur. What matter where, so I am still the same.' On this foundation he denies and repudiates whatever he considers false, notwithstanding the penalties usually supposed to be attached to such denials, and at last he is rewarded, as John Bunyan would have said, by a vision of the Celestial City, and the shining ones who walked there. He obtains a transcendental vision of goodness, of immortality, of eternal truth and justice, and of God who is the centre and essence of it all. The eternal world shines out in indefinite but real and indescribable splendour and truth, and seen in its light, he is enabled to look upon the world in which he lives with cheerfulness, with courageous resignation, and with an earnest desire to make it better, and to be on the side of the good influences which play upon it and against the bad ones. It is impossible, from the very nature of the case, that these views should be expressed in a definite manner. They run, as a matter of course into poetry and metaphor. He writes of 'the Destinies,' 'the writings on the marble tablet,' the Silences, and Eternities, and Immensities, as the ultimate ruling principles of life. A single specimen may stand for a thousand. In the Latter-day Pamphlets a group is introduced, 'under the summer beech-tree,' including an 'official law dignitary' and 'an ancient figure not engaged in smoking,' who observes, on the question of 'What to do with our criminals?'—'If we could do approximately as God Almighty does towards them: in a word, if we could try to do justice towards them. . . . 'I'll thank you for a definition of justice,' sneered the official person, in a cheerily scornful and triumphant manner. . . . 'Well, I have no pocket definition of justice to give your lordship. It has not been quite my trade to look after such a definition. I could rather fancy it had been your lordship's trade, sitting on your high place this long while. But one thing I can tell you: justice always is, whether we define it or not. Everything done, suffered, or proposed in Parliament, or out of it, is either just or unjust; either is accepted by the gods and eternal facts, or is repelled by them.' A vast deal of Mr. Carlyle's philosophy is fairly illustrated by this short specimen. He believes in Justice, in Right, in the Eternities, and the Silences, in God, in the soul. He does not believe in the pig-philosophy, or in democracy, which is its political equivalent.

As the present reviewer, to borrow one of Mr. Carlyle's own phrases, has a good deal more sympathy than Mr. Carlyle himself with the pig-philosophy, and also with democracy, it may be as well to go a little into the subject, and to state why and how far, notwithstanding this difference, we (to resume the common dialect) agree with Mr. Carlyle upon these topics, and what is the extent of our difference with him.

It is almost too trite a remark to be made that the great controversy between Platonists and Aristotelians, Realists and Nominalists, Locke and Kant, Mr. John Stuart Mill and Sir W. Hamilton, or by whatever other name it may be known, is the fundamental controversy which runs through nearly all intellectual subjects. It shows itself in every subject of human knowledge; for instance, in theology, in ethics, in jurisprudence, in mathematics, and in politics, and in its own proper and natural metaphysical form it is even now just as eager, as vivacious, and as attractive to all manner of men as it was in ancient Athens, and probably in the days when the Pyramids of Egypt were still new. Nothing but great ignorance or extreme presumption could induce any man to suppose that he could contribute anything of the least importance to the decision of such a controversy, if, indeed, any one seriously thinks that it is a controversy which in the nature of things can ever be decided. It is, however, not only possible, but, as it appears to us highly desirable, to make some observations on one particular aspect of the controversy, which, though highly important, has been much neglected.

The question at issue between the Transcendentalist and the Empiricist is, whether all our knowledge is simply generalized experience as the Empiricist affirms, or whether, as the Transcendentalist affirms, we have mental organs by the use of which we are able to affirm various truths of the highest importance, the truths which Transcendentalists do usually affirm being such as the existence of God, the distinction between right and wrong, and their universal obligation. The practical difference between the two schools, and the one which gives the controversy between them that tone of eagerness and something like indignation which it is apt to assume, consists in the fact that Transcendentalists always consider that if their doctrines were universally admitted, mankind would lead a nobler, more exalted life than they actually do lead, and would be free from all manner of debasing and ignoble conceptions of their duties here and of their prospects hereafter, which are supposed to be the natural growth of Empiricism carried out to its full consequences in all the different departments of life. The controversialists on each side appear to us to do each other great practical injustice. Be the merits of the controversy itself what they will, we think it clear that they stand in need of each other, and that, though neither side is complete in its belief, each has got hold of a truth which the other side ought to recognize. In order to explain this we will try to state shortly, and with special reference to Mr. Carlyle's writings, the strong and weak side of Transcendentalism and Empiricism respectively.

The strong side of Transcendentalism is, that it does act powerfully on the imagination and on the passions. It is an unquestionable fact that men are immensely influenced by the terms which Transcendentalists employ and of which they profess to justify the employment. The weak side of Transcendentalism is, that no Transcendentalist has ever yet succeeded in making a statement of his views which commands general assent. The Absolute and the Infinite, Faith, Beauty, Justice, Duty, and the like are words of power, but Empiricists have always been able to push their fingers through them. On the other hand, Empiricists can point to results the authority of which no one can deny. The multiplication table is true. Newton's Principia are true. The same may be said of large sections of physical philosophy, and of all results obtained and verified by the application of the approved methods of philosophizing. The most resolute Transcendentalist does not deny that his characteristic and cherished beliefs might be strengthened by further evidence. Theodore Parker, probably, stood alone in the assertion that the actual reappearance of the dead would add nothing to his conviction of the truth of the doctrine of a future state. The immense success and influence of Christianity, and of other religions resting on a basis of fact either true or taken to be true, are so many proofs of the vast importance of the empirical view of things in regard to religion and morals. If the fundamental propositions of both or either could be supported by proofs similar in kind to those on which physical science rests its claims to belief, it cannot be seriously doubted that this would both be and be felt to be a great gain to all who profess to be their friends. The weak side of Empiricism is an incompleteness which is inseparable from the early stages of every philosophy, and which may turn out ultimately to be inseparable from human knowledge and human thought when carried to its highest pitch. Incomplete, however, Empiricism most undoubtedly is upon the moral and religious side. It is far from having thoroughly answered the questions why men should be virtuous? what virtue consists of? and how A B is to know whether this or that is right or wrong? Its utterances are still more unsatisfactory upon the subject of religion, as to which it constantly has to say,

'Perhaps,' and 'I don't know.' In the meantime life has to go on, men are continually called upon to act here, there, and everywhere, in regard to all manner of matters which cannot be properly managed without reference to topics on which the Transcendentalists speak in an unsatisfactory manner, and on which the Empiricists have nothing at all to say. I am tempted to lie or steal. Why should I refrain? Virtue and Justice forbid you, says the Transcendentalist. And what are Virtue and Justice? They are the writing on the Iron Tablets; the voice of the Eternities; I have no pocket definition of them; but unless you know them and do them they will vindicate themselves in an altogether frightful manner, &c., &c., says the Transcendentalist. In a word, he threatens and rages instead of answering. The Empiricist carries the matter a little further. Virtue is compliance with a system of rules calculated to produce happiness which consists of such and such elements. And why should I try to promote general happiness, even if I got over the difficulty of ascertaining in a satisfactory way in what it consists and what would promote it? You may, perhaps, be more or less hung, damned, and hated, all or either, by yourself and others, says the Empiricist. And suppose I choose to run my chance? Then take your chance and go about your business. This is an answer, but it hardly explains in a completely satisfactory manner all the questions that may be asked, especially if the questioner resolutely pushes home the questions — what degree of probability there is that he will incur the consequences suggested? who is to inflict them? and why his instructor thinks that they will be inflicted? Still, incomplete as the answer of the Empiricist is, it is undoubtedly to the purpose, and is true as far as it goes; and what is more, it contains all, or at all events, most of the precise attainable truth which it is possible to state on the subject. Happiness is approximately a definite idea; so is punishment. No one can affect to misunderstand their meaning; and though a man may affect to despise and defy the penalties which the utilitarian system holds out, as a matter of fact they have a real and an exceedingly powerful influence, as far as they go, though they certainly do not, at all events, as usually stated, exhaust the topics to which they refer.

The case of morality, of which we have thus given a statement of the most summary kind, affords an excellent illustration of the relation in which, as it appears to us, the two great schools of thought ought to stand to each. The Transcendentalists are preachers, the Empiricists are philosophers. The object of the Transcendentalist is to excite the passions, that of the Empiricist is to give the theory of the doctrine which the Transcendentalists preach. Each function is necessary to the great object of human well-being on the large scale, and there is really no reason whatever for their being opposed to each other. The Transcendentalist describes the majesty, the beauty, the superlative glory and worth of justice in a thousand ways. He tells men, with perfect truth, that they ought above all things to know and to do justice; that if they do not know it, it will make them know it; that an age which knows and does what is just is by that very fact happy and blessed above all other ages, and so on. This kind of language is of immense importance. In the hands of a man like Mr. Carlyle it may be made to come home to every heart, and to influence thousands upon thousands in the most powerful way in the direction of all that is most worthy of admiration, but it is not in reality opposed to the Empiricist philosophy any more than anatomy or chemistry is opposed to painting. The knowledge of a just man, the contemplation of a just act, excites in my mind feelings of admiration and awe, which are capable of being deepened and rendered habitual and influential over my conduct to an almost indefinite extent by the use of such eloquent and noble phraseology as Mr. Carlyle's, for men are to a great extent the creatures of habit and sympathy. But why need these impressions be in any degree disturbed by my learning that justice consists in adherence to fixed rules, framed so as to promote the general happiness? Would the study of anatomy destroy my delight in the beauty of the human face? or is there any reason why I shall cease to care about water as soon as I learn that it is composed of oxygen and hydrogen gas mixed in certain proportions? One thing is certain at all events, the Transcendentalist will no more be able to reform an unjust law by declaiming about justice without knowing what it means, than the painter will be able to cure a squint without the aid of the surgeon. On the other hand, a man will never fall in love with a mere anatomical plate, or admire a landscape which represents nothing but geological sections; and that, be it what it may, which eludes the anatomist or the geologist, and which is worshipped, indicated, passionately asserted in a thousand forms by the poet and the painter under the name of Beauty, marks the incompleteness but not the falsehood of science, and the sphere in which it stands in need of the assistance of art.

These considerations appear to us to show in what respects Mr. Carlyle has been unjustly treated by the Empirical school, and in what respects he in his turn has been unjust to them. It appears to us that there has been a great deal of injustice on each side. We shall best give our own estimate of Mr. Carlyle by attempting to give a notion of the kind and extent of each of these injustices. We will take first the injustice of the Empirical school to Mr. Carlyle. He is taunted with his inability to suggest practical remedies for the evils of which he complains. He is constantly treated as a mere visionary. His express doctrines are analyzed and declared to be contradictory or unmeaning. His continual employment of humour and irony is stigmatized as impertinence and affectation. In short, he is treated as a mere pretender, or, as he would say himself, as a sham. All such criticism appears to us to be unfair, because it proceeds on a false notion of the part which Mr. Carlyle takes, and is fitted by nature to take, in the world of thought and literature. Let us take in turn the different accusations just specified, which are the most important of those which are brought against him, and try to appreciate their value.

First, it is said that he is a mere prophet of evil. A Jeremiah, who suggests no remedies for the evils which he points out in the affairs of the world.

This is in the first place no crime if it were true, and in the next place it is very far indeed from being true. No man is universal; and in a world which contains so strange a mixture of good and evil as the world in which we live, there is abundant room for the discharge of every sort of function. We want prophets of evil as well as prophets of good, for there is plenty for them to prophesy about. That the whole head is sick and the whole heart sore, and that there is no health in us, may be an exaggerated statement; but it is perfectly true and very important that we do suffer under a great variety of political, social, and moral diseases, and that those who point out their existence and insist upon the necessity of curing them do a great service. Every one no doubt has his bias; and the dyspeptic bias is certainly less agreeable to all parties—to those who have it as well as to those who hear the dyspeptic preacher—than the euphletic; but Heraclitus has his place in the world as well as Democritus, and the unhappy Jeremiah requires a place in society as well as those who take a brighter view of life.

It is, however, very far indeed from being true that Mr. Carlyle is a mere Jeremiah, and that his lamentations have no practical issue or application. In point of fact his writings have produced a strong practical effect on many people, and are well calculated to produce such an effect. They are quaint and strangely-worded sermons on all the great moral virtues. Mr. Carlyle's object is to exhort his readers to truth, industry, fortitude, justice, belief and trust in God, and other things admitted by moralists of all times and countries to be the cardinal and fundamental virtues. That he does this in a most effectual manner, is proved by the immense influence and popularity which, in fact, he has acquired. That he has done it by the use of unusual phraseology, by startling figures, by an admirable employment of humour and imagination, by drawing attractive pictures of the virtues which he preaches, and showing the weak and ridiculous side of the contrary vices in the case of real men—all this is mere accident. Parables are the most impressive of all exhortations, and probably it would be hardly possible in any set discourse on the subject to give so striking an exhortation to manliness, vigour, and truthfulness as is conveyed by Mr. Carlyle in his account of Abbot Sampson in Past and Present. The portrait may or may not resemble the original, but its intrinsic value, considered as a sermon, does not depend on that. It depends on the vigour with which it sets before us the excellence and beauty of the characteristics which it holds up to our admiration. This is true of nearly every picture which Mr. Carlyle has ever painted of great, or even of inconsiderable men. His object always is to construct in his own mind, from such materials as are accessible to him, a picture of the living man as he really was; and when he has got him, he invariably enlists our affections on the side of what was good in him, with as much vigour as the most powerful novelist, and, as it seems to us, with a truth and force of moral sentiment which hardly any writer of fiction, at least in our days, has ever attained to. In all his voluminous writings there is probably not a line which ever did any one any moral harm. There are hundreds, nay thousands of pages, which have taught hundreds of thousands of readers to love and honour every form of virtue, especially the harder and more active forms of it. This might be illustrated to any extent from every one of his historical or biographical works. The essence of all of them is the same. Here is Burns, Voltaire, Johnson, Rousseau, Cromwell, Napoleon, who you will. This was how he lived and worked. This was the net result of his activity in life. Thus and thus you may satisfy yourselves that in so far as he succeeded, in so far as his work prospered or lasted, it was because it corresponded with fact, and was done well, honestly, and with a true appreciation, express or tacit, of the conditions under which it had to be done. In every single instance, even in those cases in which his general dislike of the person of whom he is writing is greatest, Mr. Carlyle finds something to illustrate his belief in the immense value and beauty of every form of goodness. It is the theme on which he dwells so continually, that it becomes almost a trick with him. Surely this is a practical way of dealing with evils which, according to him, are in every case the companions at least, if not the result, of moral wrong-doings or shortcomings. His sermon, his practical advice to those whom he addresses, may be expressed in the most definite and practical of all possible forms. It is shortly this — Here, there, and everywhere you are all labouring under a variety of evils which I point out to you, and present to your notice in the most picturesque and striking forms. If you want to cure them, you must begin by being sincere, active, truthful, energetic, and self-sacrificing yourselves, and you must learn to recognize these qualities in others when you see them, and to understand the different results which they and the opposite vices have in fact continually produced in human affairs. That you may take this advice to heart, understand its bearing and see and feel how true it is; look here, and here, and here, and here, at the problems which have been solved by other men under other circumstances by the help of the very powers which I press you to exert. It is for especial men to devise special remedies for particular evils. All that I can do is to point out to you the general means by which all the evils of human life must be remedied, if they are to be remedied at all. Surely if this is not practical teaching it is hard to say what is.

It is continually said, however, that Mr. Carlyle is a mere visionary, and that his style is a mass of affected singularity.

This accusation appears to us as unjust as the other. No doubt he is a Transcendentalist, and as such he labours under the difficulty of being, as he would say himself, semi-articulate. The leading doctrine of Transcendentalism, as Mr. Carlyle frequently says, is, that intellect is in the nature of insight or direct vision, and that the logical faculty is but a secondary subordinate part of it. The humble pig-philosophers would express this by saying that he attaches more importance to power and richness of perception than to the precision of its outlines. Undoubtedly this power is most important. Without good meat cooks are a nuisance. Unless the things which you see are the important and ruling elements of life, it is no great matter to be able to describe clearly to other people what you do see. If, on the other hand, you have your eye on what is permanent and of primary importance, much confusion of language, some tendency to paradox, and any quantity of mannerism are, after all, venial faults. What looks like affected singularity in Mr. Carlyle's style is the natural effect of his position. The strange language which he uses is used because it is the way in which he finds it natural to express the extreme depth, earnestness, and vivacity of his own feelings on the topics on which he writes. It is only by the use of humour and paradox that he can give full scope to his feelings. It is by these means alone that he can show how much he is in earnest, and that he can venture to introduce those occasional bursts of passion into his writings which form so prominent a feature in them. We should describe his style rather as restrained and studiously reticent, than as impertinent or affected. It is the style of a man who does not choose to let himself loose, and to give unrestrained utterance to all that is in his mind. There is no shrieking, or bewailing, or craving for sympathy in it. It is the style of a man of deep sensibility and great self-respect, who is continually saying to his readers, Laugh if you will. There is a ludicrous side to all this. I see and feel it as clearly as any one; but there are also deeper ways of looking at it — things to which I, for my part, attach intense importance, as you may see by every word I write, as much by my laughter as by anything else. Mr. Carlyle's writings almost always suggest that whatever strangeness there may be in his style was put there not by Mr. Carlyle himself, with a view to make an impression, but because that was the way in which the facts presented themselves to his mind. In his earlier writings there is also a dash of something apologetic. He writes as young men often do when they take to periodical literature, as if they felt it a sort of liberty to address the public at all, and were obliged to make special efforts to attract their attention; but by degrees his way becomes clearer before him, he appears to stand more firmly on his legs, and his style becomes what every good style ought to be, the genuine expression of the mind and character of the author, though it retains tricks which certainly deform it, but which, after a certain time, a judicious reader becomes used to, and allows for, just as he allows for the allusive style of Gibbon or the ponderous sentences of Johnson. After all, the singularities of Mr. Carlyle's style form a very small part of it. Some of them, as the use of 'this' and 'that,' are nothing more than Lowland Scotch, the like of which are to be found, for instance, in Chalmers. Others, as the constant translation of the German 'ganz' into 'quite,' are relics of his early German studies, a much greater singularity forty years ago than they are now. After allowing, however, for these and many scores of other really unimportant matters, which might be brushed away without altering the substance of his works, what remains is a style, in some respects, of almost unequalled excellence. It is admirable for every purpose of description — nervous, natural, and vivid, to a degree which cannot be exaggerated. There is hardly to be found in the whole range of English literature a book which by mere power of style produced so great and permanent an effect as the History of the French Revolution. The men, the nation, their works and ways, their creeds and their writings, stand before us with an outline so clear and brilliant, that we feel as if we had known and lived with them. Probably several generations of Englishmen will take from Mr. Carlyle their notions of Mirabeau, Robespierre, Danton, and Louis XVI. The exquisite life and energy of these pictures is best seen by contrast. Compare the account of the flight to Varennes, or of the scene of the 10th of August, with the parallel passages in Lamartine. They differ as the conversation of a lively, well-bred man of the world differs from the declamation of a rather pompous and not first-rate actor. A style which has such merits as these must after all be taken on its own terms. Tricks of all kinds — such as twists of language, the frequent repetition of stock phrases (Dead-Sea-Apism, Wind-bag, &c.), the queer habit of quoting from unwritten books by non-existent authors, who are only Mr. Carlyle over again — are points in which, if such a man will indulge himself, he must indulge himself. If Doctor Johnson were still to be met with at the Club, who would object to meet him for fear of his making uncouth faces, or putting orange-peel in his pocket?

There is one singular and conclusive proof of the injustice of regarding Mr. Carlyle as a mere visionary, which has become much more prominent in his later works than it was in his earlier ones. In all English literature there is not to be found an instance of a historian who shows such industry and shrewdness in the investigation of matters of fact. No attorney preparing a brief for counsel could have taken so much pains to get legal evidence of every fact which could possibly be relevant to the cause, as Mr. Carlyle has taken to elucidate everything which can in any way be brought to bear upon the history of his various heroes. Indeed, one of the defects of the History of Frederick II., as it appears to us, is that too much trouble has been expended upon the details of it. This alone would be conclusive proof that whatever else he is, Mr. Carlyle is not a mere spinner of fine phrases which have no relation to practical life, and that whatever else may be said of his Transcendentalism, it is a real belief, founded on real facts, and held by a man who knows what facts are, and how to argue about them. There is a sort of Transcendentalism which people take to because it is the easiest of all forms of talking, and very poor stuff it is; but there is also another kind, which, however strange it may seem to those who incline rather (like ourselves) to the porcine view of things, does as a fact appear eternally true and intensely important to those who show in other ways that their intellects are thoroughly sound and vigorous, and Mr. Carlyle has given superabundant collateral proof of his possession of this soundness and vigour. This in itself ought to protect him from the charge of being visionary, so far as the charge is one which involves a censure.

To those who not merely defend, but admire Mr. Carlyle, his practical sagacity will probably appear one of the most characteristic features of his character. It is entirely in harmony with the whole of his philosophy, which might almost be described as fact-worship. To truth, to fact, to whatever is, and, as he says, thereby proves its right to be, Mr. Carlyle, to use his own language, is unflinchingly 'loyal'; and this reverence for truth expresses itself, amongst other things, in the keen sagacity with which he seeks out and sets in order the minutest scraps of it. The well-known controvery about the sinking of the Vengeur, which Mr. Carlyle had described in the early editions of his History of the Revolution in the usual way, and which, notwithstanding its picturesqueness, and notwithstanding the intercession of various admiring Frenchmen, he afterwards expunged, was one of the earliest proofs which he gave of this disposition. Every one of his subsequent books abounds in further illustrations of it.

The last point on which Mr. Carlyle is usually attacked by the Empirical school, is in relation to his specific doctrines which, they say, are generally fallacies or paradoxes. For instance, that silence is better than speech, and that might is right, are doctrines of his which have been a constant source of attack, sometimes humorous, sometimes serious. Sterling said that he preached the doctrine of silence with a battery of cannon, and when one is told that might is right, there certainly is a strong temptation to ask which of the two it is intended to compliment. Does it mean that when I kill my father I merely seem to have the might to do so, because I have no right to do so? or does it mean that I have the right to do so because I have the might to do so? If the first, the proposition appears to add nothing to the meaning of the word right, but makes the word might unmeaning. In the second case it adds nothing to our knowledge of might, but makes right unmeaning.

Some excuse may probably be found for the unhappy swineherds who are puzzled by these considerations, but we think that nevertheless there is a way out of them. The fact is, that in each of these cases — and they are samples of several which might be mentioned — Mr. Carlyle has a real and important meaning, which it pleases him to throw into a paradoxical form. The silence which is said to be golden is not the silence of sleep or stupidity, but the silence of self-restraint. Johnson, for instance, who passed his whole life in writing, is praised for his silence, and the meaning of the phrase apparently is, first, that he did not write about himself and his troubles, and next, that he did not write upon subjects upon which it would probably have been pleasant for him, but not good for his neighbors that he should write. It is a great and a most important truth that there is a style of writing and talking, and a very attractive style it is, which is simply bad, and bad in proportion to its attractiveness. Most of the novels which idealize the author, such poems as the most popular of Byron's, in a word, appeals for sympathy and confessions of weakness of all kinds, ought never to be written at all. The same may be said of those rebellious ravings in which people kick against the pricks, and defy destiny. A man with a considerable gift of expression is under a great temptation to speak unadvisedly with his lips upon matters of this sort, and the self-command which enables him to hold his tongue is certainly a more valuable gift than the fluency which constitutes his temptation to speak. Indeed, Mr. Carlyle's favourite phrase is little more than an adaptation of a very high authority. 'If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body.' A talent for silence involves this gift to a great extent. So far, we entirely agree with Mr. Carlyle's admiration of the gift of silence, which is compatible, be it observed, with talking and writing being the trade of the man who possesses it, and may be exercised by a barrister in large practice, or by a newspaper writer as well as by a ploughman. It must, however, be observed that he sometimes appears to mean something more than this. The contrast which sometimes occurs between clearness of inward perception or, as he would say, vision, and difficulty of articulate expression is undoubtedly picturesque, and it strikes Mr. Carlyle's fancy so forcibly that he seems to think that a difficulty in expressing oneself — such, for instance, as Cromwell's — is a positive intellectual or moral excellency, that it adds something, as it were, to the inner light which it conceals. This appears to us to be a fallacy into which Mr. Carlyle has been seduced by his passion for the picturesque.

As to the maxim that Might and Right are identical — that, too, has a meaning, and a most vitally important one, the denial of the truth of which would lead a man straight to the deepest kind of scepticism. The meaning of it appears to be, that the world is so constituted that, on the whole, and in the long run, truth and justice prevail, and are successful; that they are the principles on which alone men can permanently carry on their intercourse with each other. This is a sort of commonplace, the assertion of which would attract little attention. The peculiarity of Mr. Carlyle's way of looking at it is, that he believes it so firmly that he takes permanent and widespread success as evidence of the truth and justice of that which causes it; and in this, again, we think he is perfectly right, though if his mind had had an analytical bent he would have taken the trouble to ascertain the conditions under which delusions may, as they certainly sometimes do, endure for a great length of time, and would have furnished us with some tests for distinguishing the sort of success and durability which affords evidence of the justice of a cause from that which not unfrequently goes along with gross falsehood and imposture. His History of Frederick II. affords a good illustration of the importance of this side of the problem. Silesia was an Austrian province, by wrong, says Mr. Carlyle, from the middle of the seventeenth to the middle of the eighteenth century. It then became, and has since been, a Prussian province. Why did the century of Austrian might prove nothing as to Austrian right; whilst the century of Prussian might is put forward as evidence of Prussian right? If Mr. Carlyle were able to reply — The Austrian rule never succeeded in assimilating Silesia to the rest of the Austrian empire, and was a military occupation, which came to an end as soon as a stronger than he bound the strong man armed who kept the house; whereas the Prussian rule has made Silesia, to all intents and purposes, a part of Prussia, as French rule has made Franche Comté and Rousillon parts of France — he would have answered the question. Whether he could say so in point of fact, we do not venture to say; but if he wished to prove as well as passionately to assert his doctrine about Might and Right, he ought to provide answers for such questions. The doctrine itself, strange as it may appear that such should be the case, is, in a slightly different form, one of the leading tenets of our porcine creed. Pig philosophy becomes coherent and systematic only by the assertion of the ultimate identity of truth and utility. Truth is to be pursued (according to that philosophy) unflinchingly to all lengths, notwithstanding any apparent and immediate sacrifices, because the widest and largest experience that we can form proves that it, and it alone, is useful and good in the long run. Great as may be the temptation at particular moments to make your sum come right by counting $5+2=8$, it will be better for you, in the long run, to make the sum equal to 7. Moreover, you will find that systems which do succeed, which do produce general happiness, for long periods of time, and in a great number of cases, do so because they contain some degree of truth, and in proportion to the degree of truth which they contain. This is Mr. Carlyle's doctrine in other words. Indeed, no one, we imagine, would deny that in every controversy it is an enormous and unspeakable advantage to be on the right side. If, then, there is a long and intricate controversy, the rights of which are not immediately apparent, and in which the parties are in other respects pretty equally matched, and if one side steadily gains upon and gradually overpowers the other, is it not at all events probable that the winning side is the one in which this vast hidden advantage lies? In common life, every one says so. Ask any lawyer whether any advantage in a lawsuit can be compared to the advantage of having a good case, and whether, on the other hand, if he knew nothing of the special merits of the case, he would not bet that the side which won in a cause thoroughly fought out, was the right side? Thus the ultimate and essential identity of might and right is a truth of vital importance, though it may be at times expressed by Mr. Carlyle in a paradoxical way. We have taken these doctrines as specimens, because they are perhaps more frequently attacked and ridiculed than any others; but we believe that analogous defences might be set up for most of the maxims which he so pertinaciously preaches, and which are so frequently stigmatized as false or paradoxical.

Having thus tried to show in what respects Mr. Carlyle is unjustly treated by the Empirical school, let us look a little at the injustice of which Mr. Carlyle himself is guilty towards the poor pigs and their creed. It is in the second or practical division of his works that this injustice is most apparent, in such works, that is to say, as Past and Present, Chartism, the Later-day Pamphlets, and, in a word, those which deal with the great question of the condition of England, and especially of the labouring classes. A very few words will be enough to recall to his readers the general outline of his views on these subjects. Benthamism, Political Economy, Laissez-faire, are the objects of his special detestation and unsparing ridicule and denunciation. Parliamentary debates, journalism, democratic government, and democratic institutions in general are a vain janglement and babblement. Our first right is to be ruled. Our first necessity is the hero who will take command of us, and lead us gently, if it may be, but lead us at all events, in the direction of truth and right, and away from our present anarchy, our beaver-like energy, our aristocratic idleness and selfishness. Laissez-faire, Benthamism, and Democracy have brought us to anarchy, the slough of despond and the brink of the precipice. Nothing can set us to rights but the strong arm of some new Cromwell, who will be a real leader and king of men.

This sort of doctrine fills many volumes, and is well calculated to make a great impression on the imagination. Yet we think it is unjust and thoroughly false in fact. We assert, and will try to prove our assertion, that tried by Mr. Carlyle's own canons, Benthamism and Democracy, have a vast deal of truth in them, and have proved their right by might of the most undeniable kind, and that parliamentary debates, journalism, and the rest, are so far from being justly described as mere janglement and babblement, that they, and the other things which Mr. Carlyle despises so heartily, constitute collectively a most vigilant, active, powerful, and benevolent government, which has done, and is doing in this country and elsewhere, one of the greatest works that ever was done in the world, and that in a way in which no Cromwell, Mahomet, or other individual hero could possibly do it, however much his heroism and kingship might be recognized by mankind.

In order to show this we must vindicate a little the leading principle of Benthamism and Democracy, which, as a matter of fact, has been the guiding and ruling spirit of the government of this country for the whole of the present and during part of the last century. The 'greatest happiness principle,' as Bentham delighted to call it (and there is by the way a curious analogy between Benthames and Carlylese, and also between the characters of the two men, if we had time to draw it out), did not mean, in Bentham's works, or in those of his disciples, the personal gratification of each individual man. It was 'the greatest happiness of the greatest number.' It is very true that it is the weak side of Bentham's theories that he does not give sufficient prominence to the reasons which may and ought to induce men to try to further this object; but the question between him and Mr. Carlyle is as to the goodness of the object itself; and at the risk of being stigmatized as mere pigs, with no souls to speak of above the trough and its contents, we think that Mr. Carlyle would find it extremely difficult to deny either of the following propositions:—

1. A pocket definition of justice is essentially necessary to all practical attempts to introduce justice into the actual relations between men.

2. Adherence to rules of conduct founded on the principle of promoting the greatest happiness of the greatest number is the best pocket definition of justice yet propounded.

As a matter of fact this definition has been applied to a vast number of practical questions of the highest importance, and has produced results which Mr. Carlyle on his own principles ought to approve; and which he most assuredly would have extolled to the skies if they had been brought about, not gradually by parliamentary means, but by some Cromwell or Frederick, out of his own head, and in opposition to the wishes and prejudices of his time and country.

Let us take a few of them. Look, for instance, at the question of law reform. That in this department Benthamism has been triumphant, and had its way without opposition for about forty years past, no one with a competent knowledge of the subject will deny. Let us look a little at its results. Was it pleasing to the Immensities and the Eternities that men should be liable to precisely the same punishment for murder, for sheep-stealing, for stealing to the value of forty shillings in a dwelling house, or five shillings in a shop, and for breaking the dam of a fish-pond? That they should by way of compensation go scot free in a vast number of cases because juries would not convict them, and in a vast number of other cases because some microscopic defect was obscurely visible in some part of a most clumsy and elaborate procedure? Was it pleasing to the Veracities and Eternal Facts that the process of judicially ascertaining truth should be such as to prevent it from coming to light, and to arm those who were interested in its suppression or perversion with a thousand effectual means of concealing it? Was it written on the iron tablets that a man who had landed property worth ten thousand a-year might run into debt with every tradesman who would trust him to the extent, say of fifty thousand, and that if he suddenly died his heir should be able to enjoy that estate and repudiate the debts? Were the ecclesiastical courts, which granted probate of wills, and letters of administration to intestate estates, in the nature of owleries, enchanted wiggeries, and haunts of foul creatures swollen with fees to the extent of many thousands of pounds a-year, and if not, were there ever any institutions in the world which deserved such names? Was it vain janglement and babblement to spin out suits in Chancery to a monstrous length, and to use in conveyances and acts of parliament fifty words to express one thought?

The despised pig philosophers were the persons who first succeeded in impressing on the world the fact that these things were unjust and monstrous, the reasons why they were unjust and monstrous, and the alterations which were required to put just things in their places, and this they never could have done if they had not devised their pocket definition of justice and applied it to the particular matters in hand.

Take another illustration. The only specific measures of social reform on which Mr. Carlyle insists are education and emigration. Who preached these things quite independently of Mr. Carlyle, in season and out of season, till they became positive bores to mankind? The Benthamites, the authors of the new Poor-law, the professors of the Dismal Science, men like Mr. Senior, Sir George Lewis, Sir James Shuttleworth, and others of similar views. Mr. Carlyle says that the new Poor-law was only a half truth: no one knew that better than its authors. No one struggled more energetically or persistently to supply education, as the supplement to the Poor-law; to teach men to live like human creatures, and not like beasts, besides pricking and goading them into doing so. Teach men industry and self-reliance by your schools, force them into industry and self-reliance by your workhouses, was the doctrine of the pig philosophers. Has it not borne fruit? Do not the Gods and the Eternal Facts (if they have any sense in them) say Well done? Are not pauperism and crime too greatly reduced, and are not the rising generation, the working men of thirty-five years of age and under, better taught, better behaved, more of human beings and less of beasts than their predecessors? The answer to every one of these questions is notoriously Yes; and if you ask how the thing was done, the answer is that the pig philosophers, with their dismal science, contributed more to the result than any other body of men in England.

If proof is required of facts so notorious, look at the whole history of the growth of the system of popular education — a system which now embraces the bulk of the children of the poor, and which does give them, in a substantial way, a hold of the indispensable elements of all knowledge. This system was founded, extended, adapted by all sorts of ingenious devices, to the strange and highly complicated state of feeling and of society existing in the country by Benthamites and Utilitarians, in the teeth of all sorts of stupid, arrogant, and ignorant opposition from every person through whom they had to work, and whom in process of time they actually did convert into serviceable instruments in the great object in view. It would have been much more striking and picturesque, no doubt, if some Jupiter Tonans had issued decrees on the subject in the fiat lux style, and if schools had thereupon risen all over the country; but fiat lux in this case was a complicated business; the coals had to be got of the cellar, the grate to be swept up, the wood to be laid, and a light to be struck with very old-fashioned flint and steel and damp tinder. All this was at last effectually done, and we have now got a roaring fire which is gradually warming the whole house. Ought not a worshipper of Facts and the Eternal Silences and Veracities to recognize in this something worthy of his admiration?

The truth is, that the common-places about the advantages of parliamentary government, a free press, and all the rest of it, are in the main true. Downing-street, Westminster Hall, and the Houses of Parliament, with all their babblements, janglements, and doleful creatures having the honour to be, are collectively a far better king than any Cromwell or Frederick could possibly be. Will any one compare King Parliament to King Louis Napoleon? We fancy that the Veracities, the Eternities, and the Immensities would make a very emphatic deliverance on that subject if they had a suitable organ to speak through. The state of public and private virtue, of morality and religion in France, is not a very cheerful one. With all the goodwill in the world no single mind in the present day could possibly take in all the knowledge which is required to manage the institutions of mankind as they now exist. There are single departments of affairs in the present day which require as much thought as Cromwell had to bestow on the government of the whole nation, and thus Democracy is a simple necessity. The despot, if you got him, would have to act blindly and at random when he passed out of a very narrow sphere indeed. The collective king is far more powerful, he is far less likely to abuse his power, he is infinitely more amenable to reason, he is in general much wiser and much more humane than the single despot. Mr. Carlyle seems to us to have altogether misunderstood and undervalued the character of Democracy, and to have failed to give it credit for the real hold which it has on facts, and for its desire to do justice, to benefit mankind, and to produce gradually a higher form of life than we see at present. Here and there, especially in his earlier works, Mr. Carlyle appears to see this, but he does not keep to it, and after a certain time loses sight of it. In the course of the last two centuries all institutions and creeds have been thrown into one vast crucible. The times have been in labour, and the earnest and perpetual efforts of the human race to establish something permanent and satisfactory have apparently begun to be rewarded by the establishment of principles which are not to be despised because at present they look anything but romantic or attractive. Mr. Carlyle himself points out in various places that there are modern 'gospels,' as he would say, which have been preached in all directions and with a singular degree of success by Democracy and its heroes. There is, for instance, Napoleon's gospel of 'la carrière ouverte aux talents.' There is the doctrine of 'laissez-faire,' which, if Mr. Carlyle will only attend to it, is singularly like most of his own creed, for it is nothing else than the doctrine of natural sanctions—or if a man will not work neither let him eat. These and others of the same sort have, as he himself would admit, a foundation as solid as human nature itself. That they are in themselves incomplete, that other doctrines of a more beautiful kind will be required by way of supplement to them, is unquestionably true; but that they are the basis on which all such doctrines must and will be built—that they are the conditions to which, like it or like it not, our modern life must conform itself—these are propositions which Mr. Carlyle ought to be the last person to deny.

If, then, Democratic principles are to prevail, the practical question will really be, whether its powers ought to be vested in one hand or in many? and we can hardly conceive how any one who compares Louis Napoleon, the British Parliament, and the American Congress, can feel any sort of doubt on the question. It is like a comparison between health and disease. Mr. Carlyle might safely be challenged to show a single thing which would clearly be beneficial on the wide scale to mankind, and which would not have a full hearing with a very fair chance of ultimate adoption from Parliament or Congress. As to the special subject on which he has preached so eloquently and so long, the necessity of all the common prosaic virtues, namely, truth, honesty, courage, what he calls 'veracity,' and the like, as the indispensable condition of all reform, they flourish all round him in the richest abundance if he would only open his eyes and look at the general current of life in which he is placed. To speak of the way in which the practical business of life is transacted as mere babblements and janglements is quite as unjust as it could be to apply such phrases to Mr. Carlyle's own writings. There is a vast deal of talking in Parliament no doubt, but Frederick and Cromwell also talked a great deal, and wrote whole libraries of letters. Indeed it is yet to be seen how business of any kind can be done without the communication of ideas, or how ideas can be communicated without language. If men were guided, like ants or bees, by a dumb instinct, they might no doubt dispense with words written or spoken; but as matters actually stand this is not, and cannot possibly be the case, and the only fair question is one of degree—Does the quantity of talk which takes place in Parliament exceed what is required for the purposes of business? It seems to us rash and not just to assert that it does. The House of Commons is by no means patient of people who talk for the sake of hearing themselves speak, and has its own methods of keeping them within bounds. A reluctance to cry 'question,' or by coughing, talking, and shuffling about, to bring a man to the point, is not one of the sins which can justly be charged on the British M. P. That Parliaments work slowly, by degrees, and in a very laborious, elaborate, and prosaic way, is undoubtedly true; but is not their work all the more solid and servicable in consequence? Joseph II. made all manner of reforms, some of which were highly important, in Austrian institutions, and they all more or less fell through because they had not been ground into the minds of the people by the parliamentary mill. A worshipper of fact and veracity, ought to see something eminently respectable and satisfactory in the slow irresistible elephantine manner in which the English Parliament and cognate institutions do their work.

It is when we compare the judgment of Mr. Carlyle on the one hand, and that of the British Parliament on the other, upon some specific question, that we get the strongest impression of his injustice to popular institutions and ways of arguing. Take, for instance, the slavery question. The British Parliament, after years of agitation, discussion, inquiry, and the like, arrived at last at the conclusion that slavery was a sin and a shame, which must be abolished at any price, and abolished it accordingly was at the price of £20,000,000 sterling and a great deal of power of producing sugar in the West Indian islands and especially in Jamaica. Mr. Carlyle always resented this. He thought that the British public had been imposed upon by effeminate cant. He considered that the black man was a kind of booby, an inferior, unlovely creature who, above all things, required to be well governed. He liked permanence: why should not servants be hired for life? Was it not on the whole better for Gurth, the thrall of Cedric the Saxon, to go about with an iron collar round his neck, loyally attached (in every sense of the word) to Cedric, than that he should squat on a patch of waste land, and there bask in the sun and look at the pumpkins growing of themselves? In short, was not slavery the decree of nature, fact, and the gods, who 'wish, besides pumpkins, that spices and valuable products be grown in the West Indies?' So that 'Quashee, if he will not help in bringing out the spices, will get himself made a slave again, and with beneficent whip, since other methods avail not, be compelled to work.' As Mr. Biglow puts it, 'the blacks ought to labour, and we lie on sofas, and reel our Maker's original idee.' Mr. Carlyle, however, certainly wished for slavery freed from its abuses. 'How to abolish the abuses of slavery, and save the precious thing in it,' and there is much more to the same purpose.

Here the British nation and Mr. Carlyle are distinctly at issue on a definite point. Abolish slavery says the one—reform it says the other. Mr. Carlyle entirely omits to notice the fact that it was precisely because long experience and repeated trials showed that it could not possibly be reformed that it was at last abolished. The 'gods,' whoever they may be, must have a most passionate and insatiable appetite for sugar if they are so anxious to have it grown in Jamaica and Demerara, that they are willing, in order to get it, that one set of human creatures shall be turned into beasts of burden, and another set into something very like beasts of prey. Those which Mr. Carlyle himself regarded as the abuses of slavery were the very incidents which made it profitable. A slave who could not be sold, who was allowed to marry, who could learn to read and write, who could give evidence in courts of justice, who was to be protected by law from his master's cruelty and lust, would be about as unprofitable a piece of property as a man could have. Let any man imagine himself owning farm-labourers on such terms, and being bound to support them. Or suppose that a man had a dog which he was not allowed to drown or to sell, or to separate from her puppies, or even to sequester from the other sex, which he was obliged to support in decent comfort, and out of which in return he got the service of having certain beggars barked at. Who would not avoid such a gift like the plague? A black slave, with the essential privileges of freedom, plus the right of permanent residence and support on a particular estate, would be a ten times worse incumbrance than such a dog. It was the concession of such privileges to serfs which put an end to serfdom in Europe. Treat blacks as you treat cattle in all respects, and you may perhaps under circumstances gratify 'the gods' by making them grow sugar. Treat them like men, and slavery becomes an insupportable nuisance to the master. Hence, so long as the essential point of slavery—irresponsible proprietary power vested in the master—is permitted to exist, any attempt to remove the abuses of slavery will be futile. The slave will be treated as a mere instrument of avarice and lust, without the faintest regard either to his own moral elevation, or to the 'gods,' or to God Almighty, or to the growth of sugar and spice, or to any one thing in the heavens, or the earth, or the water under the earth, except the personal profit and pleasure of the slaveowner. It was the conviction of this fact that led the British nation to abolish the whole system as incurably bad and vile, and it is not a week's insurrection at the end of thirty-three years that will convince them that they were wrong. It is because he resolutely shuts his eyes to all these facts, and because he persists in viewing a most deliberate act done on the most mature consideration as a mere piece of sentimental weakness, that we think Mr. Carlyle unjust, in this as in some other cases, to popular institutions and convictions.

It is remarkable that in some cases Mr. Carlyle falls into transparent fallacies in his heat on this topic. For instance, he talks of slavery as a 'hiring for life.' Do I hire my horse for life when I retain 'he right to sell him at any moment? The horse would probably take a very different view of the transaction, and maintain with some plausibility that he was not 'hired' at all, but bought out and out, which is quite another thing. The truths that slavery and nothing else caused the American civil war—that the North found it necessary, as the very first step towards reconstruction, to abolish it utterly, and that they are now attempting, with the best prospect of success, to reorganize the whole condition of Southern society on the basis of freedom to the blacks, ought to teach Mr. Carlyle that democracy and its doctrines on this subject have more in them than he has been disposed to admit.

Such are a few illustrations of the injustice which Mr. Carlyle appears to be guilty of towards Benthamites, Democrats, and Philanthropists. He does not see that in pouring upon us the vials of his wrath, he is really hitting his friends, who have been guilty of no other offence but that of trying to give a definite practical shape to much of his own teaching by substituting cosmos for chaos in various departments of life to the best of our judgments and opportunities.

Such being, in general terms, our view of the general principles of Mr. Carlyle's philosophy, and of the way in which he has applied it to the practical affairs of life, we pass to the third division of his works, his histories, and especially to his history of Frederick II. History, as we have already observed, is his natural resource, because it affords the best opportunities possible for preaching and exhibiting his doctrines on the large scale. As a Transcendentalist he cannot be expected to state his views in the shape of categorical propositions, but he can exhibit them to any extent as illustrated in and by the facts which history discloses. There is a certain relation between the different works in which he has made the attempt to do so. The extraordinary prominence and importance of the French Revolution of course attracted his attention in the first instance. Indeed, it could hardly fail to do so. Several generations will have to pass before that great event ceases to be regarded as a sort of gate or porch opening into a new order of things. To give a sketch of the Revolution, therefore, was what one might view almost as an indispensable prologue to his other writings. Of the way in which he succeeded in this undertaking we have already spoken to some extent, and as the book is probably better known than any other of his works, it is unnecessary to say more of it. Cromwell's Letters and Speeches we may refer to in the same summary manner, observing merely that the extent to which Cromwell realized Mr. Carlyle's ideal of greatness and magnificence of character, is too obvious to any one acquainted with Mr. Carlyle's writings to require any detailed remarks. We come, then, to Frederick II. Why should Mr. Carlyle trouble himself to write his life?

What is the net result of it now that he has written it? How far is the result deduced by Mr. Carlyle just and true? On each of these subjects we propose to make some observations. Fewer will be needed than would have been required if we had not noticed detached parts of the work on their first appearance.

How came Mr. Carlyle to take Frederick II. for a subject? The answer would appear to be that he considered him at all events as a sort of connecting link between the old and the new, 'the last of the kings hitherto, I define him.' He was a king, and yet he ruled with an eye to the new principles which were coming in, and with the spirit of the age impressed upon him more emphatically than almost any other man of our own and the last century. Mr. Carlyle appears to have been attracted to him by the thought that here, perhaps, he should find an illustration of his own principles in the closest connexion with all the thoughts and feelings of our own times. He has worked at his self-imposed task with wonderful energy, and in some respects with the most conspicuous success; for he has certainly produced a book which testifies to his own gifts as one of the greatest historians of our age — as the greatest by far in his own direction — in an undeniable manner, but he has not attained what he would himself probably consider as the still higher success of thoroughly understanding Frederick, and entering into his mind in such a way as to read to mankind any very definite lesson as deducible from his life. Every part of the book gives the impression that Mr. Carlyle never came thoroughly to like Frederick. He tries his best to do so, and succeeds in admiring certain parts of his character, but in other matters, and especially in what lies deepest and is of most lasting importance, he seems to be sometimes baffled and sometimes repelled by him. With all his French verses and volumes of correspondence, Frederick appears to have possessed a talent for silence so remarkable that he entirely suppressed all traces of what people in these days would call his 'inner life.' He has nowhere left on record, either in express words or by any of those indications which a biographer like Mr. Carlyle would construe with so much skill and eagerness, the nature of his habitual tone of feeling about the world in which he played so prominent a part, or the principles in which he in his inmost heart believed, and on which he really regulated his conduct.

We have said that Mr. Carlyle would probably have regarded the attainment of such an understanding of Frederick's character as a still higher form of success than that which he actually has achieved, for in all his writings, and especially in his biographies, such has been his continual aim. We are, however, by no means sure that he would be right in viewing the matter thus. We do not think that his happiest portraits or writings are those in which he is perpetually in the worshipping vein. He is, perhaps, even more instructive and satisfactory when the extraordinary powers of his imagination are not exaggerated by the additional stimulus of worship, and when he feels himself justified in looking on the men and things around him with that keen practical good sense which he possesses in a larger measure than almost any other contemporary author, and without any special reference to his peculiar doctrines and transcendentalisms. That fulness of information and sympathy which a man gets from actual personal observation with his own eyes, is of perhaps even more importance to a man who has such an imagination as Mr. Carlyle than to less gifted writers. His estimates being formed principally from the imagination, he is liable when he writes from mere book knowledge to think that he knows more of people than he really does. We always suspect that the importance of the 'sea-green' aspect of Robespierre is exaggerated, because it happened to fit in with the Robespierre whom Mr. Carlyle had created in his own mind. Besides, perhaps after all he was not really sea-green. With regard, however, to people whom he himself has known, this difficulty does not arise. Nothing can be more perfect, for instance, than the portraits in the Life of Sterling. Take as a palmary instance the portrait of Coleridge roving dubiously from side to side of the gravel-walk, and talking about his 'sum-m-jects' and 'om-m-jects.' The freedom from the necessity of worshipping gives to the likeness of Frederick and his companions something of this natural life-like character. If he had succeeded better in making a hero of Frederick, his history would have had much less historical value. As it is, it appears to us to be not only the best, but almost the only history in English which gives any account of any considerable section of German history which it is possible to read with interest, or to remember when it is read in any tolerable degree. We have plenty of books about England and France which are accessible enough to all the world, and which when read leave some traces behind them; but, if we accept Robertson's Charles V., which in the present day it is the fashion to depreciate perhaps rather unduly, there is no English book from which anything but the driest outline of bare facts can be obtained about the history of Germany. Mr. Carlyle has certainly managed to throw upon the history of Prussia, from the beginning of time to the eve of the French Revolution, as broad and bright a light as could be desired. There will, we imagine, be but very few of his numerous readers who will not feel that he has permanently enlarged not merely their knowledge of names and dates, but their conception of the way in which one important section of the human race has demeaned itself upon the face of the earth. This is a matter of much greater importance than the portrait of a single hero; and though no doubt some drawbacks must be made from the merits of the book on grounds sufficiently obvious to all readers of it, the general result is most successful. It enables us to get a vivid notion of the politics of a large part of the eighteenth century, of the persons who took part in them, and of the questions then at issue. We will try to make a slight copy of this elaborate picture, and to make a few observations as we proceed on the view taken by Mr. Carlyle of the chief groups and incidents depicted in it.

Mr. Carlyle begins his book with a history of Prussia in miniature. It fills about half a volume, and is a model of picturesque vigor, giving all the leading points of a tedious and intricate story with beautiful clearness. Condensed to the highest degree, it is somewhat as follows:—The country was visited by Pytheas, the ancient traveller, or 'Marseilles Travelling Commissioner,' as Mr. Carlyle calls him, 327 B.C., after which nothing specific is known of it till the time of Henry the Fowler; who, in 928 A.D., 'marching across the frozen bogs, took Brannibor, a chief fortress of the Wends,' and ultimately made it one of the six margraves, or border provinces, by which the empire was limited on different sides. His margraves lasted till 1023, when they were succeeded by certain A-canier margraves, who lasted till 1319. They again gave place to a succession of Bavarian electors till 1373. The Bavarian electors were followed by a period of intricate confusion, in which it seemed as if the country was about to go to pieces, and to be broken up into a variety of petty districts. It came at last partly as a pledge, partly by way of escheat, into the hands of the Emperor Sigismund, who, at the Council of Constance, and in the year 1417, sold it to Frederick of Hohenzollern for about £200,000. Frederick of Hohenzollern was the descendant of Conrad of Hohenzollern, who, in 1170, had taken service with Frederic Barbarossa, and had risen in course of time to be burgrave of Nuremberg and margrave of Baireuth and Anspach, districts which through his descendant became annexed to Bradenburgh.

From the purchase by Frederick in 1417, down to the birth of Frederick the Great in 1712, there were twelve electors,* the last of whom, Frederick III. became king in 1701. The history of these twelve electors is very briefly described by Mr. Carlyle. Very little, he says, is known about them or their doings, nor are the details much worth knowing. The main fact is that by various ways and means they consolidated their power at home, and contrived to be continually adding to their dominions by one means or another, till the original margravate of Bradenburgh grew into a considerable country. As to the moral side of their history, Mr. Carlyle sums it up in one of his pregnant sentences, which are a little picture in themselves, not to be forgotten when once read. 'How the Hohenzollerns got their big territories, and came to be what they are in the world, will be seen. Probably they were not any of them paragons of virtue. They did not walk in altogether speckless Sunday pumps, or much clear-starched into consciousness of the moral sublime, but in rugged practical boots, and in such ways as there were.'

The history of the country itself, and of its politics, is certainly meagre enough. With the exception of a number of claims which the Hohenzollerns made in some cases successfully, and in others not, on various neighboring principalities, very little appears to have happened till the Reformation. Joachim II. became a Protestant in 1539, and some of his relations, who belonged to the Baireuth-Anspach branch of the family, especially a certain Margrave George, were somewhat conspicuous on the Protestant side; but on the whole, Bradenburgh did not make a conspicuous figure in the world at this time, nor till long afterwards. Throughout the whole of the Thirty Years' War it was passive, though it was several times itself the theatre of war, and as such was frightfully devastated. After the war, or rather near the end of it, in 1640, Frederick William, called the Great Elector, came to the throne. He ruled the country apparently with remarkable vigour for forty-eight years, and was succeeded by Frederick III., who took part in the wars against Louis XIV., and was promoted by being made into a king.

The important, it cannot be called the interesting, part of the history of Bradenburgh, is the history of the gradual growth of the country, the principal steps in which were as follows:—The acquisition of Neumark, of West Preussen, of Pomerania; the acquisition of claims on Cleves, Jülich, and Berg—the nucleus of modern Rhenish Prussia; and the acquisition of claims on Silesia. A few words on these points are a necessary introduction to any account of Frederick II. himself.

Neumark and West Preussen were acquired from the Knights of the Teutonic order. Neumark was bought and paid for by Joachim II. in 1455, when the order were in great distress on account of long and terrible wars, chiefly with Poland.

West Preussen fell to Bradenburgh in a more complicated way. Albert, the third Elector, had several sons; one of whom, also called Albert, was elected to be the Grand Master of the Teutonic order. He was born in 1490, elected to his office in 1511, and became a Protestant in 1523. He and the other Protestant members of the order possessed themselves of West Preussen, of which he became hereditary duke and they the hereditary nobility. He had a son, Albert Frederick, who succeeded him; on whose death without male issue West Preussen fell to the Bradenburgh Electoral House.

The claims to Jülich, Berg, and the Duchy of Cleves arose through the same Albert Frederic. He married, in 1572, Maria Eleonora, the daughter of the Duke of Cleves, who died in 1592. The Duke of Cleves made a will, by which, after the death of his only son without issue, the duchies were to go to Maria Eleonora, with remainder to her daughters successively, if she had no sons. His own younger daughters were excluded from the concession. The son did die without issue in 1609. Maria Eleonora had then already died, leaving several daughters, one of whom had married the Elector, John Sigismund, and he claimed Cleves in her right. It was also claimed by the Prince of Pfalz-Neuburg, who was the son of the testator's second daughter. The contention between the rivals ran so high that on one occasion the Elector slapped the Prince's face. This insult, and the feelings which had produced it, had such an effect on Pfalz-Neuburg that he became a Roman Catholic, married the sister of the Elector of Bavaria, and was consequently backed by the Roman Catholic party in his claims. The Emperor seized Julich. The Dutch and Spanish troops, each on their own side, entered the territory, and the quarrel became one of the principal occasions of the Thirty Years' War. After about half a century, namely in 1666, an arrangement was made by which the great Elector and Pfalz-Neuburg divided the territory between them, with an additional provision that on the failure of either family the other should succeed to its share. Under this limitation fresh questions arose, and the matter was not finally settled till the Treaty of Vienna in 1815.

The Silesian claims were a still more complicated affair. Various districts, Liegnitz, Brieg, and Woblan, belonged to a certain Duke of Liegnitz, who in the year 1537 made what was called an Erbverbrüderung treaty with the Elector, Joachim II. The nature of this deed was that if the Liegnitz family became extinct, the Brandenburgs were to get Liegnitz, which included a great part of Silesia, and that if the Brandenburgs became extinct then the Liegnitz family were to get the Bohemian fiefs of Brandenburg. The States of Bohemia, at the orders of the King of Bohemia, afterwards the Emperor Ferdinand, annulled this deed, but the Brandenburg electors always denied their right to do so. In 1675 the last Duke of Liegnitz died, and the Emperor Ferdinand took and kept possession of the Duchies.

Besides the duchy of Liegnitz there was also a duchy of Jagerndorf in the same neighbourhood. This duchy originally belonged to Vladislaus, the last king but one of Hungary and Bohemia. He sold it in 1524, to the Margrave George, the second son of Albert, the third Elector. From the Margrave George it descended to his son George Frederic, and from George Frederic to the Elector Joachim Frederic, who, in 1606, put into it his second son, John George. John George took part with the Elector Palatine, King of Bohemia, and husband of Henrietta, the sister of Charles I., and both were put to the ban of the empire in the year 1621. Shortly afterwards John George died, and Ferdinand II. seized Jagerndorf, notwithstanding the fact that the late Duke's relations had a right to it. Notwithstanding all remonstrances he kept possession of it.

The Brandenburg family had also claims under other Erbverbrüderungs on Pomerania, but all sorts of intricate disputes arose about it. In the Thirty Years' War it was taken by the Imperialists, and afterwards retaken by the Swedes. Part of it was allotted to the Great Elector, at the peace of Westphalia, part was recaptured by the Great Elector from the Swedes in 1670, but had to be restored on the representations of Louis XIV.

These, in a very few words, were the principal points in the history of Brandenburg under the Hohenzollern Electors, and down to the time when the Electorate merged in a kingdom. When they became kings, the character of their history, internal and external, did not much change. The first king, Frederic I., was a man of rather weak character and very expensive tastes. He had his back half broken by an accident in his childhood, and the shock to his nerves had a very great effect on his whole character and career. The later part of his life was made miserable, by an extremely absurd marriage. He was succeeded by his son Frederic William, the father of Frederic the Great, and of him and his affairs Mr. Carlyle naturally has a great deal more to say than of his predecessors. He was in many ways highly remarkable, and Mr. Carlyle's picture of him and his doings is in some respects the most attractive part of the whole book. He is known to the world at large rather by those memoirs of his daughter, Wilhelmina the Margravine of Baireuth than by any thing else, and the kind of impression produced by her book may be inferred with considerable accuracy from Lord Jeffrey's review of it. He represents him as a strange, half mad, furious sort of person, whose fits of violence were the terror of his family, and indeed of the nation at large. The book, however, contains much more than this, which, with other matter, Mr. Carlyle combines into a most striking and almost attractive picture.

Frederic William, according to this view of him, which we believe is generally accepted in Germany, was the founder of the prosperity and greatness of Prussia. 'His history,' says Mr. Carlyle, 'is one of economics.' There is a domestic chapter, too, which had a singularly important bearing on Frederic II.'s affairs and prospects.

Of the economic history Mr. Carlyle gives us rather glimpses and specimens than anything like a continuous statement. The short result of it is that guided partly by inclination, partly by that remarkable instinct towards the aggrandisement of his nation which is sometimes seen in princes, he aimed with considerable success at making Prussia the most thrifty, and, as Mr. Carlyle says, the most Spartan of nations. As soon as his father was dead he dismissed all the useless part of his court, and cut down the expense of it to about a fifth of its former extent. He applied himself, in all directions, to enforcing the strictest rules of government in every part of the country, and, in particular, he resolved, and carried out his resolution by the most rigorous and even harsh economy, that he would have as good an army as was to be had out of the national resources. By rigorous exertion, extreme economy, and an unsparring use of power, he gradually formed an army of eighty thousand men, who were better drilled and disciplined than any other troops in Europe. This he effected principally by the help of the Prince of Anhalt-Dessau, the sovereign of a small principality on the frontier, who is one of the most characteristic figures in Mr. Carlyle's whole book. He also gradually amassed a considerable treasure by these means, and in short, in the course of his long reign, made himself one of the most powerful princes in Europe, the most powerful by far in proportion to the extent of his dominions. This rigour of temper, which greatly endears him to Mr. Carlyle, was sometimes pushed to the length of positive tyranny and barbarity. For instance, he hung a certain nobleman of the name of Schlubhut for peculation, with little if any form of law, and in order to get Berlin built according to his own views he forced people to build houses there, whether they could afford it or not. He was a man of infinite grotesqueness of disposition, and of a great deal of strange humour and tenderness. His well-known regiment of giants is an illustration of the first characteristic, and many wonderful scenes reported by Mr. Carlyle between him and his son and his other connexions and dependents of the other. His tobacco parliaments, or smoking privy councils, were, perhaps, the strangest of these. He and his ministers met of an evening, just like labouring men in a public house tap-room, smoked pipes, talked politics, and played practical jokes of the roughest kind on unfortunate butts, in a manner which was a spectacle to men and gods.

The diplomatic external part of his life was by no means remarkable. He reigned from 1713 to 1740, during which time he had but one war. This was in 1715, when he took Stralsund from Charles XII. He continually pressed for a settlement of his claims on Jülich and Berg, which appeared likely to come into force under the settlement of 1666, on the failure then imminent of the Pfalz-Neuburg line. These claims, however, with all his diplomacy, were not settled either in his days or in his son's. The most important and most intricate, however, of his foreign affairs arose out of his position as a member of the Empire, and had a very important bearing on the history and prospects of his son. The history of this matter is related in the most minute detail, and at somewhat wearisome length by Mr. Carlyle, who contrives, however, in his peculiar way, to connect it with the general course of European history, so as to show the mutual relations of many transactions the bare names of which are all that the present generation, or at least the greater part of them, can be said to remember. In a highly condensed shape the matter stands thus:—After the Treaty of Utrecht the Emperor Charles VI. became involved in a variety of intricate bickerings and intrigues, which Mr. Carlyle calls his 'spectre-hunts.' The most important of his objects was to secure the succession to his dominions to his daughter, Maria Theresa, in default of sons, by what was called the Pragmatic Sanction, a peculiarly solemn kind of instrument, which he tried to get accepted and guaranteed by every court in Europe. Prince Eugene told him that a full treasury and an army of two hundred thousand men would be the only real guarantee, which Mr. Carlyle justly calls a piece of 'insight.' He preferred to do it by intrigue and diplomacy, the object of which was to make all sorts of powers undertake to promise to support his view when the case arose. Besides this, he would not give up his titular right to be King of Spain, which involved disputes with King Philip and his wife, Elizabeth Farnese. Elizabeth Farnese, on the other hand, was exceedingly anxious about appanages for her son Carlos, and was continually claiming the duchies of Parma and Placenza, amongst other things, for that object. These quarrels kept Europe, in a continuous dread of war, and produced all sorts of treaties, leagues, and devices for keeping the peace. In the course of these negotiations England, Prussia, and the other northern and Protestant powers were a good deal drawn together, and for various reasons it was proposed that a double marriage should take place between Frederick, the Crown Prince of Prussia, and the Princess Amelia; and between Frederick, Prince of Wales, and Wilhelmina Frederick William's daughter. The Austrian court was afraid that if these marriages took place England and Prussia would be too closely connected to suit the Austrian interests, and accordingly the Austrian agents, and especially one Seckendorf, secretly laboured to their utmost to prevent it, and as a means to that end to promote discord between Frederick William and his son. They succeeded in their efforts, and produced quarrels between the father and the son, which all but ended fatally. Ultimately Frederick William found out what their policy had been, and though the marriages were broken off and others substituted for them, he never forgave the treatment he had received, and his son signally revenged it on the House of Austria.

Short as it is, this is not a very defective account of the public events of the reign of Frederick William, who died in 1740, yet something more must be added as to his relations with his son. Frederick the Great was born on the 24th of January, 1712, and was educated under his father's eye in a very rigid effective way: the scheme laid down for this purpose by the father is given at length by Mr. Carlyle, and appears to have been strictly carried out.

A sort of time-table is also given according to which these lessons were to be taught; very strict and grim it is, every hour of the day from six a. m. to five p. m. having its allotted task. As the Prince got older he was put into the Potsdam Guards or giants, but he did not grow in favour with his father as he grew in years. He was of rather delicate, and, as his father considered, effeminate ways. 'Conceive,' says Mr. Carlyle, 'a rugged, thick-sided Squire Western of supreme degree . . . and that he produces a son who takes into Voltairism, piping, fiddling and belles-lettres, with apparently a total contempt for Grumkow (one of the principal counsellors of Frederick William) and the giant regiment.' There was a strong French element in young Frederick's education, and, as far as manners went, the bent of his mind was in the same direction, though deep down, a more emphatically sturdy German never lived. The likeness, however, between the father and son was not apparent to either till near the end of the father's life. The points of disagreement and want of sympathy produced great calamities to both, especially when they were carefully irritated by the Austrian agents, who wished to prevent the marriage for which the Crown Prince was anxious, and with the prospect of which his father tantalized him. The stages through which this diversity between the father and son went, are related by Mr. Carlyle at great length. Old Frederick William, who must have had a vein of something very like madness about him, at last, when the Crown Prince was about seventeen years of age, violently beat him with his stick more than once, and otherwise behaved to him and to his sister with the most outrageous cruelty. The final result is sufficiently well known. Young Frederick determined to run away from his father, and with the assistance of Lieutenant Katte actually attempted to do so during a journey which they made with the King into the Empire. The scheme was discovered when at the point of execution, Katte was sentenced by court-martial to two years' imprisonment in a fortress, which sentence was extended by Frederick William to beheading, which was executed accordingly. Frederick himself had a narrow escape from the same fate, on the ground that he was a colonel in the service, and had meant to desert. He was kept a close prisoner from August to November, 1730, and for more than a year afterwards was kept under very rigid terms to a strict course of duty in the neighbourhood of Custrin, where he had to superintend certain royal domains, and to give an exceedingly strict account of himself and of his way of employing his time.

This penal period of his life was gradually closed by the removal of the different restrictions under which he was placed, and at last, on the 12th of June, 1733, he was married to the Princess Elizabeth Christina, of Brunswick Bevern. His sister about the same time was married to the Margrave of Baireuth. Of his life after his marriage, and during the rest of his father's reign, there is very little to be said. He got a sight of war at the siege of Philippsburg in July, 1734; at which he was present with the Prussian contingent, and where Marshal Berwick was killed, and Prince Eugene took the field for the last time. He afterwards had the revenues of one district of Prussia assigned to him for his maintenance, and lived there at a country house called Reinsberg, where he passed his time in literature. He corresponded, amongst other things, with Voltaire, and wrote his first book — Anti-Machiavel. He passed seven years quietly enough in this manner, until he himself became King on the death of his father, May 31st, 1740. Of the final scene of old Frederick William's life, Mr. Carlyle draws one of those pictures which no one but himself can draw. It is full of humour and pathos. One little touch is all that we can notice here. It is inimitable in its way. His chief preacher urged on the King very courageously and honestly his various duties, amongst others that of forgiveness of enemies. 'Well, I will. I do. You, Fee-kin (his wife) write to your brother (untorgivablist of beings) after I am dead, that I forgave him, died in peace with him.' Better her Majesty should write at once, suggests the preacher. 'No, after I am dead—that will be safer.' He was clearly afraid that his forgiveness might have been thrown away if he recovered.

When Frederick II. succeeded to the crown, he began by a series of measures not very like those of his rigorous old father, and not particularly likely, one would suppose, to endear him to his biographer. He abolished legal torture and established general toleration, and tried to get about him a variety of French literary friends and associates. In other respects, however (except that he disbanded the Giants), he walked in his father's footsteps and governed the country, and especially the army, pretty much for himself. The most important of his ministers were three clerks, for such was their real function rather than anything higher—Eichel, Schuhmacher, and Lautensack. 'They lasted all his life,' says Mr. Carlyle, 'came punctually at four in the morning in summer and five in winter,' and did an immense quantity of work in a most effective and perfectly obscure and silent manner. The very thought of such men must be like water in a thirsty land to Mr. Carlyle. The history of Frederick's reign forms four thick and wonderfully elaborate volumes, every line of which bears traces of an amount of patient labour which is hardly exemplified elsewhere. Its leading points, however, may, by altering the arrangement slightly, be indicated very shortly. They may be arranged under three heads:—1. Foreign policy and war. 2. Domestic policy. 3. Literature and friendship.

In order to give a fair view of the nature and relations of Frederick's foreign policy and wars, Mr. Carlyle gives in various places an outline of the principal relations of all the European States to the two great wars in which Frederick took part—the war of the Austrian Succession and the Seven Years' War. The Emperor Charles VI. died on the 20th of October, 1740. Just a year before (19th October, 1739) England had declared war against Spain, greatly against the will of Walpole, who was forced into it by the popular indignation roused by the way in which the Spaniards exercised their right of restraining English commerce with South America. Mr. Carlyle always speaks of this quarrel as the 'Great Jenkins's Ear Question,' in reference to the well-known story of Captain Jenkins, whose ear was cut off by the crew of a guarda-costa, on which occasion Jenkins 'recommended,' as he observed, 'his soul to God and his cause to his country.'

According to Mr. Carlyle, the English nation had a real ground of quarrel with Spain, though Burke, long afterwards, declared that none of the principal persons who brought it about, 'No, not one did in the least degree defend the measure.' Mr. Carlyle's view is, that by what he calls the everlasting laws of fact and nature, the English had a right to trade with South America, notwithstanding all treaties to the contrary; and he appears to consider that by the same laws of fact and nature England had a right to possess and people the greater part, not to say the whole, of the North American continent. Without discussing this view—which reminds us of the remark of a witty foreigner, that the English nation appeared to him conscientiously to believe that it had a moral right to the whole world, including the moon—it will be enough to say that the English nation very decidedly meant to have as much liberty of trade, and as large a share of the North American continent, and most other places, as it could possibly get: that the French, and to some extent the Spaniards, had similar, though less energetic sentiments; and that the collision of their respective views on this point had a very great effect on the politics of the world at large and those of Germany in particular, inasmuch as it disposed them to take different sides in continental disputes, in order to damage each other's power. England and France, besides this, had each a private and special bias of their own in relation to Germany. As the King of England was Elector of Hanover, he was to some extent a German power, and he was the only sovereign who, being firm in his adhesion to the Pragmatic Sanction, kept his word like a man, and determined to support the claims of Maria Theresa to all lengths and at any risk. The French, on the other hand, had views of their own about Germany. Their notion was that it would be a good plan for them in particular, and for Europe in general; they undertook the general superintendence and regulation of Germany, and divided it symmetrically according to their own views. When the death of Charles VI. made necessary the election of a new emperor, they did interfere in a very emphatic manner, and with very remarkable designs. Such was the position of the principal powers which were interested in German affairs at the time of the Emperor's death.

Frederick II.'s own notions on the subject were at once more direct and more limited. It appeared to him that the death of the Emperor, and the difficulties to which it would give rise, afforded an excellent opportunity for the vindication of his claims on Silesia, the nature of which we have already stated. He acted with wonderful secrecy, expedition, and resolution upon this view of the case. The news of the Emperor's death reached Berlin on the 25th of October. On the 13th of December Frederick marched upon Silesia, and as the Austrians were altogether unprepared and taken by surprise, overran the province, took, Breslau, the capital, on the 2nd of January, took various strong places, and defeated an Austrian army under Neipperg at Mollwitz, some way to the south of Breslau, on the 10th of April, 1741.

This defeat brought the difficulties of Austria to a crisis. The election of the Emperor was coming on. Marshal Belleisle and the French were intriguing (as it afterwards appeared with success) against the election of the Grand Duke Franz, Maria Theresa's husband. The powers which had accepted the Pragmatic Sanction, all (with the exception of George II.) repudiated it, and many of them claimed succession adversely to Maria Theresa. Frederick II. offered to support it, and to support the election of the Archduke Francis as emperor if his Silesian claims were settled. He added that Prussia had never assented to it at all except on condition that the Emperor Charles VI. would settle the Prussian claims on Berg and Jülich, which he had never done. Under these circumstances, both the English on the one hand, and the French on the other, tried to make treaties with Frederick. The English object was to get his support for the Pragmatic Sanction; the French object, to get his support for the schemes of Belleisle. The different negotiators bid against each other for some time; but at last Frederick signed a treaty with France (5th of June, 1741), the terms of which are still indefinite in the extreme. The French guaranteed Lower Silesia and Breslau to Frederick. What consideration Frederick was to give in return appears altogether vague. This treaty was kept profoundly secret at the time, and the negotiations between Frederick and the Austrians, through English agents, continued for several months in ignorance of it. Military operations in the meantime proceeded. The French marched an army under Maillebois in the direction of Hanover, and the Bavarians threatened Austria itself. Under these circumstances a secret arrangement was at last made at Klein-Schellendorf, on the 9th of October, 1741, that the Austrian forces should be allowed to retire from Silesia towards Moravia unmolested, and that Lower Silesia should be ceded to Frederick, and that in particular he should take Neisse by a sham siege. The effect of this, no doubt, was to throw the French over, and probably few persons will think Mr. Carlyle too severe in observing: 'Magnanimous I can by no means call Frederick to his allies, nor even superstitiously voracious in this business, but he thoroughly understands, he alone, what just thing he wants out of it.' Whether Frederick cared much about the adjective which we have underlined may be questionable. Whether he did or not, the rest of the sentence is undeniably true, and it is useless to haggle over trifles.

On the 24th of January, 1742, the Elector of Bavaria was, under French auspices, elected emperor, but his prospects against Austria were hardly so good as they had been. The French had advanced towards Vienna, but had had to retreat, and they called on Frederick, in virtue of his French treaty, and as a proof of the falsehood of the Austrian assertion that he had made a treaty with them (as he had), to create a diversion in their favour. He advanced into Moravia for that, amongst other purposes, in February, 1742, and after passing some time in various manœuvres and encampments there, fought a fierce and not very decisive battle with the Austrians at Chotusitz, which, however, he was on the whole entitled to consider as a victory. The result, however, of this battle and of the discovery by Frederick of certain double dealing on behalf of the French towards him — the counterpart of his behaviour towards them — was that a public and final treaty was made at Breslau, dated on the 11th of July, by which Silesia was conclusively ceded to him in full satisfaction of all his claims.

After this peace the Austrian and French quarrel still remained outstanding; and principally by the help of English subsidies, and to some extent by the help of English and Hanoverian troops, the Austrians gained considerable advantages. At last the English and Hanoverians, who had advanced to the southwards in rather a purposeless way, were intercepted on their retreat by the French at Dettingen. They contrived to defeat the French (27th of June, 1743). The defeat, though considerable in itself, did not produce very much effect. The Austrian fortunes, however, continued to improve, though for some time the English were of very little use to them, except by money. The Bavarians and French were driven back, till at last, in the summer of 1744, they were driven across the Rhine by Prince Charles, Maria Theresa's brother-in-law. Louis XV. just at this time (August 8) fell ill at Metz, and was supposed to be dying, and there really was serious danger of an invasion of France on a great scale. It was rescued from that danger by Frederick, whose behavior on the occasion it is difficult to reconcile with any other notion of veracity than that of knowing what he wanted and trying to get it. He declared that he wished to restore peace to the Empire and to Europe, that the way in which the Emperor was treated by Austria was not to be endured, and that he accordingly must interfere. He had been trying since the peace of Breslau to procure a union of independent German powers and other means to accomplish this purpose, but without effect. He had, however, bargained with Louis XV. that he was to have a large share of Bohemia as the payment for his assistance. He accordingly set out unexpectedly on the 13th of August, and by the 18th of September had taken Prague. This brought back Prince Charles from his French invasion at once. He recrossed the Rhine on the 23rd of August, and marched against Frederick, whilst the French prepared to strengthen their own frontier, leaving Frederick to shift for himself. Between Prince Charles and Marshal Traun, a very skilful old soldier, Frederick was driven back beyond the Elbe and had to give up Prague. Indeed, Silesia was invaded by the Austrians in the winter of 1744-5, though they were defeated by the old Dessaner.

On the 20th of January, 1745, Charles Albert, the Bavarian Emperor, died, after a nominal reign of three years all but four days; and just a month before (20th of December, 1744) Marshal Belleisle was taken prisoner by a curious accident as he happened in some of his journeys to pass over a little extra-parochial portion of Hanoverian territory, and was forwarded to England, and there confined in a sort of hospitable captivity at Windsor Castle, till the following August. These two events produced various complications in German politics, as they made it necessary to choose a new emperor, and disarranged all those French schemes which had exercised so much influence over German affairs. Instead of invading Germany, the French in the course of this summer invaded the Netherlands, besieged Tournay, and being attacked by the English under the Duke of Cumberland, won the battle of Fontenoy on the 11th of May, after being within a hair's breadth of losing it. The death of the Emperor Charles Albert led to the election of the Archduke Francis, Maria Theresa's husband (13th of September), and in the meantime deprived Frederick of whatever advantage he could get from the excuse which he had urged for his advance into Bohemia.

The Austrians passed the greater part of this year in invading Silesia, with the assistance of the Saxons, whom they had induced to join them against Frederick; but they met with wonderfully bad fortune. Frederick, having ensnared them into advancing, defeated them at Hohenfriedberg (4th of June), and he followed them into Bohemia, where, after various enampments and manoeuvres, he again defeated them at Sohr (September 30th). Prince Charles, however, was not easily discouraged. He made an effort, while pretending to go into winter quarters, to march into Brandenburg and upon Berlin itself. Frederick, however, contrived to disconcert all his schemes by a well-managed attack at a place called Hennesdorf (20th of November), where, having information as to his tactics, he surprised his army on the march and succeeded in cutting it in two. The Saxons, who were to have supported this attempt, with the assistance of an Austrian division, by an advance in a different line towards the same point, were defeated on the 15th of December at Kesselsdorf, by the old Dessaner, who died of a paralytic stroke two years afterwards. This was the end of the war of the Austrian succession so far as Prussia was concerned. It left matters very much as they were at the Treaty of Breslau. Austria got nothing. Silesia remained to Prussia. The peace was concluded at the end of 1745, by the Treaty of Dresden. Ten years of peace followed, but the Seven Years' War (1756-63) was substantially nothing more than a second edition of the Silesian wars, the parts taken by the other actors being curiously inverted. Maria Theresa found herself quite unable to acquiesce in the loss of Silesia, and entered, about the year 1752, if not earlier, into secret negotiations with Saxony and Russia, with a view to the arrangement of a scheme for picking a quarrel with Prussia and partitioning it afterwards. This was a renewal of an earlier scheme for the same purpose, contained in a treaty of Warsaw made between Maria Theresa and Poland in 1745. Frederick and his minister, Winterfeld, came to the knowledge of this scheme by bribing certain clerks in the Dresden offices, who sent them copies of the despatches which related to it. The Czarina was to some extent disposed to enter into the alliance by Frederick's sarcasms against her, and was enabled by a fortunate accident to make her preparations without exciting much suspicion. The quarrels between France and England about the limits of their respective dominions in America appeared to supply a favourable opportunity for the execution of their plans. The English, according to their custom at that time, began operations by looking out for continental allies, who were to be secured by the payment of subsidies, but Maria Theresa refused to join against France. The Russians agreed to let out fifty-five thousand men for any purpose that might be required, at a very low rate, and actually got them on foot and posted them in the immediate neighbourhood of the eastern frontier of Prussia. This piece of good fortune, however, was counterbalanced, for Frederick managed to conclude with George II. a convention by which each party agreed to guarantee Germany from invasion by any foreign power. The consideration to George II. for that course was that it would protect Hanover, which would otherwise be open to the French. On the other side, Maria Theresa condescended to court the Marquise de Pompadour, whom, also, Frederick had offended by expressing his opinion of her in a pungent manner, and by these and other means she secured the assistance of France. The alliances were thus the reverse of what they had been in the earlier Silesian wars. England supported Prussia instead of Austria and the Pragmatic Sanction. France supported Austria instead of Prussia and Bavaria.

Having paid the greatest attention to his army throughout the ten years' peace, and being in a state of high preparation, Frederick thought he had better attack his enemies instead of waiting to be attacked by them. Accordingly, having instructed his ambassador at Vienna to demand an explanation of certain warlike preparations of Maria Theresa's, and an answer having been refused, he marched into Saxony on the 20th August, 1756, overran the greater part of the country, and blockaded the small Saxon army in Pirna. The Austrians attempted to relieve them, but were defeated at Lobositz (5th October, 1756). The Saxons then attempted, under circumstances of extreme hardship and difficulty, to break out; in this they failed to effect, and were forced to capitulate. Frederick compelled the bulk of the private troops to enter his service, and took possession of the whole of the resources of the country for warlike purposes.

This was a prosperous beginning of the war, but it was more than balanced by other events. Frederick was put to the ban of the empire, which involved the raising against him of an army composed of contingents from all the German States, and France took the field with nearly one hundred thousand men. Frederick felt that he was in extreme danger, and before the opening of the campaign of 1757, left directions as to what was to be done in case of his own death or capture. A fac-simile of the letter containing them is given by Mr. Carlyle, and a remarkable document it is. There was great need for it, for when the campaign opened in April or May, Prussia was invaded in four separate directions by the Russians, the Austrians, the French, and the Swedes (whose operations throughout the war were contemptible and not worth more than bare mention), besides which, the army of the Empire was in preparation. Frederick took the offensive by marching upon Prague. Prince Charles was encamped in a strong position near the town, and a desperate battle took place (6th May) between him and the Prussians, in which, after a loss of twelve thousand five hundred Prussians and thirteen thousand three hundred Austrians, the Austrians were defeated, and had more than one narrow escape from being destroyed. They did, however, escape destruction, and managed even to keep possession of Prague, though it was fiercely besieged and bombarded by Frederick. Marshal Daun advanced to relieve the town, and Frederick set out to fight him. They fought at Kolin on the 18th of June. The Prussians, who were greatly out-numbered, lost the battle and a third of their army. One result of this was that Prague was relieved. During the whole of the summer and autumn Frederick remained in a state of the greatest difficulty and perplexity. The English army under the Duke of Cumberland was managed, as usual, with extreme imbecility. The French, under Soubise, and the Imperial army were mustering. The Austrians were in great strength and occupied impregnable positions, and Frederick wandered about in various directions, wondering, apparently, which of his numerous enemies was to overwhelm him. The most fortunate circumstance for him at this time was the accession of Pitt to power in England, and his determination to 'conquer America in Germany.' This, however, was rather a fortunate symptom than an actual change for the better. The immediate prospects were still very black. In the midst of his despondency, however, his fortune took a marvellous turn. On the 5th November, as the French and Imperial army, under Soubise, was advancing in the direction of Leipsic, he skilfully fell upon it at Rossbach, at an opportune moment, and utterly routed the whole army with a loss of eight thousand men, prisoners included, in twenty-five minutes, at the expense of one hundred and sixty-five Prussians killed and three hundred and seventy-six wounded. He then marched across the country to Silesia, and at Leuthen, near Breslau, inflicted an even more severe defeat, though it was better contested, upon the Austrians who, however, were two to one in number.

These victories had given Frederick relief; but he was fearfully overmatched — as much as the Southerners in the late civil war. He passed the winter of 1757-8 at Breslau, and in the spring besieged Olmutz unsuccessfully; but in the late summer he was called out to meet an enemy almost more dangerous than any he had yet encountered. This was Marshal Fermor, who had entered Prussia at the north-east corner with a large army of Russians. They met at Zorndorf (12th of August), near Custrin, and a little to the north of Frankfurt on Oder. 'It was the bloodiest battle of the Seven-Years' War. One of the most furious ever fought.' Frederick got the best of it; but the battle was not very decisive though horribly bloody; still it checked the Russian invasion. From Zorndorf, Frederick speedily returned again to the Silesian corner of his dominions, where on the 14th of October, he was surprised by the Austrians near Hochkirch, where he was forced to retreat with a loss of about eight thousand men, Marshal Keith for one, and one hundred and one guns.

Frederick's position had now become critical in the extreme. There was another Russian invasion in 1759 in the same direction as the one in the preceding year. The Russians gained a victory at Zullichau over Wedell on the 23rd of July, and on the 13th of August they gained a far more important victory, inflicting, indeed, on Frederick himself far the most severe defeat that he ever sustained. This occurred in the terrible battle of Kunersdorf, in which the Prussian army was half destroyed and for the moment almost entirely dispersed. Frederick made up his mind to kill himself, and handed over the army to General Von Finck. By degrees, however, he slightly recovered himself. The Russian army was greatly crippled and did not know how to use its victory. They did not advance on Berlin, but gradually drew off to the eastward. Terrible misfortunes happened in another quarter. Dresden was taken by the Austrians early in September, and on the 21st of November a division under General Finck was forced, after much severe handling, to capitulate to the Austrians at Maxen, the loss to Frederick being about twelve thousand men.

The fifth campaign in 1760 was in Lower Silesia, and Frederick attempted to retake Dresden, but failed, and was exposed to terrible danger from the superior forces opposed to him. Being, however, surrounded on all sides, he was attacked by the Austrians at Liegnitz, but repulsed and broke through them, gaining a remarkable and unexpected victory. The Russians were in the main very inactive this year, though they made a flying expedition as far as Berlin, and laid it under contribution, but were unable to hold it. The great event of the year, however, was the battle of Torgau on the Elbe, on the 3rd of November, some way north of Dresden. The battle was fought in the afternoon, and at night Frederick gained a decided victory. This was the last great battle of the war, which was crippled by the defection of Russia from the alliance at the beginning of 1762. This was caused by the death of the Czarina Elizabeth, and the accession of Peter III., who was a devoted admirer of Frederick. Peter was deposed and murdered by the 9th of July, but the Empress Catherine, who succeeded him, was not unfriendly to Frederick, and left Maria Theresa to fight out her battle with him alone. The ultimate result was the Peace of Hubertsberg, which was made in February, 1763, and as between Austria and Prussia left matters just where they were at the beginning of the war.

From 1763 to 1786, Frederick had no more wars worth particular mention. The only great political event in which he took a leading part was the partition of Poland. Of this transaction Mr. Carlyle says little that adds much to the common stock of knowledge on the subject. That Poland was so governed as to be a dangerous nuisance to all its neighbours is indisputably true; that it was partitioned without any regard to anything except the aggrandisement of the partitioning powers, is no less true. The result appears to be that little sympathy is due to either party. If an habitual drunkard continually disturbs his neighbours, and if they, having certainly no other remedy, knock him on the head and divide his property, the general verdict of mankind would perhaps be, you are great rogues; but he brought it on himself. And something like this appears to be the true view of the partition of Poland, though after all the whole matter is exceedingly obscure, and little authentic information is to be had about it.

Such is the outline of Frederick's transactions as a soldier. As an administrator, we have rather glimpses of his doings than a detailed account of them. His military administration was very effective, but desperately harsh. His army was recruited to a great extent by crimps, who procured recruits from every part of Europe by enormous lying and frauds of the most monstrous kind. It was recruited in part by a rigorous conscription over every part of the Prussian dominions, and also over Saxony. Mr. Carlyle himself finds it difficult to say where the money came from. The explanation appears to be that so long as there is food, clothing, and ammunition in the country, and so long as an army can take what it wants, there is no great occasion for money. The misery of war is dreadfully intensified by such a process; but so long as there is food to take, there is no limit to the extent to which warfare may go.

As to Frederick's pacific administration, his great feats were his Code, and the different enterprises which he promoted and carried out in various parts of his dominions. Mr. Carlyle gives us very little special information about them, and it must be owned that if he had bestowed more of his time and trouble on these points, and troubled himself and his readers less about tactics, with which he fills many hundred pages, his book would have been a good deal improved. Perhaps, however, the materials were wanting. It is pretty safe to assume that the system of administration was as vigorous, as harsh, and as peremptory as the other part of Frederick's character. Such specimens as we do get are not very favourable. He introduced, for instance, a system of collecting taxes which appears to have given immense offence, and to have been abolished after his death. He intermeddled in every sort of private affair, and managed nearly all the business of the kingdom personally. Here and there, of course, such a system produced picturesque instances of fair dealing, but that it was generally beneficial is quite another proposition, and one of which we have no evidence at all. On at least one famous occasion he chose to interfere personally with the ordinary course of civil justice, by reversing the decision of a court of justice about a watercourse. Mr. Carlyle tells the whole story with his usual elaborate carefulness and good faith. He would obviously like to say that Frederick was right, and asserted the eternal laws of nature and fact. He cannot, however, conscientiously say so; he is obliged to own that the matter after all was extremely doubtful, and it is obvious enough that unless the interference was absolutely necessary it was an immense evil.

A much larger and fuller part of the book is devoted to an account of Frederick's personal friendships, especially of his long and strange relations with Voltaire. So full, indeed, is Mr. Carlyle on this topic that he has almost interwoven a life of Voltaire with his life of Frederick. It forms a marvellously entertaining underplot to the history, and gives a more vivid notion of Voltaire's character and career than is to be found elsewhere in English literature. The merit of the story, however, depends principally on the way in which it is told, and on the endless variety of anecdotes with which it is illustrated. Any sort of condensation of it, even if space were not wanting, would be tedious.

We feel that the short sketch which we have thus given of Mr. Carlyle's most elaborate work conveys no notion at all of its real character, though it contains the main points of the history itself. The six thick volumes are an immense repertory, in which something is to be found about nearly every important event in European history which was in any way whatever connected with Prussia or with Frederick. It also contains a number of detached anecdotes and personal histories so elaborate, so authentic, in some instances so inconceivably picturesque and vivid, that wherever the book is opened it has all the interest of a novel.

Voltaire and his divine Emilie; his quarrels with Maupertuis; his extremely disreputable and dirty quarrel with the Jew stock-jobber, Hirsch; his quarrel with the King of Prussia; his way of living in his old age; are all brought before us with inimitable vivacity, and throw more light on the character of the man than anything else written in English. He, however, is only one of many figures introduced into the book. There are excellent sketches of George II., the Duke of Cumberland, Chatham, Wolfe, Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, Prince Henri of Prussia, Belleisle, and innumerable others. We have, besides, incidental accounts of the principal English naval expeditions of the eighteenth century, of the exploits of Vernon and Anson, of the siege of Minorca, of Braddock's expedition and defeat, and of the other wars between the French and English colonies in America. This includes an excellent account of the taking of Quebec, with portraits of Wolfe and Montcalm. Every one of these incidents is told with a degree of skill which no other man could, and of care which hardly any other man would have expended on it all. Such a union of the special gifts of Dryadust and Walter Scott, with a depth of thought and feeling to which hardly any antiquary or novelist can pretend, has never before been produced in our country. Whatever else the book may be, it is a monument of its author's genius, which will at all events effectually preserve his memory in the world.

The fault of the work appears to us to lie in the selection of its subject. When all is said and done, it is difficult to care much about Frederick or his doings. His history is very curious and highly interesting, and it is impossible not to sympathise with a man who so thoroughly knew what he wanted, and who got it after such desperate struggles. He did get Silesia, and he had probably about as much right to it as Maria Theresa. The population, apparently, rather preferred him to her; but the question of right depends on the question whether the States of Bohemia in the year 1544 had or had not a right to annul the Erbverbrüderung made by the Duke of Liegnitz, and whether the Emperor Ferdinand had a right to confiscate Jägerndorf. Frederick's claim dated from 1624 as to Jägerndorf, and from 1675 as to Liegnitz and Brieg; but it seems to have been the way of the German Empire to keep such claims alive and to wrangle, and finally fight over them as was done only two years ago in the instance of the lovely Schleswig-Holstein controversy. What the laws of eternal fact and nature and of everlasting justice may be as to the power of the States of Bohemia over Erbverbrüderungs, appears to us a question as difficult as it is uninteresting; nor can we get beyond the assertion that Frederick, knowing his own mind and watching his opportunity, and having extraordinary good fortune, got what he wanted. Something may be said for his first war, and the last he could not help; but the second war appears to us a mere undisguised piece of rapacity, an attempt to get a slice of Bohemia to which he did not even allege that he had any sort of claim. It is difficult to make this square with fact and nature, as Mr. Carlyle uses the words. The attempt certainly was a fact, and it probably appeared to Frederick very natural.

AN Australian paper says: — "The desire of the Chinese to adopt European children appears to be so strong as to lead them in some instances to break the law. Recently a Chinaman was arrested upon the criminal charge of stealing a child. The accused states that he has had the child in his possession for some time, and we can only say that it looks as if it had been well cared for. In connection with this we may state that the Chinese have a great inclination to adopt European male children to whom their cast of countenance may be pleasing. Instances are under our own knowledge where the Celestial has offered a good round sum in exchange for a child to whom he had taken a liking."

PART II — CHAPTER VI.

EVERYTHING went on well enough at the station for some time after the great occurrence which counted for so much in Mrs. Ochterlony's life; and the Major was very peaceable, for him, and nothing but trifling matters being in his way to move him, had fewer fidgets than usual. To be sure he was put out now and then by something the Colonel said or did, or by Hesketh's well-off-ness, which had come to the length of a moral peculiarity, and was trying to a man; but these little disturbances fizzed themselves out, and got done with without troubling anybody much. There was a lull, and most people were surprised at it, and disposed to think that something must be the matter with the Major; but there was nothing the matter. Probably it occurred to him now and then that his last great fidget had rather gone a step too far — but this is mere conjecture, for he certainly never said so. And then, after a while, he began to play, as it were, with the next grand object of uneasiness which was to distract his existence. This was the sending "home" of little Hugh. It was not that he did not feel to the utmost the blank this event would cause in the house, and the dreadful tug at his heart, and the difference it would make to Mary. But at the same time it was a thing that had to be done, and Major Ochterlony hoped his feelings would never make him fail in his duty. He used to feel Hugh's head if it was hot, and look at his tongue at all sorts of untimely moments, which Mary knew meant nothing, but yet which made her thrill and tremble to her heart; and then he would shake his own head, and look sad. "I would give him a little quinine, my dear," he would say; and then Mary, out of her very alarm and pain, would turn upon him.

"Why should I give him quinine? It is time enough when he shows signs of wanting it. The child is quite well, Hugh." But there was a certain quiver in Mrs. Ochterlony's voice which the Major could not and did not mistake.

"Oh yes, he is quite well," he would reply; "come and let me feel if you have any flesh on your bones, old fellow. He is awfully thin, Mary. I don't think he would weigh half so much as he did a year ago if you were to try. I don't want to alarm you, my dear; but we must do it sooner or later, and in a thing that is so important for the child, we must not think of ourselves," said Major Ochterlony; and then again he laid his hand with that doubting, experimenting look upon his boy's brow, to feel "if there was any fever," as he said.

"He is quite well," said Mary, who felt as if she were going distracted while this pantomime went on. "You do frighten me, though you don't mean it; but I know he is quite well."

"Oh yes," said Major Ochterlony, with a sigh; and he kissed his little boy solemnly, and set him down as if things were in a very bad way; "he is quite well. But I have seen when five or six hours have changed all that," he added with a still more profound sigh, and got up as if he could not bear further consideration of the subject, and went out and strolled into somebody's quarters, where Mary did not see how lighthearted he was half an hour after, quite naturally, because he had poured out his uneasiness, and a little more, and got quite rid of it, leaving her with the arrow sticking in her heart. No wonder that Mrs. Kirkman, who came in as the Major went out, said that even a very experienced Christian would have found it trying. As for Mary, when she woke up in the middle of the night, which little peevish Wilfrid gave her plenty of occasion to do, she used to steal off as soon as she had quieted that baby-tyrant, and look at her eldest boy in his little bed, and put her soft hand on his head, and stoop over him to listen to his breathing. And sometimes she persuaded herself that his forehead was hot, which it was quite likely to be, and got no more sleep that night; though as for the Major he was a capital sleeper. And then somehow it was not so easy as it had been to conclude that it was only his way; for after his way had once brought about such consequences as in that re-marriage which Mary felt a positive physical pain in remembering, it was no longer to be taken lightly. The consequence was, that Mrs. Ochterlony wound herself up and summoned all her courage and wrote to Aunt Agatha, though she thought it best, until she had an answer, to say nothing about it; and she began to look over all little Hugh's wardrobe, to make and mend and consider within herself what warm things she could get him for the termination of that inevitable voyage, and to think what might happen before she had these little things of his in her care again — how they would wear out and be replenished and his mother have no hand in it — and how he would get on without her. She used to make pictures of the little forlorn fellow on shipboard, and how he would cry himself to sleep, till the tears came dropping on her needle and rusted it; and then would try to think how good Aunt Agatha would be to him, but was not to say comforted by that — not so much as she ought to have been. There was nothing in the least remarkable in all this, but only what a great many people have to go through, and what Mrs. Ochterlony no doubt would go through with courage when the inevitable moment came. It was the looking forward to and rehearsing it, and the Major's awful suggestions, and the constant dread of feeling little Hugh's head hot or his tongue white, and thinking it was her fault — this was what made it so hard upon Mary; though Major Ochterlony never meant to alarm her, as anybody might see.

"I think he should certainly go home," Mrs. Kirkman said. "It is a trial, but it is one of the trials that will work for good. I don't like to blame you, Mary, but I have always thought your children were a temptation to you; oh, take care! — if you were to make idols of them" —

"I don't make idols of them," said Mrs. Ochterlony, hastily; and then she added, with an effort of self-control which stopped even the rising colour on her cheek, "You know I don't agree with you about these things." She did not agree with Mrs. Kirkman; and yet to tell the truth, where so much is concerned, it is a little hard for a woman not to stop short, however convinced she may be, and think that, after all, the opinion which would make an end of her best hopes and her surest confidence may be true.

"I know you don't agree with me," said the Colonel's wife, sitting down with a sigh. "Oh, Mary, if you only knew how much I would give to see you taking these things to heart — to see you not almost, but altogether such as I am," she added, with solemn pathos. "If you would but remember that these blessings are only lent us — that we don't know what day or hour they may be taken back again" —

All this Mary listened to with a rising of nature in her heart against it, and yet with that wavering behind, — What if it might be true?

"Don't speak to me so," she said. "You always make me think that something is going to happen. As if God grudged us our little happiness. Don't talk of lending and taking back again. If He is not a cheerful giver, who can be?" For she was carried away by her feelings, and was not quite sure what she was saying — and at the same time, it comes so much easier to human nature to think that God grudges and takes back again, and is not a cheerful giver. As for Mrs. Kirkman, she thought it sinful so much as to imagine anything of the kind.

"It grieves me to hear you speak in that loose sort of latitudinarian way," she said; "oh, my dear Mary, if you could only see how much need you have to be brought low. When one cross is not enough, another comes — and I feel that you are not going to be let alone. This trial, if you take it in a right spirit, may have the most blessed consequences. It must be to keep you from making an idol of him, my dear — for if he takes up your heart from better things" —

What could Mary say? She stopped in her work to give her hands an impatient wring together, by way of expressing somehow in secret to herself the impatience with which she listened. Yet, perhaps, after all, it might be true. Perhaps God was not such a Father as He, the supreme and all-loving, whom her own motherhood shadowed forth in Mary's heart, but such a one as those old pedant fathers, who took away pleasures and reclaimed gifts, for discipline's sake. Perhaps — for when a heart has everything most dear to it at stake, it has such a miserable inclination to believe the worst of Him who leaves his explanation to the end, — Mary thought perhaps it might be true, and that God her Father might be lying in wait for her somewhere to crush her to the ground for having too much pleasure in his gift, — which was the state of mind which her friend, who was at the bottom of her heart a good woman, would have liked to bring about.

"I think it is simply because we are in India," said Mrs. Ochterlony, recovering herself; "it is one of the conditions of our lot. It is a very hard condition, but of course we have to bear it. I think, for my part, that God, instead of doing it to punish me, is sorry for me, and that He would mend it and spare us if something else did not make it necessary. But perhaps it is you who are right," she added, faltering again, and wondering if it was wrong to believe that God, in a wonderful supreme way, must be acting, somehow as in a blind ineffective way, she, a mother, would do to her children. But happily her companion was not aware of that profane thought. And then, Mrs. Hesketh had come in, who looked at the question from entirely a different point of view.

"We have all got to do it, you know," said that comfortable woman, "whether we idolize them or not. I don't see what that has to do with it; but then I never do understand you. The great thing is, if you have somebody nice to send them to. One's mother is a great comfort for that; but then there is one's husband's friends to think about. I am not sure, for my own part, that a good school is not the best. That can't offend anybody, you know; neither your own people nor his; and then they can go all round in the holidays. Mine have all got on famously," said Mrs. Hesketh; and nobody who looked at her could have thought anything else. Though, indeed, Mrs. Hesketh's well-off-ness was not nearly so disagreeable or offensive to other people as her husband's, who had his balance at his banker's written on his face; whereas in her case it was only evident that she was on the best of terms with her milliner and her jeweller, and all her tradespeople, and never had any trouble with her bills. Mary sat between the woman who had no children, and who thought she made idols of her boys — and the woman who had quantities of children and saw no reason why anybody should be much put out of their way about them; and neither the one nor the other knew what she meant, any more than she perhaps knew exactly what they meant, though, as was natural, that latter idea did not much strike her. And the sole strengthening which Mrs. Ochterlony drew from this talk, was a resolution never to say anything more about it; to keep what she was thinking of to herself, and shut another door in her heart, which, after all, is a process which has to be pretty often repeated as one goes through the world.

"But Mary has no friends — no female friends, poor thing. It is so sad for a girl when that happens, and accounts for so many things," the colonel's wife said, dropping the lids over her eyes, and with an imperceptible shake of her head, which brought the little chapel and the scene of her second marriage in a moment before Mary's indignant eyes; "but there is one good even in that, for it gives greater ground for faith; when we have nothing and nobody to cling to" —

"We were talking of the children," Mrs. Hesketh broke in calmly. "If I were you I should keep Hugh until Islay was old enough to go with him. They are such companions to each other, you know, and two children don't cost much more than one. If I were you, Mary, I would send the two together. I always did it with mine. And I am sure you have somebody that will take care of them; one always has somebody in one's eye; and as for female friends" —

Mary stopped short the profanity which doubtless her comfortable visitor was about to utter on this subject. "I have only female friends," she said, with a natural touch of sharpness in her voice. "I have an old aunt and a sister who are my nearest relatives — and it is there Hugh is going," for the prick of offence had been good for her nerves, and strung them up.

"Then I can't see what you have to be anxious about," said Mrs. Hesketh; "some people always make a fuss about things happening to children; why should anything happen to them? mine have had everything, I think, that children can have, and never been a bit the worse; and though it makes one uncomfortable at the time to think of their being ill, and so far away if anything should happen, still, if you know they are in good hands, and that everything is done that can be done — And then, one never bears till the worst is over," said the well-off woman, drawing her lace shawl round her. "Good-by, Mary, and don't fret; there is nothing that is not made worse by fretting about it; I never do, for my part."

Mrs. Kirkman threw a glance of pathetic import out of the corners of her down-dropped eyes at the large departing skirts of Mary's other visitor. The colonel's wife was one of the people who always stay last, and her friends generally cut their visits short when they encountered her, with a knowledge of this peculiarity, and at the same time an awful sense of something that would be said when they had withdrawn. "Not that I care for what she says," Mrs. Hesketh murmured to herself as she went out, "and Mary ought to know better at least;" but at the same time, society at the station, though it was quite used to it, did not like to think of the sigh, and the tender, bitter lamentations which would be made over them when they took their leave. Mrs. Hesketh was not sensitive, but she could not help feeling a little aggrieved, and wondering what special view of her evil ways her regimental superior would take this time — for in so limited a community, everybody knew about everybody, and any little faults one might have were not likely to be hid.

Mrs. Kirkman had risen too, and when Mary came back from the door the colonel's wife came and sat down beside her on the sofa, and took Mrs. Ochterlony's hand. "She would be very nice, if she only took a little thought about the one thing needful," said Mrs. Kirkman, with her usual sigh. "What does it matter about all the rest? Oh, Mary, if we could only choose the good part which cannot be taken away from us!"

"But surely we all try, a little, after that," said Mary. "She is a kind woman, and very good to the poor. And how can we tell what her thoughts are? I don't think we ever understand each other's thoughts."

"I never pretend to understand. I judge according to the scripture rule," said Mrs. Kirkman; "you are too charitable, Mary; and too often, you know, charity only means laxness. Oh, I cannot tell you how those people are all laid upon my soul! Colonel Kirkman being the principal officer, you know, and so little real Christian work to be expected from Mr. Churchill, the responsibility is terrible. I feel sometimes as if I must die under it. If their blood should be demanded at my hands!"

"But surely God must care a little about them Himself," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "Don't you think so? I cannot think that He has left it all upon you"—

"Dear Mary, if you would but give me the comfort of thinking I had been of use to you," said Mrs. Kirkman, pressing Mary's hand. And when she went away she believed that she had done her duty by Mrs. Ochterlony at least; and felt that perhaps, as a brand snatched from the burning, this woman, who was so wrapped up in regard for the world and idolatry of her children, might still be brought into a better state. From this it will be seen that the painful impression made by the marriage had a little faded out of the mind of the station. It was there, waiting any chance moment or circumstance that might bring the name of the Madonna Mary into question; but in the meantime, for the convenience of ordinary life, it had been dropped. It was a nuisance to keep up a sort of shadowy censure which never came to anything, and by tacit consent the thing had dropped. For it was a very small community, and if any one had to be tabooed, the taboo must have been complete and crushing, and nobody had the courage for that. And so gradually the cloudiness passed away like a breath on a mirror, and Mary to all appearance was among them as she had been before. Only no sort of compromise could really obliterate the fact from anybody's recollection or above all from her own mind.

And Mary went back to little Hugh's wardrobe when her visitors were gone, with that sense of having shut another door in her heart which has already been mentioned. It is so natural to open all the doors and leave all the chambers open to the day; but when people walk up to the threshold and look in and turn blank looks of surprise or sad looks of disapproval upon you, what is to be done but to shut the door? Mrs. Ochterlony thought as most people do, that it was almost incredible that her neighbours did not understand what she meant; and she thought too, like an inexperienced woman, that this was an accident of the station, and that elsewhere other people knew better, which was a very fortunate thought, and did her good. And so she continued to put the little things in order, and felt half angry when she saw the Major come in, and knew beforehand that he was going to resume his pantomime with little Hugh, and to try if his head was hot and look at his tongue. If his tongue turned out to be white and his head feverish, then Mary knew that he would think it was her fault, and began to long for Aunt Agatha's letter, which she had been fearing, and which might be looked for by the next mail.

As for the Major, he came home with the air of a man who has hit upon a new trouble. His wife saw it before he had been five minutes in the house. She saw it in his eyes, which sought her and retired from her in their significant restless way, as if studying how to begin. In former days Mrs. Ochterlony, when she saw this, used to help her husband out; but recently she had had no heart for that, and he was left unaided to make a beginning for himself. She took no notice of his fidgeting, nor of the researches he made all about the room and all the things he put out of their places. She could wait until he informed her what it was. But Mary felt a little nervous until such time as her husband had seated himself opposite her and begun to pull her working things about and to take up little Hugh's linen blouses which she had been setting in order. Then the Major heaved a demonstrative sigh. He meant to be asked what it meant, and even gave a glance up at her from the corner of his eye to see if she remarked it, but Mary was hard-hearted and would take no notice. He had to take all the trouble himself.

"He will want warmer things when he goes home," said the Major. "You must write to Aunt Agatha about that, Mary. I have been thinking a great deal about his going home. I don't know how I shall get on without him, nor you either, my darling; but it is for his good. How old is Islay?" Major Ochterlony added with a little abruptness: and then his wife knew what it was.

"Islay is not quite three," said Mary, quietly, as if the question was of no importance; but for all that her heart began to jump and beat against her breast.

"Three! and so big for his age," said the guilty Major, labouring with his secret meaning. "I don't want to vex you, Mary, my love, but I was thinking perhaps when Hugh went — It comes to about the same thing, you see — the little beggar would be dreadfully solitary by himself, and I don't see that it would make any difference to Aunt Agatha" —

"It would make a difference to me," said Mary. "Oh, Hugh, don't be so cruel to me. I cannot let him go so young. If Hugh must go it may be for his good — but not for Islay's, who is only a baby. He would not know us or have any recollection of us. Don't make me send both of my boys away."

"You would still have the baby," said the Major. "My darling, I am not going to do anything without your consent. Islay looked dreadfully feverish the other day, you know. I told you so; and as I was coming home I met Mrs. Hesketh" —

"You took her advice about it," said Mary, with a little bitterness. As for the Major, he set his Mary a whole heaven above such a woman as Mrs. Hesketh, and yet he had taken her advice about it, and it irritated him a little to perceive his wife's tone of reproach.

"If I listened to her advice it was, because she is a very sensible woman," said Major Ochterlony. "You are so heedless, my dear. When your children's health is ruined, you know, that is not the time to send them home. We ought to do it now, while they are quite well; though indeed I thought Islay very feverish the other night," he added, getting up again in his restless way. And then the Major was struck with compunction when he saw Mary bending down over her work, and remembered how constantly she was there, working for them, and how much more trouble those children cost her than they ever could cost him. "My love," he said, coming up to her and laying his hand caressingly upon her bent head, "my bonnie Mary! you did not think I meant that you cared less for them or what was for their good, than I do? It will be a terrible trial; but then, if it is for their good and our own peace of mind" —

"God help me," said Mary, who was a little beside herself. "I don't think you will leave me any peace of mind. You will drive me to do what I think wrong, or, if I don't do it, you will make me think that everything that happens is my fault. You don't mean it, but you are cruel, Hugh."

"I am sure I don't mean it," said the Major, who, as usual, had had his say out; "and when you come to think — but we will say no more about it to-night. Give me your book, and I will read to you for an hour or two. It is a comfort to come in to you and get a little peace. And after all, my love, Mrs Hesketh means well, and she's a very sensible woman. I don't like Hesketh, but there's not a word to say against her. They are all very kind and friendly. We are in great luck in our regiment. Is this your mark where you left off? Don't let us say anything more about it, Mary, for to-night."

"No," said Mrs. Ochterlony, with a sigh; but she knew in her heart that the Major would begin to feel Islay's head, if it was hot, and look at his tongue, as he had done to Hugh's, and drive her out of her senses. And that most likely when she had come to an end of her powers, she would be beaten and give in at the last. But they said no more about it that night; and the Major got so interested in the book that he sat all the evening reading, and Mary got very well on with her work. Major Ochterlony was so interested that he even forgot to look as if he thought the children feverish when they came to say good night, which was the most wonderful relief to his wife. If thoughts came into her head while she trimmed Hugh's little blouses, of another little three-year-old traveller tottering by his brother's side, and going away on the stormy dangerous sea, she kept them to herself. It did not seem to her as if she could outlive the separation, nor how she could permit a ship so richly freighted to sail away into the dark distance and the terrible storms; and yet she knew that she must outlive it, and that it must happen, if not now, yet at least some time. It is the condition of existence for the English sojourners in India. And what was she more than another, that any one should think there was any special hardship in her case?

CHAPTER VII.

THE next mail was an important one in many ways. It was to bring Aunt Agatha's letter about little Hugh, and it did bring something which had still more effect upon the Ochterlony peace of mind. The Major, as has been already said, was not a man to be greatly excited by the arrival of the mail. All his close and pressing interests were at present concentrated in the station. His married sisters wrote to him now and then, and he was very glad to get their letters, and to hear when a new niece or nephew arrived, which was the general burden of these epistles. Sometimes it was a death, and Major Ochterlony was sorry; but neither the joy nor the sorrow disturbed him much. For he was far away, and he was tolerably happy himself, and could bear with equanimity the vicissitudes in the lot of his friends. But this time the letter which arrived was of a different description. It was from his brother, the head of the house—who was a little of an invalid and a good deal of a dilettante, and gave the Major no nephews or nieces, being indeed a confirmed bachelor of the most hopeless kind. He was a man who never wrote letters, so that the communication was a little startling. And yet there was nothing very particular in it. Something had occurred to make Mr. Ochterlony think of his brother, and the consequence was that he had drawn his writing things to his hand and written a few kind words, with a sense of having done something meritorious to himself and deeply gratifying to Hugh. He sent his love to Mary, and hoped the little fellow, was all right who was, he supposed, to carry on the family honours—"If there are any family honours," the Squire had said, not without an agreeable sense that there was something in his last paper on the "Coins of Agrippa," that the Numismatic Society would not willingly let die. This was the innocent morsel of correspondence which had come to the Major's hand. Mary was sitting by with the baby on her lap while he read it, and busy with a very different kind of communication. She was reading Aunt Agatha's letter which she had been dreading and wishing for, and her heart was growing sick over the innocent flutter of expectation and kindness and delight which was in it. Every assurance of the joy she would feel in seeing little Hugh, and the care she would take of him, which the simple-minded writer sent to be a comfort to Mary, came upon the mother's unreasonable mind like a kind of injury. To think that anybody could be happy about an occurrence that would be so terrible to her; to think anybody could have the bad taste to say that they looked with impatience for the moment that to Mary would be like dying! She was unhunged, and for the first time perhaps in her life her nerves were thoroughly out of order, and she was unreasonable to the bottom of her heart; and when she came to her young sister's gay announcement of what for her part she would do for her little nephew's education, and how she had been studying the subject ever since Mary's letter arrived, Mrs. Ochterlony felt as if she could have beaten the girl, and was ready to cry with wretchedness and irritation and despair. All these details served somehow to fix it, though she knew it had been fixed before. They told her the little room Hugh should have, and the old maid who would take of him; and how he should play in the garden, and learn his lessons in Aunt Agatha's parlor, and all those details which would be sweet to Mary when her boy was actually there. But at present they made his going away so real, that they were very bitter to her, and she had to draw the astonished child away from his play and take hold of him and keep him by her, to feel quite sure that he was still here, and not in the little North-country cottage which she knew so well. But this was an arrangement which did not please the baby, who liked to have his mother all to himself, and pushed Hugh away, and kicked and screamed at him lustily. Thus it was an agitated little group upon which the Major looked down as he turned from his brother's pleasant letter. He was in a very pleasant frame of mind himself, and was excessively entertained by the self-assertion of little Wilfrid on his mother's knee.

"He is a plucky little soul though he is so small," said Major Ochterlony; "but Willy, my boy, there's precious little for you of the grandeurs of the family. It is from Francis, my dear. It's very surprising, you know, but still it's true. And he sends you his love. You know I always said that there was a great deal of good in Francis; he is not a demonstrative man—but still, when you get at it, he has a warm heart. I am sure he would be a good friend to you, Mary, if ever."

"I hope I shall never need him to be a good friend to me," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "He is your brother, Hugh, but you know we never got on." It was a perfectly correct statement of fact, but yet perhaps Mary would not have made it, had she not been so much disturbed by Aunt Agatha's letter. She was almost disposed to persuade herself for that moment that she had not got on with Aunt Agatha, which was a moral impossibility. As for the Major, he took no notice of his wife's little ill-tempered unenthusiastic speech.

"You will be pleased when you read it," he said. "He talks of Hugh quite plainly as the heir of Earlstown. I can't help being pleased. I wonder what kind of Squire the little beggar will make: but we shall not live to see that—or at least, I shan't," the Major went on, and he looked at his boy with a wistful look which Mary used to think of afterwards. As for little Hugh, he was very indifferent, and not much more conscious of the affection near home than of the inheritance far off. Major Ochterlony stood by the side of Mary's chair, and he had it in his heart to give her a little lesson upon her unbelief and want of confidence in him, who was always acting for the very best, and who thought much more of her interests than of his own.

"My darling," he said, in that coaxing tone which Mary knew so well, "I don't mean to blame you. It was a bad thing to make you do; and you might have thought me cruel and too precise. But only see now how important it was to be exact about our marriage—too exact even. If Hugh should come into the estate!"

Here Major Ochterlony stopped short all at once, without any apparent reason. He had still his brother's letter in his hand, and was standing by Mary's side; and nobody had come in, and nothing had happened. But all at once, like a flash of lightning, something of which he had never thought before had entered his mind. He stopped short, and said "Good God!" low to himself, though he was not a man who used profane expressions. His face changed as a summer day changes when the wind seizes it like a ghost, and covers its heaven with clouds. So great was the shock he had received, that he made no attempt to hide it, but stood gazing at Mary, appealing to her out of the midst of his sudden trouble. "Good God!" he said. His eyes went in a piteous way from little Hugh, who knew nothing about it, to his mother, who was at present the chief sufferer. Was it possible that instead of helping he had done his best to dishonor Hugh? It was so new an idea to him, that he looked helplessly into Mary's eyes to see if it was true. And she, for her part, had nothing to say to him. She gave a little tremulous cry which did but echo his own exclamation, and pitifully held out her hand to her husband. Yes; it was true. Between them they had sown thorns in their boy's path, and thrown doubt on his name, and brought humiliation and uncertainty into his future life. Major Ochterlony dropped into a chair by his wife's side, and covered his face with her hand. He was struck dumb, by his discovery. It was only she who, had seen it all long ago—to whom no sudden revelation could come—who had been suffering, even angrily and bitterly, but who was now altogether subdued and conscious only of a common calamity; who was the only one capable of speech or thought.

"Hugh, it is done now," said Mary; "perhaps it may never do him any harm. We are in India, a long way from all our friends. They know what took place in Scotland, but they can't know what happened here."

The Major only replied once more, "Good God!" Perhaps he was not thinking so much of Hugh as of the failure he had himself made. To think he should have landed in the most apparent folly by way of being wise—that perhaps was the immediate sting. But as for Mrs. Ochterlony, her heart was full of her little boy who was going away from her, and her husband's horror and dismay seemed only natural. She had to withdraw her hand from him, for the tyrant baby did not approve of any other claim upon her attention, but she carressed his stooping head as she did so. "Oh, Hugh, let us hope things will turn out better than we think," she said, with her heart overflowing in her eyes; and the soft tears fell on Wilfrid's little frock as she soothed and consoled him. Little Hugh for his part had been startled in the midst of his play, and had come forward to see what was going on. He was not particularly interested, it is true, but still he rather wanted to know what it was all about. And when the pugnacious baby saw his brother he returned to the conflict. It was his baby efforts with hands and feet to thrust Hugh away which roused the Major. He got up and took a walk about the room, sighing heavily. "When you saw what was involved, why did you let me do it, Mary?" he said, amid his sighs. That was all the advantage his wife had from his discovery. He was still walking about the room and sighing, when the baby went to sleep, and Hugh left the room; and then to be sure the father and mother were alone.

"That never came into my head," Major Ochterlony said, drawing a chair again to Mary's side. "When you saw the danger why did you not tell me? I thought it was only because you did not like it. And then, on the other side, if anything happened to me—Why did you let me do it when you saw that?" said the Major, almost angrily. And he drew another long impatient sigh.

"Perhaps it will do no harm, after all," said Mary, who felt herself suddenly put upon her defence.

"Harm! it is sure to do harm," said the Major. "It is as good as saying we were never married till now. Good heavens! to think you should have seen all that, and yet let me do it. We may have ruined him, for all we know. And the question is, what's to be done? Perhaps I should write to Francis, and tell him that I thought it best for your sake, in case anything happened to me—and as it was merely a matter of form, I don't see that Churchill could have any hesitation in striking it out of the register"——

"Oh, Hugh, let it alone now," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "It is done, and we cannot undo it. Let us only be quiet and make no more commotion. People may forget it, perhaps, if we forget it."

"Forget it!" the Major said, and sighed. He shook his head, and at the same time he looked with a certain tender patronage on Mary. "You may forget it, my dear, and I hope you will," he said, with a magnanimous pathos; "but it is too much to expect that I should forget what may have such important results. I feel sure I ought to let Francis know. I daresay he could advise us what would best. It is a very kind letter," said the Major; and he sighed, and gave Mary Mr. Ochterlony's brief and unimportant note with an air of resigned yet hopeless affliction, which half irritated her and half awoke those possibilities of laughter which come "when there is little laughing in one's head," as we say in Scotland. She could have laughed, and she could have stormed at him; and yet in the midst of all she felt a poignant sense of contrast, and knew that it was she and not he who would really suffer—as it was he and not she who was in fault.

While Mary read Mr. Ochterlony's letter, lulling now and then with a soft movement the baby on her knee, the Major at the other side got attracted after a while by the pretty picture of the sleeping child, and began at length to forego his sighing and to smooth out the long white drapery that lay over Mary's dress. He was thinking no harm, the tender-hearted man. He looked at little Wilfrid's small waxen face pillowed on his mother's arm—so much smaller and feebler than Hugh and Islay had been, the great, gallant fellows—and his heart was touched by his little child. "My little man! you are all right, at least," said the inconsiderate father. He said it to himself, and thought, if he thought at all on the subject, that Mary, who was reading his brother's letter, did not hear him. And when Mrs. Ochterlony gave that cry which roused all the house and brought everybody trooping to the door, in the full idea that it must be a cobra at least, the Major jumped up to his feet as much startled as any of them, and looked down to the floor and cried, "Where?—what is it?" with as little an idea of what was the matter as the ayah who grinned and gazed in the distance. When he saw that instead of indicating somewhere a reptile intruder, Mary had dropped the letter and fallen into a weak outburst of tears, the Major was confounded. He sent the servants away, and took his wife in his arms and held her fast. "What is it, my love?" said the Major. "Are you ill? For Heaven's sake tell me what it is; my poor darling, my bonnie Mary!" This was how he soothed her, without the most distant idea what was the matter, or what had made her cry out. And when Mary came to herself, she did not explain very clearly. She said to herself that it was no use making him unhappy by the fantastical horror which had come into her mind with his words, or indeed had been already lurking there. And, poor soul, she was better when she had had her cry out and had given over little Wilfrid, woke up by the sound, to his nurse's hands. She said, "Never mind me, Hugh; I am nervous, I suppose;" and cried on his shoulder as he never remembered her to have cried, except for very serious griefs. And when at last he had made her lie down, which was the Major's favorite panacea for all female ills of body or mind, and had covered her over, and patted and caressed and kissed her, Major Ochterlony went out with a troubled mind. It could not be anything in Francis's letter, which was a model of brotherly correctness, that had vexed or excited her: and then he began to think that for some time past her nerves had not been what they used to be. The idea disturbed him greatly, as may be supposed; for the thought of Mary ailing and weakly, or perhaps ill and in danger, was one which had never yet entered his mind. The first thing he thought of was to go and have a talk with Sorbette, who ought to know, if he was good for anything, what it was.

"I am sure I don't know in the least what is the matter," the Major said. "She is not ill, you know. This morning she looked as well as ever she did, and then all at once gave a cry and burst into tears. It is so unlike Mary."

"It is very unlike her," said the doctor.

"Perhaps you were saying something that upset her nerves."

"Nerves!" said the Major, with calm pride. "My dear fellow, you know that Mary has no nerves; she never was one of that sort of women. To tell the truth, I don't think she has ever been quite herself since that stupid business, you know."

"What stupid business?" said Mr. Sorbette.

"Oh, you know—the marriage, to be sure. A man looks very silly afterwards," said the Major with candour, "when he lets himself be carried away by his feelings. She ought not to have consented when that was her idea. I would give a hundred pounds I had not been so foolish. I don't think she has ever been quite herself since."

The doctor had opened de grands yeux. He looked at his companion as if he could not believe his ears. "Of course you would never have taken such an unusual step if there had not been good reason for it," he ventured to say—which was rather a hazardous speech; for the Major might have divined its actual meaning, and then things would have gone badly with Mr. Sorbette. But, as it happened, Major Ochterlony was far too much occupied to pay attention to anybody's meaning except his own.

"Yes, there was good reason," he said. "She lost her marriage 'lines,' you know; and all our witnesses are dead. I thought she might perhaps find herself in a disagreeable position if anything happened to me."

As he spoke, the doctor regarded him with surprise so profound as to be half sublime—surprise and a perplexity and doubt wonderful to behold. Was this a story the Major had made up, or was it perhaps after all the certain truth? It was just what he had said at first; but the first time it was stated with more warmth, and did not produce the same effect. Mr. Sorbette respected Mrs. Ochterlony to the bottom of his heart; but still he had shaken his head, and said, "There was no accounting for those things." And now he did not know what to make of it; whether to believe in the innocence of the couple, or to think the Major had made up a story—which, to be sure, would be by much the greatest miracle of all.

"If that was the case, I think it would have been better to let well alone," said the doctor. "That is what I would have done had it been me."

"Then why did not you tell me so?" said Major Ochterlony. "I asked you before; and what you all said to me was, 'If that's the case, best to repeat it at once.' Good Lord! to think how little one can rely upon one's friends when one asks their advice. But in the meantime the question is about Mary. I wish you'd go and see her and give her something—a tonic, you know, or something strengthening. I think I'll step over and see Churchill, and get him to strike that unfortunate piece of nonsense out of the register. As it was only a piece of form, I should think he would do it; and if it is that that ails her, it would do her good."

"If I were you, I'd let well alone," said the doctor; but he said it low, and he was putting on his hat as he spoke, and went off immediately to see his patient. Even if curiosity and surprise had not been in operation, he would still probably have hastened to Madonna Mary. For the regiment loved her in its heart, and the loss of her fair serene presence would have made a terrible gap at the station. "We must not let her be ill if we can help it," Mr. Sorbette said to himself; and then he made a private reflection about that ass Ochterlony and his fidgets. But yet, notwithstanding all his faults, the Major was not an ass. On thinking it over again, he decided not to go to Churchill with that little request about the register; and he felt more and more, the more he reflected upon it, how hard it was that in a moment of real emergency a man should be able to put so little dependence upon his friends. Even Mary had let him do it, though she had seen how dangerous and impolitic it was; and all the others had let him do it: for certainly it was not without asking advice that he had taken what the doctor called so unusual a step. Major Ochterlony felt as he took this into consideration that he was an injured man. What was the good of being on intimate terms with so many people, if not one of them could give him the real counsel of a friend when he wanted it? And even Mary had let him do it! The thought of such a strange dereliction of duty on the part of everybody connected with him went to the Major's heart.

As for Mary, it would be a little difficult to express her feelings. She got up as soon as her husband was gone, and threw off the light covering he had put over her so carefully, and went back to her work; for to lie still in a darkened room was not a remedy in which she put any faith. And to tell the truth, poor Mary's heart was eased a little, perhaps physically, by her tears, which had done her good, and by the other incidents of the evening, which had thrown down as it were the separation between her and her husband, and taken away the one rankling and aching wound she had. Now that he saw that he had done wrong — now that he was aware that it was a wrong step he had taken — a certain remnant of bitterness which had been lurking in a corner of Mary's heart came all to nothing and died down in a moment. As soon as he was himself awakened to it, Mary forgot her own wound and every evil thought she had ever had, in her sorrow for him. She remembered his look of dismay, his dead silence, his unusual exclamation; and she said, "poor Hugh!" in her heart, and was ready to condone his worst faults. Otherwise, as Mrs. Ochterlony said to herself, he had scarcely a fault that anybody could point out. He was the kindest, the most true and tender! Everybody acknowledged that he was the best husband in the regiment, and which of them could stand beside him, even in an inferior place? Not Colonel Kirkman, who might have been a petrified Colonel out of the Drift (if there were Colonels in those days), for any particular internal evidence to the contrary; nor Captain Hesketh, who was so well off; nor any half dozen of the other officers. This was the state of mind in which Mrs. Ochterlony was when the doctor called. And he found her quite well, and thought her an unaccountable woman, and shrugged his shoulders, and wondered what the Major would take into his head next. "He said it was on the nerves, as the poor women call it," said the doctor. "I should like to know what he means by making game of people — as if I had as much time to talk nonsense as he has: but I thought, to be sure, when he said that, that it was a cock-and-bull story. I ought to know something about your nerves."

"He was quite right," said Mrs. Ochterlony; and she smiled and took hold of the great trouble that was approaching her and made a buckler of it for her husband. "My nerves were very much upset. You know we have to make up our minds to send Hugh home."

And as she spoke she looked up at Mr. Sorbette with eyes brimming over with two great tears — real tears, Heaven knows, which came but too readily to back out her sacred plea. The doctor recoiled before them as if somebody had levelled a pistol at him; for he was a man that could not bear to see women crying, as he said — or to see anybody in distress, which was a true statement of the case.

"There — there," he said, "don't excite yourself. What is the good of thinking about it? Everybody has to do it, and the monkeys get on as well as possible. Look here, pack up all this work and trash, and amuse yourself. Why don't you go out more and take a little relaxation? You had better send over to my sister for a novel; or if there's nothing else for it, get the baby. Don't sit working and driving yourself crazy here."

So that was all Mr. Sorbette could do in the case; and a wonderfully puzzled doctor he was as he went back to his quarters, and took the first opportunity of telling his sister that she was all wrong about the Ochterlony, and he always knew she was. "As if a man could know anything about it," Miss Sorbette said. And in the meantime the Major went home, and was very tender of Mary, and petted and watched over her as if she had had a real illness. Though, after all, the question why she had let him do so, was often, nearly on his lips, as it was always in his heart.

CHAPTER VIII.

WHAT Mrs. Ochterlony had to do after this was to write to Aunt Agatha settling everything about little Hugh, which was by no means an easy thing to do, especially since the matter had been complicated by that most unnecessary suggestion about Islay which Mrs. Hesketh had thought proper to make; as if she, who had a grown-up daughter to be her companion, and swarms of children, so many as almost to pass the bounds of possible recollection, could know anything about how it felt to send off one's entire family, leaving only a baby behind; but then that is so often the way with those well-off people who have never had anything happen to them. Mary had to write that if all was well, and they could find "an opportunity," probably Hugh would be sent by the next mail but one; for she succeeded in persuading herself and the Major that sooner than that it would be impossible to have his things ready. "You do not say anything about Islay, my dear," said the Major, when he read the letter, "and you must see that for the child's sake" —

"Oh, Hugh, what difference can it make?" said Mrs. Ochterlony, with conscious sophistry. "If she can take one child, she can take two. It is not like a man" — But whether it was Islay or Aunt Agatha who was not like a man, Mary did not explain; and she went on with her preparations with a desperate trust in circumstances, such as women are often driven to. Something might happen to preserve to her yet for a little while longer her three-year-old boy. Hugh was past hoping for, but it seemed to her now that she would accept with gratitude, as a mitigated calamity, the separation from one which had seemed so terrible to her at first. As for the Major, he adhered to the idea with a tenacity unusual to him. He even came and superintended her at her work-table, and asked continually, How about Islay? if all these things were for Hugh? — which was a question that called forth all the power of sophistry and equivocation which Mrs Ochterlony possessed to answer. But still she put a certain trust in circumstances that something might still happen to save Islay — and indeed something did happen, though far, very far, from being as Mary wished.

The Major in the meantime had done his best to shake himself free from the alarm and dismay indirectly produced in his mind by his brother's letter. He had gone to Mr. Churchill after all, but found it impracticable to get the entry blotted out of the register, notwithstanding his assurance that it was simply a matter of form. Mr. Churchill had no doubt on that point, but he could not alter the record, though he consoled with the sufferer. "I cannot think how you all could let me do it," the Major said. "A man may be excused for taking the alarm if he is persuaded that his wife will get into trouble when he is gone, for want of a formality; but how all of you, with cool heads and no excitement to take away your judgment?" —

"Who persuaded you?" said the clergyman, with a little dismay.

"Well, you know Kirkman said that things looked very bad in Scotland when the marriage lines were lost. How could I tell? he is Scotch and he ought to know. And then to think of Mary in trouble, and perhaps losing her little provision if anything happened to me. It was enough to make a man do anything foolish; but how all of you who know better should have let me do it?" —

"My dear Major," said Mr. Churchill, mildly, "I don't think you are a man to be kept from doing anything when your heart is set upon it; — and then you were in such a hurry" —

"Ah, yes," said Major Ochterlony, with a deep sigh; "and nobody, that I can remember, ever suggested to me to wait a little. That's what it is, Churchill; to have so many friends, and not one among them who would take the trouble to tell a man he was wrong."

"Major Ochterlony," said the clergyman, a little stiffly, "you forget that I said everything I could say to convince you. Of course I did not know all the circumstances — but I hope I shall always have courage enough, when I think so, to tell any man he is in the wrong."

"My dear fellow, I did not mean you," said the Major, with another sigh; and perhaps it was with a similar statement that the conversation always concluded when Major Ochterlony confided to any special individual of his daily associates, this general condemnation of his friends, of which he made as little a secret as he had made of his re-marriage. The station knew as well after that, that Major Ochterlony was greatly disturbed about the "unusual step" he had taken, and was afraid it might be bad for little Hugh's future prospects, as it had been aware beforehand of the wonderful event itself. And naturally there was a great deal of discussion on the subject. There were some people who contented themselves with thinking, like the doctor, that Ochterlony was an ass with his fidgets; while there were others who thought he was "deep," and was trying, as they said, to do away with the bad impression. The former class were men and the latter were women, but it was by no means all the women who thought so. Not to speak of the younger class like poor little Mrs. Askell, there was at least two of the most important voices at the station which did not declare themselves. Mrs. Kirkman shook her head, and hoped that however it turned out it might be for all their good, and above all might convince Mary of the error of her ways; and Mrs. Hesketh thought everybody made a great deal too much fuss about it, and begged the public in general to let the Ochterlonys alone. But the fact was, that so far as the ordinary members of society were concerned, the Major's new agitation revived the gossip that had nearly died out, and set it all afloat again. It had been dying away under the mingled influences of time and the non-action of the leading ladies, and Mrs. Ochterlony's serene demeanor, which forbade the idea of evil. But when it was thus started again the second time it was less likely to be made an end of. Mary, however, was as unconscious of the renewed commotion, as if she had been a thousand miles away. The bitterness had gone out of her heart, and she had half begun to think as the Major did, that he was an in-injured man, and that it was her fault and his friend's fault; and then she was occupied with something still more important, and could not go back to the old pain, from which she had suffered enough. Thus it was with her in those troubled, but yet, as she afterwards thought, happy days; when she was very miserable sometimes and very glad — when she had a great deal, as people said, to put up with, a great deal to forgive, and many a thing of which she did not herself approve, to excuse, and justify to others; this was her condition, and she had at the same time before her the dreadful probability of a separation from both of her children, the certainty of separation and a long, dangerous voyage for one of them, and sat and worked to this end day after day with a sense of what at the moment seemed exquisite wretchedness. But yet, thinking over it afterwards and looking back upon it, it seemed to Mary as if those were happy days.

The time was coming very near when Hugh (as Mrs. Ochterlony said) or the children (as the Major was accustomed to say) were going home: when all at once, without any preparation, very startling news came to the station. One of the little local rebellions that are always taking place in India had broken out somewhere, and a strong detachment of the regiment was to be sent immediately to quell it. Major Ochterlony came home that day a little excited by the news, and still more by the certainty that it was he who must take the command. He was excited because he was a soldier at heart, and liked, kind man as he was, to see something doing; and because active service was more hopeful and exhilarating and profitable than reposing at the station, where there was no danger and very little to do. "I don't venture to hope that the rogues will show fight," he said cheerfully; "so there is no need to be anxious, Mary: and you can keep the boys with you till I come back — that is only fair," he said, in his exultation. As for Mary, the announcement took all the colour out of her cheeks, and drove both Hugh and Islay out of her mind. He had seen service enough, it is true, since they were married, to habituate her to that sort of thing; and she had made, on the whole, a very good soldier's wife, bearing her anxiety in silence, and keeping a brave front to the world. But perhaps Mr. Sorbette was right when he thought her nerves were upset. So many things all coming together may have been too much for her. When she heard of this she broke down altogether, and felt a cold thrill of terror go through her from her head to her heart, or from her heart to her head, which perhaps would be the most just expression: but she dared not say a word to her husband to deter or discourage him. When he saw the two tears that sprang into her eyes, and the sudden paleness that came over her face, he kissed her, all flushed and smiling as he was, and said: "Now, don't be silly, Mary. Don't forget you are a soldier's wife." There was not a touch of despondency or foreboding about him; and what could she say who knew, had there been ever so much foreboding, that his duty was the thing to be thought of, and not anybody's feelings? Her cheek did not regain its colour all that day, but she kept it to herself, and forgot even about little Hugh's reprieve. The children were dear, but their father was dearer, or at least so it seemed at that moment. Perhaps if the lives of the little ones had been threatened, the Major's expedition might have bulked smaller — for the heart can hold only one overwhelming emotion at a time. But the affair was urgent, and Mary did not have very much time left to her to think of it. Almost before she had realized what it was, the drums had beat, and the brisk music of the band — that music that people called exhilarating — had roused all the station, and the measured march of the men had sounded past as if they were all treading upon her heart. The Major kissed his little boys in their beds, for it was, to be sure, unnaturally early, as everything is in India: and he had made his wife promise to go and lie down, and take care of herself, when he was gone. "Have the baby, and don't think any more of me than you can help, and take care of my boys. We shall be back sooner than you want us," the Major had said, as he took tender leave of his "bonnie Mary." And for her part she stood as long as she could see them, with her two white lips pressed tight together, waving her hand to her soldier till he was gone and out of sight. And then she obeyed him, and lay down and covered her head and sobbed to herself in the growing light, as the big blazing sun began to touch the horizon. She was sick with pain and terror, and she could not tell why. She had watched him go away before, and had hailed him coming back again, and had known him in hotter conflict than this could be, and wounded, and yet he had taken no great harm. But all that did her little good now: perhaps because her nerves were weaker than usual, from the repeated shocks she had had to bear.

And it was to be expected that Mrs. Kirkman would come to see her, to console her that morning, and put the worst thoughts into her head. But before even Mrs. Kirkman, little Emma Askell came rushing in, with her baby and a bundle, and threw herself at Mary's feet. The Ensign had gone to the wars, and it was the first experience of such a kind that had fallen to the lot of his little baby wife; and naturally her anxiety told more distinctly upon her than it did upon Mary's ripe soul and frame. The poor little thing was white and cold and shivering, notwithstanding the blazing Indian day that began to lift itself over their heads. She fell down at Mary's feet, forgetting all about the beetles and scorpions which were the horror of her ordinary existence, and clasped her knees, and held Mrs. Ochterlony fast, grasping the bundle and the little waxen baby at the same time in the other arm.

"Do you think they will ever come back?" said poor little Emma. "Oh, Mrs. Ochterlony, tell me. I can bear it if you will tell me the worst. If anything were to happen to Charlie, and me not with him! I never, never, never can live until the news comes. Oh, tell me, do you think they will ever come back?"

"If I did not think they would come back, do you think I could take it so quietly?" said Mary; and she smiled as best she could, and lifted up the poor little girl, and took from her the baby and the bundle, which seemed all one, so closely were they held. Mrs. Ochterlony had deep eyes, which did not show when she had been crying; and she was not young enough to cry in thunder showers, as Emma Askell at eighteen might still be permitted to do; and the very sight of her soothed the young creature's heart. "You know you are a soldier's wife," Mary said; "I think I was as bad as you are the first time the Major left me—but we all get used to it after a few years."

"And he came back?" said Emma, doing all she could to choke a sob.

"He must have come back, or I should not have parted with him this morning," said Mrs. Ochterlony, who had need of all her own strength just at that moment. "Let us see in the meantime what this bundle is, and why you have brought poor baby out in her night-gown. And what a jewel she is to sleep! When my little Willy gets disturbed," said Mary, with a sigh, "he gives none of us any rest. I will make up a bed for her here on the sofa; and now tell me what this bundle is for, and why you have rushed out half dressed. We'll talk about them presently. Tell me first about yourself."

Upon which Emma hung her pretty little head, and began to fold a hem upon her damp handkerchief, and did not know how to explain herself. "Don't be angry with me," she said. "Oh, my Madonna, let me come and stay with you!—that was what I meant; I can't stay there by myself—and I will nurse Willy, and do your hair and help sewing. I don't mind what I do. Oh, Mrs. Ochterlony, don't send me away! I should die if I was alone. And as for baby, she never troubles anybody. She is so good. I will be your little servant and wait upon you like a slave, if you will only let me stay."

It would be vain to say that Mrs. Ochterlony was pleased by this appeal, for she was herself in a very critical state of mind, full of fears that she could give no reason for, and a hundred fantastic pains which she would fain have hidden from human sight. She had been taking a little comfort in the thought of the solitude, the freedom from visitors and disturbance, that she might safely reckon on, and in which she thought her mind might perhaps recover a little; and this young creature's society was not specially agreeable to her. But she was touched by the looks of the forlorn girl, and could no more have sent her away than she could repress the little movement of impatience and half disgust that rose in her heart. She was not capable of giving her any effusive welcome; but she kissed poor little Emma, and put the bundle beside the baby on the sofa, and accepted her visitor without saying anything about it. Perhaps it did her no harm: though she felt by moments as if her impatient longing to be alone and silent, and free to think her own thoughts, would break out in spite of all her self-control. But little Mrs. Askell never suspected the existence of any such emotions. She thought, on the contrary, that it was because Mary was used to it that she took it so quietly, and wondered whether she would ever get used to it. Perhaps, on the whole, Emma hoped not. She thought to herself that Mrs. Ochterlony, who was so little disturbed by the parting, would not feel the joy of the return half so much as she should; and on these terms she preferred to take the despair along with the joy. But under the shadow of Mary's matronly presence the little thing cheered up, and got back her courage. After she had been comforted with tea, and had fully realised her position as Mrs.

Ochterlony's visitor, Emma's spirits rose. She was half or quarter Irish, as has been already mentioned, and behaved herself accordingly. She recollected her despair, it is true, in the midst of a game with Hugh and Islay, and cried a little, but soon comforted herself with the thought that at that moment her Charlie could be in no danger. "They'll be stopping somewhere for breakfast by a well, and camping all about, and they can't get any harm there," said Emma: and thus she kept on chattering all day. If she had chattered only, and been content with chattering, it would have been comparatively easy work; but then she was one of those people who require answers, and will be spoken to. And Mary had to listen and reply, and give her opinion where they would be now, and when, at the very earliest, they might be expected back. With such a discipline to undergo, it may be thought a supererogation to bring Mrs. Kirkman in upon her that morning with her handkerchief in her hand, prepared, if it was necessary, to weep with Mary. But still it is the case that Mrs. Kirkman did come, as might have been expected; and to pass over conversation so edifying as hers would, under such circumstances, be almost a crime.

"My dear Mary," Mrs. Kirkman said when she came in, "I am so glad to see you up and making an effort: it is so much better than giving way. We must accept these trials as something sent us for our good. I am sure the Major has all our prayers for his safe return. Oh, Mary, do you not remember what I said to you—that God, I was sure, was not going to leave you alone?"

"I never thought He would leave me alone," said Mrs. Ochterlony; but certainly, though it was a right enough sentiment, it was not uttered in a right tone of voice.

"He will not rest till you see your duty more clearly," said her visitor; "if it were not for that, why should He have sent you so many things one after another? It is far better and more blessed than if he had made you happy and comfortable as the carnal heart desires. But I did not see you had any one with you," said Mrs. Kirkman, stopping short at the sight of Emma, who had just come into the room.

"Poor child, she was frightened and unhappy, and came to me this morning," said Mary. "She will stay with me—till—they come home."

"Let us say, if they come home," said Mrs. Kirkman, solemnly. "I never like to be too certain. We know when they go forth, but who can tell when they will come back? That is in God's hands."

At this speech Emma fell trembling and shivering again, and begged Mrs. Kirkman to tell her the worst, and cried out that she could bear it. She thought of nothing but her Charlie, as was natural, and that the Colonel's wife had already heard some bad news. And Mrs. Kirkman thought of nothing but improving the occasion; and both of them were equally indifferent and indeed unaware of the cold shudder which went through Mary, and the awful foreboding that closed down upon her, putting out the sunshine. It was a little safeguard to her to support the shivering girl who already half believed herself a widow, and to take up the challenge of the spiritual teacher who felt herself responsible for their souls.

"Do not make Emma think something is wrong," she said. "It is so easy to make a young creature wretched with a word. If the Colonel had been with them, it might have been different. But it is easy just now for you to frighten us. I am sure you do not mean it." And then Mary had to whisper in the young wife's ear, "She knows nothing about them—it is only her way," which was a thing very easily said to Emma, but very difficult to establish herself upon in her own heart.

And then Mrs. Hesketh came in to join the party.

"So they are gone," the new comer said. "What a way little Emma is in, to be sure. Is it the first time he has ever left you, my dear? and I daresay they have been saying something dreadful to frighten you. It is a great shame to let girls marry so young. I have been reckoning," said the easy-minded woman, whose husband was also of the party, "how long they are likely to be. If they get to Amberabad, say tomorrow, and if there is nothing very serious, and all goes well, you know, they might be back here on Saturday—and we had an engagement for Saturday," Mrs. Hesketh said. Her voice was quite easy and pleasant, as it always was; but nevertheless, Mary knew that if she had not felt excited, she would not have paid such an early morning visit, and that even her confident calculation about the return proved she was in a little anxiety about it. The fact was, that none of them were quite at their ease, except Mrs. Kirkman, who, having no personal interest in the matter, was quite equal to taking a very gloomy view of affairs.

"How can any one think of such vanities at such a moment?" Mrs. Kirkman said.

"Oh, if I only could convince you, my dear friends. None of us can tell what sort of an engagement they may have before next Saturday — perhaps the most solemn engagement ever given to man. Don't let misfortune find you in this unprepared state of mind. There is nothing on earth so solemn as seeing soldiers go away. You may think of the band and all that, but for me, I always seem to hear a voice saying, 'Prepare to meet your God.'"

To be sure the Colonel was in command of the station and was safe at home, and his wife could speculate calmly upon the probable fate of the detachment. But as for the three women who were listening to her, it was not so easy for them. There was a dreadful pause, for nobody could contradict such a speech; and poor little Emma dropped down sobbing on the floor; and the colour forsook even Mrs. Hesketh's comely cheek; and as for Mary, though she could not well be paler, her heart seemed to contract and shrink within her; and none of them had the courage to say anything. Naturally Mrs. Hesketh, with whom it was a principle not to fret, was the first to recover her voice.

"After all, though it's always an anxious time, I don't see any particular reason we have to be uneasy," she said. "Hesketh told me he felt sure they would give in at once. It may be very true all you say, but at the same time we may be reasonable, you know, and not take fright when there is no cause for it. Don't cry, Emma, you little goose; you'll have him back again in two or three days, all right."

And after awhile the anxious little assembly broke up, and Mrs. Hesketh, who though she was very liberal in her way, was not much given to personal charities, went to see some of the soldiers' wives, who, poor souls, would have been just as anxious if they had had the time for it, and gave them the best advice about their children, and promised tea and sugar if they would come to fetch it, and old frocks, in which she was always rich; and these women were so ungrateful as to like her visit better than that of the Colonel's wife, who carried them always on her heart and did them a great deal of good, and never confined herself to kindnesses of impulse. And little Emma Askell cried herself to sleep sitting on the floor, notwithstanding the beetles, reposing her pretty face flushed with weeping and her swollen eyes upon the sofa, where Mary sat and watched over her. Mrs. Hesketh got a little ease out of her visit to the soldiers' wives, and Emma forgot her troubles in sleep; but no sort of relief came to Mary, who reasoned with herself all day long without being able to deliver herself from the pressure of the deadly cold hand that seemed to have been laid upon her heart.

CHAPTER IX.

AND Mary's forebodings came true. Though it was so unlikely, and indeed seemed so unreasonable to everybody who knew about such expeditions, instead of bringing back his men victorious, it was the men, all drooping and discouraged, who carried back the brave and tender Major, covered over with the flag he had died for. The whole station was overcast with mourning when that melancholy procession came back. Mr. Churchill, who met them coming in, hurried back with his heart swelling up into his throat to prepare Mrs. Ochterlony for what was coming; but Mary was the only creature at the station who did not need to be prepared. She knew it was going to be so when she saw him go away. She felt in her heart that this was to be the end of it from the moment when he first told her of the expedition on which he was ordered. And when she saw poor Mr. Churchill's face, from which he had vainly tried to banish the traces of the horrible shock he had just received, she saw that the blow had fallen. She came up to him and took hold of his hands, and said, "I know what it is;" and almost felt, in the strange and terrible excitement of the moment, as if she were sorry for him who felt it so much.

This was how it was, and all the station was struck with mourning. A chance bullet, which most likely had been fired without any purpose at all, had done its appointed office in Major Ochterlony's brave, tender, honest bosom. Though he had been foolish enough by times, nobody now thought of that to his disadvantage. Rather, if anything, it surrounded him with a more affectionate regret. A dozen wise men might have perished, and not left such a gap behind them as the Major did, who had been good to everybody in his restless way, and given a great deal of trouble, and made up for it, as only a man with a good heart and natural gift of friendliness could do. He had worried his men many a time as the Colonel never did, for example: but then, to Major Ochterlony they were men and fine fellows, while they were only machines, like himself, to Colonel

Kirkman; and more than one critic in regimentals was known to say with a sigh, "If it had only been the Colonel." But it was only the fated man who had been so over careful about his wife's fate in case anything happened to him. Young Askell came by stealth like a robber to take his little wife out of the house where Mary was not capable any longer of her society; and Captain Hesketh too had come back all safe—all of them except the one: and the women in their minds stood round Mary in a kind of hushed circle, looking with an awful fellow-feeling and almost self-reproach at the widowhood which might have, but had not, fallen upon themselves. It was no fault of theirs that she had to bear the cross for all of them as it were; and yet their hearts ached over her, as if somehow they had purchased their own exemption at her expense. When the first dark moment, during which nobody saw the Madonna Mary—a sweet title, which had come back to all their lips in the hour of trouble—was over, they took turns to be with her, those grieved and compunctious women—compunctious not so much because at one time in thought they had done her wrong, as because now they were happy and she was sorrowful. And thus passed over a time that cannot be described in a book, or at least in such a book as this. Mary had to separate herself, with still the bloom of her life unimpaired, from all the fair company of matrons round her; to put the widow's veil over the golden reflections in her hair, and the faint colour that came faintly back to her cheek by impermissible right of her health and comparative youth, and to go away but of the high-road of life where she had been way-faring in trouble and in happiness, to one of those humble by-ways where the feeble and broken take shelter. Heaven knows she did not think of that. All that she thought of was her dead soldier who had gone away in the bloom of his days to the unknown darkness which God alone knows the secrets of, who had left all his comrades uninjured and at peace behind him, and had himself been the only one to answer for that enterprise with his life. It is strange to see this wonderful selection going on in the world, even when one has no immediate part in it; but stranger, far stranger, to wake up from one's musings and feel all at once that it is one's-self whom God has laid his hand upon for this stern purpose. The wounded creature may writhe upon the sword, but it is of no use; and again as ever, those who are not wounded—those perhaps for whose instruction the spectacle is made—draw round in a hushed circle and look on. Mary Ochterlony was a dutiful woman, obedient and submissive to God's will; and she gave no occasion to that circle of spectators to break up the hush and awe of natural sympathy and criticise her how she bore it. But after a while she came to perceive, what everybody comes to perceive who has been in such a position, that the sympathy had changed its character. That was natural too. How a man bears death and suffering of body, has long been one of the favourite objects of primitive human curiosity; and to see how anguish and sorrow affect the mind is a study as exciting and still more interesting. It was this that roused Mrs. Ochterlony out of her first stupor, and made her decide so soon as she did upon her journey home.

All these events had passed in so short a time, that there were many people who on waking up in the morning and recollecting that Mary and her children were going next day, could scarcely realise that the fact was possible, or that it could be true about the Major, who had so fully intended sending his little boys home by that same mail. But it is on the whole astonishing how soon and how calmly a death is accepted by the general community; and even the people who asked themselves could this change really have happened in so short a time, took pains an hour or two after to make up little parcels for friends at home which Mary was to carry; bits of Oriental embroidery and filagree ornaments, and little portraits of the children, and other trifles that were not important enough to warrant an Overland parcel, or big enough to go by the Cape. Mary was very kind in that way, they all said. She accepted all kinds of commissions, perhaps without knowing very well what she was doing, and promised to go and see people whom she had no likelihood of ever going to see: the truth was, that she heard and saw and understood only partially, sometimes rousing up for a moment and catching one word or one little incident with the intensest distinctness, and then relapsing back again into herself. She did not quite make out what Emma Askell was saying the last time her little friend came to see her. Mary was packing her boys' things at the moment, and much occupied with a host of cares, and what she heard was only a stream of talk, broken with the occasional burden which came in like a chorus, "when you see mamma."

"When I see mamma?" said Mary, with a little surprise.

"Dear Mrs. Ochterlony, you said you would perhaps go to see her—in St. John's Wood," said Emma, with tears of vexation in her eyes; "you know I told you all about it. The Laburnums, Acacia Road. And she will be so glad to see you. I explained it all, and you said you would go. I told her how kind you had been to me, and how you let me stay with you when I was so anxious about Charlie. Oh, dear Mrs. Ochterlony, forgive me! I did not mean to bring it back to your mind."

"No," said Mary, with a kind of forlorn amusement. It seemed so strange, almost droll, that they should think any of their poor little passing words would bring that back to her which was never once out of her mind, nor other than the centre of all her thoughts. "I must have been dreaming when I said so, Emma; but if I have promised, I will try to go—I have nothing to do in London, you know—I am going to the North-country, among my own people," which was an easier form of expression than to say, as they all did, that she was going home.

"But everybody goes to London," insisted Emma; and it was only when Mr. Churchill came in, also with a little packet, that the ensign's wife was silenced. Mr. Churchill's parcel was for his mother who lived in Yorkshire, naturally, as Mrs. Ochterlony was going to the North, quite in her way. But the clergyman, for his part, had something more important to say. When Mrs. Askell was gone, he stopped Mary in her packing to speak to her seriously as he said, "You will forgive me and feel for me, I know," he said. "It is about your second marriage, Mrs. Ochterlony."

"Don't speak of it—oh, don't speak of it," Mary said, with an imploring tone that went to his heart.

"But I ought to speak of it—if you can bear it," said Mr. Churchill, "and I know for the boys' sake that you can bear everything. I have brought an extract from the register, if you would like to have it; and I have added below"—

"Mr. Churchill, you are very kind, but I don't want ever to think of that," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "I don't want to recollect now that such a thing ever took place—I wish all record of it would disappear from the face of the earth. Afterwards he thought the same," she said, hurriedly. Meanwhile Mr. Churchill stood with the paper half-drawn from his pocket-book, watching the changes of her face.

"It shall be as you like," he said, slowly, but only as I have written below—if you change your mind, you have only to write to me, my dear Mrs. Ochterlony—if I stay here—and I am sure I don't know if I shall stay here; but in case I don't, you can always learn where I am, from my mother at that address."

"Do you think you will not stay here?" said Mary, whose heart was not so much absorbed in her own sorrows that she could not feel for the dismayed desponding mind that made itself apparent in the poor clergyman's voice.

"I don't know," he said, in the dreary tones of a man who has little choice, "with our large family, and my wife's poor health—I shall miss you dreadfully—both of you: you can't think how cheery and hearty he always was—and that to a down-hearted man like me"—

And then Mary sat down and cried. It went to her heart and dispersed all her heaviness and stupor, and opened the great sealed fountains. And Mr. Churchill once more felt the climbing sorrow in his throat, and said, in broken words, "Don't cry—God will take care of you. He knows why He has done it, though we don't; and He has given his own word to be a father to the boys."

That was all the poor priest could find it in his heart to say—but it was better than a sermon—and he went away with the extract from the register still in his pocket-book and tears in his eyes; while for her part Mary finished her packing with a heart relieved by her tears. Ah, how cheery and hearty he had been, how kind to the down-hearted man; how different the stagnant quietness now from that cheerful commotion he used to make, and all the restless life about him; and then his favorite words seemed to come up about and surround her, fitting in the air with a sensation between acute torture and a dull happiness. His bonnie Mary! It was not any vanity on Mary's part that made her think above all of that name. Thus she did her packing and got ready for her voyage, and took the good people's commissions without knowing very well to what it was that she pledged herself; and it was the same mail—"the mail after next"—by which she had written to Aunt Agatha that Hugh was to be sent home.

They would all have come to see her off if they could have ventured to do it that last morning: but the men prevented it, who are good for something now and then in such cases. As it was, however, Mrs. Kirkman and Mrs. Heeketh and Emma Askell were there, and poor sick Mrs. Churchill, who had stolen from her bed in her dressing-gown to kiss Mary for the last time. "Oh, my dear, if it had been me—oh, if it had only been me!—and you would all have been so good to the poor children," sobbed the poor clergyman's ailing wife. Yet it was not her, but the strong, brave, cheery Major, the prop and pillar of a house. As for Mrs. Kirkman, there never was a better proof that she was, as we have so often said, in spite of her talk, a good woman, than the fact that she could only cry helplessly over Mary, and had not a word to say. She had thought and prayed that God would not leave her friend alone, but she had not meant Him to go so far as this; and her heart ached and fluttered at the terrible notion that perhaps she had something to do with the striking of this terrible blow. Mrs. Hesketh for her part packed every sort of dainties for the children in a basket, and strapped on a bundle of portable toys to amuse them on the journey, to one of Mrs. Ochterlony's box. "You will be glad of them before you get there," said the experienced woman, who had once made the journey with half-a-dozen, as she said, and knew what it was. And then one or two of the men were walking about outside in an accidental sort of way, to have a last look of Mary. It was considered a very great thing among them all when the doctor, who hated to see people in trouble, and disapproved of crying on principle, made up his mind to go in and shake hands with Mrs. Ochterlony; but it was not that he went for, but to look at the baby, and give Mary a little case "with some sal volatile and so forth, and the quantities marked," he said, "not that you are one to want sal volatile. The little shaver there will be all right as soon as you get to England. Good-bye. Take care of yourself." And he wrung her hand and bolted out again like a flash of lightning. He said afterwards that the only sensible thing he knew of his sister, was that she did not go; and that the sight of all those women crying was enough to give man a sunstroke, not to speak of the servants and the soldiers' wives who were howling at the back of the house.

Oh, what a change it was in so short a time, to go out of the Indian home, which had been a true home, with Mr. Churchill to take care of her and her poor babies, and set her face to the cold far-away world of her youth which she had forgotten and which everybody called home by a kind of mockery; and where was Hugh, who had always taken such care of his own?

Mary did not cry as people call crying, but now and then, two great big hot tears rolled out of the bitter fountain that was full to overflowing, and fell scalding on her hands, and gave her a momentary sense of physical relief. Almost all the ladies of the station were ill after it all the day; but Mary could not afford to be ill; and Mr. Churchill was very kind, and went with her through all the first part of her journey over the cross roads, until she had come into the trunk road, where there was no more difficulty. He was very, very kind, and she was very grateful; but yet perhaps when you have had some one of your very own to do everything for you, who was not kind but did it by nature, it is better to take to doing it yourself after, than have even the best of friends to do it for kindness' sake. This was what Mary felt when the good man had gone sadly back to his sick wife and his uncertain lot. It was a kind of relief to her to be all alone, entirely alone with her children, for the Ayah, to be sure, did not count—and to have everything to do; and this was how they came down mournfully to the seaboard, and to the big town which filled Hugh and Islay with childish enjoyment, and Mary bade an everlasting farewell to her life, to all that she had actually known as life—and got to sea, to go, as they said, home.

It would be quite useless for our purpose to go over the details of the voyage, which was like other voyages, bad and good by turns. When she was at sea, Mrs. Ochterlony had a little leisure, and felt ill and weak and overworn, and was the better for it after. It took her mind for the moment off that unmeasured contemplation of her sorrow which is the soul of grief, and her spirit got a little strength in the interval of repose. She had been twelve years in India, and from eighteen to thirty is a wonderful leap in a life. She did not know how she was to find the things and the people of whom she had a girl's innocent recollection. Nor how they, who had not changed, would appear to her changed eyes. Her own people were very kind, like everybody. Mary found a letter at Gibraltar from her brother-in-law, Francis, full of sympathy and friendly offers. He asked her to come to Earlston with her boys to see if they could not get on together. "Perhaps it might not do, but it would be worth a trial," Mr. Ochterlony sensibly said; and there was even a chance that Aunt Agatha, who was to have met Hugh at Southampton, would come to meet her widowed niece, who might be supposed to stand still more in need of her good offices. Though indeed this was rather an addition to Mary's cares; for she thought the moment of landing would be bitter enough of itself, without the pain of meeting with some one who belonged to her, and yet did not belong to her, and who had doubtless grown as much out of the Aunt Agatha of old as she had grown out of the little Mary. When Mrs. Ochterlony left the North country, Aunt Agatha had been a middle-aged maiden lady, still pretty, though a little faded, with light hair growing gray, which makes a woman's countenance, already on the decline, more faded still, and does not bring out the tints as dark hair in the same powdery condition sometimes does. And at that time she was still occupied by a thought of possibilities which people who knew Agatha Seton from the time she was sixteen had decided at that early period to be impossible. No doubt twelve years had changed this — and it must have made a still greater change upon the little sister whom Mary had known only at six years old, and who was now eighteen, the age she had herself been when she married; a grown-up young woman, and of a character more decided than Mary's had ever been.

A little stir of reviving life awoke in her, when the weary journey was over, and the steamboat at length had reached Southampton, to go up to the deck and look from beneath the heavy penthouse of her widow's veil at the strangers who were coming — to see, as she said to herself, with a throb at her heart, if there was anybody she knew. Aunt Agatha was not rich, and it was a long journey, and perhaps she had not come. Mary stood on the crowded deck, a little apart, with Hugh and Islay on each side of her, and the baby in his nurse's arms — a group such as is often seen on these decks — all clad with loss and mourning coming "home" to a country in which perhaps they have no longer any home. Nobody came to claim Mrs. Ochterlony as she stood among her little children. She thought she would have been glad of it, but when it came to the moment — when she saw the cold unknown shore and the strange country, and not a Christian soul to say welcome, poor Mary's heart sank. She sat down, for her strength was failing her, and drew Hugh and Islay close to her, to keep her from breaking down altogether. And it was just at that moment that the brightest of young faces peered down under her veil, and looked doubtfully, anxiously at her, and called out impatiently, "Aunt Agatha!" to some one at the other side, without speaking to Mary. Mrs. Ochterlony did not hear this new-comer's equally impatient demand: "Is it Mary? Are those the children?" for she had dropped her sick head upon a soft old breast, and had an old fresh sweet faded face bent down upon her, lovely with love and age and a pure heart. "Cry, my dear love, cry, it will do you good," was all that Aunt Agatha said. And she cried, too, with good-will, and yet did not know whether it was for sorrow or joy. This was how Mary, coming back to a fashion of existence which she knew not, was taken home.

LINES FOR THE DAY.

Delivered at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, February 22, 1866, by Colonel C. G. Halpine, at the Festival given by the Military Order of the Loyal Legion in Honor of Washington's Birthday — the Proceeds being devoted to Found a Home for the Disabled Soldiers and Sailors of the Recent War.

FOREVER past the days of gloom,
The long, sad days of doubt and fear,
When woman, by her idle loom,
Heard the dread battle's nearing boom
With clasped hands and straining ear;
While each new hour the past pursues
With further threat of loss and pain,
Till the sick senses would refuse
To longer drink the bloody news
That told of sons and brothers slain.

The days of calm at length are won,
And, sitting thus, with folded hands,
We talk of great deeds greatly done,
While all the future seems to run
A silvery tide o'er golden sands.
With pomp the votive sword and shield
The saviours of the land return;
And while new shrines to Peace we build,
On our great banner's azure field
Yet larger constellations burn!

Who bore the flag — who won the day?
The young, proud manhood of the land,
Called from the forge and plow away,
They seized the weapons of the fray
With eager but untutored hand;
They swarmed o'er all the roads that led
To where the peril hottest burned —
By night, by day, their hurrying tread
Still Southward to the struggle sped,
Nor ever from their purpose turned.

Why tell how long the contest hung,
 Now crowned with hope and now depressed ;
 And how the varying balance swung,
 Until, like gold in furnace flung,
 The truth grew stronger for the test ?
 'Twas our own blood we had to meet ;
 'Twas with full peers our swords were crossed,
 Till in the march, assault, retreat,
 And in the school of stern defeat
 We learned success at bloody cost.

Oh, comrades of camp and deck,
 All that is left by pitying Fate
 Of those who bore through fire and wreck,
 With sinewy arm and stubborn neck
 His flag whose Birth we celebrate !
 Oh, men, whose names, forever bright
 On history's golden tablets graven —
 By land, by sea who waged the fight,
 What guerdon will you ask to-night
 For service done, for perils braved ?

The charging lines no more we see,
 No more we hear the din of strife ;
 Nor under every greenwood tree,
 Stretched in their life's great agony,
 Are those who wait the surgeon's knife ;
 No more the dreaded stretchers drip,
 The jolting ambulances groan ;
 No more, while all the senses slip,
 We hear from the soon silent lip
 The prayer for death as balm alone !

And ye who, on the sea's blue breast,
 And down the rivers of the land,
 With clouds of thunder as a crest,
 Where still your conquering prowls were pressed,
 War's lightnings wielded in your hand !
 Ye, too, released, no longer feel
 The threat of battle, storm and rock —
 Torpedoes grating on the keel,
 While the strained sides with broadsides reel.
 And turrets feel the dinging shock.

Joint Saviours of the Land ! To-day
 What guerdon ask you of the land ?
 No boon too great for you to pray —
 What can it give that could repay
 The men we miss from our worn band ?
 The men who lie in trench and swamp,
 The dead who rock beneath the wave —
 The brother-souls of march and camp,
 Bright spirits — each a shining lamp,
 Teaching our children to be brave !

And thou — Great Shade ! in whom was nursed
 The germ and grandeur of our land —
 In peace, in war, in reverence first,
 Who taught our infancy to burst
 The tightening yoke of Britain's hand !
 Thou, too, from thy celestial height
 Will join the prayer we make to-day —
 " Homes for the crippled in the fight,
 And what of life is left, made bright
 By all that gratitude can pay."

Teach these who loil in gilded seats,
 With nodding plume and jeweled gown,
 Boasting a pedigree that dates
 Back to the men who swayed the fates
 When thou wert battling Britain's crown,
 That ere the world a century swims
 Through time — this poor, blue-coated host,
 With brevet-rank of shattered limbs,
 Will swell the fame in choral hymns
 And be of pride the proudest boast !

Homes for the men we ask, implore ;
 The brave who limbe and vigor gave,
 That North and South, from shore to shore,
 One free, rich, boundless country o'er,
 The flag of WASHINGTON should wave !
 The flag that first — the day recall —
 Long years ago, one summer morn,
 Flashed up o'er Independence Hall,
 A meteor-messenger to all,
 That a new Nation here was born !

Oh, wives and daughters of the land !
 To every gentler impulse true,
 To you we raise the invoking hand,
 Take pity on our stricken band,
 These Demi-gods disguised in Blue !
 More sweet than coo of pairing birds
 Your voice when urging gentle deeds,
 And power and beauty clothe her words —
 A West-wind through the heart's thrilled chords
 When woman's voice for pity pleads.

To you I leave the soldier's doom,
 Your glistening eyes assure me right ;
 Oh, think through many nights of gloom,
 When round you all was light and bloom,
 And he preparing for the fight,
 The soldier bade his fancy roam
 Far from the foe's battalions proud —
 From camps, and hot steeds champing foam,
 And fondly on your breast at home
 The forehead of his spirit bowed !

Oh, by the legions of the Dead,
 Whose ears e'en yet our love may reach —
 Whose souls, in fight or prison fled,
 Now swarm in column overhead,
 Winged with fire my faltering speech ; —
 From stricken fields and ocean caves
 I hear their voice and cry instead — " Gazing upon our myriad graves,
 Be generous to the crippled braves
 Who were the Comrades of the Dead !"

Our cause was holy to the height
 Of holiest cause to manhood given ;
 For Peace and Liberty to smite,
 And while the warm blood bounded bright,
 For these to die, if called by Heaven !
 The dead are cared for — in the clay
 The grinning skull no laurel seeks ;
 But for the wounded of the fray,
 It is through my weak lips to-day
 The ORDER OF THE LEGION speaks !

From the Corahill Magazine.

MY COUNTRYMEN.

ABOUT a year ago, the Saturday Review published an article which gave me, as its articles often do give me, much food for reflection. The article was about the unjust estimate which, says the Saturday Review, I form of my countrymen, and about the indecency of talking of "British Philistines." It appears that I assume the truth of the transcendental system of philosophy, and then lecture my wiser countrymen because they will not join me in recognizing as eternal truths a set of platitudes which may be proved to be false. "Now there is in England a school of philosophy which thoroughly understands, and, on theoretical grounds, deliberately rejects, the philosophical theory which Mr. Arnold accuses the English nation of neglecting; and the practical efforts of the English people, especially their practical efforts in the way of criticism, are for the most part strictly in accordance with the principles of that philosophy."

I do not quite know what to say about the transcendental system of philosophy, for I am a mere dabbler in these great matters, and to grasp and hold a system of philosophy is a feat much beyond my strength; but I certainly did talk about British Philistines, and to call people Philistines when they are doing just what the wisest men in the country have settled to be quite right, does seem unreasonable, not to say indecent. Being really the most teachable man alive, I could not help making, after I had read the article in the Saturday Review, a serious return, as the French say, upon myself; and I resolved never to call my countrymen Philistines again till I had thought more about it, and could be quite sure I was not committing an indecency.

I was very much fortified in this good resolution by something else which happened about the same time. Every one knows that the heart of the English nation is its middle class; there had been a good deal of talk, a year ago, about the education of this class, and I, among others, had imagined it was not good, and that the middle class suffered by its not being better. But Mr. Bazley, the Member for Manchester, who is a kind of representative of this class, made a speech last year at Manchester, the middle-class metropolis, which shook me a good deal. "During the last few months," said Mr. Bazley, "there had been a cry that middle-class education ought to receive more attention. He confessed himself very much surprised by the clamour that was raised. He did not think that class need excite the sympathy either of the legislature or the public." Much to the same effect spoke Mr. Miall, another middle-class leader, in the Nonconformist: "Middle-class education seems to be the favourite topic of the hour, and we must confess to a feeling of shame at the nonsense which is being uttered on the subject. It might be thought from what is said, that this section of the community, which has done everything else so well, — which has astonished the world by its energy, enterprise, and self-reliance, which is continually striking out new paths of industry and subduing the forces of nature, — cannot, from some mysterious reason, get their children properly educated." Still more strong were the words of the Daily News (I love to range all the evidence in black and white before me, though it tends to my own discomfiture) about the blunder some of us were making: "All the world knows that the great middle class of this country supplies the mind, the will, and the power for all the great and good things that have to be done, and it is not likely that that class should surrender its powers and privileges in the one case of the training of its own children. How the idea of such a scheme can have occurred to anybody, how it can have been imagined that parents and schoolmasters in the most independent, and active, and enlightened class of English society, how it can have been supposed that the class which has done all the great things that have been done in all departments, will beg the Government to send inspectors through its schools, when it can itself command whatever advantages exist, might seem unintelligible but for two or three considerations." These considerations do not much matter just now; but it is clear how perfectly Mr. Bazley's stand was a stand such as it becomes a representative man like Mr. Bazley to make, and how well the Daily Telegraph might say of the speech: "It was at once grand, genial, national, and distinct;" and the Morning Star of the speaker: "He talked to his constituents as Manchester people like to be talked to, in the language of clear, manly intelligence, which penetrates through sophisms, ignores commonplaces, and gives to conventional illusions their true value. His speech was thoroughly instinct with that earnest good sense which characterizes Manchester, and which, indeed, may be fairly set down as the general characteristic of England and Englishmen everywhere."

Of course if Philistinism is characteristic of the British nation just now, it must in a special way be characteristic of the representative part of the British nation, the part by which the British nation is what it is, and does all its best things, the middle class. And the newspapers, who have so many more means than I of knowing the truth, and who have that trenchant authoritative style for communicating it which makes so great an impression, say that the British middle class is characterized, not by Philistinism, but by enlightenment; by a passion for penetrating through sophisms, ignoring commonplaces, and giving to conventional illusions their true value. Evidently it is nonsense, as the Daily News says, to think that this great middle class which supplies the mind, the will, and the power for all the great and good things that have to be done, should want its schools, the nurseries of its admirable intelligence, meddled with. It may easily be imagined that all this, coming on the top of the Saturday Review's rebuke of me for indecency, was enough to set me meditating; and after a long and painful self-examination, I saw that I had been making a great mistake. I had been breaking one of my own cardinal rules: the rule to keep aloof from practice, and to confine myself to the slow and obscure work of trying to understand things, to see them as they are. So I was suffering deservedly in being taunted with hawking about my nostrums of State schools for a class much too wise to want them, and of an Academy for people who have an inimitable style already. To be sure I had said that schools ought to be things of local, not State, institution and management, and that we ought not to have an Academy; but that makes no difference. I had been meddling with practice, proposing this and that, saying how it might be if we had established this or that. I saw what danger I had been running in thus intruding into a sphere where I have no business, and I resolved to offend in this way no more. Henceforward let Mr. Kinglake belabour the French as he will, let him describe as many tight merciless lips as he likes; henceforward let Educational Homes stretch themselves out in The Times to the crack of doom, let Lord Fortescue bewitch the middle class with ever new blandishments, let any number of Mansion House meetings propound any number of patchwork schemes to avoid facing the real difficulty; I am dumb. I let reforming and instituting alone; I meddle with my neighbour's practice no more. He that is unjust, let him be unjust still, and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still, and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still, and he that is holy, let him be holy still.

This I say as a sincere penitent; but I do not see that there is any harm in my still trying to know and understand things, if I keep humbly to that, and do not meddle with greater matters, which are out of my reach. So having once got into my head this notion of British Philistinism and of the want of clear and large intelligence in our middle class, I do not consider myself bound at once to put away and crush such a notion, as people are told to do with their religious doubts; nor, when the Saturday Review tells me that no nation in the world is so logical as the English nation, and the Morning Star, that our grand national characteristic is a clear intelligence which penetrates through sophisms, ignores commonplaces, and gives to conventional illusions their true value, do I feel myself compelled to receive these propositions with absolute submission as articles of faith, transcending reason; indeed, this would be transcendentalism, which the Saturday Review condemns. Canvass them, then, as mere matters of speculation, I may; and having lately had occasion to travel on the Continent for many months, during which I was thrown in company with a great variety of people, I remembered what Burns says of the profitableness of trying to see ourselves as others see us, and I kept on the watch for anything to confirm or contradict my old notion, in which, without absolutely giving it up, I had begun certainly to be much shaken and staggered.

I must say that the foreign opinion about us is, not at all like that of the Saturday Review and the Morning Star. I know how madly the foreigners envy us, and that this must warp their judgment; I know, too, that this test of foreign opinion can never be decisive; I only take it for what it is worth, and as a contribution to our study of the matter in question. But I do really think that the admirers of our great middle class, which has, as its friends and enemies both agree, risen into such preponderating importance of late years, and now returns the House of Commons, dictates the policy of Ministers, makes the newspapers speak with its voice, and in short governs the country,—I do think, I say, the admirers of this great class would be astounded if they could hear how cavalierly a foreigner treats this country of their making and managing. "It is not so much that we dislike England," a Prussian official, with the graceful tact of his nation, said to me the other day, "as that we think little of her." The Cologne Gazette, perhaps the chief newspaper of Germany, published in the summer a series of letters, much esteemed, I believe, by military men, on the armies of the leading Continental powers. The writer was a German officer, but not a Prussian. Speaking of the false military system followed by the Emperor Nicholas, whose great aim was to turn his soldiers into perfectly drilled machines, and contrasting this with the free play left to the individual soldier in the French system: "In consequence of their purely mechanical training," says this writer, "the Russians, in spite of their splendid courage, were in the Crimean war constantly beaten by the French, nay, decidedly beaten even by the English and the Turks."* Hardly a German newspaper can discuss territorial changes in Europe but it will add, after its remarks on the probable policy of France in this or that event: "England will probably make a fuss, but what England thinks is of no importance." I believe the German newspapers must keep a phrase of that kind stereotyped, they use it so often. France is our very good friend just now, but at bottom our "clear intelligence penetrating through sophisms," and so on, is not held in much more esteem there than in Germany. One of the gravest and most moderate of French newspapers — a newspaper, too, our very good friend, like France herself, into the bargain — broke out lately, when some jealousy of the proposed Cholera Commission in the East was shown on this side the water, in terms which, though less rough than the "great fool" of the Saturday Review, were still far from flattering. "Let us speak to these English the only language they can comprehend. England lives for her trade; Cholera interrupts trade; therefore it is for England's interest to join in precautions against Cholera."

Compliments of this sort are displeasing to remember, displeasing to repeat; but their abundance strikes the attention; and then the happy unconsciousness of those at whom they are aimed, their state of imperturbable self-satisfaction, strikes the attention too, and makes an inquisitive mind quite eager to see its way clearly in this apparent game of cross purposes. For never, surely, was there such a game of cross purposes played. It came to its height when Lord Palmerston died the other day. Lord Palmerston was England; "the best type of our age and country," The Times well called him; he was "a great representative man, emphatically the English Minister;" the interpreter of the wishes of that great middle class of this country which supplies the mind, the will, and the power requisite for all the great and good things that have to be done, and therefore "acknowledged by a whole people as their best impersonation." Monsieur Thiers says of Pitt, that though he used and abused the strength of England, she was the second country in the world at the time of his death, and the first eight years afterwards. That was after Waterloo and the triumphs of Wellington. And that era of primacy and triumphs Lord Palmerston, say the English newspapers, has carried on to this hour. "What Wellington was as a soldier, that was Palmerston as a statesman." When I read these words in some foreign city or other, I could not help rubbing my eyes and asking myself if I was dreaming. Why, taking Lord Palmerston's career from 1830 (when he first became Foreign Secretary) to his death, there cannot be a shadow of doubt, for any one with eyes and ears in his head, that he found England the first Power in the world's estimation, and that he leaves her the third, after France and the United States. I am no politician; I mean no disparagement at all to Lord Palmerston, to whose talents and qualities I hope I can do justice; and indeed it is not Lord Palmerston's policy, or any Minister's policy, that is in question here, it is the policy of all, it is the policy of England; for in a government such as ours is at present, it is only, as we are so often reminded, by interpreting public opinion, by being "the best type of his age and country," that a Minister governs; and Lord Palmerston's greatness lay precisely in our all "acknowledging him as our best impersonation." Well, then, to this our logic, our practical efforts in the way of criticism, our clear manly intelligence penetrating through sophisms and ignoring common-places, and above all, our redoubtable phalanx possessing these advantages in the highest degree, our great middle class, which makes Parliament, and which supplies the mind, the will, and the power requisite for all the great and good things that have to be done, have brought us; to the third place in the world's estimation, instead of the first. He who disbelieves it, let him go round to every embassy in Europe and, ask if it is not true.

The foreigners, indeed, are in no doubt as to the real authors of the policy of modern England; they know that ours is no longer a policy of Pitts and aristocracies, disposing of every movement of the hoodwinked nation to whom they dictate it; they know that our policy is now dictated by the strong middle part of England,—England happy, as Mr. Lowe, quoting Aristotle, says, in having her middle part strong and her extremes weak; and that, though we are administered by one of our weak extremes, the aristocracy, these managers administer us, as a weak extreme naturally must, with a nervous attention to the wishes of the strong middle part, whose agents they are. It was not the aristocracy which made the Crimean war; it was the strong middle part—the constituencies. It was the strong middle part which showered abuse and threats on Germany for mishandling Denmark; and when Germany gruffly answered, Come and stop us, slapped its pockets, and vowed that it had never had the slightest notion of pushing matters so far as this. It was the strong middle part which, by the voice of its favourite newspapers, kept threatening Germany, after she had snapped her fingers at us, with a future chastisement from France, just as a smarting school-boy threatens his bully with a drubbing to come from some big boy in the background. It was the strong middle part, speaking through the same newspapers, which was full of coldness, slight, and sermons for the American Federals during their late struggle; and as soon as they had succeeded, discovered that it had always wished them well, and that nothing was so much to be desired as that the United States, and we, should be the fastest friends possible. Some people will say that the aristocracy was an equal offender in this respect: very likely; but the behaviour of the strong middle part makes more impression than the behaviour of a weak extreme; and the more so, because from the middle class, their fellows in numberless ways, the Americans expected sympathy, while from the aristocracy they expected none. And, in general, the faults with which foreigners reproach us in the matters named,—rash engagement, intemperate threatening, undignified retreat, ill-timed cordiality,—are not the faults of an aristocracy, by nature in such concerns prudent, reticent, dignified, sensitive on the point of honour; they are rather the faults of a rich middle class,—testy, absolute, ill-acquainted with foreign matters, a little ignoble, very dull to perceive when it is making itself ridiculous.

* Ja, selbst von den Engländern und Türkern entschieden geschlagen.

I know the answer one gets at home when one says that England is not very highly considered just now on the Continent. There is first of all the envy to account for it,—that of course; and then our clear intelligence is making a radical change in our way of dealing with the Continent; the old, bad, aristocratical policy of incessantly intermeddling with the affairs of the Continent,—this it is getting rid of; it is leaving the miserable foreigners to themselves, to their wars, despotisms, bureaucracy, and hatred of free, prosperous England. A few inconveniences may arise before the transition from our old policy to our new is fairly accomplished, and we quite leave off the habit of meddling where our own interests are not at stake. We may be exposed to a little mortification in the passage, but our clear intelligence will discern any occasion where our interests are really at stake. Then we shall come forward and prove ourselves as strong as ever; and the foreigners, in spite of their envy, know it. But what strikes me so much in all which these foreigners say is, that it is just this clear intelligence of ours that they appear at the present moment to hold cheap. Englishmen are often heard complaining of the little gratitude foreign nations show them for their sympathy, their good-will. The reason is, that the foreigners think that an Englishman's good-will to a foreign cause, or dislike to it, is never grounded in a perception of its real merits and bearings, but in some chance circumstance. They say the Englishman never, in these cases, really comprehends the situation, and so they can never feel him to be in living sympathy with them. I have got into much trouble for calling my countrymen Philistines, and all through these remarks I am determined never to use that word; but I wonder if there can be anything offensive in calling one's countryman a young man from the country. I hope not; and if not, I should say, for the benefit of those who have seen Mr. John Parry's amusing entertainment, that England and Englishmen, holding forth on some great crisis in a foreign country,—Poland, say, or Italy,—are apt to have on foreigners very much the effect of the young man from the country who talks to the nursemaid after she has upset the perambulator. There is a terrible crisis, and the discourse of the young man from the country, excellent in itself, is felt not to touch the crisis vitally. Nevertheless, on he goes; the perambulator lies a wreck, the child screams, the nursemaid wrings her hands, the old gentleman storms, the policeman gesticulates, the crowd thickens; still, that astounding young man talks on, serenely unconscious that he is not at the centre of the situation.

Happening to be much thrown with certain foreigners, who criticised England in this sort of way, I used often to think what a short and ready way one of our hard-hitting English newspapers would take with these scorners, if they fell into its hands. But being myself a mere seeker for truth, with nothing trenchant or authoritative about me, I could do no more than look shocked and begin to ask questions. "What!" I said, "you hold the England of to-day cheap, and declare that we do not comprehend the situation; yet you rate the England of 1815 so high, and call our fathers and grandfathers the foremost people in Europe. Did they comprehend the situation better than we?" "Yes," replied my foreign friends, "the situation as they had it, a great deal better. Their time was a time for energy, and they succeeded in it perfectly. Our time is a time for intelligence, and you are not succeeding in it at all."

Though I could not hear without a shudder this insult to the earnest good sense which, as the Morning Star says, may be fairly set down as the general characteristic of England and Englishmen everywhere, yet I pricked up my ears when my companions talked of energy, and England's success in a time for energy, because I have always had a notion myself that energy — energy with honesty — is England's great force; a greater force to her, even, than her talent for penetrating through sophisms and ignoring commonplaces; so I begged my acquaintances to explain a little more fully to me what they meant. "Nothing can be clearer," they answered. "Your Times was telling you the other day, with the enlightenment it so often shows at present, that instead of being proud of Waterloo and the great war which was closed by it, it really seemed as if you ought rather to feel embarrassed at the recollection of them, since the policy for which they were fought is grown obsolete; the world has taken a turn which was not Lord Castlereagh's, and to look back on the great Tory war is to look back upon an endless account of blood and treasure wasted. Now, that is not so at all. What France had in her head, from the Convention, 'faithful to the principles of the sovereignty of the people, which will not permit them to acknowledge anywhere the institutions militating against it,' to Napoleon, with his 'immense projects for assuring to France the empire of the world,' — what she had in her head, along with many better and sounder notions destined to happier fortune, was supremacy. She had always a vision of a sort of federation of the States of Europe under the primacy of France. Now to this the world, whose progress no doubt lies in the direction of more concert and common purpose among nations, but these nations free, self-impelled, and living each its own life, was not moving. Whoever knocks to pieces a scheme of this sort does the world a service. In antiquity, Roman empire had a scheme of this sort, and much more. The barbarians knocked it to pieces — honour to the barbarians. In the middle ages Frederick the Second had a scheme of this sort. The Papacy knocked it to pieces — honour to the Papacy. In our own century, France had a scheme of this sort. Your fathers knocked it to pieces — honour to your fathers. They were just the people to do it. They had a vigorous lower class, a vigorous middle class, and a vigorous aristocracy. The lower class worked and fought, the middle class found the money, and the aristocracy wielded the whole. This aristocracy was high-spirited, reticent, firm, despising frothy declamation. It had all the qualities useful for its task and time; Lord Grenville's words, as early as 1793: 'England will never consent, that France shall arrogate the power of annulling at her pleasure, and under the pretence of a pretended natural right, the political system of Europe;' these few words, with their lofty strength, contain, as one may say, the prophecy of future success: you hear the very voice of an aristocracy standing on sure ground, and with the stars in its favour. Well, you succeeded, and in 1815, after Waterloo, you were the first power in Europe. 'These people have a secret,' we all said; 'they have discerned the way the world was going, and therefore they have prevailed; while, on the other hand, the "stars in their courses fought against Sisera."' We held you in the greatest respect; we tried to copy your constitutional government; we read your writers. 'After the peace,' says George Sand, 'the literature of Great Britain crossed the straits, and came to reign amongst us.' It reigned in Byron and Scott, voices of the great aristocratical spirit which had just won the victory: Scott expressing its robust, genial conservatism, holding by a thousand roots to the past; Byron its defiant force and indomitable pride.

"We believed in you for a good while; but gradually it began to dawn upon us that the era for which you had had the secret was over, and that a new era, for which you had not the secret, was beginning. The work of the old era was to prevent the formation of a second Roman empire, and to maintain a store of free, rich, various national lives for the future to work with and bring to harmony. This was a work of force, of energy: it was a work for an aristocratical power, since, as you yourself are always saying, aristocracies, poor in ideas, are rich in energy. You were a great aristocratical power, and did it. But then came an era with another work, a work of which it is the great glory of the French Revolution (pardon us for saying so, we know it makes some of your countrymen angry to hear it,) passionately to have embraced the idea: the work of making human life, hampered by a past which it has outgrown, natural and rational. This is a work of intelligence, and in intelligence an aristocratic power, as you know, does not so much shine. Accordingly, since the world has been steadily moving this way, you seem to have lost your secret, and we are gradually ceasing to believe in you. You will say, perhaps, that England is no longer an aristocratical power, but a middle-class power, wielded by an industrial middle class, as the England of your fathers was wielded by a territorial aristocracy. This may be so; and indeed, as the style, carriage, and policy of England have of late years been by no means those of an aristocratical power, it probably is so. But whatever class dictates it, your course, allow us to say, has not of late years been intelligent; has not, at any rate, been successful. And depend upon it, a nation who has the secret of her era, who discerns which way the world is going, is successful, keeps rising. Can you yourselves, with all your powers of self-satisfaction, suppose that the Crimean war raised you, or that your Indian mutiny raised you, or that your attitude in the Italian war raised you, as your performances at the beginning of the century raised you? Surely you cannot. You held your own, if you will; you showed tenacity; you saved yourselves from disaster; but you did not raise yourselves, did not advance one jot. Can you, on the other hand, suppose that your attitude in the Danish business, in the American business, has not lowered you? You are losing the instinct which tells people how the world is going; you are beginning to make mistakes; you are falling out of the front rank. The era of aristocracies is over; nations must now stand or fall by the intelligence of their middle class and their people. The people with you is still an embryo; no one can yet quite say what it will come to. You lean, therefore, with your whole weight upon the intelligence of your middle class. And intelligence, in the true sense of the word, your middle class has absolutely none."

I was aghast. I thought of this great class, every morning and evening extolled for its clear, manly intelligence by a hundred vigorous and influential writers; and though the fine enthusiasm of these writers had always seemed to me to be carrying them a little too far, and I had even been guilty of the indecency of now and then calling my countrymen Philistines, these foreign critics struck me as passing all bounds, and quite out-Heroding Herod. Fortunately I had just received from England a copy of Mr. Lowe's powerful and much-admired speech against Reform. I took it out of my pocket. "Now," said I to my envious, carping foreigners, "just listen to me. You say that the early years of this century were a time for energy, and we did well in them; you say that the last thirty or forty years have been a time for intelligence, and we have done ill in them. Mr. Lowe shall answer you. Here is his reading of our last thirty or forty years' history, as made by our middle-class Parliament, as he calls it; by a Parliament, therefore, filled by the mind and will of this great class whose rule you disparage. Mr. Lowe says: 'The seven Houses of Commons that have sat since the Reform Bill have performed exploits unrivalled, not merely in the six centuries during which Parliament has existed, but in the whole history of representative assemblies.' He says: 'Look at the noble work, the heroic work which the House of Commons has performed within these thirty-five years. It has gone through and revised every institution of the country; it has scanned our trade, our colonies, our laws, and our municipal institutions; everything that was complained of, everything that had grown distasteful, has been touched with success and moderation by the amending hand. And to such a point have these amendments been carried, that when gentlemen come to argue this question, and do all in their power to get up a practical grievance, they fail in suggesting even one.' There is what Mr. Lowe says. You see we have nothing left to desire, absolutely nothing. As Mr. Lowe himself says: 'With all this continued peace, contentment, happiness, and prosperity, — England in its present state of development and civilization, — the mighty fabric of English prosperity, — what can we want more?' Evidently nothing: therefore to propose 'for England to make a step in the direction of democracy is the strangest and wildest proposition ever broached by man.' People talk of America. 'In America the working classes are the masters; does anybody doubt that?' And compare, Mr. Lowe means, England, as the middle class is making her, with America, as the working classes are making her. How entirely must the comparison turn to the advantage of the English middle class! Then, finally, as to the figure we cut in the eyes of the world, our grandeur and our future, here is a crowning sentence, worthy of Lord Macaulay himself, whose style Mr. Lowe enthusiastically admires: 'The destiny of England is in the great heart of England!'"

Mr. Bright had not then made his famous speech about the misdeeds of the Tories, but, if he had, I should certainly have added that our middle class, by these unrivalled exploits of theirs, had not only raised their country to an unprecedented height of greatness, but had also saved our foolish and obstructive aristocracy from being emptied into the Thames.

As it was, however, what I had urged, or rather what I had borrowed from Mr. Lowe, seemed to me exceedingly forcible, and I looked anxiously for its effect on my hearers. They did not appear so much disconcerted as I had hoped. "Undoubtedly," they said, "the coming of your middle class to power was a natural, salutary event, to be blessed, not anathematized. Aristocracies cannot deal with a time for intelligence; their sense is for facts, not ideas. The world of ideas is the possible, the future; the world of aristocracies is the established, the past, which has made their fortune and which they hope to prolong. No doubt your middle class found a great deal of commercial and social business waiting to be done, which your aristocratic governments had left undone, and had no talents for doing. Their talents were for other times and tasks; for curbing the power of the Crown when other classes were too inconsiderable to do it; for managing (if one compares them with other aristocracies) their affairs and their dependants with vigour, prudence, and moderation, during the feudal and patriarchal stage of society; for wielding the force of their country against foreign powers with energy, firmness, and dignity. But then came the modern spirit, the modern time: the notion, as we say, of making human life more natural and rational; or, as your philosophers say, of getting the greatest happiness for the greatest number. Have you succeeded, are you succeeding, in this hour of the many, as your aristocracy succeeded in the hour of the few? You say you are; you point to 'the noble work, the heroic work which the House of Commons has performed within these last thirty-five years; everything that was complained of, everything that had grown distasteful, has been touched with success and moderation by the amending hand.' Allow us to set clap-trap on one side; we are not at one of your public meetings. What is the modern problem? to make human life, the life of society, all through, more natural and rational; to have the greatest possible number of one's nation happy. Here is the standard by which we are to try ourselves and one another now, as national grandeur, in the old regal and aristocratical conception of it, was the standard formerly. Every nation must have wished to be England in 1815, tried by the old standard: must we all wish to be England in 1865, tried by the new standard? Your aristocracy, you say, is as splendid, as fortunate, as enviable as ever: very likely; but all the world cannot be aristocracy. What do you make of the mass of your society, of its vast middle and lower portion? Are we to envy you your common people; is our common people to wish to change places with yours; are we to say that you, more than we, have the modern secret here? Without insisting too much on the stories of misery and degradation which are perpetually reaching us, we will say that no one can mix with a great crowd in your country, no one can walk with his eyes and ears open through the poor quarters of your large towns, and not feel that your common people, as it meets one's eyes, is at present more raw, to say the very least, less enviable-looking, further removed from civilized and humane life, than the common people almost anywhere. Well, then, you are not a success, according to the modern standard, with your common people. Are you a success with your middle class? They have the power now; what have they made of themselves? what sort of a life is theirs? A life more natural, more rational, fuller of happiness, more enviable, therefore, than the life of the middle classes on the Continent? Yes, you will say, because the English middle class is the most industrious and the richest. But it is just here that you go a great deal too fast, and so deceive yourselves. What brings about, or rather tends to bring about, a natural, rational life, satisfying the modern spirit? This: the growth of a love of industry, trade, and wealth; the growth of a love of the things of the mind; and the growth of a love of beautiful things. There are body, intelligence, and soul all taken care of. Of these three factors of modern life, your middle class has no notion of any but one, the first. Their love of industry, trade, and wealth, is certainly prodigious; and their example has done us a great deal of good: we, too, are beginning to get this love, and we wanted it. But what notion have they of anything else? Do but look at them, look at their lives. Some of us know your middle class very well; a great deal better than your own upper class in general knows them. Your middle class is educated, to begin with, in the worst schools of your country, and our middle class is educated in the best of ours. What becomes of them after that? The fineness and capacity of a man's spirit is shown by his enjoyments; your middle class has an enjoyment in its business, we admit, and gets on well in business and makes money; but beyond that? Drugged with business, your middle class seems to have its sense blunted for any stimulus besides, except religion; it has a religion, narrow, unintelligent, repulsive. All sincere religion does something for the spirit, raises a man out of the bondage of his merely bestial part, and saves him; but the religion of your middle class is the very lowest form of intelligential life which one can imagine as saving. What other enjoyments have they? The newspapers, a sort of eating and drinking which are not to our taste, a literature of books almost entirely religious or semi-religious, books utterly unreadable by an educated class anywhere, but which your middle class consumes, they say, by the hundred thousand; and in their evenings, for a great treat, a lecture on teetotalism or nunneries. Can any life be imagined more hideous, more dismal, more unenviable? Compare it with the life of our middle class as you have seen it on the Rhine this summer, or at Lausanne, or Zurich. The world of enjoyment, so liberalizing and civilizing, belongs to the middle classes there, as well as the world of business; the whole world is theirs, they possess life; in England the highest class seems to have the monopoly of the world of enjoyment, the middle class enjoys itself, as your Shakspeare would say, in hugger-mugger, and possesses life only by reading in the newspapers, which it does devoutly, the doings of great people. Well then, we do not at all want to be as your middle class; we want to learn from it to do business and to get rich, and this we are learning a great deal faster than you think; but we do not, like your middle class, fix our consummation here: we have a notion of a whole world besides not dreamed of in your middle class's philosophy; so they, too, like your common people, seem to us no success. They may be the masters of the modern, time with you, but they are not solving its problem. They cannot see the way the world is going, and the future does not belong to them. Talk of the present state of development and civilization of England, meaning England as they represent it to us! Why, the capital, pressing danger of England, is the barbarism of her middle class; the civilization of her middle class is England's capital, pressing want."

"Well, but," said I, still catching at Mr. Lowe's powerful help, "the Parliament of this class has performed exploits unrivalled not merely in the six centuries during which Parliament has existed, but in the whole history of representative assemblies. The exploits are there: all the reforms we have made in the last five-and-thirty years."

"Let us distinguish," replied the envious foreigners, "let us distinguish. We named three powers — did we not? — which go to spread that rational humane life which is the aim of modern society: the love of wealth, the love of intelligence, the love of beauty. Your middle class, we agreed, has the first; its commercial legislation, accordingly, has been very good, and in advance of that of foreign countries. Not that free-trade was really brought about by your middle class: it was brought about, as important reforms always are, by two or three great men. However, let your middle class, which had the sense to accept free trade, have the credit of it. But this only brings us a certain way. The legislation of your middle class in all that goes to give human life more intelligence and beauty, is no better than was to be expected from its own want of both. It is nothing to say that its legislation in these respects is an improvement upon what you had before; that is not the question; you are holding up its achievements as absolutely admirable, as unrivalled, as a model to us. You may have done — for you — much for religious toleration, social improvement, public instruction, municipal reform, law reform; but the French Revolution and its consequences have done, upon the Continent, a great deal more. Such a spectacle as your Irish Church Establishment you cannot find in France or Germany. Your Irish land-question you hardly dare to face,—Stein settled as threatening a land-question in Prussia. Of the schools for your middle class we have already spoken; while these schools are what they are, while the schools for your poor are maintained in the expensive, unjust, irrational way they are, England is full of endowments and foundations, capable by themselves, if properly applied, of putting your public education on a much better footing. In France and Germany all similar funds are thus employed, having been brought under public responsible management; in England they are left to private irresponsible management, and are, in nine cases out of ten, wasted. You talk of municipal reform; and cities and the manner of life in them have, for the modern business of promoting a more rational and humane life in the great body of the community, incalculable importance. Do you suppose we should tolerate in France, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, your London corporation and London vestries, and London as they make it? In your provincial towns you do better; but even there, do the municipalities show a tenth part either of the intelligence or the care for the ends, as we have laid them down, of modern society, that our municipalities show? Your middle-class man thinks it the highest pitch of development and civilization when his letters are carried twelve times a day from Islington to Camberwell, and from Camberwell to Islington, and if railway-trains run to and fro between them every quarter of an hour. He thinks it is nothing that the trains only carry him from an illiberal, dismal life at Islington to an illiberal, dismal life at Camberwell; and the letters only tell him that such is the life there. A Swiss burgher takes Heaven knows how many hours to go from Berne to Geneva, and his trains are very few; this is an extreme on the other side; but compare the life the Swiss burgher finds or leaves at Berne or Geneva with the life of the middle class in your English towns. Or else you think to cover everything by saying: 'We are free! we are free! Our newspapers can say what they like!' Freedom, like Industry, is a very good horse to ride—but to ride somewhere. You seem to think that you have only got to get on the back of your horse Freedom, or your horse Industry, and to ride away as hard as you can, to be sure of coming to the right destination. If your newspapers can say what they like, you think you are sure of being well advised. That comes of your inaptitude for ideas, and aptitude for clap-trap; you can never see the two sides of a question; never perceive that every human state of things, even a good one, has its inconveniences. We can see the conveniences of your state well enough; and the inconveniences of ours, of newspapers not free, and prefects over-busy; and there are plenty of us who proclaim them. You eagerly repeat after us all we say that redounds to your own honour and glory; but you never follow our example yourselves. You are full of acuteness to perceive the ill influence of our prefects on us; but if any one says to you, in your turn, 'The English system of a great landed aristocracy keeps your lower class a lower class for ever, and materialises and vulgarises your whole middle class,' you stare vacantly at the speaker, you cannot even take in his ideas; you can only blurt forth, in reply, some clap-trap or other about a 'system of such tried and tested efficiency as no other country was ever happy enough to possess since the world was a world.'

I have observed in my travels, that most young gentlemen of our highest class go through Europe, from Calais to Constantinople, with one sentence on their lips, and one idea in their minds, which suffices, apparently, to explain all that they see to them: Foreigners don't wash. No doubt, thought I to myself, my friends have fallen in with some distinguished young Britons of this sort, and had their feelings wounded by them; hence their rancour against our aristocracy. And as to our middle class, foreigners have no notion how much this class, with us, contains; how many shades and gradations in it there are, and how little what is said of one part of it will apply to another. Something of this sort I could not help urging aloud. "You do not know," I said, "that there is broken off, as one may say, from the top of our middle class, a large fragment, which receive the best education the country can give, the same education as our aristocracy; which is perfectly intelligent and which enjoys life perfectly. These men do the main part of our intellectual work, write all our best newspapers; and cleverer people, I assure you, are nowhere to be found."

"Clever enough," was the answer, "but they show not much intelligence, in the true sense of the word,—not much intelligence of the way the world is going. Whether it is that they must try to hit your current public opinion, which is not intelligent; whether it is that, having been, as you say, brought up with your aristocracy, they have been too much influenced by it, have taken, half insensibly, an aristocracy's material standard, and do not believe in ideas; certain it is that their intelligence has no ardour, no plan, leads them nowhere; it is ineffectual. Your intellect is at this moment, to an almost unexampled degree, without influence on the intellect of Europe."

While this was being said, I noticed an Italian, who was one of our party, fumbling with his pocket-book, from whence he presently produced a number of gray newspaper slips, which I could see were English. "Now just listen to me for a moment," he cried, "and I will show you what makes us say, on the Continent, that you English have no sense for logic, for ideas, and that your praise and blame, having no substantial foundation, are worth very little. You remember the famous French pamphlet before our war began in 1859: Napoleon the Third and Italy. The pamphlet appealed, in the French way, to reason and first principles; the upshot of it was this: 'The treaties which bind governments would be invariable only if the world was immovable. A power which should intrench itself behind treaties in order to resist modifications demanded by general feeling would have doubtless on her side an acquired right, but she would have against her moral right and universal conscience.' You English, on the other hand, took your stand on things as they were: 'If treaties are made,' says your Times, 'they must be respected. Tear one, and all are waste paper.' Very well; this is a policy, at any rate, an aristocratical policy; much may be said for it. The Times was full of contempt for the French pamphlet, an essay, as it called it, 'conveying the dreams of an agitator expressed in the language of an academician.' It said: 'No one accustomed to the pithy comments with which liberty notices passing history, can read such a production without complacency that he does not live in the country which produces it. To see the heavy apparatus of an essay brought out to solve a question on which men have corresponded and talked and speculated in the funds, and acted in the most practical manner possible for a month past, is as strange as if we beheld some spectral review,' and so on. Still very well; there is the strong practical man despising theories and reveries. 'The sentiment of race is just now threatening to be exceedingly troublesome. It is to a considerable extent in our days a literary revival.' That is all to the same effect. Then came a hitch in our affairs, and fortune seemed as if she was going to give, as she often does give, the anti-theorists a triumph. 'The Italian plot,' cried The Times, 'has failed. The Emperor and his familiars knew not the moral strength which is still left in the enlightened communities of Europe. To the unanimous and indignant reprobation of English opinion is due the failure of the imperial plots. While silence and fear reign everywhere abroad, the eyes and ears of the Continent are turned continually to these Islands. English opinion has been erected into a kind of Areopagus.' Our business went forward again, and your English opinion grew very stern indeed. 'Sardinia,' said The Times, 'is told very plainly that she has deserted the course by which alone she could hope either to be happy or great, and abandoned herself to the guidance of fatal delusions, which are luring her on to destruction. By cultivating the arts of peace she would have been solving, in the only possible way, the difficult problem of Italian independence. She has been taught by France to look instead to the acquisition of fresh territory by war and conquest. She has now been told with perfect truth by the warning voice of the British Parliament that she has not a moment to lose in retracing her steps, if indeed her penitence be not too late.' Well, to make a long story short, we did not retrace our steps; we went on, as you know; we succeeded; and now let us make a jump from the spring to the autumn. Here is your unanimous English opinion, here is your Areopagus, here is your Times, in October: 'It is very irregular (Sardinia's course), it is contrary to all diplomatic forms. Francis the Second can show a thousand texts of international law against it. Yes; but there are extremities beyond all law, and there are laws which existed before even society was formed. There are laws which are implanted in our nature, and which form part of the human mind,' and so on. Why, here you have entirely boxed the compass and come round from the aristocratical programme to the programme of the French pamphlet, 'the dreams of an agitator in the language of the rhetorician!' And you approved not only our present but our past, and kindly took off your ban of reprobation issued in February. 'How great a change has been effected by the wisely courageous policy of Sardinia! The firmness and boldness which have raised Italy from degradation form the enduring character of a ten years' policy. King Victor Emmanuel and his sagacious counsellor have achieved success by remembering that fortune favours the bold.' There you may see why the mind of France influences the Continent so much and the mind of England so little. France has intelligence enough to perceive the ideas that are moving, or are likely to move, the world; she believes in them, sticks to them, and shapes her course to suit them. You neither perceive them nor believe in them, but you play with them like counters, taking them up and laying them down at random, and following really some turn of your imagination, some gust of liking or disliking. When I heard some of your countrymen complaining of Italy and her ingratitude for English sympathy, I made, to explain it, the collection of those extracts and of a good many more. They are all at your service; I have some here from the Saturday Review, which you will find exactly follow suit with those from The Times." "No, thank you," I answered, "The Times is enough. My relations with the Saturday Review are rather tight-stretched, as you say here, already; make me a party to none of your quarrels with them."

After this my original tormentor once more took up his parable. "You see now what I meant," he said, "by saying that you did better in the old time, in the day of aristocracies. An aristocracy has no ideas, but it has a policy, — to resist change. In this policy it believes, it sticks to it; when it is beaten in it, it holds its tongue. This is respectable, at any rate. But your great middle class, as you call it, your present governing power, having no policy, except that of doing a roaring trade, does not know what to be at in great affairs, — blows hot and cold by turns, — makes itself ridiculous in short. It was a good aristocratical policy to have helped Austria in the Italian war; it was a good aristocratical policy to have helped the South in the American war. The days of aristocratical policy are over for you; with your new middle-class public opinion you cut, in Italy, the figure our friend here has just shown you; in America you scold right and left, you get up a monster memorial to deprecate the further effusion of blood; you lament over the abridgment of civil liberty by people engaged in a struggle for life and death, and meaning to win; and when they turn a deaf ear to you and win, you say, 'Oh, now let us be one great united Anglo-Saxon family and astonish the world.' This is just of a piece with your threatening Germany with the Emperor of the French. Do you not see that all these blunders dispose the Americans, who are very shrewd, and who have been succeeding as steadily as you have been failing, to answer: 'We have got the lead, no thanks to you, and we mean to astonish the world without you.' Unless you change, unless your middle class grows more intelligent, you will tell upon the world less and less, and end by being a second Holland. We do not hold you cheap for saying you will wash your hands of all concerns but your own, that you do not care a rush for influence in Europe; though this sentence of your Lord Bolingbroke is true: 'The opinion of mankind, which is fame after death, is superior strength and power in life.' We hold you cheap because you show so few signs, except in the one department of industry, of understanding your time and its tendencies, and of exhibiting a modern life which shall be a signal success. And the reaction is the stronger, because, after 1815, we believed in you as now-a-days we are coming to believe in America. You had won the last game, and we thought you had your hand full of trumps, and were going to win the next. Now the game has begun to be played, and we have an inkling of what your cards are; we shrewdly suspect you have scarcely any trumps at all."

I am no arguer, as is well known, "and every puny whisper gets my sword." So, instead of making bad worse by a lame answer, I held my tongue, consoling myself with the thought that these foreigners get from us, at any rate, plenty of Rolands for any stray Oliver they may have the luck to give us. I have since meditated a good deal on what was then said, but I cannot profess to be yet quite clear about it. However, all due deductions made for envy, exaggeration, and injustice, enough stuck by me of these remarks on our logic, criticism, and love of intelligence, to determine me to go on trying (taking care, of course, to steer clear of indecency) to keep my mind fixed on these, instead of singing hosannas to our actual state of development and civilization. The old recipe, to think a little more and bustle a little less, seemed to me still the best recipe to follow. So I take comfort when I find the Guardian reproaching me with having no influence; for I know what influence means, — a party, practical proposals, action; and I say to myself: "Even suppose I could get some followers, and assemble them, brimming with affectionate enthusiasm, in a committee-room at some inn; what on earth should I say to them? what resolutions could I propose? I could only propose the old Soc-ratic commonplace, Know thyself; and how blank they would all look at that!" No; to inquire, perhaps too curiously, what that present state of English development and civilization is, which according to Mr. Lowe is so perfect that to give votes to the working class is stark madness; and, on the other hand, to be less sanguine about the divine and saving effect of a vote on its possessor than my friends in the committee-room at the "Spotted Dog,"—that is my inevitable portion. To bring things under the light of one's intelligence, to see how they look there, to accustom oneself simply to regard the Marylebone Vestry, or the Educational Home, or the Irish Church Establishment, or our railway management, or our Divorce Court, or our gin-palaces open on Sunday and the Crystal Palace shut, as absurdities—that is, I am sure, invaluable exercise for us just at present. Let all persist in it who can, and steadily set their desires on introducing, with time, a little more soul and spirit into the too, too solid flesh of English society,

I have a friend who is very sanguine, in spite of the dismal croakings of these foreigners, about the turn things are even now taking amongst us. "Mean and ignoble as our middle class looks," he says, "it has this capital virtue, it has seriousness. With frivolity, cultured or uncultured, you can do nothing; but with seriousness there is always hope. Then, too, the present bent of the world towards amusing itself, so perilous to the highest class, is curative and good for our middle class. A piano in a Quaker's drawing-room is a step for him to more humane life; nay, perhaps, even the penny gaff of the poor East-Londoner is a step for him to more humane life; it is—what example shall we choose?—it is Strathmore, let us say,—it is the one-pound-eleven-and-sixpenny gaff of the young gentlemen of the clubs and the young ladies of Belgravia, that is for them but a step in the primrose path to the everlasting bonfire. Besides, say what you like of the ideanness of aristocracies, the vulgarity of our middle class, the immaturity of our lower, and the poor chance which a happy type of modern life has between them, consider this: Of all that makes life liberal and humane,—of light, of ideas, of culture,—every man in every class of society who has a dash of genius in him is the boon friend. By his bringing up, by his habits, by his interest, he may be their enemy; by the primitive, unalterable complexion of his nature, he is their friend. Therefore, the movement of the modern spirit will be more and more felt among us, it will spread, it will prevail. Nay," this enthusiast often continues, getting excited as he goes on, "The Times itself, which so stirs some people's indignation—what is The Times, but a gigantic Sancho Panza, to borrow a phrase of your friend Heine;—a gigantic Sancho Panza, following by an attraction he cannot resist that poor, mad, scorned, suffering, sublime enthusiast, the modern spirit; following it, indeed, with constant grumbling, expostulation, and opposition, with airs of protection, of compassionate superiority, with an incessant by-play of nods, shrugs, and winks addressed to the spectators; following it, in short, with all the incurable recalcitrancy of a lower nature, but still following it?" When my friend talks thus, I always shake my head, and say that this sounds very like the transcendentalism which has already brought me into so many scrapes.

I have another friend again (and I am grown so cowed by all the rebuke my original speculations have drawn upon me that I find myself more and more filling the part of a mere listener), who calls himself Anglo-Saxon rather than English, and this is what he says: "We are a small country," he says, "and our middle class has, as you say, not much gift for anything but making money. Our freedom and wealth have given us a great start, our capital will give us for a long time an advantage; but as other countries grow better-governed and richer, we must necessarily sink to the position to which our size and our want of any eminent gift for telling upon the world spiritually, doom us. But look at America; it is the same race; whether we are first or they, Anglo-Saxonism triumphs. You used to say that they had all the Philistinism of the English middle class from which they spring, and a great many faults of their own besides. But you noticed, too, that, blindly as they seemed following in general the star of their god Buncombe, they showed, at the same time, a feeling for ideas, a vivacity and play of mind, which our middle class has not, and which comes to the Americans, probably, from their democratic life, with its ardent hope, its forward stride, its gaze fixed on the future. Well, since these great events have lately come to purge and form them, how is this intelligence of theirs developing itself? Now they are manifesting a quick sense to see how the world is really going, and a sure faith, indispensable to all nations that are to be great, that greatness is only to be reached by going that way and no other? And then, if you talk of culture, look at the culture their middle, and even their working class is getting, as compared with the culture ours are getting. The trash which circulates by the hundred thousand among our middle class has no readers in America; our rubbish is for home-consumption; all our best books, books which are read here only by the small educated class, are in America the books of the great reading public. So over there they will advance spiritually as well as materially; and if our race at last flowers to modern life there, and not here, does it so much matter?" So says my friend, who is, as I premised, a devotee of Anglo-Saxonism; I, who share his pious frenzy but imperfectly, do not feel quite satisfied with these plans of vicarious greatness, and have a longing for this old and great country of ours to be always great in herself, not only in her progeny. So I keep looking at her, and thinking of her, and as often as I consider how history is a series of waves, coming gradually to a head and then breaking, and that, as the successive waves come up, one nation is seen at the top of this wave, and then another of the next, I ask myself, counting all the waves which have come up with England on the top of them: When the great wave which is now mounting has come up, will she be at the top of it? Ille nihil, nec me quarentem vana moratur.

Yes, we arraign her; but she,
The weary Titan, with deaf
Ears, and labour-dimm'd eyes,
Regarding neither to right
Nor left, goes passively by,
Staggering on to her goal;
Bearing, on shoulders immense,
Atlantéan, the load,
Wellnigh not to be borne,
Of the too vast orb of her fate.

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

A VALENTINE OF THE ELIZABETHAN AGE.

(In an old Album, dated 1583.)

WHEN Slumber first unclouds my brain,
And thoughte is free,
And Sense refreshed renews her reigne, —
I thinke of Thee.

When nexte in prayer to God above
I bende my knee,
Then when I pray for those I love, —
I pray for Thee.

And when the duties of the day
Demande of mee
To rise and journey on life's way, —
I work for Thee.

Or if perchance I sing some lay,
Whate'er it bee;
All that the idle verses say, —
They say of Thee.

For if an eye whose liquid lighte
Gleams like the sea,
They sing, or tresses browne and brighte, —
They sing of Thee.

And if a wearie mood, or sad,
Possesses mee,
One thought can all times make mee glad, —
The thoughte of Thee.

And when once more upon my bed,
Full wearily,
In sweet repose I lay my head, —
I dream of Thee.

In short, one only wish I have,
To live for Thee;
Or gladly if one pang 'twould save, —
I'd die for Thee.

From the Spectator, 17 Feb.

NAPOLEON AND ROME.

THE weary observers who, tired with the long supremacy of wrong, declare, like Macaulay, that the Papacy is eternal, have this week received new aliment. It is no longer possible to doubt that the Emperor of the French, in spite of all hints and professions, and even promises, has decided that the temporal power shall continue to exist. When the Convention of September 15 was first announced to the world, it was believed even in Italy that Rome was in September, 1866, to be finally left to itself. The French garrison was to be withdrawn and the Italian army to stand aloof, and the Papacy and the Romans to be left for the first time since 1848 face to face. No one doubted what the result would be. The Romans, in whom hatred of their priestly rulers is scarcely so much an impulse as an instinct, who regulate their lives, and their education, and their occupations with a secret reference to an animosity, would instantly appeal to force, and either expel the Pope, or force him to avoid expulsion by an appeal to Italian arms. The temporal power would end, and Italy regain, if not absolute possession of her capital, at least a practical sovereignty which in time would harden into a right. From the first, however, observers doubted whether this were Napoleon's real design, whether he would so utterly break with the priesthood, so completely relax his grasp upon the throat of the nation he has set free. He was understood to remember keenly the vote of December, 1852, when the peasantry marched in bands with the curés at their head to place him upon the throne. He was understood to dread, though he does not share, the intense dislike of French politicians to the possible growth of a strong and united Italy, able perhaps to enfranchise the Mediterranean, and affect the whole current of European policy in the East. It was known that the idea of federation which produced the treaty of Zurich lies very close to his heart, and Reds, who disbelieve him, pronounced from the first that the Convention was a snare, that its object was to guarantee and not to menace the autonomy of the Papal peculium. As time went on this idea was strengthened by the construction of great works at Civita Vecchia, by the immense collections permitted in France for Peter's Pence, and by the favour shown to Papal projects for the levy of an international garrison for Rome. It was whispered even that the favour extended by Napoleon to La Marmora's Government had its root in the same design, that he upheld that combination in fear lest the supreme moment should find Ricasoli at the helm, and himself compelled to choose between the independence of Italy or an invasion of her territory.

The publication of the Yellow Book of France and the Red Book of Spain has set all theories at rest. It appears from the despatches of the Spanish Ambassador in Paris that the Catholic Powers had at once foreseen the course of the Roman people, and addressed to the Emperor urgent demands for explanation. To all they received substantially the same reply. The French Government, annoyed at savageness with the Encyclical—which has embarrassed them to a degree almost unintelligible to Protestants—refused to inform its questioners as to its course in the event of the Pope making concessions to his people, demanded an absolute liberty of action, but declared that it looked to a separate sovereignty in Rome as indispensable. It pointed significantly to the sacrifices made during sixteen years to protect the Papal chair as proof sufficient of the permanent policy of France. Indeed if M. Mon may be trusted, the Foreign Minister on one occasion went further, and declared that if the temporal power were upset by the Revolution, France would return to Rome; but it is not necessary to rely on a perhaps misapprehended conversation. Late in 1865 the French Government grew alarmed at the result of the Italian elections, which seemed to foreshadow a Chamber resolute to obtain Rome. The Emperor accordingly addressed a new despatch to Florence, and on the 2nd of January of this year M. Sartiges reports the result of his interview with the Italian Premier in the midst of the Cabinet crisis produced by S. Sella's fall. The Premier indignantly repudiated any intention of departing from the Convention, but M. de Sartiges informed him nevertheless that the Parliamentary history of the previous few days—La Marmora had just been turned out—had excited in the calmest minds fears for the future of Italy, that "power seemed about to pass into less conservative hands," and that it was "possible the execution of the Convention might be entrusted to men who had resisted that international act." It was therefore necessary to repeat the inevitable obligations of the Convention, the more so as the Italian press persisted in misrepresenting them. "I stated once more that, contrary to the daily statements of the Italian press, we had intended in signing the Convention of 15th September to assure the co-existence in Italy of two separate sovereignties—that of the Pope reduced to the proportions it possesses to-day, and that of the kingdom of Italy.” He informed him also that the expression “moral means” had been “abused,” and signified for the French Government only conciliation, and the effects of similar interests and of time, which would ultimately produce the reconciliation of a power eminently Catholic with the chief of Catholicism. And finally, M. de Sartiges told the Premier, then in the very throes of a great Parliamentary conflict, that while he remained in power the Imperial Government had certainty, and that even if power passed to men whose ideas were neither those of the Premier nor of the Emperor, France still would not “permit” herself to doubt the strict execution of the treaty!

There, then, is the design of the Emperor at last fully revealed. He does not intend that Rome should become Italian. If the Pope will reconcile himself with Italy, well; even if the reconciliation should involve an Italian garrison in Rome the Emperor will not oppose, will rather point to that consummation as a proof of his wisdom and foresight. But in no case is the temporal power to be overset, or merged in that of the Italian kingdom, in no case is Rome to cease to obey her priestly rulers, under penalty of a declaration that a solemn treaty with France has been violated by Italy, that is, in undiplomatic language, under penalty of war. France is to be relieved of the expense of this great garrison, but Italy is to gain nothing save one more chance of reconciliation with Rome, is never to be relieved from the danger that an independent Sovereign, seated in her midst, may not summon a Frenchman or Austrian back to help him rule. Italy is to be two, not one, and the power which has liberated her assumes to dictate Cabinet combinations agreeable to herself. The idea of Villafranca is to be realized in Rome, and the Papacy, guaranteed by its only imminent foes, is to commence a new career of separate sovereignty. No wonder that the Red party gains ground in Italy. No wonder that Florentine politicians whisper of foreign interference, and that Ministry and Parliament alike seem paralyzed, and that the King fears to dissolve lest the electors should return him a Chamber still more democratic. The one object which lies close to the heart of all Italians, without which Italy must be, as M. Mon wrote to Spain, “Somehow or other a federation,” for which successive Ministries have endured French interference and French dictation with an appearance of good-will, is lost. There is no road to Rome except through force, and what marvel that the party in Italy which believes in force should increase till rumours spread that in the last resort the King, aware that force is for the hour impossible, has resolved to meet Parliamentary opposition by means other than an appeal to the electors? Those rumours are, we believe, unfounded, but the Government, which appears to wish to exist in order to carry out an internal policy, and does exist lest the conduct of foreign affairs should be entrusted to other hands, is of necessity weak.

It is a terrible crisis for Italy; but in Rome, as in Mexico, Napoleon, will, we believe, be baffled. It is the weakness of intellects like his, it is pre-eminently his own weakness, never quite to comprehend the force of a national passion, the solidity of a feeling once engrained in the hearts of a separate people. Four of the great mistakes of his life have been due to this break in the chain of his sympathies. He did not comprehend why, if a British Government was willing to pass a Conspiracy Bill, the British people should be so certain to reject it, for he had never realized to himself the “sacredness,” as a Greek would have called it, of the English horror of foreign dictation. He has been but once defeated in his own Legislature, and it was because he forgot that France would not reason even with him about the creation of majorata. He has wasted millions in Mexico because he did not perceive that the North would be spent, treasure and men, before it would resign its dream of the American future. And now he thinks that with time he can make Italians forget that Rome is theirs. As well might he strive to cancel the Italian past. Without that forgetfulness his policy, wise, and astute, and sure as his courtiers may declare it to be, is but a policy of the hour. A population cannot perish. The Italian population, persistent beyond all human precedent, though patient beyond all Red endurance, will not give up its end, and the defeat of the Napoleonic idea there, as in Mexico, is as certain as that the Italians will survive the Bonaparts. Either an Italian Pope will weary of dependence upon “barbarians,” or the support of Austria will make France perceive that the temporal power injures her, or Napoleon will need the Italian sword, or accident will compel him once more to court the revolution, and in any one of these events the capital will be free. M. de Sartiges has scarcely finished speaking before General della Marmora, who bows to him, tells the Spanish Court, in language almost of menace, that Italy has not pledged, and will not pledge herself, to tolerate the permanent sacrifice of Rome to the interests of the Catholic world, or the meddling of a power other than France in her internal affairs. Every word of his despatch, which is bitter to the last degree, and has been published in the official gazette of Florence, is intended to tell Italy and Napoleon that the Italian Premier only yields to force in abstaining from Rome. As the Premier thinks so thinks the population of Italy. There are among them those who think Rome would not be the better capital, but there is not from the Alps to Sicily one who believes that Rome can justly have an owner other than united Italy. The spring now so sharply pressed down must fly back some day; and when it does, in spite of Popes and Emperors, of the wiles of the Vatican, and the deep-laid schemes of the Tuileries, Rome will be Italian once more.

NIAGARA IN WINTER.

THE 24th of January, 1866, was a white day in my calendar. I passed it amongst the white wonders of the ice of Niagara. For a score or more of years, as old inhabitants assured me, there had been nothing like it. The marvels of the grandest of the glaciers amongst the Alps did not surpass it. In some aspects they did not equal it.

The morning of Saturday, the 20th, was almost summer-like in mildness, and rainy. But before night the weather grew intensely cold, and the wind blew a gale. The morning of the Sabbath saw the waters of the cataract greatly swollen, and huge masses of ice dashing down the abyss. Whole fields of it, cracked and torn in the rapids above, plunged headlong into the awful cauldron, and were then ground and dashed into myriads of fragments. It must have been a magnificent sight.

But what was more marvellous, the ice had become jammed, or was jamming, from shore to shore; so that on the Sabbath, from the very foot of the Falls almost to the Suspension Bridge—two miles—there was one compact mass of it. The narrow channel could not disgorge the masses which had come from the broader surfaces above, and the accumulations, held more firmly by congelation, choked up the outlet; and when the wild waters swept and eddied underneath, the foot of man could pass in safety from the United States to Canada!

But water and ice had not finished their work in building this marble bridge. It must be lifted and torn and ridged. It must have profound fissures, into which one might look with awe, wild hummocks, and broad fields of terrific roughness—roughness which I can equal in memory only by the lava of Vesuvius, freely poured and cooled from the side of the rent crater, and this was effected by continuous accessions of ice, which, coming over the cataract, plunged under the surface, and by the violence of the water, swept onward, lifted the mighty mass bodily on its back. In this way the ice was perhaps from twenty to fifty feet in thickness!

It was thus that I saw it on the 24th. Going at once down, at the inclined plane, to the ferry—just below the cataract—I crossed over to the Canada side on foot, went to Table Rock, passed under the sheet, and came back as I went. Many others were performing the same feat.

It was a glorious morning, clear and brilliant, and a myriad icicles were pendent from every point where precipice projected. Just under Table Rock a vast column had formed, as if to say, "What is left of this ancient stand-point shall never perish!" Beside it was an ice-stalagmite, perhaps two feet and a half in diameter, and just high enough to serve as an altar, and crowned with rounded crystals which might well be taken for crowded garlands. How Nature, in her most fantastic forms, seems to speak of God! Under the Fall, where the rock is hollowed from the above like a scallop-shell, was perhaps the highest concentration of beauty. This was one incrustation of icicles, glittering like diamonds in the sun. Under foot huge banks of ice had formed, inclining inward, so that the footing was more than safe; the only effort needed—to a certain distance—was to keep from sliding away from the water plump against the rocky wall.

Above, in the vicinity of Table Rock, the whole surface was one glare of ice to the very edge of the precipice; and I shuddered at the thought of a careless step plunging one downward to an awful death. At this point the icy spray was pouring like rain, making thicker and thicker the marble sheet which hid the ground.

In going over I had not sighted well my course, and so found myself in a world of whiteness and roughness. But in returning I marked a path where an eddy, apparently, had deposited a semi-circle of finely ground ice, almost from shore to shore; and on this I made the passage homeward with twice the ease that I had gone abroad. Blest is the path over that leads us HOME!

Just under the American Fall, and in front of it, I got a view, the memory of which a life-time could not efface. The spray, freezing as it fell, had built up on the icy foundation a succession of hills, from thirty to fifty feet in height above the surrounding surface. They were beautifully rounded like a sugar loaf, and almost as white. One of these I climbed, and from it looked down into the awful gloom and madness of the plunging water. At my left, half hidden in the mist, was another, and apparently still another. It was at this point that the sense of awe culminated.

Reclimbing the bank, past ice encrusting rock and tree and shrub, ice everywhere, I crossed to Goat Island. The passage to Terapin Tower was barred and marked "Dangerous." But it was barred more effectively by the ice, which so covered the path by which you descend to it, that it was like letting yourself go from the ridge of the roof of a cathedral to start for it. But finding a place where a descent was possible, I let myself down by trees and rocks, and was soon at the Tower. Here, amidst spray and thunder, I caught the final glory. The Sea of Ice was before me; the mad, cold waters rolled and plunged in their awful descent; terror and sublimity held high carnival; while on either hand, arching one from the American and one from the Canada side — as if to whisper of hope and heaven amidst those symbols of perdition and the pit — floated a quivering rainbow. THE LATE RICHARD F. BOND, of the well-known firm of William Bond & Son, chronometer makers, Congress Street, whose death occurred in Cambridge on the 6th of February last, has left behind him a monument, which, although constructed of brass, may well be termed, in the words of the Latin poet, "Ære perennius." This work is a simple, yet wonderfully perfect, clock escapement. His leisure moments had been devoted to its accomplishment for some months, but the finishing touch was given to it only three days before his death. A working model had been constructed under his direction, which was set up by his bed side; at intervals he was enabled to give instruction to one of his workmen, — an intelligent man who entered fully into the interest of the work, — and by frequently-interrupted efforts, it grew steadily and surely to its completion; and at length — for it seemed as though he could not die until this consummation was reached — he could whisper, almost with his dying breath, "it is perfect." And when his eyes were closed in death, the attention of the sorrowing friends who stood or knelt around his bed, was turned from the motionless form beside them to the regular pulsations of the almost living instrument which he had called into action, recording the passing away of moments, which, for him, were no more to be numbered on earth.

Equally gifted with his father and brother, the late lamented Directors of the Cambridge Observatory, it was to his inventive genius that they were indebted for the means of attaining to such accuracy in their observations through the telescope, as to have established, beyond a question, the truth of their discoveries, in opposition to some of the predetermined dicta of the Old World. The Chronograph, or Spring Governor, to which was accorded the bronze medal of the World's Fair in 1851, was Richard Bond's individual invention, though, with the retiring modesty which was part of his character, he was anxious only to attach to it the well-known name of William Bond and Son; and he was happy in the conviction of the world-wide appreciation of the instrument itself, — Europe, Africa, America, and Australia bearing testimony to its perfection. His dying legacy to the scientific world is as perfect as the Chronograph, and worthy of being attached to it as a companion, — a clock escapement which seems almost to have controlled the laws of matter, being wholly divested of friction, hitherto deemed inseparable from mechanical agency.

This escapement is to be immediately attached to an astronomical clock which the firm are now manufacturing for the Observatory in Liverpool, England.

ON THE RELATIONS OF RADIANT HEAT TO CHEMICAL CONSTITUTION, COLOUR, AND TEXTURE.

A LECTURE, DELIVERED IN THE ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN, ON FRIDAY EVENING, 19th JANUARY, 1866.

ONE of the most important functions of physical science, considered as a discipline of the mind, is to enable us by means of the tangible processes of nature to apprehend the intangible. The tangible processes give direction to the line of thought; but this once given, the length of the line is not limited by the boundaries of the senses. Indeed, the domain of the senses in Nature is almost infinitely small in comparison with the vast region accessible to thought which lies beyond them. From a few observations of a comet, when it comes within the range of his telescope, an astronomer can calculate its path in regions which no telescope can reach; and in like manner, by means of data furnished in the narrow world of the senses, we make ourselves at home in other and wider worlds, which can be traversed by the intellect alone.

From the earliest ages the questions, "What is light?" and "What is heat?" have occurred to the minds of men; but these questions never would have been answered had they not been preceded by the question, "What is sound?" Amid the grosser phenomena of acoustics the mind was first disciplined, conceptions being there obtained from direct observation, which were afterwards applied to phenomena of a character far too subtle to be observed directly. Sound we know to be due to vibratory motion. A vibrating tuning-fork, for example, moulds the air around it into undulations or waves, which speed away on all sides with a certain measured velocity, impinge upon the drum of the ear, shake the auditory nerve, and awake in the brain the sensation of sound. When sufficiently near a sounding body we can feel the vibrations of the air. A deaf man, for example, plunging his hand into a bell when it is sounded, feels through the common nerves of his body those tremors which, when imparted to the nerves of healthy ears, are translated into sound. There are various ways of rendering those sonorous vibrations not only tangible but visible; and it was not until numberless experiments of this kind had been executed, that the scientific investigator abandoned himself wholly, and without a shadow of uncertainty, to the conviction that what is sound in us is, outside of us, a motion of the air.

But once having established this fact—once having proved beyond all doubt that the sensation of sound is produced by an agitation of the nerve of the ear, the thought soon suggested itself that light might be due to an agitation of the nerve of the eye. This was a great step in advance of that ancient notion which regarded light as something emitted by the eye, and not as anything imparted to it. But if light be produced by an agitation of the optic nerve or retina, what is it that produces the agitation? Newton, you know, supposed minute particles to be shot through the humours of the eye against the retina, which hangs like a target at the back of the eye. The impact of these particles against the target. Newton believed to be the cause of light. But Newton's notion has not held its ground, being entirely driven from the field by the more wonderful and far more philosophical notion that light, like sound, is a product of wave-motion.

The domain in which this motion of light is carried on lies entirely beyond the reach of our senses. The waves of light require a medium for their formation and propagation, but we cannot see, or feel, or taste, or smell this medium. Still, though thus apparently cut off from all investigation, its existence has been established. How has this been done? By showing that all the phenomena of optics are accounted for with a fullness and clearness and conclusiveness which leave no desire of the intellect unfilled, by the assumption of this wonderful intangible ether. When the law of gravitation first suggested itself to the mind of Newton, what did he do? He set himself to examine whether it accounted for all the facts. He determined the courses of the planets; he calculated the rapidity of the moon's fall towards the earth; he considered the precession of the equinoxes, the ebb and flow of the tides, and found all explained by the law of gravitation. He therefore regarded this law as established, and the verdict of science subsequently confirmed his conclusion. On similar, and, if possible on stronger grounds, we found our belief in the existence of the universal ether. It explains facts far more various and complicated than those on which Newton based his law. If a single phenomenon could be pointed out which the ether is proved incompetent to explain, we should have to give it up; but no such phenomenon has ever been pointed out. It is, therefore, at least as certain that space is filled with a medium by means of which suns and stars diffuse their radiant power, as that it is traversed by that force which holds not only our planetary system, but the immeasurable heavens themselves, in its unconquerable grasp.

There is no more wonderful instance than this of the production of a line of thought from the world of the senses into the region of pure imagination. I mean by imagination here, not that play of fancy which can give to airy nothing a local habitation and a name, but that power which enables the mind to conceive realities which lie beyond the range of the senses—to present to itself distinct physical images of processes which, though mighty in the aggregate beyond all conception, are so minute individually, as to elude all observation. It is the waves of air excited by this tuning-fork which renders its vibrations audible. It is the waves of ether sent forth from those lamps overhead which render them luminous to us; but so minute are these waves, that it would take from 30,000 to 60,000 of them placed end to end to cover a single inch. Their number, however, compensates for their minuteness. Trillions of them have entered your eyes and hit the retina at the back of the eye in the time consumed in the utterance of the shortest sentence of this discourse. This is the steadfast result of modern research; but we never could have reached it without previous discipline. We never could have measured the waves of light, nor even imagined them to exist, had we not previously exercised ourselves among the waves of sound. Sound and light are now mutually helpful, the conceptions of each being expanded, strengthened, and defined by the conceptions of the other.

The ether which conveys the pulses of light and heat not only fills the celestial spaces, bathing the sides of suns and planets, but it also encircles the atoms of which these suns and planets are composed. It is the motion of these atoms, and not of any sensible parts of either planets or stars, that the ether conveys; it is this motion that constitutes the objective cause of what in our sensations are light and heat. An atom, then, sending its pulses through the infinite ether, resembles a tuning-fork sending its pulses through the air. Let us look for a moment at this thrilling ether, and briefly consider its relation to the bodies whose vibrations it conveys. Different bodies, when heated to the same temperature, possess very different powers of agitating the ether: some are good radiators, others are bad radiators; which means that some are so constituted as to communicate their motion freely to the ether, producing therein powerful undulations; while others are unable thus to communicate their motion, but glide through the ether without materially affecting its repose. Experiment has proved that elementary bodies, except under certain anomalous conditions, belong to the class of bad radiators. An atom vibrating in the ether resembles this naked tuning-fork vibrating in the air. The amount of motion communicated to the air by these thin prongs is too small to evoke at any distance the sensation of sound. But if we permit the atoms to combine chemically and form molecules, the result in many cases is an enormous change in the power of radiation. The amount of ethereal disturbance produced by a compound molecule may be many thousand times that produced by its constituent atoms when uncombined. The effect is roughly typified by this tuning-fork when connected with its resonant case. The fork and its case now swing as a compound system, and the vibrations which were before inaudible, are now the source of a musical sound so powerful that it might be plainly heard by thousands at once. The fork and its case combined may be regarded as a good radiator of sound.

A single example will suffice to illustrate the vast influence of the coalescence of atoms to oscillating systems upon the radiation of heat. Supposing a pound of dry oxygen, and also a pound of the transparent vapour of water, to be taken to the top of a high mountain where the air is too attenuated to offer any sensible resistance to the passage of radiant heat towards stellar space; suppose the gas and the vapour to be there heated to the temperature of boiling water, and afterwards exposed beneath the cloudless heaven. By the heating of the gas and vapour a more vigorous motion — a greater amount of vis viva, as we term it — is imparted to the ultimate particles of both. Will the oxygen impart its motion as freely to the ether as the aqueous vapour? No. The difference between them in this respect is enormous. When their temperatures are alike, the amount of heat radiated, or, in other words, of molecular motion lost by the vapour in a given time, is at least nine thousand times the amount lost in the same time by the oxygen. So great is this power on the part of the vapour, that I profoundly doubt the correctness of the simple formula assigned to it by chemists. The molecule of water represents a sound-board of vast dimensions, otherwise it never could generate waves of the extraordinary magnitude that experience has proved it competent to produce.*

The pitch of a musical note depends upon the rapidity of its vibrations, or, in other words, on the length of its waves. Now, the pitch of a note answers to the colour of light. Taking a slice of white light from the beam of an electric lamp, I cause that light to pass through an arrangement of prisms. It is decomposed, and we have the effect obtained by Newton, who first unrolled the solar beam into the splendours of the solar spectrum. At one end of this spectrum we have red light, at the other violet, and between those extremes lie the other prismatic colours. As we advance along the spectrum from the red to the violet, the pitch of the light — if I may use the expression — heightens, the sensation of violet being produced by a more rapid succession of impulses than that which produces the impression of red. The vibrations of the violet are not quite twice as rapid as those of the red; in other words, the range of the visible spectrum is not quite equal to an octave.

There is no solution of continuity in this spectrum; one colour changes into another by insensible gradations. It is as if an infinite number of tuning-forks, of gradually augmenting pitch, were vibrating at the same time. But turning to another spectrum — that, namely, obtained from the incandescent vapour of silver — you observe that it consists of two narrow and intensely luminous green bands. Here it is as if two forks only, of slightly different pitch, were vibrating. The length of the waves which produce this first band is such that 47,460 of them, placed end to end, would fill an inch. The waves which produce the second band are a little shorter; it would take of these 47,920 to fill an inch. In the case of the first band, the number of impulses imparted in one second to every eye which now sees it, is 577 millions of millions; while the number of impulses imparted in the same time by the second band is 600 millions of millions. I now cast upon the screen before you the beautiful stream of green light from which these bands were derived. This luminous stream is the incandescent vapour of silver. You cannot by any possibility render that vapour white hot. The rates of vibration of its atoms are as rigidly fixed as those of two tuning-forks; and to whatever height the temperature of the vapour may be raised, the rapidity of its vibrations, and consequently its colour, which wholly depends upon that rapidity, remain unchanged.

The vapour of water, as well as the vapour of silver, has its definite periods of vibration, and these are such as to disqualify the vapour from being raised to a white heat. The oxyhydrogen flame, for example, consists of hot aqueous vapour. It is scarcely visible in the air of this room, and it would be still less visible if we could burn the gas in a clean atmosphere. But our atmosphere, even at the summit of Mont Blanc, is dirty; in London it is more than dirty; and the burning dirt gives to this flame the greater portion of its present light. But the heat of the flame is enormous. Cast iron fuses at a temperature of 2,000° Fahr.; the temperature of the oxyhydrogen flame is 6,000° Fahr. A piece of platinum is heated to vivid redness at a distance of two inches beyond the visible termination of the flame. The vapour which produces incandescence is here absolutely dark. In the flame itself the platinum is raised to dazzling whiteness, and is finally pierced by the flame. When this flame impinges on a piece of lime, we have the dazzling Drummond light. But the light is here due to the fact that when it impinges upon the solid body, the vibrations excited by the flame are of periods different from its own.

Thus far we have fixed our attention on atoms and molecules in a state of vibration, and surrounded by a medium which accepts their vibrations, and transmits them through infinite space. But suppose the waves gen-

* Bulk for bulk, that wonderful substance ozone probably transcends ordinary oxygen in radiant power a hundred thousand times. This shows that the atoms of an element can be so grouped as to behave towards the ether as a highly complex compound. May not the molecule of water, from which its vast radiant power is derived, be a molecule of molecules, the chemical formula stamping only a single member of the group?

erated by one system of molecules to impinge upon another system, how will the waves be affected? Will they be stopped, or will they be permitted to pass? Will they transfer their motion to the molecules on which they impinge, or will they glide round the molecules, through the intermolecular spaces, and thus escape? The answer to this question depends upon a condition which may be beautifully exemplified by an experiment on sound. These two tuning-forks are tuned absolutely alike. They vibrate with the same rapidity, and mounted thus upon their resonant stands, you hear them loudly sounding the same musical note. I stop one of the forks, and throw the other into strong vibration. I now bring that other near the silent fork, but not into contact with it. Allowing them to continue in this position for four or five seconds, I stop the vibrating fork; but the sound has not ceased. The second fork has taken up the vibrations of its neighbour, and is now surrounded in its turn. I dismount one of the forks, and permit the other to remain upon its stand. I throw the dismounted fork into strong vibration, but you cannot hear it sound. Detached from its stand the amount of motion which it can communicate to the air is too small to make itself sensible to the ear at any distance. I now bring the dismounted fork close to the mounted one, but not into actual contact with it. Out of the silence rises a mellow sound. Whence comes it? From the transferred vibrations of the dismounted fork. That the motion should thus transfer itself through the air it is necessary that the two forks should be in perfect unison. If I place on one of the forks a morsel of wax not longer than a pea, it is rendered thereby powerless to affect, or to be affected by, the other. It is easy to understand this experiment. The pulses of the one fork can affect the other, because they are perfectly timed. A single pulse causes the prong of the silent fork to vibrate through an infinitesimal space. But just as it has completed this small vibration, another pulse is ready to strike it. Thus, the small impulses add themselves together. In the five seconds during which the forks were held near each other, the vibrating fork sent 1,280 waves against its neighbour, and those 1,280 shocks, all delivered at the proper moment, all, as I have said, perfectly timed, have given such strength to the vibrations of the mounted fork as to render them audible to you all.

Let me give you one other illustration of the influence of synchronism on musical vibrations. Here are three small gas-flames inserted in three glass tubes of different lengths. Each of these flames can be caused to emit a musical note, the pitch of which is determined by the length of the tube surrounding the flame. The shorter the tube the higher is the pitch. The flames are now silent within their respective tubes, but each of them can be caused to respond to a proper note sounded anywhere in this room. I have here an instrument called a syren, by which I can produce a powerful musical note. Beginning with a low pitch, and ascending gradually to a higher one, I finally reach the note of the flame in the longest tube. The moment it is reached, the flame bursts into song. I stop and re-excite the syren, to enable you to hear that its note and the flame's note are identical. But the other flames are still silent within their tubes. I urge the instrument on to higher notes; the second flame has now started, and the third alone remains. But a still higher note starts it also. Thus, as the sound of the syren rises gradually in pitch, it awakens every flame in passing, by striking it with a series of waves whose periods of recurrence are similar to its own.

Let us apply these facts to radiant heat, taking as before the vapour of water as a representative case. The molecules of this vapour have definite periods of vibration to which they are as rigidly bound as a tuning-fork is to its periods. Recurring then to our experiment on the mountain top: instead of exposing our hot vapour in the manner described, with nothing above it, let us suppose a stratum of aqueous vapour to be spread out between it and the firmament. The light of the stars is unaffected by this stratum, which I suppose to be true vapour, and, therefore, perfectly transparent. But the case is different as regards the rays issuing from the hot vapour underneath. The molecules of this vapour and of the stratum overhead are, if I may use the expression, tuned to precisely the same note, and instead of the direct transference of the vibratory motion into space, we have it transferred to the molecules of the vapour above. The motion is thus intercepted — in technical language the heat is absorbed. The upper stratum of vapour having thus become warmed, first at its under surface, and then, by a gradual progression, through its entire mass, it would radiate in all directions, returning a portion of the heat communicated to it to the source from which it is derived. We are here manifestly dealing with that great principle which lies at the basis of spectrum analysis, and which has enabled scientific men to determine the substances of which the sun, the stars, and even the nebulae, are composed: — the principle, namely, that a body which is competent to emit any ray, whether of heat or light, is competent in the same degree to absorb that ray. The absorption depends on the synchronism which exists between the vibrations of the atoms from which the rays, or more correctly the waves, issue, and those of the atoms against which these waves impinge.

To its incompetence to emit white light, aqueous vapour adds incompetence to absorb white light. It cannot, for example, absorb the luminous rays of the sun, though it can absorb, and that with mighty power, the non-luminous rays of the earth. This incompetence of aqueous vapour to absorb luminous rays is shared by water and ice — in fact, by all really transparent substances. Their transparency is due to their inability to absorb luminous rays. The molecules of such substances are in dissonance with the luminous waves, and hence such waves pass through transparent substances without disturbing the molecular rest. A purely luminous beam, however intense may be its heat, is sensibly incompetent to melt the smallest particle of ice. I can, for example, converge a powerful luminous beam upon a surface covered with hoar frost without melt a single spicula of the ice-crystals. How then, it may be asked, are the snows of the Alps swept away by the sunshine of summer? I answer they are not swept away by sunshine at all, but by solar rays which have no shine whatever in them. The luminous rays of the sun fall upon the snow-fields and are flashed in echoes from crystal to crystal, but they find no lodgment within the crystals. They are not absorbed, and hence they cannot produce fusion. But a body of powerful dark rays are emitted by the sun, and it is these rays that cause the glaciers to shrink and the snows to disappear; it is they that fill the banks of the Arve and Arveyron, and liberate from their captivity upon the heights the Rhone and the Rhine.

Placing a concave silvered mirror behind the electric light I converge its rays to a focus of dazzling brilliancy. I place in the path of the rays, between the light and the focus, a vessel of water, and now introduce at the focus a piece of ice. The ice is not melted by the concentrated beam which has passed through the water, though matches are ignited at the focus and wood is set on fire. The powerful heat then of this luminous beam is incompetent to melt the ice. I withdraw the cell of water; the ice immediately liquefies, and you see the water trickling from it in drops. I re-introduce the cell of water; the fusion is arrested and the drops cease to fall. The transparent water of the cell exerts no sensible absorption in the luminous rays, still it withdraws something from the beam, which, when permitted to act, is competent to melt the ice. This something is the dark radiation of the electric light. Again, I place a slab of pure ice in front of the electric lamp; send a luminous beam first through our cell of water and then through the ice. By means of a lens I cast an image of the slab upon a white screen. The beam, sifted by the water, has no power upon the ice. But observe what occurs when the water is removed: we have here a star and there a star, each resembling a flower of six petals, and growing visibly larger before your eyes. As the leaves enlarge their edges become serrated, but there is no deviation from the six-rayed type. We have here, in fact, the crystallization of the ice inverted by the invisible rays of the electric beam. They take the molecules down in this wonderful way, and reveal to us the exquisite atomic structure of the substance with which nature every winter roofs our ponds and lakes.

Numberless effects, apparently anomalous, might be adduced in illustration of the action of these lightless rays. Here, for example, are two powders both white, and undistinguishable from each other by the eye. The luminous rays of the lamp are unabsorbed by both powders, — from those rays they acquire no heat; still one of the substances is heated so highly by the concentrated beam of the electric lamp that it first smokes violently and then inflames, while the other substance is barely warmed at the focus. Here, again, are two perfectly transparent liquids placed in a test tube at the focus; one of them boils in a couple of seconds, while the other in a similar position is hardly warmed. The boiling point of the first is 78° C., which is speedily reached; that of the second liquid is only 48° C., which is never reached at all. These anomalies are entirely due to the unseen element which mingles with the luminous rays of the electric beam, and indeed constitutes 90 per cent. of its calorific power.

I have here a substance by which these dark rays may be detached from the total omission of the electric lamp. This ray-filter is a black liquid — that is to say, black as pitch to the luminous, but bright as a diamond to the non-luminous radiation. It mercilessly cuts off the former, but allows the latter free transmission. I bring these invisible rays to a focus at a distance of several feet from the electric lamp; the dark rays form there an image of the source from which they issue. By proper means this invisible image may be transformed into a visible one of dazzling brightness. I could, moreover, show you, if time permitted, how out of those perfectly dark rays we might extract, by a process of transmutation, all the colours of the solar spectrum. I could also prove to you that those rays, powerful as they are, and sufficient to fuse many metals, may be permitted to enter the eye and to break upon the retina without injury to the eye, without producing the least luminous impression. The dark rays are now collected before you; you see nothing at their place of convergence; with a proper thermometer it could be proved that even the air at the focus is just as cold as the surrounding air. And mark the conclusion to which this leads. It proves the ether at the focus to be practically detached from the air, and that the most violent ethereal motion may there exist without the least aerial motion. But though you see it not, there is sufficient heat at that focus to set London on fire. The heat there at the present moment is competent to raise iron to a temperature at which it throws off brilliant scintillations. It can heat platinum to whiteness and almost fuse that refractory metal. It actually can fuse gold, silver, copper, and aluminium. The moment, moreover, that wood is placed at the focus it bursts into a blaze.

It has been already affirmed that whether as regards radiation or absorption the elementary atoms possess but little power. This might be illustrated by a long array of facts; and one of the most singular of these is furnished by the deportment of that extremely combustible substance phosphorus, when placed at this dark focus. It is impossible to ignite there a fragment of amorphous phosphorus. But ordinary phosphorus is a far quicker combustible, and its deportment to radiant heat is still more impressive. It may be exposed to the intense radiation of an ordinary fire without bursting into flame. It may also be held for twenty or thirty seconds at an obscure focus of sufficient power to raise platinum to a white heat, without ignition. Notwithstanding the energy of the ethereal waves here concentrated, notwithstanding the extremely inflammable character of the elementary body exposed to their action, the atoms of that body refuse to share in the motion of the waves, and consequently cannot be powerfully affected by their heat.

The knowledge which we now possess will enable us to analyze with profit a practical question. White dresses are worn in summer because they are found to be cooler than dark ones. The celebrated Benjamin Franklin made the following experiment:—He placed bits of cloth of various colours upon snow, exposed them to direct sunshine, and found that they sank to different depths in the snow. The black cloth sank deepest, the white did not sink at all. Franklin inferred from his experiment that black bodies are the best absorbers, and white ones the worst absorbers, of radiant heat. Let us test the generality of this conclusion. I have here two cards, one of which is coated with a very dark powder, and the other with a perfectly white one. I place the powdered surfaces before the fire, and leave them there until they have acquired as high a temperature as they can attain in this position. Which of the cards is most highly heated? It requires no thermometer to answer this question. Simply pressing the back of the card, on which the white powder is strewn, against my cheek or forehead, I find it intolerably hot. Placing the other card in the same position I find it cool. The white powder has absorbed far more heat than the dark one. This simple result abolishes a hundred conclusions which have been hastily drawn from the experiment of Franklin. Again, here are suspended two delicate mercurial thermometers at the same distance from a gas-flame. The bulb of one of them is covered by a dark substance, the bulb of the other by a white one. Both bulbs have received the radiation from the flame, but the white bulb has absorbed most, and its mercury stands much higher than that of the other thermometer. I might vary this experiment in a hundred ways, and show you that you can draw no safe conclusion from the darkness of a body regarding its power of absorption.

The reason of this simply is, that colour gives us intelligence of only one portion, and that the smallest one, of the rays impinging on the coloured body. Were the rays all luminous we might with certainty infer from the colour of a body its power of absorption; but the great mass of the radiation from our fire, our gas-flame, and even from the sun itself, consists of invisible calorific rays, regarding which colour teaches us nothing. A body may be highly transparent to one class of rays, and highly opaque to the other class. Thus the white powder, which has shown itself so powerful an absorber, has been specially selected on account of its extreme perviousness to the visible rays, and its extreme imperviousness to the invisible ones; while the dark powder was chosen on account of its extreme transparency to the invisible, and its extreme opacity to the visible rays. In the case of the radiation from our fire, about 98 per cent. of the whole emission consists of invisible rays; the body, therefore, which was most opaque to these triumphed as an absorber, though that body was a white one.

I would here invite you to consider the manner in which we obtain from natural facts what may be called their intellectual value. Throughout the processes of nature there is interdependence and harmony, and the main value of our science, considered as a mental discipline, consists in the tracing of this interdependence and the demonstration of this harmony. The outward and visible phenomena are with us the counters of the intellect; and our science would not be worthy of its name and fame if it halted at facts, however practically useful, and neglected the music of law which accompanies the march of phenomena. Let us endeavour, then, to extract from the experiment of Franklin its full intellectual value, calling to our aid the knowledge which our predecessors have already stored. Let us imagine two pieces of cloth of the same texture, the one black and the other white, placed upon sunned snow. Fixing our attention on the white piece, let us inquire whether there is any reason to expect that it will sink into the snow at all. There is knowledge at hand which enables us to reply at once in the negative. There is, on the contrary, reason to expect that after a sufficient exposure the bit of cloth will be found on an eminence instead of in a hollow; that instead of a depression, we shall have a relative elevation of the bit of cloth. For, as regards the luminous rays of the sun, the cloth and the snow are alike powerless; the one cannot be warmed, nor the other melted, by such rays. The cloth is white and the snow is white, because their confusedly mingled particles are incompetent to absorb luminous rays. Whether, then, the cloth will sink or not depends entirely upon the dark rays of the sun. Now the substance which of all substances absorbs the dark rays of the sun with the greatest avidity is ice, — or snow, which is merely ice in powder. A less amount of heat will be lodged in the cloth than in the surrounding snow. The cloth must therefore act as a shield to the snow on which it rests; and in consequence of the more rapid fusion of the exposed snow, the cloth must in due time be left behind, perched upon an eminence like a glacier-table.

But though the snow transcends the cloth both as a radiator and absorber it does not much transcend it. Cloth is very powerful in both these respects. Let us now turn our attention to the piece of black cloth, the texture and fabric of which I assume to be the same as that of the white. For our object being to compare the effects of colour, we must, in order to study this effect in its purity, preserve all other conditions constant. Let us then suppose the black cloth to be obtained from the dyeing of the white. The cloth itself, without reference to the dye, is nearly as good an absorber of heat as the snow around it. But to the absorption of the dark solar rays by the undyed cloth is now added the absorption of the whole of the luminous rays, and this great additional influx of heat is far more than sufficient to turn the balance in favour of the black cloth. The sum of its actions on the dark and luminous rays exceeds the action of the snow on the dark rays alone. Hence the cloth will sink in the snow, and this is the philosophy of Franklin's experiment.

Throughout this discourse the main stress has been laid on chemical constitution, as influencing most powerfully the phenomena of radiation and absorption. With regard to gases, vapours, and to the liquids from which these vapours are derived, it had been proved by the most varied and conclusive experiments that the acts of radiation and absorption were molecular — that they depended upon chemical and not upon mechanical condition. In attempting to extend this principle to solids I was met by a multitude of facts obtained by celebrated experimenters, which seemed flatly to forbid such extension. Melloni, for example, found the same radiant and absorbent power for chalk and lamplack. M.M. Masson and Courtépée performed a most elaborate series of experiments on chemical precipitates of various kinds, and found that they one and all manifested the same power of radiation. They concluded from their researches, that where bodies are reduced to an extremely fine state of division the influence of this state is so powerful as entirely to mask and override whatever influence may be due to chemical constitution.

But it appears to me that through the whole of these researches a serious oversight has run, the mere mention of which will show what caution is essential in the operations of experimental philosophy. Let me state wherein I suppose this oversight to consist. I have here a metal cube with two of its sides brightly polished. I fill the cube with boiling water and determine the quantity of heat emitted by the two bright surfaces. One of them far transcends the other as a radiator of heat. Both surfaces appear to be metallic. What then is the cause of the observed difference in their radiative power? Simply this: I have coated one of the surfaces with transparent gum, through which, of course, is seen the metallic lustre behind. Now this varnish, though so perfectly transparent to luminous rays, is as opaque as pitch or lampblack to non-luminous ones. It is a powerful emitter of dark rays; it is also a powerful absorber. While, therefore, at the present moment it is copiously pouring forth radiant heat itself, it does not allow a single ray from the metal behind to pass through it. The varnish then, and not the metal, is the real radiator.

Now Melloni, and Masson, and Courtépée experimented thus: they mixed their powders and precipitates with gum-water, and laid them by means of a brush upon the surfaces of a cube like this. True they saw their red powders red, their white ones white, and their black ones black, but they saw these colours through the coat of varnish which encircled every particle of their powders. When, therefore, it was concluded that colour had no influence on radiation, no chance had been given to it of asserting its influence; when it was found that all chemical precipitates radiated alike, it was the radiation from a varnish common to them all which showed the observed constancy. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of experiments on radiant heat have been performed in this way by various inquirers, but I fear the work will have to be done over again. I am not, indeed, acquainted with an instance in which an oversight of so trivial a character has been committed in succession by so many able men, and vitiated so large an amount of otherwise excellent work.

Basing our reasonings then on demonstrated facts, we arrive at the extremely probable conclusion that the envelope of the particles and not the particles themselves, was the real radiator in the experiments just referred to. To reason thus, and deduce their more or less probable consequences from experimental facts, is an incessant exercise of the student of physical science. But having thus followed for a time the light of reason alone through a series of phenomena, and emerged from that series with a purely intellectual conclusion, our duty is to bring that conclusion to its crucial test. In this way we fortify our science, sparing no pains, shirking no toil to secure sound materials for the edifice which it is our privilege to build. If, then, our alleged facts be real, and if our inference from these be just, we ought to find that inference ratified by experiment. For the purpose of testing it I take two powders of the same physical appearance: one of them is a compound of mercury and the other a compound of lead. On two surfaces of this cube are spread these bright red powders without varnish of any kind. Filling the cube with boiling water, and determining the radiation from the two surfaces, one of them is found to emit thirty-nine rays, while the other emits seventy-four. This, surely, is a great difference. Here, however, is a second cube, having two of its surfaces coated with the same powders, the only difference being that now the powders are laid on by means of a transparent gum. Both surfaces are now absolutely alike in radiative power. Both of them emit somewhat more than was emitted by either of the unvarnished powders, simply because the gum employed is a better radiator than either of them. Excluding all varnish, and comparing white with white, I find vast differences; comparing black with black I find them also different; and when black and white are compared, in some cases the black radiates far more than the white, while in other cases the white radiates far more than the black. Determining the absorptive power of these powders, it is found to go hand-in-hand with their radiative power. The good radiator is a good absorber, and the bad radiator is a bad absorber. From all this it is evident that as regards the radiation and absorption of non-luminous heat, colour teaches us nothing; and that even as regards the radiation of the sun, consisting as it does mainly of non-luminous rays, conclusions as to the influence of colour may be altogether delusive. This is the strict scientific upshot of our researches. But it is not the less true that in the case of wearing apparel—and this for reasons which I have given in analysing the experiment of Franklin—black dresses are more potent than white ones as absorbers of solar heat.

Thus, in brief outline, I have brought before you a few of the results of recent inquiry. If you ask me what is the use of them, I can hardly answer you, unless you define the term use. If you meant to ask me whether those dark rays which clear away the Alpine snows will ever be applied to the roasting of turkeys or the driving of steam-engines, while affirming their power to do both, I would frankly confess that I do not think them capable at present of competing profitably with coal in these particulars. Still they may have great uses unknown to me; and when our coal-fields are exhausted, it is possible that a more ethereal race than ourselves may cook their victuals and perform their work in this transcendental way. But is it necessary that the student of science should have his labours tested by their possible practical applications? What is the practical value of Homer's Iliad? You smile, and possibly think that Homer's Iliad is good as a means of culture. There's the rub. The people who demand of science practical uses, forget, or do not know, that it also is great as a means of culture; that the knowledge of this wonderful universe is a thing profitable in itself, and requiring no practical application to justify its pursuit. But while the student of nature distinctly refuses to have his labours judged by their practical issues, unless the term practical be made to include mental as well as material good, he knows full well that the greatest practical triumphs have been episodes in the search after natural truth. The electric telegraph is the standing wonder of this age, and the men whose scientific knowledge and mechanical skill have made the telegraph what it is are deserving of all honour. In fact, they have their reward, both in reputation and in those more substantial benefits which the direct service of the public always carries in its train. But who, I would ask, put the soul into this telegraphic body? Who snatched from heaven the fire that flashes along the line? This, I am bound to say, was done by two men, the one a dweller in Italy,* the other a dweller in England, and therefore not a thousand miles distant from the spot where I now stand,† who never in their inquiries consciously set a practical object before them, — whose only stimulus was the fascination which draws the climber to a never-trodden peak, and would have made Cæsar quit his victories to seek the sources of the Nile. That the knowledge brought us by those prophets, priests, and kings of science is what the world calls useful knowledge, the triumphant application of their discoveries proves. But science has another function to fulfil, in the storing and the training of the human mind; and I would base my appeal to you on the poor specimen which has been brought before you this evening, whether any system of education at the present day can be deemed even approximately complete in which the knowledge of nature is neglected or ignored.

A WALK FROM LONDON TO THE LAND'S END AND BACK.—With Illustrations. By Elihu Burritt. (Sampson Low, Son, and Marston.)—We can forgive this genial critic some slight inaccuracies in English history, and just the least tendency at times to fine writing after the American fashion. If he has added a crime to King Harry's list, already "long enough to hang a common sinner," in taking off Jane Seymour's head, he has made compensation by bestowing on the lady "virtues enough to make a saint," which we never heard of before; and his ambitious phrases, such as "tomb-fonts" and "home-stars," are few and far between. Generally he writes sensibly and with just the amount of friendliness that Englishmen most appreciate, the friendliness that arises from a recognition of relationship in ancestry, in temperament, and in aim. The leading motive of this, as of his previous "Walk," was, it seems, to see and note the agricultural system, aspects, and industries of this country, and to collect information that might be useful to American farmers; he has certainly adhered to this design, and in the chapter on the Wiltshire labourers discusses the subject of wages in a way that is well worthy of the attention of the employers of labour in those parts; but he by no means confines himself to these topics. He writes pleasantly about the old towns and their historical associates the cathedrals, the baronial mansions and parks, and even the legends, such as that of the Glastonbury thorn. As he is satisfied with the people that he has visited, having "never experienced any disagreeable treatment, nor been subjected to any inconvenience worth mentioning," though he has "measured the length of the island and doubled it half way back on foot," so are we with our visitor. We recognize the judgment and the kindness with which he has observed us, and we cordially recommend the perusal of his volume. — Spectator.

WHO SHALL DELIVER ME ?

God strengthen me to bear myself;
That heaviest weight of all to bear,
Inalienable weight of care.

All others are outside myself;
I lock my door and bar them out,
The turmoil, tedium, gad-about.

I lock my door upon myself,
And bar them out; but who shall wall
Self from myself, most loathed of all?

If I could once lay down myself
And start self-purged upon the race
That all must run! Death runs apace.

If I could set aside myself,
And start with lightened heart upon
The battle by all men overgone!

God harden me against myself,
This coward with pathetic voice
Who craves the ease, and rest, and joys:

• Myself, arch-traitor to myself;
My hollowest friend, my deadliest foe,
My clog whatever road I go.

Yet One there is can curb myself,
Can roll the strangling load from me,
Break off the yoke and set me free.

MY VIS-A-VIS.

THAT olden lady! — can it be?

Well, well, how seasons slip away!

Do let me hand her cup of tea

That I may gently to her say,

“Dear madam, thirty years ago,

When both our hearts were full of glee,

In many a dance and courtly show.

I had you for my vis-a-vis.

“That pale blue robe, those chestnut curls,

That eastern jewel on your wrist,

That neck-encircling string of pearls

Whence hung a cross of amethyst, —

I see them all, — I see the tulle

Looped up with roses at the knee,

Good Lord! how fresh and beautiful

Was then your cheek, my vis-a-vis!

“I hear the whispered praises yet,

The buzz of pleasure when you came,

The rushing eagerness to get

Like moths within the fatal flame;

As April blossoms, faint and sweet,
As apples when you shake the tree,
So hearts fell showering at your feet
In those glad days, my vis-a-vis.

“And as for me, my breast was filled
With silvery light in every cell;
My blood was some rich juice distilled
From amaranth and asphodel;
My thoughts were airier than the lark
That carols o’er the flowery lea;
They well might breathlessly remark,
‘By Jove! that is a vis-a-vis!’

“O time and change, what is’t you mean?
Ye gods! can I believe my ears?
Has that bald portly person been
Your husband, ma’am, for twenty years?
That six-foot officer your son,
Who looks o’er his moustache at me!
Why did not Joshua stop our sun
When I was first your vis-a-vis?

“Forgive me, if I’ve been too bold,
Permit me to return your cup;
My heart was beating as of old,
One drop of youth still bubbled up.”
So spoke I: then, like cold December,
Only these brief words said she,
“I do not in the least remember
I ever was your vis-a-vis.”

CHAPTER V.

FEMININE CHARACTER.

SIR DOUGLAS ROSS was considerably startled when, on the drawing-room door being opened, in lieu of receiving the usual commonplace and easy welcome accorded to morning visitors, he beheld Lady Charlotte sobbing bitterly in the depths of a very comfortable French causeuse, in which she was rather lying than sitting when the two gentlemen arrived. She lifted her embroidered handkerchief from her eyes for an instant, as if disturbed by their entrance, and then recommenced her weeping. The soft-eyed girl, who had sung the German "Good-night" the previous evening, was standing by her chair, with an expression of mingled perplexity and sympathy: she murmured, "Dear mamma, here are friends," in an expostulating tone, put out one hand shyly to greet Kenneth, leaning with the other on the back of her mother's chair, and repeated the words, "Here are friends."

"Zizine! Zizine! Zizine!" sobbed Lady Charlotte.

"Mamma, Zizine will do very well; you will see she will do very well; I will attend to her myself."

"How can you talk such nonsense, my dear Gertrude? I am sure she will die! Zizine! my poor little Zizine!"

Puzzled beyond measure, and wondering whether a little sister, grandchild, or favourite niece was the subject of lamenting, Sir Douglas made rather a stiff bow, and said hurriedly, "We have come at a most unfortunate moment; I hope there is no serious cause of anxiety; we will call again later in the day."

"Oh no, no; oh no, no; don't go away; don't leave me; I am sure Mr. Ross would not think of leaving me at such a time! He is always so friendly. Pray don't go—pray don't; it makes me worse, the idea of your going! It makes me worse!"

"Mamma will be better presently," added the daughter, in a low, vexed voice; and she glanced from Kenneth, who was biting his lip to repress the dawn of one of his insolent smiles, and looked appealingly in the graver face of his uncle.

"Can we do anything?" asked the latter, kindly.

"Oh, no! pray sit down. I will endeavour to be more composed—pray don't go—no one can do anything; it is most afflicting; but don't go. The fact is, Antonio has been so tormented by my English servants (and I am sure I would send every one of them away sooner than Zizine should suffer),—that he utterly refuses to stay with me. I offered him double what he engaged for as courier, but he won't! He said (it was so cruel of him! he said)—and here a renewed burst of sobbing interrupted the explanation—"that—that it was ridiculous to expect him to stay for the sake of a piccola bestia' (that was what he called Zizine), when he was made quite triste, day and night, by the enmity of my servants. Now, you know, they have no enmity at all to him; only they don't like him; and if he had any generosity he wouldn't consider his own feelings in the matter, but mine: think what a goose he must be to go and fret in that way about nothing! And Zizine will die; I know she will die!"

"Who is Zizine?" exclaimed Sir Douglas at last, with a little impatience in his voice.

He was answered by the soft-eyed girl, grave, embarrassed, hesitating, with downcast lids. "Zizine—Zizine—is a little Brazilian monkey, of which mamma is very fond."

There was a moment's pause; and then she added, "We are all fond of mamma's pet. Mr. Ross knows Zizine."

And with the last words, trifling as they seemed, the melodious voice seemed to grow severe, and the eyes that had been so timid turned so full and pained a look of reproach at Kenneth, that Sir Douglas was positively startled.

Not so Kenneth, whose repressed smile broke into a little mocking laugh. "Yes, I do know Zizine; and I will introduce her to my uncle, or, to speak more respectfully, I will introduce my uncle to her; and if she does not snap his fingers off, he shall feed and caress her, and console her for Antonio's obduracy."

"Oh, Mr. Ross," whimpered Lady Charlotte, "how can you make a jest of anything so distressing. I am sure if your good uncle knew all! You are not aware, Sir Douglas, that this little creature—this precious little creature—will not eat unless fed by Antonio! It will not take food from any other hand; and what is to be done, if Antonio persists in leaving me, I am sure I don't know! I have been wretched about it all the morning!"

The shower of easy tears, after this last burst, seemed to clear off a little; and the possessor of Zizine listened with a ray (or a rainbow) of hope to Sir Douglas's assurances that a hungry monkey would take food from the most alien hand, sooner than go without it; and even ventured to hint that the value Antonio himself must originally have been a stranger to Zizine, since she was brought from the Brazils; a remark which seemed to make a profound impression on Lady Charlotte, who pronounced it to be "so true; so very true — and — and so very comforting;" and she was quite surprised it had never occurred to her before. "But you know, Sir Douglas — Columbus's egg — you know!" And on seeing rather a puzzled acquiescence in her new friend's face, she further explained herself by adding, "what nobody thought of till they saw it done, you know!" and with a tearful smile she gave a final flourish of the embroidered pocket-handkerchief, and settled herself for more cheerful discourse. Then she listened with rapt attention to a number of little anecdotes told by Sir Douglas, of instinct and wisdom in animals, such as would be narrated to an intelligent child; and when he wound up with the tragic incident of the suicide from grief, of a male marmoset whose little mate dying on shipboard, was thrown overboard; and told how, the very first day his cage was left accidentally open, the melancholy little survivor leaped over the ship's side at that identical spot, into the waves; and described the regret of all the sailors, who were of opinion that the ship should have been put about, though in wild weather, rather than that Jocko should have been allowed to perish, — Lady Charlotte vehemently exclaimed, "Oh! I think so too — I think so too! — How very cruel of the captain!" And as she and her guests stepped forth into the garden, and paced along the terrace, and through the Pergola shaded with vines, she remarked to Kenneth that she had never seen a more pleasant or gentlemanly man than his uncle — "and so travelled, too" — which phrase she explained, like Columbus's egg, and said she meant that he knew so many things, which, of course, he had picked up going so much about the world as she understood he had done.

And Gertrude too praised Sir Douglas, even to himself! She was leaning against one of the square stone supports of the loggia, the vine leaves with their tendrils drooping and curling round her uncovered head, pausing to let her companion admire the distant view of land and sea. "It was very kind of you," she said, "to amuse mamma; it took away all her nervousness."

Sir Douglas flushed a little. It was very pleasant being spoken to in such a friendly tone by this pretty girl; and he was rather shy, though his shyness was not awkward like his friend Lorimer Boyd's.

"I was glad to amuse her. But you must not be angry with Kenneth for laughing a little: I had no idea it was a monkey that Lady Charlotte was so anxious about when I first saw her distress."

Gertrude shrank a little farther from her companion; and spoke in a low voice.

"I know; I was not exactly angry; but it vexed me. Mamma is not — that is, I mean, she is not one of those clever women with strong nerves, who do nothing that any one can smile at. I know mamma is not clever; but she is good and tender; she is tender to all she loves; and she is tender to all creatures — birds, and pets of all kinds. My poor father used to give them to her; he died of consumption, and he used to have them in his room; it is true he did not give her Zizine, but mamma has the habit of loving these things extremely — and — and I cannot bear that any one should seem almost to jest at her vexation."

She trembled a little as she spoke; but that trembling — like the tremolo in her clear rich singing — gave no impression of weakness; and the touch of sternness was in her voice again at the final phrase, as it had been when she said that Kenneth "knew Zizine." Sir Douglas liked her for it. He liked the protection given by her own child to this sacred silly woman: sacred as a parent, even where weakness could not but be perceptible; sacred for the sake of duty and for the sake of scenes replete with sadness and reverent associations: — not to be laughed at by mocking lips; to be pitied, to be tenderly dealt with, even as she dealt, or was supposed to deal, with others. He felt that had he been the son of a silly mother he also would have dealt so by her; and his own mother's half-remembered, half-forgotten face, vaguely rose again to memory in presence of this girl, as it had done the evening before — leaving the impression, as it did then, that Gertrude Skifton "had a look of her about the eyes." Dear eyes, that bent over his cradle, and were lifted to Heaven when he first learned to pray, and shone for a little way on in his childhood, and then vanished, leaving in those childish years such a comfortless blank of love.

When he left the Villa Mandorlo with Kenneth, they walked a little way in silence; then Kenneth said, laughing, "Well, we had a fine scene there! That woman is an incarnation of folly, but this girl is very nice."

"Yes, the girl is very nice," assented Sir Douglas.

"I'm glad you like her," said Kenneth, carelessly; "for they are the only people (of your sort) I care to see here; and your friend, Lorimer Boyd, is in and out of their house like a tame dog. When he ain't in the Chancellerie you may look for him in the Villa Mandorlo. I believe he means to take Lady Charlotte in hand, according to the advertisements, 'To ladies of neglected education.' He comes in like a tutor, with plans of Herculaneum, and drawings of Pompeian pottery, and tickets to see this, that, and the other, with most desperate industry."

"And does Lady Charlotte respond?"

"Well, not unless some magnates are to accompany her. Her whole soul (if she has a soul) seems to be occupied with the ambition of being always in a certain 'set,' wherever she goes. She is always triumphing in being invited, or lamenting that she and her daughter are 'left out,' or setting some little wheel in motion to 'get asked,' somewhere. I believe she tolerates Lorimer Boyd (to whom she always listens with a stifled yawn), only as the well-spring and fountain of introductions she would not otherwise obtain in this place. She dines constantly at the English Legation, and goes to balls at the Neapolitan Court, and knows all the Princesses, Duchesses, Countesses, and Contessinas that rattle their carriages up and down the Chiaja; and if the whole government were subverted (as it certainly will be one of these days), it is my belief that she would transfer her allegiance and her visiting cards to whatever potentates floated on the surface, and to whatever dynasty happened to reign."

"Well, it is an odd mania in a woman holding a certain and established rank herself in her own country; but when you know more of the world, Kenneth, you won't think it so very uncommon. Are they rich?"

"Yes, I think they are. I believe" (and here Kenneth hesitated a little)—"I believe the daughter has an independent fortune; and her mother is bent on marrying her to some foreign grandee. She very nearly managed it with one of the Roman Colonas, or some such great family, before they came here; but his family wouldn't hear of it, the young lady being a Protestant."

"I wonder Lady Charlotte would think of such a marriage!"

"Think of it! I assure you she clung to it as if she were drowning; and as to the religious part of the difficulty, she said she really had hoped better things from the confessor of the family, who seemed such a suave, well-mannered, sociable man, than to oppose himself to her daughter; and she was sure, Gertude would not object to listen 'occasionally' to his exhortations, or even to go, 'now and then, with her husband the prince,' to the great Church festivals, 'but not as a customary thing; of course they could not expect that.' I really do think there never was such a goose born as that woman!"

If Sir Douglas thought his concealed nephew severe, he did not find his rational friend, Lorimer Boyd, a whit more indulgent with respect to his new associates. All the craving after fine acquaintance and frivolous gaieties, and all the insane planning about her daughter, was confirmed in his report. "And the worst of it is," concluded Lorimer, gloomily, "that she was once a great beauty."

Sir Douglas laughed. "How does that add to her offence?"

"By adding to her folly. She has all the minauderies and airs of a silly beautiful girl, being now but a silly elderly woman. I could box her ears when I see her drooping her faded pendulous cheek to her skeleton shoulder, with a long ringlet of heaven-knows-who's hair in the fashion of a love-lock trailing over her scragginess. She always reminds me of some figure in Holbein's 'Dance of Death.' A most preposterous woman."

"Her daughter seems very different, and very fond of her, Lorimer. There must be some good in her, depend upon it."

"I suppose there is some good in every one. Her daughter—well! we see what bright freshness of vegetation springs up in tropic dust; what flowers burst through the crevices of those hot, barren walls! Poor child! half her time is spent in endeavouring not to seem ashamed of her mother!"

"No; she loves her mother," exclaimed Sir Douglas, eagerly.

"She must have a great deal of love to spare," said Lorimer Boyd, with something between a sigh and a sneer; "and, if it be so, it says much for the daughter, but nothing for the mother. Gertrude Skilton is like her father. I knew him: he died here. A man to love and to remember."

"Well, you must not dispute with my wise uncle," laughed Kenneth, "for he sets up to know more of these people in two days than those who have sat, as we have, for two months, within hail of Lady Charlotte's one ringlet almost every evening."

CHAPTER VI.

HOW ACQUAINTANCE RIPENS.

ALMOST every evening. It is astonishing how rapidly intimacy progresses in country houses, sea-side gatherings, and the small society of compatriots in a foreign town. If you know each other at all, it is almost impossible not to be what is called "intimate;" even though that degree of familiarity may lessen, or cease altogether, when the circumstances which produced it are altered, and when persons who were "great friends" at Rome, Naples, or Florence, choose to drop into being civil acquaintances, after they once more carelessly congregate with the herding swarms of London. Lady Charlotte and her daughter Gertrude were the chief stars at Naples of many a picnic party and ball. Not that Gertrude was a great beauty, or her mother a wise woman, as we have seen; but because they were among the few well-connected English then in Naples, and "the set," as Lady Charlotte called it, with the addition of what was best of the "foreign set," mingled and met nearly every day in pursuit of the same aim — pleasure. The English are said to hold aloof from each other abroad; and there is a humorous passage at the opening of Sterne's "Sentimental Journey," where he represents himself as meeting with a gentleman-like and conversible person, of whose chance companionship he was about to avail himself, but, finding he was a compatriot, he retired to his own room. Whatever may have been the case in Sterne's time, it is certain that the disposition now is rather the reverse; and though we hear of ladies in India, and officers' wives in regiments on foreign service, "flouting" each other in their own small circle; and in colonial society of ladies whom "nobody in the colony visits;" and everywhere of the various little monkey-copyings of exclusiveness performed by the Zizines who give themselves airs abroad — "captains' ladies," and "majors' ladies," "colonels' ladies," and "governors' ladies;" and "white ladies," who won't associate with "brown ladies;" and Creoles, and Mestaz, and all sorts of other distinctions unknown to the great European family — yet, in a general way, the English are a sociable nation; and, beyond a certain cautious shyness as to the "respectability" of new acquaintance, there is no reluctance to come together.

But Lady Charlotte was of Scotch extraction, and the Scotch are yet more willing to "foregather," as it is called, provided it be with their "own folk." They are a scantier population than the English, with a scantier aristocracy and gentry. The tide of commercial success has not yet so flooded in among them (though it is fast advancing) as it has amongst the English, sweeping away old feudal memories and landmarks. They know all about each other's families and "forbears," down to the twentieth degree of cousinhood; and both rich and poor, high and low, genteel and ungenteel, set a value on rank and connection far beyond the value set upon it in England, and set a value on their own nationality, which is a feeling distinct and apart. "Come of gude Scotch bluid" is a far greater recommendation among them than "come of a good old county family" is among the Southrons; and when that "gude stock" is also noble, the respect is unbounded. That "Caledonia, stern and wild,"

which made so rough a nurse to poetic Burns, admits, as a theory, his noble line —

"A man's a man for a' that;,"

but, as a matter of practice, it is certain that if her wayward gauger had been a lord — if he had been a duke — if he had even been a laird — "Burns of Burndyke" — she would not have delayed the opportunity to fêter his genius till it became a centenary festival.

Lady Charlotte was a Scotchwoman; and she was glad to meet Lorimer Boyd and friends "from the North." She had even sought to establish a cousinhood between herself and Lorimer on the strength of some intermarriage between the Clochnabens and her own family in very remote times. And, at all events, she held him bound and responsible for her destiny in Naples, for fit introductions, and pleasant days. He had been very kind, she said, when Mr. Skifton was dying; "read to him, and that sort of thing," and very sorry for her and her daughter. That was more than two years ago now; and the grief for Mr. Skifton had begun to be wiped off the china slate of his widow's memory. She had not been a bad wife to him. Always very gentle; always very attentive when he was particularly ill; very sorry when he died. She wept very much the first time she saw her daughter in mourning, and when she was trying on her own weeds. Indeed, "for a long time afterwards," as she impressed upon Gertrude, "she could not bear the sight of black crape," it always "brought the tears into her eyes, let her meet it where she would." But she was now beginning to be very cheerful and comfortable again; and had none of that depth of nature which, she observed, caused "a mere nothing" suddenly to "overcome that dear girl by reminding her of her poor father."

She was anxious, too, about Gertrude. She wished her to marry early, and marry well; and she was all the more uneasy about invitations and opportunities on account of various past circumstances connected with the long weary illness and climate-seeking days that had removed her from general society and "seasons" in London, where she had once been so much admired. And then, after she was left a widow, Gertrude had a bad cough, and was supposed to be threatened with the same complaint as her father, and she was advised to pass a "couple more winters in Italy" to recruit her strength; and, beyond and besides all this, there was the patent fact that her marriage with Mr. Skifton had rather put her out of that "set" to which it was her great aim to belong. It had been a love-match; a love-match not repented of by either party, and extremely advantageous in point of fortune to Lady Charlotte who had none. But, then, who was Mr. Skifton? He had every merit a man could have; but he did not come of a "good old stock," or of any known family. He was handsome, rich, elegant in manner, and singularly accomplished; but the careless question elicited by the news of his decease and Lady Charlotte's consequent widowhood, of "By the by, who the deuce was Skifton?" produced only the vague reply, "Well, I really don't know; I believe he was a very good sort of fellow. His father was a merchant, or a broker, or something; and his daughter will have money."

A little soreness consequent on this position, and a wavering puzzled notion that such circumstances had weighed more with her recalcitrant foreign grandees than Gertrude's religion, troubled Lady Charlotte's mind; she had been rather humbled and annoyed at the escape from her very simple web of the young Colonna; and previous to Sir Douglas's arrival she had already been occupying herself with little fooleries and flatteries to Kenneth, who, faute de mieux, would, she thought, make a good husband for Gertie (in her view of a good husband), being well off himself and heir to old Sir Douglas. Her efforts, however, being confined to what chaperons call "bringing the young people together," and the encouragement of much singing of Scotch ballads in alternation with more cultivated music, she did neither good nor harm; and that is more than can be said of the majority of match-making or match-hoping mothers.

Neither was she, in fact, very anxious about it; for, after all, either here or elsewhere, some great duke, prince, or count might suddenly fall in love with her daughter; and she might wish that instead of Mr. Ross; and it would be very embarrassing to have to "throw over" Kenneth, and not very ladylike.

So things were suffered to take pretty much their own course; and a very pleasant course it was for all parties. Lorimer Boyd was as friendly as possible, and Kenneth exceedingly attentive, though now and then he teased Lady Charlotte by little mockeries and persiflage which she only half understood and feebly rebutted; and Sir Douglas, "in his way" was charming too. Lady Charlotte took great pains to please him; and never felt uneasy with him as she did occasionally with his nephew. She had just prudence enough "in case it ever came to anything between Kenneth Ross and Gertie," to avoid all allusion to her knowledge that the nephew was thought very wild. It would be very foolish to set his rich uncle against him, and all young men ran a little wild at his age and abroad. And she used to try a little feeble flattery with Sir Douglas — her head very much to one side, and her slender fingers twirling that long young ringlet which she had made sole inheritor of her own departed love-locks, and which kept Lorimer Boyd in a chronic state of dissatisfaction. Modulating her voice to a sort of singing whisper, like a canary-bird at sunset, she ventured little hints of admiration as to his looks; and how he must "have been" much handsomer than Kenneth; and she bantered him about his "dreadful bravery" and his probable relationship to the "Parliament Captain," the Ross of 1650, and talked of the taking of Montrose, and made Gertrude repeat a stanza that she "saw in an old book, but what book it was had gone out of her poor head," —

"Leslie for the kirk,
And Middleton for the king;
But deil a man can gie a knock
But Ross and Augustine!"

But it was when Brazilian Zizine fell ill ("like a fellow-creature," as Lady Charlotte expressed it) that Sir Douglas's favour rose to its climax! He actually gravely inspected Zizine; he brought remedies, and seemed to pity the little dumb beast; and he talked with Gertrude of its "plaintive captive eyes," while he fed it. And Lady Charlotte was overheard saying of him, in most unintelligible Italian to the Contessa Rufo, that "Avendo potuto essere uno generale, nondimeno aveva guarito Zizine!" on which the pretty Contessa, with a warm Southern smile, pronounced Sir Douglas to be "tanto amabile!" though she had not the remotest idea what meaning her friend wished to convey, or what the possibility of his becoming a general had to do with his feeding a monkey.

His tenderness, however, to Zizine was not all. He amused Lady Charlotte; who declared that talking to him was "like sitting with the Arabian Nights." "No, Mr. Kenneth need not laugh; for of course she did not mean that she could sit with the Arabian Nights,—or with any other stories; but he knew well enough that what she really meant was, that his uncle told them so many pleasant things." She had daily driven up and down the Chiaja till she was weary, and daily inspected what Gertrude called the "playthings" at their pretty villa: playthings of which all Italians are very fond. Strange slender bridges over artificial streamlets; garden traps that when trodden on send a sprinkling shower over the head of the startled visitor; grottoes, and guilt gazebos, and Chinese summer-houses and thatched rustic lodges. But she had not seen the graver sights of Naples, as a dowager who had more acquaintance with history or even with Murray's guide-books might have done: so that much novelty cropped and budded out of the old places, in consequence of being with the new companionable friend.

People see things under such different aspects! When Stendahl published his "Rome, Naples, and Florence, in 1817," all that he chose to describe in his opening pages—whether the better to mask subsequent expressions of political opinions, or from any other motive—was the eagerness with which he flew to the theatres, and what operas were performed at the various cities he visited during his tour. His account of his first entrance into Milan is, that he immediately went to La Scala; and his description of Naples is confined to the fact, that San Carlo being shut, he rushed to the Fiorentini. He mentions that "two playhouses have been discovered at Pompeii, and a third at Herculaneum;" and as to the beauties of Nature, he disposes of them in his diary thus:—"25 Fevrier. Je reviens de Pæstum. Route pittoresque."

An English lady who had arrived by sea at Lisbon sent her coachman and lady's-maid to amuse themselves with the sights of the new foreign city. The coachman returned filled with melancholy contempt for the inferior "turnout" of the Portuguese nobility as to carriages and harness: the lady's-maid said she (like Stendahl) had been to the opera, and thought the ladies' necks were in general far too short (though they wore some fine necklaces), and that their inclination to embonpoint was very remarkable; figures, indeed, that she "would have no pleasure in dressing."

Sir Douglas's mode of seeing Naples might be no better than that of his neighbours, but it had the merit of entertaining Lady Charlotte Skifton. He was full of historical gossip; to which she used to listen most attentively, pulling the young ringlet nearly straight, and looking round as if she vaguely expected to see the people and events he conjured up. She "could not eat her dinner" for thinking of young Conradin—titular king of Sicily from the time he was two years old till he was sixteen,—and then, (at that boyish age!) led out to execution in the market-place with his uncle Frederic of Austria; Pope Urban having aided Charles of Anjou to defeat and take him prisoner. She implicitly believed the doubtful story of his mother sailing into the Bay of Naples with black sails to her ships, and untold treasure as ransom, too late to rescue her murdered and courageous boy. She was "afraid she was almost glad" at the increased hatred of the French which that execution inspired, till in the rolling course of years, at a certain Easter, 1282, every Frenchman in Sicily, except one, was murdered.

She thought Queen Joanna's conduct "really now so very abominable," twisting a silk cord of variegated colours, and answering her inquisitive husband that it was "to strangle him with," so playfully that he believed she was joking till the horrible threat came true. She was delighted to hear that Queen Joanna was herself smothered afterwards, after many more years of crime, and she looked at the dark, gaping windows of her ruined palace in the Bay, with awe and satisfaction.

As to Masaniello, and his rebellion and brief triumph—she said she "knew all about him"—except that the people had sewed his head again to his body, and obliged the Government to give him a state burial after his downfall and massacre, — “because she had seen the opera of Masaniello several times: only in the opera there was nothing about what happened after he was killed.”

Newer to her was the hanging of Admiral Caraccioli (that blot upon the fame of Nelson !), and the well-attested story of the body of the Italian admiral floating upright, to the consternation of the sailors, in the wake of Nelson's ship, from the imperfect weighing down of the corpse when flung into the sea.

Her interest as to the disputed fact whether Pozzuoli was the place where St. Paul landed, was weak to the absorbed attention with which she devoured the details of the murder of Agrippina by order of her own son, the Emperor Nero. The picture of this proud, profligate, energetic old woman, betrayed into a galley contrived like those in the time of the French Noyades, to give way and sink under her, — her escape, after being hit on the head by a slave with an oar, her floating, swimming, and struggling to the shore at Baie, and being taken to her own Lucrine villa only to be afterwards assassinated in her bed there, — had a fascination, not unmixed with a sensation of terror for Lady Charlotte, moving her to observe that it was impossible for her to hear such a story, in the very place where it had happened, without being thankful no one could put her “on board a boat that was all to crack and come to pieces,” or come and kill her at the Villa Mandorlo “only because somebody else had ordered it.”

CHAPTER VII.

FAST YOUNG MEN.

SWIFTLY the days passed on; and it became almost a usual ceremony in the little circle to end each day with “What shall we do to-morrow?” When Sir Douglas first arrived, indeed, there had been grave talk of instant departure; of breaking up bad habits by removing Kenneth from scenes of idle temptation; and of all sorts of reforming and repressive measures. But it is not so easy to move a full-fledged young gentleman of Kenneth's disposition, from a place that happens to hit his fancy. His uncle's arrival, if not followed by any very real reform of conduct, had certainly secured greater decency; and he bore with patience

(or comparative patience) the brief anxious lectures which followed the examination of very complicated and uncertain calculations as to general debts, and debts of “honour;” loans made (half from careless generosity, half from vanity) to idle young foreigners, who had no earthly claim upon his assistance; jewellery squandered on their female associates; and all the embarrassments from which, — had he probed his own heart for the truth, — he expected to be relieved by the very simple expedient of getting his uncle to “pay them off.”

Nothing is more curious, in these cases of extravagance, than the puppy-blindness which does not see, — in that first stage of manhood, — that if such debts are “paid off” by some relative or friend, the items of which they were composed were acts of meanness, and not acts of generosity. If the phrases usual on such occasions were put into the language of the pleasant old story of the “Palais de la Verité,” — where people said, not what they intended to say, but spoke the “naked truth,” — how very extraordinary those sentences would sound! Conceive a man addressing his friend thus: “My dear fellow, certainly I will lend you a couple of hundreds. I'll give you all my three sisters' music-lessons, new dresses, and jaunts to the seaside for this year: and there's pale little Fanny, who costs my mother a good deal in physician's advice. I'll give you all her doctor's fees for six months or so, and she shall go without. I would not be so stingy as to refuse a friend such a paltry sum as you've asked of me, — no, not for the world.”

Or thus: —

“I made little Justerini the dancer such a splendid present last Christmas! I gave her three years of my fat old father's plodding work as head-clerk with Tighenall and Co.! He's getting old, you know: drowsy of an evening: tired out in fact: had rather a hard life of it: a good many of us to provide for. But I was determined I'd give her the ear-rings. I'd have given double, ay, six years of his hard-earned salary, sooner than not have behaved handsomely to her about them!”

Or thus:

“I can't stand a fellow refusing his chum such a paltry favour as belonging to a club, or sharing a yacht, or taking half an opera-box with him. I know I didn't hesitate a minute when Tom Osprey asked me. I gave him my mother's carriage-horses, and little Sam's favourite pony, and my father's hunters, and that little box at Twickenham where they used to go for change of air in summer, — before Tom had half done explaining about it. I'm not one of your backward fellows. I always come forward like a man, when a friend wants anything."

Or thus — liberal only to Self, instead of Self and Co. : —

"I always say there are certain things a fellow can't do without. Must make a certain figure, and have certain comforts. I like to enjoy life, and see other fellows enjoy it. Life is not worth having if you don't put some pleasure into it! I was obliged to have all my old grandmother's sables and shawls last winter, — (you know she brought me up, my mother was too poor to do it); — and the portion she had put by for my Cousin Bessie; couldn't do without, I assure you; not, at least, so as to live like a gentleman. Can't see why Cousin Bessie should be in any hurry about marrying, or why the confounded prig she's engaged to makes such a point of what he calls 'mutual means of support.' All I know is, I couldn't do without her portion, and grandmother's Indian shawls and Russian sables; that's fact."

Or even thus: — among a set where shawls and sables and marriage portions are alike unknown: —

"You say you wonder, because I'm a poor curate's son, how I can get on at college? That's all you know about it: of course it's difficult; and I'm put to it to give wine-parties, and so forth, like other fellows — but it's to be done with proper management. If I take six days in the week butcher's meat that my brothers and sisters would eat; and all the coals and blankets the old women in the village used to get, — and my father's two glasses of port wine which my mother fancied kept his throat from relaxing for Sunday duty, — and a year or two of Dick's schooling, (who scarcely needs it, for my father gives him all his spare time, and he's a sharp fellow by nature), it comes to a good lump of money in the end; and, if there's still some debt left, I've no doubt I can grind it out of them sooner than seem shabby to these fellows at Oxford."

Ah! how many a true tragedy lies under this apparent farce of words! How many a "fine, spirited young gentleman, very free with his money," steps out of his hotel in the sight of admiring waiters, drawing on a pair of straw-coloured gloves in preparation for a day's pleasure — tossing double his real fare to the cabman to be driven rapidly to the place of rendezvous: and then talking to the boon-companions he joins, it may be, of poachers on his father's estate; of some servant of his own turned away, as an idle vagabond and a thief, for taking his master's cigars and silk-handkerchiefs; of "being regularly swindled out of his money" by some jeweller who, according to custom, has sold him a set of studs and a gold ring for treble their real value, — to whom it never once occurs that the tu quoque of these various accusations would be but his own just due! — that he, also, is an idle vagabond, living on what he never earned; a "poacher" on the better means of better men; — a "swindler" in the acquirement of things unpaid for, or the profitable interest on which is lost in the uncertainty and delay of payment; — yea, it may be a most daring robber, whose "stand and deliver" threatens more than the lives of those whose substance has to be surrendered to him, since it threatens disgrace and ruin to himself (and through him to all connected with him) if they do not suffer themselves to be stripped of their goods, and consent to the extremity of sacrifice!

And fathers may toil, and mothers may darn, and many a Bessie pine, and many a Fanny sicken for sea-air, and many a little Dick lose his schooling; and so long as the cause of all these troubles does not actually pick pockets in the streets, or garotte unwary passengers on the highways and byeways where business or pleasure calls him, he contentedly believes himself to be living the life of a gentleman and an honest man, and would knock the offender down who dared to dispute that position.

Kenneth Ross doubted as little of his title to be thought "a thorough gentleman," as others of his creed. And yet it is certain that he expected his friends, his tradesmen, his gambling-debts, and his follies, to be paid for out of his uncle's money; was perfectly content that all his vicarious acts of generosity should (like his debts), be set down to his own credit, but, in truth, be provided for by this other man; and had never even given a single thought to what his situation, or the situation of his motley crowd of creditors would be, should his own means fall short, and his uncle, wearied out at last, refuse to supply the deficit.

But why should he give it a thought? Was he not his uncle's heir? He knew he was to be his heir. At least he had always expected it, ever since he was a child, and he believed Sir Douglas had always intended it.

Yes, Sir Douglas certainly had intended it. Up to a certain evening — the evening of a day of glory and beauty and sunshine, spent in an expedition to Sorrento — he had intended it, though he did not know that Kenneth built upon it; and even that first night which saw him waver in such intentions, saw him also wakeful, weary, and tender, full of yearnings to his nephew, and occupied till early dawn with anxious repetitions in his own mind of wise council and explanation, though both counsel and explanation were to make it clear to Ross of Torrieburn that Ross of Glenrossie was assisting him for the last time!

But Torrieburn's past experience was very much against any very settled belief in such a declaration as to Glenrossie's future proceedings.

CHAPTER VIII.

A DAY AT SORRENTO.

As the lovely Italian spring advanced the question, "What shall we do to-morrow?" was answered more and more boldly; and the little intimate circle that had mingled with Royal balls, and musical routs, during more wintry weather (for even Naples has its winter), and whose members had availed themselves of Italian hospitalities, began to draw more and more together, seeking, as strangers naturally would, their chief pleasure in excursions among scenes, the beauty of which will for ever be described in vain in guide-books, itineraries, and travels, since not all the glowing words that were ever strung together can convey a hundredth part of the impression made on the senses by actual experience. It is a favourite phrase with poets, that we should "conjure up a vision" of such and such objects; but no magic can conjure up, to one who has never yet beheld Southern Italy, the sudden irradiation of our common world that takes place. It is the nature we always knew — but it is nature illuminated! Colour is deeper and brighter, seas are more dazzling, sunrise and sunset are inconceivably richer, mountains have gradations of purple which no pencil can translate. The wasteful wealth of fruit and flowers sets us dreaming of Eden instead of our digging and delving climes; and the very people who dwell in these favoured regions seem endowed with a quicker life. Eyes have a depth of shining, and teeth a glitter in smiling, and cheeks a warmth of glowing, that the north can never show. Like Wilson's cloud, of which he says —

"E'en in its very motion there was rest," even in their very indolence there is passion; and that dolce far niente, of which we hear so much and understand so little, is more like the tranquillity of their own slumbering volcanoes, than the settled calm which alone among us would produce it. Or, to take the less grandiose simile of Lorimer Boyd in discussing the subject with Sir Douglas, it is the difference between the contented grazing of the bovine race, and the sleek and sleepy yawning of the hunting leopard. There is real quiet in the one, there is only temporary inaction in the other.

And though the simile might not be over-complimentary, Lorimer Boyd loved the Italians. He praised their simplicity, the absence of affectation, the loving nature of their women. He denied the inferiority of their men. He held that all of best and brightest in Europe came originally from Italy. He counted over the roll of the old heroic names, and came down, with an excuse for every blotted entry in history, to those later times when even her artists had fought as soldiers, and her priests governed as statesmen. He would not admit, without opposition, even Sir Douglas's censure of the Neapolitan nobility. What could be expected of men who were only too well aware that Government had no feeling towards such as might be marked for distinction, but that of jealousy? Take away the occupation of literature and politics, freedom of action, and great landed interests, from the youthful nobility of Great Britain; take away their natural stake in the prosperity of their country; and what would remain even for them but the pursuit of pleasure and the driving on of aimless days? Besides, Naples was not Italy. In that often taken and retaken town there was scarcely a nation whose blood did not mingle with the original race. French and Spanish, German and English, Greek and even Turkish, currents are in those idle veins. And because Kenneth had found a set of profligates and gamblers there — as he could have found a set of idlers and gamblers in Paris or in London — was Sir Douglas to pass a sweeping judgment over the land, or attribute to the aristocracy of Naples any increase in his anxieties respecting his wayward nephew? As well might he consider it the fault of the fishermen in the islands of Ischia or Procida.

Those anxieties were perpetually haunting Sir Douglas, so much so that once or twice he let fall a word respecting his hope that Kenneth "would make creditable friendships" even to Gertrude, — recurring eagerly to his own love in youth and boyhood for Lorimer.

And Gertrude looked grave, and said, "I know what you feel. I had once a brother."

Sir Douglas asked Lorimer about this brother. He had known them all. Did he resemble Gertrude?

No. He was exactly like his most ridiculous mother, clothed in a tail-coat instead of female habiliments—if possible even more silly, more vain, and certainly less well-tempered; and it was anything but a subject of regret that he had pre-deceased his father, for he would have been a plague instead of a protection to his mother and sister.

"How old do you suppose Miss Skifton may be? She is very grave and staid for a girl."

"She is two-and-twenty. I know her age. And she has seen much of life and its cares even for those years." And Lorimer Boyd sighed.

Sir Douglas mused on her tone and look when she said, "I had once a brother;" and on a hundred other instances which impressed his memory though they seemed mere nothings. There are persons who talk much and readily of their feelings, and who yet leave you in uncertainty both as to the sincerity and the motive of their confession; and there are others whose rare allusions to themselves and their private joys or sorrows seem to come like gleams of light, showing their whole inner nature. Sir Douglas would have been at a loss to explain why the little he had ever gleaned from Gertrude Skifton respecting herself had filled him with such intense sympathy and approval; such a conviction that her character was one of mingled gentleness and strength; fondness and girlish dignity; reserve and a subdued eagerness—which pleased him better than all the open enthusiasm in the world! He loved in her the cherishing of her foolish mother; the adoration for her dead father's memory; her easy courtesy to strangers; her sweet frank friendliness with those whom she acknowledged as intimates: with Kenneth, and Lorimer Boyd, and—himself. This last admission Sir Douglas made with a little hesitation. Her welcome of him was shyer than her welcome to them. Well, he would not have had it otherwise—she had not known him as long; and he remembered with pleasure the beautiful blush which overspread her face once when she said, "I do not feel that you are so much of a stranger as I should; because Mr. Lorimer

Boyd used to read your letters aloud sometimes, when you were in India, to my poor father; indeed very often he used to read us one; my father enjoyed them so." The expression of her countenance was always lovely: lovely when her eyes were downcast (as indeed was habitual with her), and lovely when she slowly raised them, as she did on this occasion, with a sort of innocent appeal in them, as though they said, "I know I am blushing, but it is not for anything of which I need feel ashamed."

He thought of her perpetually, and settled in his own mind that there was not in her one iota that he could wish to see altered, or that could be changed for the better.

And Lady Charlotte was quite pleased with his evident approval, for she felt "if ever it came to anything between Kenneth Ross and Gertie," here would be one great step gained for all subsequent arrangements.

And now they were to have one of their customary holidays, and spend the whole bright day at Sorrento: the little smiling Contessa Rufo, and a German couple, to whom she was "doing the honours" of the sights of Naples, being the only strangers of the party.

Lady Charlotte got but one scanty story from Sir Douglas; (the death of Pliny, which she declared she had never heard before,) and then she chatted with the Contessa, her companions being absorbed in the beauty of the moving panorama before them. They had left Naples at an hour unknown to indolent Londoners, and the early glory of morning yet fell on the tideless sea as they wound through the narrow roads surmounting the Bay of Castellamare; dotted with pointed white sails like wings, and showing on its rippled surface those strange dappled patches of green and purple which vary the blue of the ocean whenever it nears the shore.

Lovelier and lovelier grew the scene as they proceeded onwards. In odd nooks of the lofty cliffs nestled houses as white as those distant sails; fruit-trees and vines surrounded them; gay foliage mantled the rocky ledges; and here and there the eye could rest on the glistening tops of thickly-planted orchards of orange and lemon trees, looking like rounded domes of emerald, clustering far down in the hollows.

Fig-trees, with their broad dark leaves, and vines in tender transparent green, mocked the grey volcanic ruggedness of the lofty rocks, as they came in sight of Sorrento. Little rude staircase-like paths straggled downwards to the caverns and coves of the beach, inviting the feet to explore them. Groups of fishermen, with women and children, loitered and basked here and there, clothed in those bright vestments in which all southern people delight. Now and then echoes of laughter, or the fragment of a simple song, came floating up on the air with that wonderful distinctness with which sounds are heard along a rocky shore, — airs which Gordigiani's exquisite setting have since made famous, and which, perhaps, it required that composer's fine and sensitive taste to strip from their ruggedness as we strip off the shell of the almond, denuding the veiled melodies from nasal and husky tones, and sending them forth to the world full only of such gentle passion as breathes in the "Bianco visin," and the "Tempo Passato;" familiar to us now from many a sweet and tutored voice even in our own land.

Lorimer Boyd had known Gordigiani's daughter. He described that sweet ethereal creature to Gertrude: her large spiritual eyes, like the eyes we imagine those of a guardian angel; her smile, faint and tender as the serenest twilight; her pretty bashful pride in being able to compose words to her father's music. But she was gone — passed away like the echo of her own songs — taken in the early prime of her sweetness, scarcely living even to the time indicated by the poetic French epitaph written on one almost as lovely: —

"Rose, elle a vécu ce que vivent les Roses, L'espace d'un jour!"

They were still talking of this young Italian and her genius; and Sir Douglas was murmuring to himself the Scriptural words, "When the ear heard her, it blessed her," — less with any thought of Gordigiani's angel-daughter, or a yet fitter reference to "works of necessity, piety, and charity," than in remembrance of the tremulous contralto of the English girl at his side, — when a wild shriek, followed by that wonderful amount of exclamatory appeals to Madonnas and Saints of different altars, common among the Italians, startled them into attention.

The carriages were to meet them at a given point, and they had been traversing part of their road upon mules; Gertrude riding by her mother, till they had paused to gaze at the town and beach, and then falling a little into the rear with Lorimer and Sir Douglas while speaking of Gordigiani's music; the Rufos with their friends coming next; and Kenneth and Lady Charlotte a little in advance. Lady Charlotte was in high spirits, replying to Kenneth's constant persiflage with more aplomb than usual; pricking her mule from time to time with the coral points of her white silk parasol, and laughing foolishly like a school-girl at any little difficulties in the route. Presently the mule suddenly stopped. "Oh, you obstinacy, won't you take me on 'cause I'm such a giddy thing?" giggled the rider, giving a final prod at the mule's ear with the ornamented parasol. The steel of the light parasol snapped; the sharp end entered the ear of the animal, which swerved, put its head down, and set off at a pace anything but safe or pleasant in poor Lady Charlotte's opinion. All the other mules, accustomed to act in concert with parties of sight-seers, set off at a like pace. Lady Charlotte screamed, the guides shouted, and a perfect Babel of voices sent up prayers to heaven for protection, mingled with curses of the poor beast on earth. Kenneth at first leaned back in his saddle in a fit of inextinguishable laughter at the ridicule of the whole scene. Fat Count Rufo, pulling in vain at the hard mouth of his monture, and bounding in his saddle like an India-rubber ball; his pretty countess laughing also, as she careered along, flying past Kenneth with her ancles much more exposed than at the decent commencement of her ride; the German couple, also at full speed, looking helplessly at each other as they fled together like the hapless pair in Bürger's Leonora; and Lady Charlotte, the primary cause of all this erratic disturbance, making involuntary soubresauts on and off her frightened mule, such as are performed by light and nimble professionals for the entertainment of the audience at Astley's.

But all laughter was merged in fear, when the mule made a false step on a path close to the precipice, that crumbled beneath its tread; then scrambled to recover its footing, unseating Lady Charlotte in the operation, and dragging her a few yards, pinned by many folds of careful shawling, and so utterly unable to extricate herself. Before the sharp, bitter shriek from Gertrude had died thrillingly on the air, the gentlemen of the party had reached the poor frightened woman, and rescued her from further danger. Sir Douglas had been first; leaping from his mule, which he suffered to roam at large, and not attempting the dangerous experiment of riding after her. They were close to Sorrento, close to the Hotel di

Tasso, where already rooms and refreshments had been ordered in anticipation of their arrival. Lady Charlotte was easily carried there, and laid, half-fainting from fright and shock—but not otherwise the worse of her Mazeppa-like career—on a chaise longue in one of the bedrooms.

Kenneth helped to carry her in, and with a returning smile, congratulated Gertrude on her mother's safety. Gertrude smiled too, vaguely, with a confused, tearful look at Kenneth, in acknowledgment of being spoken to, rather than as hearing the exact words; and then Kenneth Ross retreated to compliment and re-assure pretty Countess Rufo, and Gertrude knelt down by her mother. Sir Douglas was still arranging pillows and shawls. If he had been waiting upon the venerable and unfortunate Queen Amelie of France, he could not have attended to her with more tender respect. He paused, and looked down on her as she lay. Gertrude's mother! That useless—inestimable life! As he paused, the kneeling girl looked up at him; she voluntarily extended her hand to clasp his. "Oh! I thank you so!" was all she said.

The warmth of the sun, when it glitters through rain in those warm southern climes, when the rapid storms are over, and the red geranium and pale violet take glory from its rays—what was it to the warmth of Gertrude's eyes, shining through their haze of agitated tears! Her gaze thrilled the heart of him she addressed; his hand trembled as it pressed hers. Here, that white hand with its modelled fingers—

"Loveliely tapering less and less,"— whose graceful and nimble passage over the notes of the piano he had so often watched in the accompaniments to her welcome songs. He blessed her mentally for the eager movement which had so given it, warm and gloveless, into his cordial grasp; and whether after that sudden clasping it was dropped by him, or withdrawn by her, he was made too giddy by such contact to remember.

It must have been withdrawn; for one spectator whom both had forgotten—Lorimer Boyd—passed his hand over his brow with a sense of pain, and muttered—"She is in love with Douglas!"

In love? No girl "in love" would leave her hand to be clasped as friendship only, with its firm light satisfied hold, should clasp it, if that electric thrill which flashes loves' messages from heart to heart told her she either loved or was beloved. Let us then believe, for Sir Douglas's sake, that the white hand was withdrawn, and that the trembling downcast look with which Gertrude listened to his further re-assurances (made in rather a different voice from usual), as to Lady Charlotte's condition, resulted rather from tender embarrassment than from any lingering misgiving as to her mother's danger.

Lady Charlotte had indeed sustained no hurt. Her extreme fragility and slenderness had caused her to fall so lightly, that not a bruise was discoverable beyond a little abrasion on one of her wrists; and the quantity of soft shawls of very rich texture, slipping with her as she fell, made a sort of cradle for her head and shoulders during the brief interval of risk, when she was dragged along the path by the rocks.

"But it might have been very serious; I might even have been killed, mightn't I?" she repeated over and over again, not without a little feeling of pleasure at having been the heroine of so dangerous an adventure. And as often as Gertrude assented, and pressed her lips on the faded face, with—"It might, indeed, my poor little mother!" so often did Lady Charlotte, with a sort of cooing murmur of pity for herself, assiduously smoothe and twine round her finger the ringlet, which had been made terribly dusty and unsightly during the cubute of its possessor, and had required more than ordinary care to restore it to form and brightness. The Hotel di Tasso overhangs the sea, and on that side at least there is comparative silence. Lady Charlotte, therefore, wearied by her inauspicious ride, and lulled by the sound of gently-lapping waves far beneath the windows, and by the heat of the afternoon sun, carefully as it was shut and shaded from her, soon fell fast asleep. For a short interval Sir Douglas and Gertrude remained motionless, listening to her measured, slumberous breathings. Then he proposed to her daughter to come out, to join the rest of the party, who had already braved both heat and fatigue, and clambered to the Capo di Sorrento: and they sallied forth, not unwilling to enjoy their walk according to the implication conveyed in that sweet Irishism, "alone together," the "presque seule" of the pretty French widow, who was asked if she was going alone into the country.

And now all again was gladness, and all again was bloom and beauty; wild flowers sparkled along the shore, even the to very verge of Neptune's domain. On the lovely headland grew tufted patches of myrtle, and the tall pointed white heather which gleams like the ghost of some unknown harvest of another world. Down in the dream-land, under the far away sea, lay shifting shadows of broken white fragments, which are held to be (and why should they churlishly doubt it?) remnants of palaces and temples, over which the waters have closed, as over O'Donoghue and his white horse and valiant retainers in our own island of fairy traditions. Fatigue was unfelt; that air of which the elder Tasso spoke — “ Si vitale, che gl' uomini che senza provar, Altro cielo ci vivono, sono quasi immortali,” fanned their faces, and made the very act of breathing a pleasure.

“ Up the heather mountain and down the craggy brae,” undesiring of further rest than frequent pauses to take their fill of gazing, or to listen laughingly to some pretty peasant, some distaff spinning matron, some bouquet-giving child, all vainly endeavouring to explain in their curious patois, requests to the sight-seers which resolved themselves most distinctly into an unromantic act of mendicancy, — the gay party reunited on their homeward course; and arrived at the hotel to find Lady Charlotte alert, and recovered; only too willing to hear from Sir Douglas the mournful romance of the poet Tasso's mad love for the high-born princess, whose ducal brother had him imprisoned in darkness and solitude for years to expiate his presumption; and his miserable return, after insane and wretched years, to his sister and the old half-forgotten home.

And when that romance in prose was ended, Countess Rufo's German friend repeated Schiller's wonderful ballad of “The Diver,” and his wife sang one of the sweet wild songs, whose harmonies are indeed “songs without words.” And after that, on low pleading from Sir Douglas, and urging from all the rest, Gertrude sang.

Some irresistible fancy of the moment urged Sir Douglas to inquire if she had ever heard the ballad of which he recollected the one verse of farewell, as sung by his mother. Yes, she knew it; but even she could not recollect all the words. She did not think it was a complete ballad, but an old fragment of a song of exile; not, she said, from a “foreign” shore, as Sir Douglas had it, but the “Irish shore,” and without further preface she began it, in the clear, rich voice he loved so to hear.

And while they listened, the day departed, and the moon fell on the unruffled sea; where the fisherman's tiny barks flashed, gleaming for a moment, and turned their sails again to shadow. The mountains rose beyond, dark and majestic, and the huge form of Vesuvius slept, unlit by its fiery torch, in the white light of the moon. The oars ceased to sound; the voices from the shore became less frequent; the very waves seemed to come more and more softly to the sands, till at length there seemed but one sound left on earth — her voice!

The broken fragment of a song is in many an old collection: —

“ A lightsome heart, a soldier's mien,
And a feather of the blue;
Were all of me you knew, dear love,
Were all of me you knew!

“ Now all is done that man can do,
And all is done in vain;
My love, my native land, adieu,
For we ne'er can meet again.

“ He turned him round and right about
All on the Irish shore;
He gave his bridle reins a shake,
With Adieu for evermore, my love,
Adieu for evermore!”

The tender tremulousness of the last line, and the beauty of her face looking dreamily out over the sea as she sang, melted the heart of more than one of her listeners. But no one spoke to her of her song except Sir Douglas, and he said to her, in a choked, passionate voice, “If I thought it were ‘adieu for evermore’ between us — in lieu of a sweet, sorrowful dream — I should go mad!”

It was a declaration of love, like any other; or unlike any other, for no two declarations of love are alike, any more than any two leaves on a tree, or human faces, or voices, or even the handwriting of different persons, can be alike.

And though Kenneth and Lorimer Boyd and Count Rufo and the ladies of that happy party all spoke to Gertrude afterwards, she could not have told what any of them had said, except that at last she heard her mother say, in her softest canary-bird voice, “Well, and what shall we do to-morrow?” And Sir Douglas said, “I have business in the morning, but late in the day we might go to Amalfi, and stay a day or two there.”

CHAPTER IX.

A LIFE OF PLEASURE.

BUSINESS in the morning. That special morning had long been dedicated to the final examination and arrangement of Kenneth's difficulties, at least so far as his continental tour was concerned. And now there was yet something else which his uncle desired to talk over with him, beyond and above the unpalatable fact that he must confine his expenses to his own means, and expect no more of this system of what he carelessly termed "clearing" him, henceforth and for ever.

Sir Douglas arrived at Kenneth's apartment on the Chiaja very early, very anxious, rather weary, and thoroughly resolved. He had begun to think there was some truth in the severe opinion expressed by his friend Lorimer Boyd, that the great misfortune of Kenneth's life was his uncle's indulgence.

"Of course," that friend had said, "as long as you put a feather-bed for him to fall upon, he will pitch head-foremost like a harlequin, into every scrape and trap on the stage of existence. Leave him to suffer consequences. Either he is capable or incapable of self-conduct. In the one case all your love and pains won't save him, and in the other he will at last find his real level. If I had had an idea you were so in your dotage about this lad, Douglas, I declare I never would have written to you. I expected you to come down upon him in a stern, dignified, offended-guardian sort of way, and here you are for all the world like a nursing mother, whose precious babe has had a tumble! Do, for God's sake, let this be the last time that you actually help him to escape from the only lesson his careless mind can profit by — namely, bitter experience."

There was truth in these words; and they beat hotly in Sir Douglas's ears, as he turned restlessly on his pillow the night they returned from Sorrento. The hours of that night passed on from silvery moonlight to the blue dawn and the crimson glory of sunrise, without bringing him needful rest. There was too much in the day that was coming, and the day that had passed, for night to be anything but a bar or a gap to divide those intervals.

When the morning stir of life began once more, — early as such life begins in the streets of Naples, — Sir Douglas bathed, dressed, and went out. Even if Kenneth was not yet up, he would wait. His nephew's manner, the previous evening, had rather wounded him. It was saucy, sullen, and dissatisfied. It was easy to see that he thought himself maltreated, and his uncle officious in the matter of Lady Charlotte. Kenneth knew that Gertrude disliked and resented any overt disrespect to her mother, yet he could not for the life of him abstain. He thought Lady Charlotte ridiculous, and he showed that he thought her so. He thought Gertrude neglectful of him, and almost, in her calm way, repellant to him the evening before. He was accustomed to be flattered and caressed. He had bid them all good night very curtly, getting out of the carriage in the Chiaja, instead of seeing them to the Villa Mandorlo, and had walked away with a cigar in his mouth, — looking so like his handsome wilful father, that instead of feeling angry, foolish Sir Douglas looked after him with aching tenderness and intense good-will!

On arriving at his lodgings on this particular morning, not only Sir Douglas did not find Kenneth up (that perhaps with his habits was scarcely to be expected), but it was doubtful, from the hesitating manner of the servant, whether he had been in at all, since the previous day. Sir Douglas said little to the man, and passed into the room which had been the scene of his first interview and useless lecture. Breakfast was laid, as then; but not yet touched. All was in the same sort of order, or disorder. The very sunshine appeared to be lying in stereotyped lines on the parquet floor. Sir Douglas threw himself into a lounge chair by the window, and once more thought over all he meant to say to his nephew; putting it into the most patient loving words he could frame.

Gradually the silence and warmth, after the rapid morning walk and long wakeful night, had their effect in spite of anxiety; and Kenneth's uncle slept as soundly as Lady Charlotte had done after her adventure with the recalcitrant mule at Sorrento.

It is Lord Brougham's theory (and it is also the theory of other thinkers on the same subject) that dreams occupy only a few moments before our waking, and that during their brief passage through the brain, they blend and connect themselves with outward objects of sense and sound. In proof of which, he says, you have only to go and run a pin sharply into a slumbering friend, and he will inform you, as he starts into consciousness, that he had dreamed for a considerable time; that he has, in fact, had a very long dream of being attacked by robbers in a wood, or otherwise wounded, — with all graphic and interesting details; all depending on that cruel little poke with a pin which you privately know you had experimentally inflicted upon him!

Sir Douglas dreamed a very pleasant dream, of wandering in Paradise with Gertrude (and without Lady Charlotte) through interminable groves of orange-trees, white with blossom and golden with fruit, while, — beyond a sort of rainbow caused by the spray of innumerable fountains, for ever rising and falling and lapping against basins of white marble carved with wreaths of immense lilies — forms of angelic grace, in shimmering vestments of the faintest and most delicate colours, sung to their golden harps in a most ravishing manner; ending always with the burthen "Here, there is peace!"

Just as he was straining his dreaming ear for words he could not catch — owing apparently to the very indistinct pronunciation of these agreeable angels — something struck him, lightly but sharply, on the temple; and again immediately afterwards on the cheek.

He started and woke; but so strange was the scene acting round him, that for a minute he fancied that also must be a dream.

A woman shabbily dressed, with resplendent black eyes, and a thin black silk shawl carelessly adjusted over shoulders very obviously deformed, was picking out from manuscript notation a melody of Blumen-thal's for the guitar. A young girl (scarcely in courtesy to be called a young lady), rather pretty, very pale, and dirty and neglected in her dress, sat at the breakfast-table, picking the bones of a chicken; not ungracefully, though she picked them in her fingers and seemed exceedingly hungry. Another "young lady," still prettier, still paler, and (if possible) in a still more neglected toilette, sat perched on the scroll-work end of the stiff satin sofa opposite Sir Douglas's chair. It is to be presumed she was less hungry than her companion, since her occupation was biting off with her very even white teeth the budding oranges and orange-flowers from a large branch she held in her hand, and aiming at the sleeper with these fragrant pellets.

When this young nymph beheld his amazed eyes open and fix themselves upon her, she leaped from her perch with a lithe activity which even Zizine could not have surpassed, and shrieking out, "si sveglia! si sveglia!" — with a peal of laughter re-echoing by the other occupants of the apartment, she flitted to the furthest end, where a heavy portière of yellow silk divided the outer from the inner chamber; and folding the massive brocade round her, so as only to leave her laughing head visible, seemed to expect that the victim she had so unceremoniously attacked would start from his trance and follow her. Perceiving after a little breathless pause that this was not to be, she flung the curtains behind her, and returned, making first a few slow steps on the very tips of her toes, then the light and rapid run performed by ballet-dancers, then three or four pirouettes in succession, and a profound curtsy as a finale. During the bewildered moment that followed, while Sir Douglas, feeling his situation already sufficiently absurd, looked angrily round for his hat, she skipped, cat-like, into one of the great armchairs, and stood up in it as in a rostrum, leaning her arms over the cushioned back, with a roll of music which she had snatched up on the way, and with mock gravity of recitation commenced an oration.

"Stimatissimo Signore," said she in a most nasal Neapolitan patois, "we rejoice and felicitate you on having slumbered so well, and we hope!"

What further foolery they might have performed cannot be known, since just as Sir Douglas attempted to leave the room, with the courtesy — even to them — of a bow which should include the trio, and amid renewed peals of mocking laughter, the door opened and Kenneth came in.

Kenneth!

His aspect in that bright Italian morning could scarcely be surpassed in degradation. Staggering drunk; his eyes bloodshot and stupefied; his hair dishevelled; his dress neglected and disordered; his face almost as pale as those of the wild intruders already present, he stood, swaying to and fro, with the handle of the door in his hand, apparently attempting to comprehend what was going on in his rooms. The door, like many in the old palaces of Naples, was overlaid with tarnished but richly-patterned gilding; and beyond it was another of the heavy yellow satin brocade portières. He stood there like a picture set in a wondrous frame. His youth, his exceeding beauty, the grace and strength of his form, only made his present state of untidy helplessness the more saddening. It was a horrible vision! There was a moment of suspense during which all stood still. Then his countenance, which had worn a sort of puzzled, embarrassed, idiotic smile of greeting, suddenly assumed an expression of savage anger as he turned slowly from looking at Sir Douglas, and fixed his dull red eyes on the group of women, now huddled together, the elder adjusting her shawl and rolling up her manuscript music, as if in the act of departure.

"How dare you come here? how many hundred times have I forbid your coming here in the morning?" muttered the half-conscious drunkard in broken Italian.

"You told me on the contrary last night to come to breakfast, and that you would give me a good breakfast," whimpered the girl, who had been seated at the table picking chicken-bones.

"You told me you would like to practise that barcarole, and besides, Signore, to-night is my benefit!" rapidly protested the elder of the three; "and I wanted, therefore, to see your Excellency." Then they both spoke together, with loud, shrill, vehement chattering; till the nimble dancer who had awakened Sir Douglas by flinging orange blossoms, and who had hitherto sat dangling her feet from the arm of the great chair, as a mere looker-on, interfered, and struck up the hand Kenneth had extended towards them in angry gesticulation, with the words, "Val tu sei ubriaco come un porco"—"You're as drunk as a hog." Kenneth seized her by the arm.

"Who says I am drunk? Who dares to say I'm drunk?" shouted he; "you shall be punished—you shall be imprisoned."

"Lascia!" exclaimed the girl, releasing her arm from his grasp, and looking him contemptuously in the face—"e dormi!" "Bestia!" added she in a tone of disgust, as she shook her arm free, and attempted to pass him.

There was a moment when Sir Douglas actually expected Kenneth would return her insult with a blow. He made a step forwards—Kenneth's arm dropped heavily by his side, but he continued to look at the girl with a dull glare of anger.

"Go!" said he. "Get out, all of you!"

"What a polite Signore!" said the dancer, with a forced laugh; "ah! there is no one like an Englishman for fine manners."

"Go!" shouted the drunkard, with an infuriated stamp of his foot; still leaning on the lock of the door with his left hand.

"At your pleasure!" bowed the girl, mockingly; and she followed her frightened companions out on the staircase. As she passed she turned her pale pretty head, as the head of the Cenci is turned in the famous picture, and snapped her fingers at him with a gesture of derision and defiance common among the lower orders of the Neapolitans, and which those who study books of chiromancy can find and practise if they please.

There are occasions in life in which what we think beauty seems to wear the devil's stamp on it, and becomes repulsive instead of attractive.

Such an occasion was the present! Impossible to be more regularly and perfectly beautiful than Kenneth Ross: he might have been painted as an ideal Apollo. Impossible to have thrown more intense grace of attitude into any action than was shown in that pallid girl's vulgar and unseemly farewell. But the effect of all this grace and beauty,—under the circumstances,—on the sole spectator was as if he had been struck down by some demoniac spell.

As the door closed on that departing group Sir Douglas sank back in his chair, and covered his face with his hands. Kenneth also seated himself with a staggering gait, and, leaning both arms across the breakfast-table, addressed Sir Douglas; clipping his husky words, and alternately attempting to stand, and dropping back into his seat.

"You think, I suppose, that these people ain't—ain't r'spectable? They are r'spectable! Wife of leader of orchestra,—great friend of mine, and leader of orchestra. You couldn't lead orchestra, for all you give yourself such connoisseur airs about music. Quite r'spectable. Could you lead orchestra, now? Come, I say, could you, uncle? and he laughed an idiotic laugh.

"O Kenneth, go to bed, and end this scene."

"No, I won't go to bed. You think I'm drunk. I'm not drunk. D—— it, do you think you're to come the schoolmaster for ever over me, as if I were ten years old? I ain't drunk. I know all about it. I know that—that to-day's Tuesday; and we're—we're going to settle accounts. There! is that drunk? And we're going—going to Amalfi—going to pick up old ladies who can't ride,—can't eh? Going to—Amalfi. All right; let's go to—to Amalfi; only don't say I'm drunk; and don't set old mother Skifton saying I'm drunk; nor Ger—Ger"—

Sir Douglas sprang to his feet. "Wretched boy!" exclaimed he, "don't dare to utter her name."

Then recovering himself, he repeated sadly, "O Kenneth, go to your room; go to bed; I'll not irritate you by any observations; if you're not drunk, at least you are not well. We can't talk business while you are in this state. We will put off business till to-morrow. I will return for you later. It is very early still; you will get some hours of sleep. Give me your hand. There, go to your room. Good-bye for the present. Go and rest."

The cigar-smoking valet bowed Sir Douglas out, muttering, with obsequious smiles, that he would give "remedies;" that his young excellency had unfortunately "met some friends" late last night, and that the "friends" often persuaded his young excellency to excesses he would not otherwise think of; winding up (in the inevitable style of Italian flattery) that he was sure the young excellency, in reality, would have greatly preferred being with his beloved and illustrious uncle, to all other society, in Naples, or elsewhere.

The story of Kenneth's evening would indeed have amazed that sober uncle! Going towards his lodgings in a very discontented frame of mind, he had met with and joined a group of those so-called "friends," returning from the theatre of San Carlo. The rest of the night was spent by all in gambling, drinking, and dissipation. When day-dawn was near, he had again lost sums that for him were enormous. The two men who were the largest winners were all for departing with their gains. Kenneth objected: he claimed his revanche, and appealed to the others. A hot dispute ensued, some of those present being for dispersing, and some thinking Kenneth's proposal no more than reasonable. A young Portuguese nobleman, whose reputation for riches had made him the centre of a certain circle of wild young men, then took the side of the loser. He insisted on remaining and sharing the fate of the revanche with Kenneth. They staked and lost, staked and won, staked and lost again. At length one of their boon companions addressed the Portuguese in a bantering tone, "Come, Marquis, you are out of luck; try once more, — any stake you please, — and that shall end it." The young man looked round, set his teeth with a strange smile, and said, "Well! I'll win it all back with a yard or two of cambric. Mr. Ross, will you go halves in my luck? Two throws of the dice; that won't greatly delay us."

Yes; Kenneth would go halves in the stakes. What was it to be?

The young Marquis rapidly divested himself of his coat and waistcoat, drew over his head one of those wonderfully embroidered Parisian shirts, which he coolly informed the company had cost him seven hundred francs; * observed with a scoffing laugh, as he took his stand by the gaming-table, that his present costume closely resembled that of an English gentleman about to engage in a boxing-match (a sport in which foreigners believe we continually indulge), and then threw the dice. In a few minutes his adversaries, who had thought the scene infinitely diverting, looked rather grave: they had had their throws, and lost.

He had won back the greater portion of the sums they had hoped to divide amongst them.

He lifted the embroidered dandy garment from the table, tossed it over his arm, made a salute full of gay irony to the company, retired to re-invest himself with the usual amount of clothing, and was heard, a few minutes later, humming an air from the opera of the evening, as he passed down the Tolédo on his way to his hotel.

Kenneth had departed with him; having drunk almost too deeply to stand or walk, and with a dim sense, even then, of shame and annoyance, increased, as we have seen, to more intense irritation by the scene which awaited him in his apartments.

Shrouded now in luxurious curtains, his head feeling as though blistered with fire, and with just enough sense remaining for sullen consciousness of pain, — cursing his folly, his valet, and the remedies by which the latter proposed to put him in a condition to re-appear creditably in the course of the afternoon, — Kenneth remained for blank hours "resting" in his disordered apartment; while Sir Douglas, once more stepping out into the morning light, directed his steps to the quarter of Sta-Lucia, and to the verandas of the Villa Mandóro.

"There," thought he, as he looked at the pleasant sunshine falling on the white walls, "there, at least, dwells such an image of peace, purity, and quiet affection, as might mend any man's broken trust in the goodness of human nature."

* This anecdote is a fact.

IN LODGINGS AT KNIGHTSBRIDGE.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART I.

MRS. DEVLIN was an Irishwoman, and a widow. In the first of these capacities she was attractive; in the second, she was resigned. I cannot say of my own certain knowledge that she regarded the decease of Devlin as "no loss;" but there was a busy sprightliness about the little woman, a cheerful self-reliant content in her face, in her manner, in her movements, and a tone of satisfaction with the arrangements of the world in general, and those which affected her own lot in particular, which led me to form such a conclusion. I had known Mrs. Devlin prior to her widowhood; but I had never seen the late Mark, who had been an out-pensioner of his wife's from the time at which she became forewoman of Mrs. Jackson's ready-made-linen and stay warehouse at Knightsbridge, and had died before she had succeeded to the business. Mrs. Jackson was Honor Devlin's aunt; and I have occasionally thought that had her niece been still in the enjoyment of conjugal bliss, Mrs. Jackson (who was a spinster, and Mrs. by brevet only) would not have made her unconditionally her sole heir. As it was, the old lady had done a very wise thing, and Honor Devlin carried on the business with probity, activity, and success. I and mine had been customers of Mrs. Jackson's for many years; and when I united my destinies with my dear James Penniford, and thereby incurred the lasting reprobation of my aunt, Lady Moore, and my uncle, General Croxholm — for James was only a junior partner in a solicitor's firm of no great distinction, and our house was situated in that unfashionable and uninteresting locality, Bedford Row — I had also recourse to Mrs. Devlin for the articles in her line for my modest trousseau. Some years have elapsed since then, and the trousseau, through the exertions of the laundress and the flux of time, has disappeared; but I am still a steady customer of the tidy shop at Knightsbridge, where Mrs. Devlin presides in her own right, and over a forewoman whom I remember a blooming, idle, clever girl, and carries on a business much increased and expedited by the lately-invented sewing-machine. It is a long way from Bedford Row to Knightsbridge, and I do not very often see Mrs. Devlin; but whenever I go to her shop, we make a regular gossiping occasion of it, and all other customers are handed over to the subordinates. It fell out one day, while the International Exhibition was open, that my nurse came to me with the melancholy intelligence that Master James was destitute of pinafores — "which there ain't no keeping of him in sich, ma'am, I do assure you," said nurse hurriedly, lest I should confound her with remonstrances and dates of purchase; "what with a hinking of 'em when his par will let him into his study, and never takes no notice of him, which he comes out a awful sight most mornings, and what with a-tearing of 'em with his saw and cutting of 'em with his chisel — and them there tool-chests is the mischevouousest toys as ever was brought into a nus'ry — the poor child ain't fit to be seen."

I happened to want some little patterns just then, and I told nurse that I would call at Mrs. Devlin's and select them, and also the newest form of pinafores for James, on my return from the Exhibition. As I was speaking, a letter was handed to me. It was from James's aunt, Mrs. Carter; a very nice but peculiar old lady, who lived in Somersetshire, and maintained a discreet distance between herself and her relations. Not that she was unkind; on the contrary, her accurate recollection of birthdays was something wonderful, and her congratulations invariably took the shape of large hampers, liberally filled, carefully packed, and punctually carriage paid. She never came on a visit to us, and when we had our autumn holiday she never invited us to spend it with her; but said very candidly she was an oddity, and could neither sacrifice her own old ways nor ask any one else to put up with them.

"I am coming up to see the Exhibition," wrote the old lady; "though the building is hideous, and the interior arrangement, judging by the pictures of it, detestable. The telescope-and-the-pickle trophy ought to keep me away, and would do so but that I am too old to go to Rome to see the Cleopatra and the Sibyl, and you have got them there, and I want to see them and the tinted Venus before I die. There is a picture or two also I want to look at; and one can keep out of the middle of the big Barn if one likes, I suppose, as I certainly shall like. Now, my dear Margaret, you and James will at once think of inviting me to your house; I beg you will not lose time, and retard the real service you will do me, by making an invitation I will not accept. I shall see you and James very often, I hope, while I remain in town; but I will not stay as a guest in your house or in that of any other person. What you can do for me is this: to look for lodgings for me within an easy and reasonable distance of the Exhibition Barn, and where, if possible, I may get sight of the Park or Kensington Gardens. I want quiet tidy rooms for myself and old Joan, who has forgotten her grumbling and her rheumatism in the prospect of seeing London. I fancy she and I are brisker and more energetic than you are; for I find it is the mode nowadays for young people to affect the lassitude and indifference which in my time old people would have been ashamed of. But I don't want to reform the world,—only to enjoy a glimpse of it; so take the lodgings from Monday next. Tell the people to expect me at 6 P.M., and to have something for dinner; don't be there to meet me, but come at 12 on Tuesday. Take the lodgings as soon as possible, and send me the address at once.—Yours affectionately,

ANNE CARTER.

"P.S. I shall bring Corporal Trim; if I left him here, he would have too much meat and no exercise. I will pay extra for him if required; but I will not go without him, and there must be no children or cats in the house."

It was six o'clock on a brilliant June day when I found myself seated in Mrs. Devlin's shop, and looking over a variety of small and, to the uninitiated, mysterious articles,—all my needs in which the brisk little woman understood as well as I did. I had made my selection, and was exchanging some friendly words with her previous to leaving, when my eye fell on the address of a parcel on the counter, "Mrs. Cringle, Elm House, Taunton, Somerset." It recalled Mrs. Carter's letter, and the task of lodging-hunting: Mrs. Devlin was the very person to assist me. My difficulty explained to her, she assumed the look of consideration from which good counsel resulted.

"Two sitting-rooms, ma'am, and a large bedroom—a glimpse of the Park, no children, no cats?" I nodded assent. "Well, ma'am, I don't know all in a minute like. I suppose it would not do for the lady to be over a shop?"

"Well, no; I think not," I said, "unless I cannot do better. But what lodgings do you know of over a shop? I might see them, at all events."

She turned her frank gray Irish eyes upon me, saying with a smile, "Why, then, I was just thinking of my own, ma'am. The lady that's in them is going away on Thursday. She gave me leave to put a bill up; but I would not, for she is delicate and in trouble, and would have been disturbed by people; and there is no fear but that they will be let quick enough when she is gone."

It occurred to me very strongly as Mrs. Devlin was speaking, that the very best arrangement I could make for Mrs. Carter's comfort would be to take these rooms. I had not seen them; but I felt assured they must be clean, comfortable, and well-ordered, merely because they belonged to Mrs. Devlin. The back-windows looked to the Park, and the front to Wilton Place; so there was plenty of air. The brisk little Irishwoman had no children, and I did not suspect her of a partiality to cats. The shop certainly did constitute an objection, but one not sufficiently strong to counter-balance the advantages the arrangement offered. I could easily make the old lady understand the season was an exceptional one; and that all things considered, she could not do better. I proposed to Mrs. Devlin that she should show me the rooms; and passing through a side-door opening from the shop, I found myself at the foot of a narrow flight of stairs covered with bright green and white carpet. Through the window on the landing, I saw trees in the Park, and caught glimpses of the carriages and the equestrians. Another short flight brought us to the door of the drawing-room, at which Mrs. Devlin knocked, was bidden to enter by a low voice, and she did so. I heard her ask permission to show the rooms to a lady, and an assenting answer given. Then she returned to the door, and asked me to walk in. I entered a square tolerably-sized room, plainly but comfortably furnished, and scrupulously clean. A glance round it was sufficient to show me it would suit Mrs. Carter, who was indifferent to luxury, but inexorable on the score of cleanliness. The windows were open, but the blinds were down, and in the softened light I saw the occupant of the apartment, who was standing by a chair; and as she bent her head in graceful salutation to me, my impression was that I had never seen so beautiful a face, and I have never changed that opinion; and when, the same evening, I would have described her to James, I felt my description was utterly futile and commonplace. When I said she was tall and slight; that her head was small, and had a peculiar alertness in its pose and movement; that her skin was of a rich drosky tinge, the true line of the European brunette; and that her eyes were like brown velvet in colour, but as full of light as of softness; that her hair was lustrously black and silken; that her brows were broad and low, and indicative of intellect and will,—I had told him all I could, and yet I felt that all was just nothing. She was dressed in the deepest and plainest mourning, and totally without ornament, except that on her left hand she wore a heavy seal-ring, more fitted to a man's than to her delicate hand. Books, papers, and manuscript-music lay upon the tables, a cottage-piano stood open, and on the keys lay a handkerchief, a scrap of paper, and a pencil, and close to the half-open folding-door stood a large French travelling-trunk closed, with the straps thrown loosely upon it. The impress of refinement was upon the young lady and all her surroundings. In her manner, when receiving my apology for disturbing her, there was sweet well-bred simplicity, but no embarrassment or self-consciousness. She stepped forward to open the folding-doors that I might see the room beyond. I assured her it was unnecessary, and withdrew. When Mrs. Devlin and I had climbed the next flight of stairs, and I found myself in a large, well-ordered, airy, and evidently unoccupied bedroom, I said,

"The young lady only occupies the drawing-rooms, then?"

"Only them, ma'am," replied Mrs. Devlin, "since her pa died in this very room a month ago."

It was a very nice room,—just the thing for Mrs. Carter,—though it occurred to me it would be as well to say nothing to her of the death of her predecessor, knowing that old people, and occasionally young people too, have their own peculiar notions on such subjects, and prefer to ignore death as a polite fiction in any intimate relationship.

"Had she and her father been long with you?" I asked.

"Just three months. Captain Dallas was his name, and he was not long home from India, I know; for Miss Winifred told me he had taken her from school in the Regent's Park when he came back, and that is not more than a year ago. They were going to France, only for the poor Captain's illness—something in the head, caused by an old wound, as far as I can understand—and they stayed here to be near his doctor, who saw him every day, but could do nothing for him. He was very gentle and quiet, to be sure; and Miss Winifred is a brave young lady."

"It must have been very sad for her," I said; "but I suppose her friends came to her. Yet it seems strange she should have remained here so long."

I felt ashamed of my inquisitiveness; and yet it was rather interest, awakened by that beautiful face, than mere curiosity.

Mrs. Devlin seemed pleased rather than shocked, as she replied in her own brisk way, "La, ma'am! I know nothing about her friends. No one ever came here, except the doctor, the lawyer, and the clergyman. She had no help or comfort, but such as I could give her, poor thing; and that was not much."

I thought otherwise, and said so; but the cheerful little woman put aside my praise, and chatting about other things, we descended into the shop.

Mrs. Devlin hailed one of the myriad cabs which pervaded Knightsbridge at that time, put me and my parcels into it, audibly instructed me as to the correct amount of the fare to Bedford Row, for the admission of the cabman, and I drove away, having given directions that the rooms should be prepared for Mrs. Carter by the following Monday.

Mrs. Carter graciously approved of all that I had done, and duly notified her arrival at Mrs. Devlin's by the following characteristic note, written on the Monday night a few hours after her arrival :

"Knightsbridge, 9 P.M.

"MY DEAR MARGARET, — The lodgings are nice, but noisy. The noise cannot be helped; it makes Corporal Trim bark at present — he thinks it announces burglars — but he will get used to it by and by, and so shall I, no doubt. Joan was tired and cross; but she could not resist your nice little Irishwoman, who had every thing so comfortable for us, even to some roses in the vases on the chimney-piece, lest we might 'miss the country,' she said. The dinner was capital. I believe she 'has an eye' to the cooking; though how she can attend to the shop and her lodgers also, I am unable to understand. She has a happy knack of selecting servants too. I did not think London could boast anything so clean, tidy, and modest, as the damsel who waits on us. Somersetshire too! Joan is quite at home with her. Be punctual tomorrow. I don't mean to go to the Barn till Wednesday, and you shall come with me.—

Yours ever,

A. C."

James's aunt was a handsome well-preserved old lady, of upwards of fifty. She was very clever, and had been all her life a great reader. I knew little of her story but its outlines, in which there was nothing remarkable. She was the only sister of my husband's father, and had married when she had passed her first youth a country-gentleman much older than herself, who died in the fifth year of their marriage, leaving her all his unentailed property, of which a considerable portion consisted of land. She had no children, few relatives, and none but distant connections on her husband's side, with whom I understand she kept up little or no intercourse. She was a very agreeable woman, — good, charitable, and popular; but I always fancied she had a strong spice of obstinacy in her character, though I had no personal knowledge of the fact. I was led to think so in consequence of having learned from James that his aunt had persisted against his opinion, and that of her late husband's advisers, in selling the land which he had bequeathed to her, and purchasing a small estate near Taunton, which she had bought at far too high a price, as they believed. "And why she wanted to go and live there," James had said when he told me the circumstance, "I cannot make out.

If it were her father's old place, where she had lived as a girl, I could understand it; though even that would be very sentimental for Aunt Anne, whom I always considered a most unsentimental person. Old Carter was not likely to cultivate any thing of that kind in her disposition, I should think." Be that as it might, and whatever her motive, Mrs. Carter purchased Woodlee, put all the buildings into thorough repair, let the land, with the exception of the pretty pleasure-ground surrounding the house, and established herself there in a style of unpretending but very substantial dowager comfort, which did not imply the expenditure of her income, as we supposed it to be, or any thing like it. To be sure, we may have been mistaken in our calculation; people are apt to be so liberal in their estimate of the wealth of others, especially when it is right and reasonable that some of it should come their way. In one respect Mrs. Carter formed an exception to well-dowered widows. No one ever speculated upon the probabilities for or against her contracting a second marriage. This was unaccountable; but it was the case. She was only forty years old when Mr. Carter had followed his harmless ancestors to their irreproachably respectable family-vault. She was rich, handsome, and popular. She was not accredited by the voice of society with a broken heart or buried affections; she never talked sentiment, or indeed cant of any kind; she never bored any body about the beloved departed; and she left off her weeds, like a sensible woman, at the end of the period prescribed for practical persons who do not desire to be nuisances to their neighbours. She had been a good sensible wife, and she continued to be a good sensible widow; and I am quite sure it never occurred to any one, not even to a half-pay officer, or an elderly curate, that he might induce her to change her condition. She was a just and generous woman, and her brother's children had all benefited in their various needs by her modest wealth. Of them, James was her favourite, and she had added much personal kindness and warmth of friendship to the pecuniary aid she had given him.

Mrs. Carter behaved very handsomely on the occasion of our marriage, though she refused to come to our wedding, "in the first place," as she said in a letter to James, "because I never go to any one's wedding, and in the second, because I have no fancy for beholding the grand airs of my Lady Moore, and the blinking, purblind fatuity of General Croxholm applied to patronising you. Your future wife is a nice creature, my dear nephew, but she will be much nicer when she has been away from the snob atmosphere in which she has lived for a little." I am not sure that James did a very wise thing when he showed me this letter, for it made me feel rather afraid of Aunt Carter; but the blunder, if it were a blunder, was committed in the early days of gushing confidence, and very pardonable. Besides, it is a good habit to give a husband, that of telling one everything; and on the other hand, one may avoid the indiscretion in one's own person.

All this had happened five years before, and Aunt Carter had become convinced that the anticipated improvement in me had taken place; and she and I were great friends. I fancied that I understood the old lady much better than James did. That dear blundering, sweet-tempered fellow was so much more transparent in all his ways, so warm in his affections, and so unsuspicious in his disposition, that I often wondered at the inscrutable proceeding of Providence that had made him an attorney; not but that he was a clever and prosperous man of business, but I never could fancy James concerned in any thing that was to punish, expose, or give pain to any body.

However, I was saying that I understood Aunt Carter better than he did; and I felt sure that when he laughed about her never coming to stay with us, or inviting us to stay with her, and said "it was all the fault of Joan and Corporal Trim, and his aunt was more like an old maid than a widow," he was altogether mistaken. Of course I did not say so, for the best of men—and I really must say my dear James is that—does not like his wife to know better than he does on any possible point; so that if she be a wise woman, she will act upon her superior knowledge, but will not talk about it. I fancied there was more than this in Aunt Carter's mind in reference to us. I had an idea that she had not been very happy in her prosperous, decorous, married life, and she felt more peaceful and less regretful when the happiness of others—though I am sure she truly and unaffectedly rejoiced in it—was not before her eyes. I do not think she cared the less for our children if, as I shrewdly suspected, their voices in her house would have awakened echoes in her heart painful to hear.

Of her girlhood and early womanhood I knew nothing, and the external history of her marriage and widowhood was prosperous and calm. I had asked James once if her marriage had been a love-match. The dear fellow looked puzzled, said he supposed so, and yet he did not exactly see how it could have been, for Carter was "a long way older than Aunt Anne."

"Where did she meet him, James?" I asked.

"How should I know, you inquisitive nuisance?" he replied smiling. "At my grandfather's, I suppose. She had lived at the Larches all her life, as far as I know."

"Was it a nice place, James?"

"I believe so. I never saw it; my grandfather sold it before I was born; but Aunt Anne says it was a delightful place—much larger and handsomer than Wood-lee, which is within five miles of it."

"Who bought the Larches from your grandfather?"

"Colonel Minshull, retired from the East India Company's service; but he is dead, and I do not know who has it at present."

Now this comprised everything I knew about Mrs. Carter, except that she and her brother, James's father, had not been on very intimate or affectionate terms; but I never heard any cause assigned for the estrangement, nor did I know whether any really existed beyond such as might be naturally accounted for by their divided course in life and their radical difference in disposition and character.

When I was ushered into Aunt Anne's drawing-room I found the old lady seated at a table covered with books, and apparently as much at home as if she had lived there all her life. A goodly pile of morning papers and the smartly-bound authorised catalogues of the International Exhibition made part of the literary display. Corporal Trim—a shaggy terrier of unprepossessing appearance but extraordinary talent—sat gravely in a window, occasionally slapping his futile tail emphatically upon the ground, and expressing his opinion of the crowd in general and the omnibuses in particular by short distressful yelps. Aunt Anne was attired in rich black silk and her customary lace-cap, and was looking remarkably well and young. I had hardly kissed her and begun to question her about her journey when a piercing scream from the throat of a bird made me start by its loud nearness. I looked round, and saw a cage with a canary in it hanging in the window over the head of Corporal Trim.

"I never knew you cared for birds, aunt," I said; "I suppose you warned me against cats on account of your canary."

"It is not mine, dear," she replied; "it belongs to a young lady who has just left these lodgings. Your good Mrs. Devlin (I am quite charmed with her, Margaret) promised to take charge of it. She is gone to be companion to a lady, who shows her sense of the duties of the contract by refusing to allow the girl to have the only companion she has left." The old lady spoke with lively indignation. "Mrs. Devlin had forgotten to take the bird downstairs, and came to me with many apologies about it this morning; but I told her to leave it here in the sunshine. I will take care of it as long as I stay. I shall not hear its song too early in the morning in my bedroom; and here it is only a pleasant addition to the noises in the street. What are you thinking of, Margaret? where are your wits gone to?"

"Gone as companion to a lady!" I muttered incoherently; and then Aunt Anne's laugh roused me, and I told her that I had seen this young girl, and how beautiful, refined, and elegant she was. "I cannot fancy her in the position of a dependant, Aunt Anne," I said. "I wish you could have seen her. Mrs. Devlin told me she was going away, or of course I could not have taken the lodgings; but somehow I had an idea she said something about her going to France to her friends."

"Ah, well—I know nothing about it," said Aunt Anne, as if she thought I was making too much of a matter of no great moment. "I only know that I shall take care of her bird, and I hope the lady will take care of her; but I doubt it. How the creature sings,—fit to crack its throat, to say nothing of its voice! Just lower the cage, Margaret, and throw this anti-macassar over it, or we shall not be able to hear ourselves speak."

I did so, and the song ceased.

"And now, my dear," said the old lady affectionately, "tell me all about herself,—all, I mean, that Mrs. Devlin has not told me already (she is a delightful gossip; so friendly, and so respectful too), and all about James and the children. We are going to chat together till two, and then I have ordered dinner; at half-past three we will go for a drive (Mrs. Devlin knows where I can get a capital brougham and a steady man; she sent for him this morning), and we will call at the office for James."

I need say no more of Aunt Anne's first day in town than that her pleasant programme was carried out in every particular; that Mrs. Devlin assured me, in a few confidential words, that Mrs. Carter was the pleasantest old lady she had ever had to deal with; and that she and Joan were like sisters already—an observation which would have had a soothing effect upon Joan, considering their relative ages, had she heard it.

Aunt Anne's visit to London proved decidedly successful; and I do not know whether she or I derived from it greater enjoyment. I learned to know and love her better; and as I did so, I became more and more convinced that James but little understood her. Her character had many noble traits, and I was by no means sure that a deep and abiding power of sentiment was not amongst their number. I often found myself wondering whether she had ever known much sorrow—and her large benignant tolerance of disposition made me feel sure she had—and under its severe but salutary teaching had learned the lesson of wide compassion and ready sympathy. She called herself an oddity, and perhaps she was one; but at least her singularity was of a good and genial kind, and did not bar me from the pleasantest companionship with her. We were very much together in those beautiful days of summer, and we made many an expedition to the Exhibition, which she persisted in calling "the Barn." On these occasions she did not go out again in the evening, and I frequently remained with her until James came for me at ten o'clock. Sometimes, but not often, Aunt Anne dined with us; at other times, when James and I had evening engagements, she would tell me not to disquiet myself on her account, for that she and Joan were as comfortable in their London lodgings as in their large country-house—thanks to the care and attention of "my" Mrs. Devlin, whom the old lady frequently invited to pass an hour or two with her in the dusk, and of whom she found something new to say in praise and approbation every day. Jamie and Alice also grew in favour with their great aunt—the more surely and rapidly, I think that she did not see too much of them. They were disposed to take liberties with Corporal Trim, which a dog of his sedate and settled habits could hardly be expected to approve; and when he had been induced to go once through the performance of shouldering and presenting arms (the musket being represented by a short ruler), I usually adjourned the sitting, and sent the children home under convoy of nurse. Altogether things were going on most happily and prosperously, when Aunt Anne caught cold one day from sitting in the Horticultural Gardens listening to the band, after a slight shiver had warned her that she was doing an imprudent thing. It was not a severe cold, but sufficient to confine her to the house. Under these circumstances Mrs. Devlin proved herself invaluable.

When Aunt Anne had been ailing for about three days, it chanced that James told me one morning that he had to go out of town on a little business after office-hours, and if I wished to pass the evening with Mrs. Carter, he would call for me on his return and take me home.

This suited me nicely; and I reached Knightsbridge a little after six o'clock. I found the old lady much better, and in excellent spirits. We had our tea, and were discussing an excursion to Brighton to visit some old acquaintances who were so unfashionable as to remain at the seaside in June, when Mrs. Devlin knocked at the door, and on Aunt Anne's invitation entered. She had inquired how Mrs. Carter felt, and was about taking her leave, when I said,

"Pray sit down, Mrs. Devlin: don't go away. Mrs. Carter has just been speaking of your kindness and attention; and I am glad to have an opportunity of thanking you. Do sit with us a little while."

It was a deliciously-warm tranquil evening. The front-windows were closed; but the large square casement in the back-room was open, and the masses of almost motionless foliage in the Park were plainly visible. The light had hardly declined, but the beauty of evening had set in, and momentarily increased. I was sitting in one of the front-windows, my hands resting idly on my lap as I gazed at the stirless trees in the distance. Suddenly a recollection crossed me of the beautiful girl I had seen in the room we were now sitting in; and I asked Mrs. Devlin whether she had heard anything of her late lodger since she went away, and if she knew whither she had gone.

"Yes, ma'am," said Mrs. Devlin. "I have heard from her twice; such pretty letters too, poor dear soul! She thinks far too much of the little I could do for her, and says she always remembers this house as home. She is living with a lady near Leamington. Very grand people they are, I am sure; but I don't think they are over kind."

"Indeed I'm sure they are not," said Aunt Anne from the sofa. "The woman's conduct about the bird is proof enough of that. Come here, Corporal Trim," she called to the shaggy terrier sleeping peacefully upon the hearth-rug, who at her call went up to her, wagging an indolent protest against being disturbed. "I think when I die I shall leave you to Mrs. Devlin's care. — You would take care of him, Margaret, I know; but then, you see, he does not like children. — Ah, poor girl, they might have let her have her bird!"

"Does she tell you she is unhappy, Mrs. Devlin?" I asked.

"Oh no, ma'am, she does not do that; she is a proud young lady, and I am sure she would not complain. She was very friendly with me, but she never told me much; and though I know she had very little money left after her papa's funeral was paid for, she wanted to go on paying for the bedroom, though she did not use it, because she said I could not let a single room; though, indeed, if I could I would never have thought of letting a stranger into the house with her, poor dear."

"And when did her papa die, Mrs. Devlin?" asked Aunt Anne.

"Just a month before you came, ma'am," was the answer.

There! it had come out, of course — the very thing I did not wish Mrs. Carter to know; and it was of no use to cast admonitory glances at Mrs. Devlin, for she was not looking at me, and besides, it was too late now. Mrs. Carter did not appear to be at all disconcerted; but asked me rather carelessly if I had not seen this young lady.

"Oh yes, Aunt," I said; "and I told you how very beautiful I thought her — an elegant creature indeed. I shall never forget her as she stood just where your sofa is, in her black dress, — she looked so young and so mournful, and yet there was something strong and brave in her look; and I think she might be bright too, if she were but happy."

"You are right, ma'am," said Mrs. Devlin. "She was bright enough when she first came here — for she had no notion then that the Captain's illness was anything serious; and she was as gay as a lark, and for ever singing — sometimes long beautiful songs to the piano that she learned at school, she told me — and sometimes she mocking the bird, and the bird mocking her, just like two playfellows. And I never heard such a reader: she would read to her papa for hours and hours, and never a roughness or weakness in her voice. And laugh! it would do you good to hear her laugh: it did s good down there in the workroom, I can tell you. And while the poor Captain was able to go on with his painting, she would be playing or writing music all day, and keeping him company. Latterly, since he was so bad, she did not go out at all, except for half an hour to morning-service at St. Paul's over yonder. She used to say it did her good to say her prayers there, because she had been there when she was a little child, and had spent her holidays with her aunt, who lived in Wilton Place, while her papa was in India! How precious the poor Captain was of her, to be sure! how he did watch and think and trouble about her! It makes me tremble now to think of it. As long as he could get up he used to watch her crossing the street and going down Wilton Place and into the church-porch; and after he was no longer able, he asked me to do so, and I did; and then I used to tap at his room-door, and say 'She's gone in, sir;' and then he would be quite content. If the day were wet, I sent Hannah with an umbrella to fetch her home; and I always tried to prevent his knowing that it rained. Many and many's the time I've thought, when I've seen him so anxious and restless, and watching her, how sore and terrible the thought of what was to become of her after he was gone must have been to him. I don't know whether she ever thought of it; but she was so sensible, I am sure she must: anyhow, she never said anything like doubt or anxiety to him, I am sure. The very day the doctor told her the truth, though she was as white as marble, and her sweet voice was so changed I hardly knew it when she came and asked me to stay with her father a little, until she had recovered herself, she was quite calm and cheerful, and I heard her talking to him just as usual. I don't think he ever had any fret about money—I think he was spared that, from something Miss Winifred told me after his funeral—but I am sure all his trouble was that his child had no friends. I could not understand that, such nice people as they were; but as I told you, Mrs. Penniford, no one but the doctor and the attorney ever came here, until the undertaker came. When Miss Winifred took this situation, she gave the doctor and the attorney for references; and said she to me, with such a sad smile, 'You'll give me a good character, if any one asks you, Mrs. Devlin—you'll say I am sober, honest, and quiet, and can make myself generally useful?' and she laughed then just for half a minute, and gave me a kiss. This, I am sure, troubled the Captain very sorely. Once he wrote a letter while Miss Winifred was at her dinner and I was sitting with him; but he tore it up, and gave me the pieces to burn in the kitchen-fire; and when he lay down again he whispered to himself, and said, 'No—no,' and something like 'forgotten now,' and 'no right to ask her, of all people;' and then gradually fell off asleep with a great sigh. Just before he died I think his mind got easier. But whether he had any reason for being more easy I can't say, for of course he knew she would have a welcome here always; but that was nothing for a young lady like her, from a humble person like me; so the comfort could not have come from that. Anyhow some comfort did come to him from somewhere, and it never went away again; and he died quite peaceful one evening just at sunset, after a sleep, as a person might settle themselves to sleep a little longer."

We had listened attentively to Mrs. Devlin's story, and she had told it with an interest, an intensity of feeling which completely engrossed her. Now she said, "I beg your pardon, ladies; I forgot you do not know Miss Winifred."

"Oh, pray go on, Mrs. Devlin," I said. "I have seen her, you know; and am sure Mrs. Carter is interested in her also. Are you not, Aunt Anne?"

"Indeed I am, Margaret," said the old lady. "You said she mentioned having lived with an aunt for a time in her childhood, Mrs. Devlin. Did she not tell you what had become of this relative?"

"Yes, ma'am; she told me she was dead. After the funeral, the lawyer wrote to Miss Winifred that he would come to see her; and he did, and was a long time with her. When he was gone, she looked very ill and downcast, as I notice most people do when they have been talking to lawyers."

Here Mrs. Devlin became slightly embarrassed; but I reassured her, and declared that I did not believe even James's clients were improved in their spirits by his acquaintance.

"Well, ma'am, you're very kind to say so," she continued; "but I beg your pardon all the same. However, she did look ill, and like one loaded with a fresh grief; and then she told me that when the lawyer had examined into the poor Captain's affairs, he found he had been heartlessly robbed by persons in England, to whom he had trusted all his money—made out there among the blacks, where he was; and that they had gone on paying him the interest, and he never suspecting that the capital was all gone; and now nothing could be done, for they were 'men of straw,' the lawyer said, and had just failed; and poor Miss Winifred could recover nothing. 'What a blessing dear papa did not know it!' said Miss Winifred. He fretted so much,—I know he did,—at the idea of my being so lonely, that I do not know how he could have borne the knowledge that I must be poor too. So you see there's good in everything, Mrs. Devlin; and if papa had been left longer with me, it would have been much harder for him to die.' The next day she went to the lawyer's office — Mr. Newman is his name, Henrietta Street — and I sent Hannah with her; and when she came back, she told me the lawyer had written out an advertisement for her, and he and the doctor were to be her references. 'If I could stay with you,' she said, 'I would be very happy; but dear, dear, these are quite fashionable lodgings, and I am too young to go out to teach, and no one would send pupils to me, or buy my drawings or my rubbishy pieces of music;' — though I thought them very sweet, and sad, and pretty, — 'and I can't write novels, and no one would publish them if I could; and I would be no use in the workroom, even if I understood the use of the sewing-machine. And so I am going to be companion to a lady, and to do my best to make myself useful and agreeable.' She was a brave young lady, but a big tear began to gather over each of her brown eyes, and after a minute she let them gather and fall, and she cried, as they say it does young people good to cry; but, for my part, I don't believe that. The lawyer soon got an answer to the advertisement; and she agreed to every thing they asked her. I could hardly bear to part with her, but she promised I should hear from her, and that in any difficulty or trouble she would come to me; and she left her little school-trunk, and a box of her papa's books, in my charge. She took his paintings with her; but I am to have them too, she tells me, for she will not be allowed to hang them up where she is; and she says she knows I will let them hang in my little sitting-room until she has a home for them and Ally too."

"Who is Ally?" asked Aunt Anne.

"The bird, ma'am; its name is Allegra, which Miss Winifred says is a foreign word for 'joyful'; but somehow we could not always think of that, and so we took to calling it Ally."

"Hang the paintings up in this room, Mrs. Devlin, at least for the time that I shall be here," said Mrs. Carter.

Then the old lady turned restlessly upon her sofa and sighed.

When I arrived at Mrs. Devlin's in the afternoon of the following day, I found it tenanted only by Corporal Trim and Ally, and much improved in its general aspects by four handsome water-colour drawings suspended upon the walls. Their subjects were various. One represented a scene in Egypt, with the Pyramids, and the Sphinx; and had the rich golden warmth of the afterglow upon it. The second was a hill-scene in India, with the lance-like, snow-crowned mountain-tops, the precipitous winding roads, and the groups of picturesque travellers, familiar to us all. The third — and to my mind the most beautiful — was a scene at sea. The gorgeous hues of sunset rested upon the water, still and smooth as a lake. A long low coast-line defined the distance, and on the calm waves lay a deserted drifting boat. To my mind a wonderful expression of rest was in this picture; of rest won after long and fierce struggle. The calm was there indeed, but the storm had raged before it fell in its deep peace: the lonely broken boat told its story. Where was the noble ship, whose rent fragments had even been swallowed by the great deep? The fourth picture was of an English home, of which the drawing gave a side-view. It was a large house with bay-windows jutting out on smooth grass and gay flower-beds, with a belt of fine trees on one side, and a stone terrace on the other, where the inevitable peacocks of all water-colour drawings displayed their splendid plumage. The execution of this drawing was very beautiful; the finish of its details was perfect; and yet it was hardly grand enough to be an ideal country-mansion. The artist, if he drew merely from his fancy, might easily have made the house far more imposing, the pleasure-ground more extensive and artistically arranged, and the trees finer; and he might have thrown in many an accessory of wealth and display with that minute gorgeousness which water-colour loves. But there had evidently been a stricter guide than fancy here — memory had inspired the pencil, and truth had handled it. Mrs. Devlin came to me, as I stood before this picture examining it closely.

"I beg your pardon," she said. "I could not come up sooner. Mrs. Carter's cold is rather heavier. I persuaded her to remain in her room — she is quieter up there — and I got the pictures hung, as she desired me. They are pretty, are they not, Mrs. Pennifold? How fond the poor Captain was of them, to be sure! These are all he did since he left India; but there are a great number to be sent home yet, Miss Winifred told me. They are to go to the lawyer's to be sold; but she said she would never par-with these, because she was by her papa's side when he did them, and one of them is the place where she was born."

"Ah, that country-house, I suppose?"

"No, ma'am,—the place with all the green trees, and the snow on the tops of the mountains."

"They are a great improvement to the drawing-room, Mrs. Devlin,—I am sure my aunt will be quite pleased when she sees them," I said; and then I went up to Aunt Anne's room.

Mrs. Carter did not leave her room for nearly a week after the pictures were hung in the drawing-room. For two or three days during that period I feared that she also might die in the large upper-chamber where Winifred's father had breathed his last. But she rallied and recovered, and great indeed was the joy of myself, Mrs. Devlin, and the lugubrious, faithful, foreboding Joan, when she once more made her appearance in the drawing-room. Our family-physician had attended her during the severity of the illness, and we expected a farewell-visit from him on this occasion; indeed the old lady had but been installed upon her sofa when his carriage rolled up to the door. Dr. Elliott came in with his accustomed jaunty, trust-inspiring manner; and after the usual questions, he looked round and said,

"What a pleasant room this is! I have been here before; I was called in by Cuthbert to see a poor fellow who died here. Nothing to be done in his case for a long time before I saw him, though. I remember he had such a pretty daughter,—a tall brown-eyed girl."

"Yes," I said; "I saw her once,—she is very handsome. I fear she has suffered much by his death."

"Cuthbert was very much interested in her," said Dr. Elliott. "There was some sad story about her mother, I believe; at all events he had known her father more than professionally."

"Mrs. Devlin calls him Captain," said I somewhat inconsequently; "what service was he in?"

"Neither of ours," he replied; "he had gone out to India in some commercial capacity, but had afterwards taken service with one of the native princes, and had played a rather distinguished part in the puzzling game of internal Indian politics. When I saw him he had long been an invalid." Then the doctor once more turned his attention to his patient.

When he had left us I said to Aunt Anne, "I wish you were strong enough to examine those drawings,—I am sure they would please you greatly. You cannot see them from the sofa, of course."

"No," she said; "my old eyes are weak: wait till to-morrow."

No more was said just then; but when with the evening and her release from business Mrs. Devlin came up to sit with us, our talk turned once more on her handsome young lodger.

Mrs. Carter had just been saying how pleasant it must have been to her to have had such agreeable lodgers for so long, and how much she must feel the difference in the characters of persons with whom she had been brought in contact.

Mrs. Devlin answered in her own cheery way: "Well, ma'am, of course I do; but then you see, if I don't care for the people, I see nothing of them. Hannah has all the management of them in that case, and I keep to my shop. I have been very fortunate indeed, though I cannot say I ever had lodgers like the Captain and Miss Winifred, or you, ma'am, and Joan, and the Corporal."

The Corporal made a gruff acknowledgment of this allusion to him, and Aunt Anne said: "You must have met some strange people though, and come to know some strange stories."

"Well, ma'am, I have, but not so many as they who keep lodgings in other neighbourhoods—such as the Strand, or down Pimlico way. We don't have poor or struggling people about here, and our lodgers are always respectable; and I think when people are not poor, and you know exactly who they are and all about them, they are not very interesting, at least not like the interesting people in books. Not but they are happy or sorrowful or amiable or unamiable, but they are not remarkable; very dreadful things, or very joyful things, don't happen to them. They change so often too in the season; sometimes I hardly get to know their faces when they are gone." Then turning to me, she continued, "You remember, ma'am, when I was forewoman here, in Mrs. Jackson's time—before you and Miss Huster were married. I used to be very curious about the lodgers in those days, especially when we had foreign ladies staying here, and I liked to get the maids to show me their beautiful dresses. We had many ladies here in the year of the Great Exhibition. That was a gay time, to be sure, when the Queen and the Prince were the life and soul of every thing. It is all very big and grand and important now; but somehow I don't seem to care for it. To be sure, I am eleven years older than I was then ; but that is not all the difference." She seemed to ponder over this in silence, and then went on : " I shall never forget one lady we had in these rooms in July, 1851. She came alone to look at the lodgings, and brought a recommendation from the agent Mrs. Jackson always employed. I remember I had to attend to her, for my aunt was taking orders for a wedding-outfit in the shop ; and I never was so struck with the manner and appearance of any one in my life. I suppose she was about forty, and very handsome, but so wild and sad-looking, and so hurried and excited in her manner. She was beautifully dressed, but she had a reckless way ; and I am sure she did not care about her dress or any thing. She spoke very quickly and in a very abrupt way, and seemed desperately bent upon taking the rooms, though she hardly looked at them, but walked straight up to the windows and gazed out, first right before her and then to each side, and never turned away all the time she stayed. ' I want to take these rooms at once,' she said ; ' I don't hesitate to tell you that I have a particular purpose in taking them ; but that purpose is a blameless one,' — and she caught her breath with a great sob, — ' a perfectly respectable one. I shall not require them for long, and I am willing to pay any reasonable rent. I shall require no attendance ; I shall not be here at night, and shall receive no visitors. Pray do not refuse me ; indeed you shall have no reason to regret having taken me. I cannot explain ; if I could you would know that you would only be doing a charitable and kind action.' I remember that she sat down and panted, as if tired and out of breath, but still turned her head to the window. Of course the offer of the rent made no difference ; if my aunt would take the poor lady as a lodger at all, she would not make her pay for being, as she evidently was, in trouble. I had to refer the matter to her ; and as I urged the lady's case for her very strongly, she consented. When I asked her what day she would like to come in, the lady took me by surprise by replying, ' Now, — this minute.' She laid a fortnight's rent on the table as she spoke and her card. I think I have the card still. ' Let me stay here now,' she said ; ' I shall only remain a few hours, but pray leave me.' I asked her if she would require any thing, but she said, ' No ; only some cold water to be left on the table.' You may suppose I was astonished at all this ; but I did as she asked me, and took the money and the card down to Mrs. Jackson. Then I settled to my work ; and though I could not help thinking of our strange lodger, I said no more about her. Evening was drawing on, when a plain brougham drove up to the private door. I listened for a knock — none came ; but in a minute I heard the door opened, and just caught sight of the skirt of the lady's dress as she stepped into the carriage, which rolled rapidly away. I confess that I took advantage of the first minute I could spare to run up to the drawing-room. Every thing was in its place ; no one would have supposed that any one had entered the room that day. A cambric-handkerchief, which lay upon the carpet near the window, was the only token that every thing which had passed had not been a dream."

PART II.

"NEXT day and the next the lady came in the forenoon, and remained until dusk, and each time the carriage drove up, and she came down, opened the door without any knock, and drove away. How did she know that the carriage had come I wondered — how did she distinguish it from the countless others that thronged the highway ? What did she do there alone ? was she always at one of the windows ? I asked myself these questions, and I asked Hannah others. But Hannah knew nothing ; the lady never rang her bell, and, beyond bidding her good-morning when she opened the door for her, she never addressed her. Mrs. Jackson was very much occupied with her business, which began to thrive just then, and she gave herself no concern about the mysterious lady, who never wanted any thing, and never gave any trouble. When Sunday came, my curiosity was keenly excited. I wondered whether the lady would come on that day to pass her time in the same apparently profitless manner. Mrs. Jackson and I always went to one of the early services at St. Paul's, and Hannah was free to go to the eleven-o'clock, afternoon, or evening service, as she pleased. On this particular Sunday she had gone to the eleven-o'clock service ; and when a knock was heard at the door, it fell to my lot to open it. There stood the mysterious lady, richly dressed and closely veiled. She exchanged a courteous salutation with me, and then passed hurriedly up the stairs. In the idleness and rest of the Sunday hours, I thought more sadly and wonderingly than before of the strange lady. It was a profitless speculation for me — nothing could be more unlikely than that I should ever learn her history; but I could not turn my thoughts from her, lonely, and I felt assured unhappy, in that orderly room, which she never disarranged by any trace. Mrs. Jackson and I dined alone on Sunday; and on this occasion we talked of the strange lady almost exclusively. Mrs. Jackson was inclined to think she must be mad; but I did not partake her opinion. It was not madness I saw in her face, whenever I caught a glimpse of it, but misery, or dreadful regret and hopelessness. The day was bright and sunny; happy groups of people wended their way through the streets, the birds sang, London birds though they were, as if they felt the sunshine quite as much as any country birds could do; and my heart grew fuller and fuller, as I thought of the lonely woman upstairs. At last I determined to venture on showing her a little kindness; so I placed a slice of cake and a glass of wine on a salver, and went up to the drawing-room door. I knocked, but she made no answer; so I turned the handle and went in. She was standing where you are sitting now, Mrs. Penniford, by the side of the window; the curtain was drawn forward, and she was gazing through the chink left along its outer edge, her head resting against the wood-work. For a moment she did not hear me; but as I stepped forward, the glass I carried jingled against the plate, and she turned suddenly round. O what a face it was!—full of weariness, and watching, and excitement, beautiful, and painful. ‘I beg your pardon,’ I said, ‘but I thought you looked tired this morning and not very strong, and so I took the liberty of bringing up a glass of wine. Will you kindly take it?’ ‘Thank you,’ she said, passing her hand, as she spoke, wearily across her eyelids, and pressing them closely over the large eyeballs, ‘I will.’ She took the wine from my hand, sat down on the chair close to the window, and ate the piece of cake, drinking the wine with it slowly and absently, still keeping her gaze fixed upon the street. Presently she said, ‘You are very thoughtful and kind; tell me your name.’ I told her, and she wrote it down on a tablet. She said no more, and I saw there was no more to be said, so I took up the salver and left the room. Of course I told Mrs. Jackson about my short interview with the strange lady, and it made her more than ever convinced that she was mad. ‘Think of her writing down your name, Honor,’ she said; ‘you’ll be having a handsome legacy some of these days.’”

“Did that prediction come true?” asked Aunt Anne, who had been listening to this strange episode in the romance of lodging—letting with interest as great as that which the story of the Captain and Miss Winifred had excited.

“It did indeed, ma’am,” said Mrs. Devlin; “and in a sadly short time. But something else happened first. If you are not tired of my talk, I will tell you about it. It all seems as clear and plain to me now, though it happened eleven years ago, as you seem sitting there, Mrs. Penniford, or Miss Winifred seemed when I used to watch her pretty ways. I remember, the day the Exhibition was opened, she was standing by the window, but behind the curtain, so that she might not be seen, watching the carriages; and I thought, when I saw her tall figure drawn up there, of the other, nearly as beautiful, that I saw in the same place so many years before. All in a minute the strange lady seemed to stand there again. I did not like to think of it; it seemed like overlooking the poor dear to remember any thing so sorrowful by her,” said the little Irishwoman mournfully, and with a touch of the poetic superstition of her country and nation.

“But what else happened about this lady, Mrs. Devlin?” I asked; “we want to hear all about her first, and then you shall talk of Miss Winifred to your heart’s content. I forgot to tell you that Dr. Elliott knows her; he told us to-day he remembered attending the Captain.”

“Very likely, ma’am; there was more than one doctor, two or three times, as well as I remember. But I will tell you about the strange lady. I remember every thing about her so well, that I think I see her face now and hear her voice. It was two or three days after that Sunday, and I was in the work-room, and Mrs. Jackson was busy in the shop, when I heard the drawing-room bell ring very loud, and in a minute or two Hannah came to the door and called me. ‘Pray, go upstairs; the lady wants to see you very particularly.’ I went at once, and there she was, with the whitest face I ever saw, and yet the brightest most exploring eyes. As I entered the room she came towards me hurriedly and said, ‘Mrs. Devlin, who is there below in the shop?’ ‘I don’t know,’ I answered in great surprise; ‘I was in the work-room when Hannah called me.’ ‘Go and see,’ she said; ‘pray go and see. I am almost sure a lady is there who has just crossed the street. Pray, go and see.’ ‘But how shall I know if she is the same?’ I asked. ‘The lady I mean is very tall and dark, and she is dressed in half-mourning, with a grenadine shawl and deep lace-border; she answered me breathlessly. 'Go and see.' I went down into the shop at once, and there, seated at the counter, I saw a nice gentle-looking lady, who exactly answered the description I had heard. Mrs. Jackson was taking down her name and address as I came in; and I heard her say, 'Then you will send before twelve to-morrow?' and Mrs. Jackson answered, 'Certainly.' Then the lady went away, and my aunt said, 'That is an outfit order, Honor, for a little girl going to school. You will have to take the things yourself, before twelve to-morrow, to No. 10 Wilton Place.' I looked at the entry in the order-book; and just then some customers came in, and I escaped upstairs. The lady was sitting this time, not by the window, quite pale and quiet. She looked at me, but she did not speak. 'It is she, sure enough,' I said; and then I told her all that had passed. She looked at me with intense eagerness, and muttered, 'I knew it — I knew it — I knew I must succeed.' Then she said, 'You do not know what a service you have done me; you can never imagine how grateful I am! Do not mention this to any one; but I need not tell you that.' Then she stood up and took her bonnet and mantle from the table where they lay, put them on, took my hand in hers, wrung it with passionate force, and went downstairs, leaving me standing in the drawing-room with amazement. The next moment I heard the door shut, and I presently saw her cross the street and take her way down Wilton Place. Of course, ladies, I thought over all this, and puzzled over it; and no doubt I was romantic and foolish eleven years ago, though I have more sense now; and I was fairly bewitched by the strange lady. There was something quite delightful to me in even this little bit of confidence between us; and I thought very little of my business all that afternoon and the next morning. It was just half-past eleven when I set out with my wicker-basket on my arm to take the patterns to No. 10 Wilton Place. I remember the very things now, and even the pieces. It is but a step, as you know, ladies; but there was always a crowd in Knightsbridge then, just as there is now, and I had to stand a good many minutes at the crossing. While I was watching for a clear moment to run across, I noticed a brougham drawn up at the opposite side, the horse's head being turned towards Piccadilly; and just as I did so, a hand beckoned to me from the window. I crossed over, and saw the strange lady.

'Here,' she said, opening the carriage-door from inside, 'get in for a minute. I know where you are going, and I must speak to you.' As she spoke she took the basket, placed it in the bottom of the carriage, moved into the farthest corner, and then held out her hands to help me in. In another moment I was seated beside her, and the coachman, evidently previously instructed, drove slowly off. I felt frightened; but it all passed so rapidly that I cannot describe my sensations in any way that will give you an idea of them. The change in the lady startled me more than any thing else. It was she herself, and yet it was not. Instead of her usual rich, careless dress, she wore a plain Carmelite gown, exactly like my own, a black shawl, plain white collar and cuffs, and a straw bonnet with a simple ribbon trimming. Strong leather gloves covered her hands, instead of the dainty pearl-gray kid ones which she always wore. Her very face was changed. I do not know how she had done it, but she had banished all the elegance from it; handsome though it was, it had a common look. Ladies, I assure you she had changed herself into much the same sort of woman that I am, only not so contented-looking. The sorrow was in the face still. When I looked at her I thought of that clever actress at the Adelphi, whom I saw in one evening as a French countess and a London servant-of-all-work, and equally at home in both characters. She laid hold of me with both hands, and said, 'Don't be angry with me; I mean no harm; I am doing none. But if you have a woman's heart in your breast, you will not refuse to help one so wretched as I am.' As I said before, ladies, I was younger then, and I never had much resolution, and she had wonderful power over me; greater power, I think, when she changed herself in that extraordinary way than before. Well, I need not tell you all she said, in the way she said it; but the meaning of it was this.

"She had taken these rooms for no other purpose than that of finding out where the lady lived whom she had seen crossing the street on the previous day. She had an all-important motive for desiring to discover this, and direct inquiry was impossible. All she had been able to find out was, that this lady had lodgings in Wilton Place; and she had resorted to the means I have described for getting sight of her unnoticed. She told me this so rapidly, with so much excitement, that I could not ask her a question; but it struck me that she did not mention this lady with any strong feeling either of affection or enmity, desperate as was her desire to see her. 'She does not know me,' she said: 'she would not recognise me; perhaps not under any circumstances, certainly not under these;' and she indicated her dress. Then she told me that she had watched since ten o'clock for me to leave the shop with my basket, and that her purpose — to which she entreated me to accede with words of such dreadful earnestness that they turned me cold and sick, it seemed so frightful to me to be thus implored, to have so much power even in only one thing, and for a short time, over a fellow-creature — was this: She would personate me, go to Wilton Place, try the articles of dress on the little girl for whom they had been ordered, take all necessary orders, and then rejoin me. I was to wait in the carriage for her at the other end of Wilton Place, in the mean time. Of course I objected; but she had foreseen, and overbore, every objection I raised. The lady was a stranger; no customer of ours; she would play her part so that no mistake could arise; if, at the worst, any did, why should the lady be surprised that one of Mrs. Jackson's work-women should be sent on one occasion, and a different one on another? No injury to any one was within the reach of possibility in the thing she wanted me to do; only an unspeakable boon to her, only a solace she had travelled far to seek, and must find now or never, for in a few days she would have left England for ever.

"I daresay, ladies, as I tell you this, in my feeble way, it sounds very foolish, and you think me very weak; but if you had seen that face alone with you, close to you, heard that voice, which seemed to thrill through my nerves, and felt the clinging hands, which would have spoken for her if she had been dumb, I think you would have yielded, as I did."

"I am sure I should, Mrs. Devlin," said Aunt Anne; "but I don't know about Mrs. James Penniford; she is an attorney's wife, you know, and cautious."

"Hush, aunt," I said; "don't be spiteful, and let Mrs. Devlin finish her story; I quite share in her interest in the mysterious lady. But I cannot make out what she wanted to try on the little girl's clothes for."

"Ladies," said Mrs. Devlin, and there was a great solemnity in her voice, "that little girl was the strange lady's only child!"

I cannot describe the impression these words made upon us; the story had for us a more abstract interest; we knew nothing of the dead woman who had kept her weary watch in the room that was so cheerful and happy a habitation for us; but the feeling that Mrs. Devlin threw into her narrative flung its charm over us, beneath which we sat silent.

"Yes," she continued slowly and sadly, "that was the meaning of it all. She was going away from England for ever, and she yearned for the sight of her child's face, which she knew she was never more to see, — the child's face which she had not seen for years, in which she would find no recognition of herself. I cannot tell you her story, ladies, for I do not know it, nor did I need. That it was a sad one, I knew too well; and terrible, when it could mean hopeless separation from her child. I had no power to question her, even if I had dared; and I did not; there was something awful about her in her sorrow. I only yielded to her, and pitied her with all my heart. She had not shed a single tear while she was speaking; and when she had done, she forced her face back into perfect calm. By a sharp jerk of the check-string she conveyed some direction to the coachman; and then taking the things out of the basket, she asked the questions necessary for her guidance in the part she was about to play. The little garments were all marked in plain figures, so the difficulties were few. All this had passed in a short space of time; and I had no idea where we were, when the carriage came to a stop at the end of Wilton Place. In a moment she opened the door, and stepped out. The street was singularly empty, and no one was passing on our side. She lifted the basket with one hand, pressed mine with the other, made a sign to the coachman, and was gone. The carriage moved slowly on, and I was driven at a foot-pace round the squares for about half an hour. I cannot, and I need not, attempt to describe the state my mind was in; I don't think any thing was very clear to me, and I believe the most distinct thought I had was of how I should account for my unusually long absence on business which really required so little delay. At length, as the carriage passed by the end of Wilton Place, I saw the lady walking steadily towards it. The coachman immediately drew up round the corner and out of sight, and she came on. I opened the door, but she beckoned to me to step out. I did so; she placed the basket in my hands, got into the carriage, and just bending towards me, said the one word, 'To-morrow.' Then the carriage drove rapidly off, leaving me standing on the pavement like one in a dream. If any one had taken notice of her as she came towards me down the street, he must have seen one curious discrepancy in her dress; for she had thrown over her bonnet, so that I could not see her face, a veil of Spanish lace, which, I noticed, she had always worn on other days. Mrs. Jackson did remark on my delay; and I just said I had been kept waiting, when I remembered, with a start, that nothing had been said of the contents of the basket, and that I was therefore incompetent to give any account of my business. I hurriedly opened the basket, and found the things inside, with a slip of paper, on which was written, 'All the patterns approved. Mrs. Jackson will please furnish twelve of each article as early as possible.' She had not plundered them, and all was safe. 'You must see to that order, directly, Honor,' said Mrs. Jackson, and then turned her attention to something else. Later in the day, she said to me; 'Our mysterious lodger has not made her appearance to-day. Perhaps she will not come any more.' 'Perhaps not,' I said, as carelessly as I could. 'I hope she will give us notice,' said Mrs. Jackson; 'I should not like to re-let the rooms, even if the fortnight she has paid for were up, without knowing something about her.'

"To-morrow," the strange lady had said, and I waited anxiously for that to-morrow; and when it came I counted the hours, until the time at which she usually arrived. But she did not come. The morning passed, and then the afternoon; the order for No. 10 Wilton Place was in brisk course of execution; and from the workroom I listened to every sound, in the hope of hearing her foot upon the stairs. But I did not hear it then or since; and now it will never be heard any where on earth again. The evening had fallen, when a letter, directed to Mrs. Jackson, was brought by a commissionaire. It was from the strange lady, and was a polite letter, telling her that circumstances had occurred which obliged her to leave England at once, and therefore she had no further need of the rooms. She enclosed a present in money for Hannah, and sent a handsome brooch, with kindest regards, to me. That was all; and when she had read the letter, Mrs. Jackson said, 'There, I told you she was mad; now I hope you believe me. She takes expensive lodgings, pays a fortnight's rent in advance, uses them for not quite a week, and apparently for the purpose of gaping out of window, and then goes off, giving the servant as much as a month's wages. Ah! I don't understand such people. Put the bill up, Honor; the rooms won't want any extra cleaning this time, that's a blessing!' And so she went away, and no more was heard or thought of her in the house by any one but me."

"And was that all you ever knew, Mrs. Devlin?" I asked, after a pause, and breaking the silence with some difficulty.

"You spoke of a legacy, did you not?" inquired Mrs. Carter.

"Yes," said Mrs. Devlin, answering us both simultaneously; "I did say something of a legacy: and that was not quite the last I heard of our strange lodger. About six years ago a young man called here one morning, and asked for a Mrs. Devlin. I answered his inquiries in person, and he put me through a regular cross-examination as to who I was, how long I had been here, whether I had always had a personal knowledge of the lodgers, and so forth. I gave him some rather short answers; for I did not see his drift, and I did not understand why he should be so mightily inquisitive, in asking me so much, and telling me so little. Of course I told him I had a personal knowledge of the lodgers, seeing that, since Mrs. Jackson was dead, they were my lodgers; but I did not know any thing about their affairs, and was not going to tell if I did. Somehow, he had a look about him that told me he belonged to the law, and made me fancy he meant mischief. 'O, thank you, Mrs. Devlin,' he said; 'it's nothing of that kind; I only wanted to identify you.' So he handed me a letter from a gentleman, named Mr. Bowley, in Lincoln's Inn Fields, in which he desired me to call at his office on the following day at eleven o'clock. Accordingly I went; and a very nice, clean, brisk, short-mannered gentleman Mr. Bowley was. He did not detain me ten minutes; and his business with me was, to give me a cheque for 50*l.*, and take my receipt for the money. Who do you think it came from, ladies?"

"From the mysterious lodger," we replied simultaneously.

"Yes," said Mrs. Devlin, "from the mysterious lodger. She had died in some foreign country, and left me the money, free of legacy-duty, and Mr. Bowley paid it to me by order of her executor. I would have liked to ask him several questions about her; but he did not look encouraging, and I thought I had better not. So I merely ventured to ask if she ever came back to England after '51, or saw her little girl. Mr. Bowley answered very stiffly that he could really give me no further information, and seemed, as I could not help perceiving, rather anxious to get rid of me. That was the first money I ever put in the bank, and I have never touched it. I have never wanted it, thank God, having been always pretty comfortable since Devlin died. In his time, poor fellow, I was badly off enough; for somehow, making money was not in his constitution, but he was clever in spending it, to be sure."

"You don't know, then, whether the strange lady made any mention of her motive for leaving you the money?" said Aunt Anne, who was vehemently interested.

"No, ma'am, I do not," said Mrs. Devlin. "I felt afraid to ask Mr. Bowley; and I never saw any one else belonging to her."

"That was a strange adventure indeed," said Mrs. Carter. "Did you never see the little girl at all, or the lady at Wilton Place again?"

"No, ma'am, never. I intended to have taken the things to her myself, but they were already in the shop, and I was in the workroom when the lady called, and had them put into her carriage, and paid for them on the spot. I did contrive to get speaking to one of the maids at No. 10; but she said Mrs. Hungerford had left their house, and I asked no more questions. I was even timid about asking that, as I felt the strange lady had trusted me, in so far as she had told me, and I could not tell how far an incautious question might violate her confidence, and do her an injury."

"That is a sentiment which does you honour, Mrs. Devlin," said Aunt Anne heartily. She was an outspoken person, though not, therefore, like some whom I have known, detestably rude; and when she felt approval, she expressed it. She was chary only of condemnation. "Indeed, most of the sentiments I have heard you express do that."

We talked a good deal over this curious episode in the life of our good little friend after she had left us, and commented to one another upon the unsuspicious impulsiveness of character which it bespoke. Then we speculated upon the probable history of the heroine of the strange story; and we thought we saw a clue to it—a sad and shameful explanation. This woman was no doubt a wife and mother, who had fallen from her high estate, and on whom the righteous self-incurred doom of separation from her child had come. No doubt the glamour had passed, as it always must and will pass, and she had stood in these rooms face to face with her fate. What that fate had been, we should never know, but, in guessing, could not wander very far from the dismal truth. At least, it had not been very long of accomplishment on this side of the grave. As we talked thus, and while the impression of seriousness was upon us, James arrived; and Aunt Anne was so full of the story of Mrs. Devlin's strange lodger, that she repeated it to her favourite nephew. He was interested in it, but he took it more quietly than we women had done. Queer stories were in his line,—they were no novelties to him.

"Of course," he said, "one thing is very plain; she must have been disgracefully separated from her husband, or she could not have been hopelessly parted from her child."

"Yes," said Aunt Anne; "I fear there is no other solution of the mystery. By the way, I wonder what was her name. Mrs. Devlin did not mention it. I must ask her to-morrow."

"What for, Aunt?" said matter-of-fact James. "She would use a false name no doubt, if circumstanced as we supposed; and it is much more romantic to think of her as the strange lady, or 'the mysterious lodger,' than as Mrs. Smith or Mrs. Harris."

"James, don't be horrid," I said; "whatever her name may have been, or whatever her sins, she must have been a woman of decided character and firm will, and no inconsiderable cleverness; if she had not been, she would not have made such an impression on Mrs. Devlin, I can tell you. She is not a silly woman by any means; and you should hear her describe the cleverness with which the lady altered her appearance—not merely her dress, but her face, as Mrs. Devlin described it. She banished all the elegance from it, and turned herself into a common-looking person."

"H-n-m," said James reflectively, and rubbing his chin; "I should say she was an actress."

"Oh no, James," I said indignantly; "if you had heard Mrs. Devlin tell the story, you could not think such a thing. She suffered so really; and besides, what a foolish thing for her to do, to play such a part as that for no purpose but to mystify a woman, and"—

"Don't run away with my words, Maggie," said my imperturbable James; "I did not say your friend's mysterious lodger was acting; I said I thought it likely she was an actress. The idea was suggested to me by your description of the ready and rapid assumption of a commonplace appearance and manner, utterly opposed to her own, under difficult and trying circumstances, which must have taxed her nerves to the utmost, and which, with all the will and courage in the world, I doubt whether any woman, untrained in travestie, could carry through. We must be going now, Aunt," he added; "but I know something of old Bowley. I think you said he was the solicitor whom Mrs. Devlin had seen. Bowley and Standish is the firm of Lincoln's Inn Fields; and some day or other I shall talk to him about it, and see if he has any recollection of the circumstances of the legacy. If he were employed, as Mrs. Devlin says, by the executor to the lady's will, he must know something about her. How long has she been dead?"

"Six years, Mrs. Devlin says."

"Well, it is rather romantic to dig up the buried history of a life that closed six years ago, and did not belong to a particularly great person," said my husband; "nevertheless I will do it, when I get the chance."

The conversation then turned on general matters, and we soon took our leave, Aunt Anne declaring herself much better, and announcing her intention of rising very early on the following day. The night was beautiful; the fragrance and youth of the summer had triumphantly defeated the ordinary characteristics of London; and James and I walked home. How well I remember the stars and the trees in the Park, and the flashing of the lamps, the glimpses of rich dress, the gleam of costly jewels! That walk was memorable to me, not in itself, but for what it preceded. Our talk was highly satisfactory to ourselves, but not otherwise important; it turned upon our own affairs, business matters and domestic details. Then we talked of Aunt Anne; and James seemed much pleased that I liked the old lady so cordially, and still more, when I told him that at length my desire to see Woodlee was about to be gratified, for Mrs. Carter had expressed a wish that we should go there in the long vacation, and, of course, take the children.

"Then she really must be very fond of my Maggie," said James; "for, for a really kind-hearted and generous person, she has always been, in my opinion, singularly inhospitable. The stranger rarely remains within her gates for more time than suffices for the performance of a dinner-party. I hope we shall get on well there (of course we go), and that she will take to the children."

"O yes," I said, "I hope she will; but I am not sure; I will not let them worry her, if I can help it. And, James, I really do think she will leave you her property — perhaps not all her money, but a great deal of it, and Woodlee. I don't think she cares in the least for your brothers; and besides, they are so well off, they don't want it."

"I'm not so sure of that, Maggie," said my husband; "at least, that they think so. However, time will tell; and I hope the dear old lady will enjoy her property for many a long year to come, though I don't mean to say I should not, at the end of them, like to find myself master of Woodlee, and wonderfully improving the property for Jamie."

I gave him an emphatic and sympathising squeeze, and we walked on all the more briskly and pleasantly for our little bit of castle-building, in which, Heaven knows, there was not a touch of disloyal envy of the châtelaine in esse.

When I reached Knightsbridge on the following morning, I found that Mrs. Carter had not carried out her intention of rising early, and that she was still in her own room. I assisted her to finish her toilet, which was always rich, careful, and suitable to her age and condition, and then we descended to the drawing-room. Aunt Anne was wonderfully better that day, and was looking so. Her face wore the softened, brightened expression which so often succeeds illness, with its enforced inaction and its opportunities for thought. I had thought, as she sat before her toilet-glass, and I had handed her the massive old-fashioned gold bracelets she always wore, and she had clasped them on the delicate wrists — a little shrunken, it is true, but still graceful — and arranged the lappets of her handsome cap, that she must have been a beautiful woman in her time; and I wondered whether her life had always been a tranquil one, or whether my old vague supposition, that the power to feel deeply and to suffer much lay hidden under that quiet and rather eccentric exterior, was correct. I was thinking these thoughts as we went down together to the drawing-room, where our entrance was greeted by a decorous welcome from the Corporal, and a burst of song from Ally. The room looked pretty and cheerful, and the light simple frames of the drawings on the walls glinted in the sun.

"Come now, Aunt," I said, "and before you sit down look at Miss Winifred's drawings."

"O yes," she said; "I must not forget that." And she put on her spectacles, and went over to the opposite wall, where were the Indian scene and the beautiful drawing of the sea and the boat. She fully shared my admiration of the latter, and traced out its sentiment enthusiastically; but she dwelt upon the former with even closer attention, and said, "Is there no writing under the picture or at the side, to tell us where this view is taken from, Margaret?"

"No, Aunt," I replied, "there is nothing written there. Mrs. Devlin told me Miss Winifred spoke of it as 'the hills;' some European station in the Himalayas, or Neilgherries, I suppose."

"I wish I knew," she said, almost as if she were talking to herself.

"Why, Aunt?" I asked. "Is there anything particular about the hills in your mind?" I asked the question idly and carelessly; but she did not answer it for fully a minute, and then she spoke gravely, and I noticed with surprise that she looked paler than before.

"Yes," she said; "I once took a great interest in all that part of the world, and felt impatient enough at the little one could get to know about it in those old times. But what is the subject of the other drawings?" And she crossed the room to where the Egyptian and the English scenes hung side by side.

"You may as well sit down while you are looking at them, Aunt," I said; and rolled an arm-chair towards her, in which she sat down immediately. I was pointing out the beauties and the finish of the Egyptian scene to her, when she started up, uttered an exclamation, and stood gazing with clasped hands at the other picture—that one which represented the tranquil English country-house.

Something in her face and attitude frightened me.

"What is the matter, Aunt?" I cried. "What ails you?"

"What is this?" was her strange answer. "Tell me at once who has done this."

"Done what?" I said, my alarm growing, as her face bore more and more traces of agitation.

"Why, this—this drawing. Don't you know what it is?"

"No, Aunt," said I, "I don't—do you?"

"Do I? Yes. I tell you, child, it is a picture of Woodlee, as it was when I was a girl, as it was when"—she stopped, and I stared at her in silent amazement. The staid caustic old lady was shaking from head to foot; her lips were quivering; a rebellious army of emotions had broken loose in her, and were ravaging her features.

"Woodlee!" I said,—"a picture of Woodlee! What an extraordinary coincidence! But sit down, Aunt; pray sit down: why should this agitate you so much?"

Even while I spoke I was full of wonder, remembering that the picture had been painted within this very room where we were then looking at it, within three months of the artist's death; and that if indeed it were, as Mrs. Carter said, a picture of Woodlee in its former condition, it must have been painted from the memory of many years ago.

"What did Mrs. Devlin say about these pictures, Margaret?" said Aunt Anne, in a quick nervous voice.

"I remember only that they belong to her, Miss Winifred, and that she was forbidden to have them hung up where she is now."

"But what else did she say? Who painted them?"

"Dear Aunt," I said, "have you forgotten? Why, her father—and that is why the poor girl prized them so,—the father died here, you know, just before you came."

She looked at me in a puzzled sort of way, and said in a weak voice:

"What was his name? The father's name, I mean. Mrs. Devlin talks of the Captain and Miss Winifred, but she has never mentioned them by name to me."

"O, but she did to me, Aunt," I said. "The father's name was Arthur Dallas."

She started violently, uttered a sound that was neither a cry nor a moan, but in some indescribable way was both; then sank heavily back in her chair and fainted. If you have ever seen an old person faint—one in whom the impulse and passion of youth are extinct, one in whom life has ceased to be buoyant and self-asserting, in whom reaction is slow and pulsation feeble—you will understand the terror with which I gazed upon the motionless figure, the helpless hands, the gray fixed face. Hannah and Joan came into the room, alarmed by the violent ringing of the bell, and one of them called Mrs. Devlin. We flung the windows and door wide open, placed the chair in the current of air between them, and applied the usual restoratives, but for some time in vain. At length the spell seemed broken; she moved and moaned; the haggard eyes opened and looked vacantly, heavily around, and two large laggard tears—for age is grudging of the power to weep—dropped heavily upon the front of her dress. She looked from Mrs. Devlin to me, and from me to the frightened servants, and then closed her eyes again with a shudder.

"We had better get her to her room, and into bed again, without delay, Mrs. Devlin. I'm afraid this is a relapse."

"No," I said, "I think not but I cannot explain it. We cannot move her up-stairs; let us lay her on the sofa for the present."

We did so, and she was perfectly passive. Then we gave her some wine, and she lay quite still, covering her face with her hands. When I knew by her pulse that the faintness had gone off, I went into the back drawing-room and wrote a message to James, directed Hannah to take it to the nearest telegraph-office, and when she was gone, I told Mrs. Devlin exactly what had occurred. That she had received a shock by the mention of Captain Arther Dallas' name was evident, but nothing further. I had never, to my knowledge, heard such a name in connection with her, or any member of my husband's family.

"Did you ever hear him, or Miss Winifred, mention Woodlee, Mrs. Devlin?" I asked.

"Never, ma'am," she said, "I am quite sure; or when I saw Mrs. Carter's letters, and the plates on her trunks, I should have been sure to have remarked and remembered it. The best way is to leave her perfectly quiet, ma'am," said Mrs. Devlin. "Whatever it is, she is not able to tell you, and she ought not to talk to you. Leave her to herself until the shock has gone off, and then it will be a relief to her to speak."

At this moment Joan came to the folding-door and told me Mrs. Carter was better, and asked for me. Mrs. Devlin and I went into the front-room, found her sitting-up on the sofa, her face quite pale, but still composed, and her hands, still tremulous, lying folded on her lap.

"I fear I frightened you, Margaret," she said, as I knelt down beside the sofa. "I am frightened myself, and ill, my dear, and I want to be quite alone. Yes," she continued, as I made a gesture of remonstrance, "quite alone. I am confused, and I must have things made plain to me before I can speak. You must leave me, dear. Go away now, and keep your engagement for this evening, and come to me to-morrow." (Mrs. Devlin, standing behind the sofa, made a quick signal to me to acquiesce.) She spoke with growing agitation and great urgency, and I began to perceive that she was too much in earnest to be contradicted.

"I promise you," she continued, "that I will take care of myself, but I must be alone.

Don't be vexed, my dear; you will understand it soon."

Pained, afraid, and wondering, I obeyed her, and took my leave. Mrs. Devlin saw me to the door, and gave me the most earnest assurance of her care and attention. She also promised to send for me at once should Mrs. Carter exhibit any symptoms of illness; and then reluctantly and slowly I turned away from the house. I had telegraphed to James that I could not leave Aunt Anne, and he must either go out to dinner without me or send an apology; and now I thought the best thing I could do was to go to his office and tell him how matters stood. I accordingly got into a cab and drove to Furnival's Inn. James was fortunately alone when I arrived, and he heard my account of all that had occurred that morning with equal astonishment and concern. He also was wholly at a loss to understand the origin of his aunt's agitation and suffering. He made me repeat the exact words that had been spoken more than once, and then said:

"There is no doubt it was the name which knocked the dear old lady up. There is also no doubt about the picture being Woodlee before she bought it, and probably altered it very much. I have some of the papers relative to the purchase here, I know, and I will look over them before I come home; they may throw some light upon the matter. You must get home now, my dear, or you will be ill next."

"Of course we will not dine at the Trevors," James?"

"Of course not. If you are up to it, we will go together to inquire for Aunt Anne in the evening; and if she is inclined to have you with her, you had better stay."

The day seemed long and dreary. I was nervous and apprehensive, and every ring at the bell made me start. At six o'clock James came home; and I followed him into his dressing-room to learn whether he had examined the papers and made any discoveries.

"Well, Maggie, I have found out something," he said. "Aunt Anne purchased Woodlee (as I knew before) from General Strickland; but I looked over some letters that were tied up with the deeds, and which had been mere preliminaries to the transaction, and I find that General Strickland bought the place from a Mr. Dallas, who inherited it from his father, and had lived in it for nearly fifty years."

"Then I suppose Captain Dallas was his son?" I said, "and ought to have been the owner of Woodlee. What an extraordinary circumstance that Aunt Anne should have gone into the very rooms in which he lived and died, and found it out by such a mere accident as the hanging-up of a picture which had no real right to be there at all! But why should she be so dreadfully distressed, James? Do you suppose she knew this Captain Dallas? There is nothing in the mere fact of the drawing being a picture of Woodlee to throw her into such a state. She has not done any wrong or injustice; she does not purchase the place of them — of these Dallases, I mean. After all, the coincidence is strange; but it is only a coincidence, and I don't understand her agitation. Can you make it out, James?"

"Certainly not, Maggie," he said; "and there is no use in our wasting time in trying to make it out. We shall know it if Aunt Anne chooses to tell us; and if she does not, we must resign ourselves to ignorance. Her getting into those rooms is entirely a coincidence, and a very unfortunate one in my opinion. — By the by, Tisdale called on me to-day."

And then my husband, who has a business-like objection to prolonging a conversation after all the facts have been exhausted, proceeded to talk of the object of his friend's visit, and of things in general.

Dinner was over; and I had gone to the nursery to see the children undressed and put to bed, just before James and I should go to Knightsbridge, when the housemaid came to tell me that a gentleman had called to see her master on business, and that he accordingly begged me to wait for him for half an hour. I went down to the drawing-room in my shawl and bonnet, and was sitting idly there, listening to the hum of voices audible from the room below through the open windows, when Susan once more came upstairs — this time with a note. It was from Mrs. Devlin, and written by Mrs. Carter's desire. "Mrs. Carter and I have had a long conversation," the note said; "and I have been able to set her mind at rest about many things. She wishes you to know that she received a shock on learning the name of Miss Winifred's father, as she had known him well, under peculiar circumstances, in her youth. She is much better now, and has gone to her room, and begs me to write and tell you not to be at all uneasy about her, for she feels she will be quite calm and well to-morrow. Mrs. Carter hopes you will be able to come to her early." When I had read this, I perceived that our going to Knightsbridge that evening would be unnecessary; and when James joined me in the drawing-room, he agreed with me, and we remained at home.

Aunt Anne received me in the drawing-room on the following day, and with her accustomed kindness and cheerfulness; but she was changed. I saw the alteration with my first glance at her handsome serene face, from which agitation had passed away in the long hours of the night, which bring counsel and calmness. It was a kind of change not easily described, but which I felt in every look and word of hers. It was not that she looked more happy, but that there was a purpose in her face, which lent a deeper meaning to its lines and features than the comfortable well-to-do intelligence which had been their ordinary expression. Something of pensive (not peevish) regret, of quiet solemnity, which I had never seen in her face before, increased the impression it made upon me. She was seated in an arm-chair beside the largest table in the room, on which, propped up by books, she had placed the water-colour drawing that had so deeply affected her. A number of books besides — all strangers to me — lay upon the table, and also a photographic portrait, in which I recognised the likeness of Winifred Dallas. I felt some embarrassment in this meeting with Mrs. Carter, such as I think persons who are naturally shy and sensitive must always experience when they have witnessed intense emotion, rendering a confidence inevitable which they feel might not otherwise have been accorded to them.

I think Aunt Anne saw that I was embarrassed and uncomfortable, and tried to set me at ease at once by saying, as she still held my hand, "You are regretting that I ever came here, Margaret; but it has been well for me, my dear." Then, after a little, she said, "I am going to tell you my story, Margaret. It is not a strange one, I daresay, though it seems strange to me. It is an old one now, indeed; but though you are young, you are not one of those whose narrow sympathies are but for their own age, and who cannot realise that the old were ever young."

"It is at least not difficult to realise in your case, Aunt," I said; "for you have little of age about you but the years."

"Perhaps so, my dear," she said thoughtfully; "and if that be really the case, the cause is, I think, that my memory has always been kept green. Mine has been a quiet life; and if one blessing has been denied me, I have enjoyed many lesser ones; and it may be that in the end such compensation as this world can bestow is yet to be mine for that great deprivation."

You don't understand me, Margaret; but you will do so when you have heard the story of my youth."

"Pray tell it to me, Aunt," I said; "and at least I can estimate such a confidence aright."

So she told me, in the words I use. I leave out only such interruptions as arose from my own questions and remarks. She told me her story gravely and simply, and without any of the strong excitement and agitation which had overpowered her on the previous day.

"I do not know, Margaret," she began. "whether you know much of James's family history. Some wives never learn a great deal on such points, especially when, as you did, they marry men whose occupations have removed them from the scenes of their youth and broken up close association. I will not question this, however, but tell you all I need as briefly as I can. Your husband's father was my brother, and my father's second son. There were three of us; I, the only daughter and the youngest child, was born only a few weeks before my mother's death. My eldest brother went into the army, and has long been dead. James and I were thrown together in our home-days, and naturally exercised a mutual influence on each other's life. I doubt whether James knows what his father's real character was; and I am sure, if he does know it, he has never imparted the knowledge to you. I will say no more of him than I must to make you understand my story. He and I and our father lived on at the Larches, which, as you know, my father sold some years before his death, after John had got his commission and gone abroad. I was educated at home by a governess, and James by a tutor. This tutor was an accomplished scholar and a gentleman, but he was a weak man, and unable to exercise authority when it was resisted, which it was by James. My father was an indolent man, whose property was already injured by his carelessness: and though he was kind and gentle to us all, I don't think we ever inspired him with any keen interest; and I am sure he never made our characters and dispositions a subject of study or observation. Our neighbourhood was not thickly inhabited, and our circle of visiting acquaintances was small, of friends still smaller. My intimacies were confined to two families—the Carters of Carters Court, and the Dallahs of Woodlee. The Carters were people of large fortune and a fine old name, and Carters Court a place which realised all the old ideas of English hospitality and domestic life. The family were pleasant associates for me, as gay and young as themselves. Rosalind was my constant companion; and the young men, both in the army, and not very often at home, regarded me in the light of an additional sister, to be made much of, after an unceremonious fashion, when they did come to the house on leave. Algernon and Meredith Carter were much older than their sister, the child of their father's second wife. I have not much to tell you of the family, and only give you these particulars because you know Meredith Carter became my husband long after the happy time I am telling you of. The Larches were within two miles of Carters Court, and Woodlee was five miles on the other side of the Larches. The difference in distance made some difference in intimacy; and Helen and Arthur Dallas were less frequently at the Larches, and I less frequently with them, than with the Carters. Yet we saw a good deal of each other; and Helen Dallas, Rosalind Carter, and myself, were great friends, in all the girlish intensity of the term. When my brother James was nineteen and I was seventeen, I began to fancy he had a boyish predilection for Helen Dallas. He would come to the morning-room where she and I worked and read, practised our music, or gossipped together, when if Helen had not been there, he would have been off with his dog and gun, or visiting in the neighbourhood. James was a handsome, attractive young man; and I wondered sometimes that Helen never seemed attracted to him. I did not like him myself, but I had sufficient sense to know that that was no criterion. Mr. Thackeray did not write in those days, and remind young ladies that as their brothers were not in love with them, they could not possibly judge of the effect they produced upon other young ladies with whom they were in love; but I knew this by instinct, if not by instruction, observed silently, and knew that Helen cared nothing for James. If any thing could have made my father uneasy, I think James's conduct and disposition at this time would have done so; but nothing could; and he received complaints from Mr. Mars, the tutor, and accounts from tradespeople to whom James owed money, with a kind of contemptuous indifference which seems wonderful to me to look back on now, but which I did not reason on then. I never knew what was my father's exact position in money-matters, but I knew generally that he was not so rich as he had been, and that there was no entail of property on

"eldest son" in the case. The Larches had belonged to our family for four generations, but it was at my father's absolute disposal; and, as you know, he ultimately sold the place. He was very generous to me, though careless in the sense in which care is valuable to a motherless girl, and I am sure he was liberal to my brothers; but his liberality did not suffice for James's extravagance, and gradually something like discomfort arose in the atmosphere of our house. I remember, in particular, the departure of Mr. Marsh, and an angry scene between my father and James, in consequence of the tutor's having told my father that James had very imperfectly profited by his instructions. There was, as I have said, an angry scene; and I know my father told James he was seriously injuring his future prospects in life, for every shilling he had to pay for him above his allowance he would deduct from the share which was to be his at his death. He also spoke to him of a future career; and when James said insolently enough, there was time enough yet to think about that, my father asked him if he intended to make a fortune by his good looks and marry an heiress. 'No,' said James, 'I don't; I mean to marry Helen Dallas, if she will have me.' 'I don't think she will then,' said my father; 'and if she would, I think her father and her brother would hinder her; for Dallas has no good opinion of you, James, and does not fancy you for a companion for Arthur; and I conclude that if you were not a mere boy, whose marriage it is absurd to talk about, he would not consider you any more eligible as a husband for Helen.' Then my father went into his study, and appeared to remember the matter no more; perhaps he never did, for he had a wonderful faculty for casting off care, and substituting small things for great, in his interests in life. I have always thought, Margaret, that these unfortunate words of my father's laid the foundation of much of the misery which ensued: it was some distance off yet, and my life was very bright about this time. You will not laugh or listen listlessly when an old woman talks to you of love? The young pay an ill tribute to their own feelings when they ridicule sentiment merely because it has stood the test of time — merely because it has fulfilled the most ardent aspirations which their own young hopes and feelings have ever formed.

"I loved Arthur Dallas very well and devotedly, and so I love him still — more happy now, since yesterday, my dear, than for many years before, because I have no more doubt or uncertainty about him; no more ignorance, because I know he has passed from darkness into the light which can be never more interrupted; and because the term of our separation must needs be brief, and will have a solace for me which has not been in all the years of my life since I saw him last. Yes, Margaret, he who died in this house, in the room, on the bed where I have thought the thoughts of him which have dwelt freshly with me for thirty years, where I have lived over again in memory much keen suffering, and a little transient joy — the father of the beautiful girl who interested you so much, the friendless girl — friendless, please God, no longer; the man who painted in this picture the home of his youth, where he and I dreamed of a home which was never to be, till we have met in the abiding City, and who, in painting it, must needs have thought of me — that man, Margaret, was my first and only love. Look here! do you see this stone terrace? There, where the lower steps begin, just under the stone vase, he and I and Helen used to sit. Here, on the opposite side, where that footpath winds away in the wood, he and I used to walk. There, where the painting grows indistinct, and the masses of trees are clustered together, and the walk winds out of view, he found me one day. Ah, I see him now, as he came hurriedly towards me, with a light in his brown eyes, and his black curls tossing behind his boyish head, and told me how he had traced me by a glove and a thimble and a pair of scissors, scattered along the footpath; as Poncet traced his parents by the pebbles. It was on that day we told each other in words what we had long known in our hearts, — known ever so long, and so well, that we did not say much about it, but soon fell to talking of James and Helen. I told Arthur I knew Helen did not care for James. He said he was glad of it, for even for my sake he could not like James. 'He was overbearing,' he said, 'insolent and shallow, selfish, disposed to profligacy, and, he felt sure, vindictive.' I remember so well how he told me he had watched James the day before, and had seen the scowl pass over his face when Helen gave some mark of her preferment to Algernon Carter.

"These are little things, Margaret, to have remembered all these years, but the time during which I had an opportunity of gathering up memories was brief, and all our measurements are arbitrary when they are applied to such things as these. We talked of Helen and James then regretfully, but without apprehension; indeed, we feared nothing. What was there to fear? Nothing from his parents, who loved me, and who could hardly object to our marriage on pecuniary grounds, for I supposed my father would portion me handsomely; nothing from my father, partly because of his indolent want of interest in me, and partly because he liked the Dallases better than any of our neighbours, and his intercourse with them almost amounted to intimacy. We were very happy, and we intended to be happier, and the garden and the woods of Woodlee were enchanted ground to us that day. It was to be the last of Arthur's stay at Woodlee for some time; the next he was to return to Cambridge, for he was in his second year at the University. He thought it well for us to keep our secret until his next visit to Woodlee, and this I agreed to. I had an undefined reluctance to my brother James being made acquainted with it; and indeed, knowing, as I did, that we had no opposition to fear, there was no reason why I should not enjoy the luxury of my secret happiness unshared. You must remember, Margaret, that though my father was a widower, and I was his only daughter, there was no such close tie of affection and confidence between us as to render my reticence a breach of loyalty to him, or an injury in any way. It was otherwise as regarded Helen, and I wished to tell her; but Arthur said, not yet, it might make her position more awkward with James. 'I wish he would propose to her, and get refused,' Arthur said; 'and then it would be over, and very likely James would make his mind up to something, and go away; and I'll tell you what, Anne, Algernon Carter is older than Helen, but I think she is inclined to like him, and I hope he may like her too.'

"Well, Margaret, he went away, and every thing seemed different. He was often from home, and though I loved him, and knew it, I did not seem to mind it much; but now when he belonged to me, I felt it hard, and somehow unjust. I was very young, dear, and unreasonable, and I grudged the time out of my life that seemed wasted. I have learned to look out on a larger prospect now than the little space lying at our feet, and to know that all periods fit into the eternal plan, and none are scattered loose or wasted. For every month that parted us then I can now count a year; and yet, what is it all?"

"You would like to know what sort of man Arthur Dallas was, Margaret, in those days? You have seen his daughter, and Mrs. Devlin has given me this photograph, which is, she tells me, a very accurate likeness. Then the resemblance between them must be very great. For that girlish figure substitute a lithe, tall, powerful frame, light and supple, with movements full of grace and energy, and the gladness of a light heart in them all. For the pensive softness of this face, picture a frank boldness and high-hearted, gleeful, intelligent vitality, but leave untouched the brown-velvet eyes and the broad level brows, let the silken black hair be short and rippling over the head in close curls; and you have the father's picture, as like the child's as the difference of sex will permit. I wonder how much of the manly strength, grace, and beauty that I looked upon that day in the beech-wood was left in the form that lay at rest upon the bed upstairs. Arthur Dallas," she continued after a pause, which I did not break by a word, "was clever and enthusiastic, and, as I afterwards knew, but did not then suspect, weak. His weakness of character was of the generous, not the mean order, and it lent an additional fascination to his amiability, his light-heartedness, and the vivacity of his temperament. He was a general favourite; and when people said he was a little 'spoiled,' I paid no attention to the remark, which indeed was made in no unkindly spirit. My father liked him much in his own indolent way, and never appeared to have any objection to any amount of association between us. Not so my brother James. Before I had taken count of the nature of my own feelings towards Arthur, I perfectly understood those of James. He did not like him, and he was jealous of him — jealous because Rosalind Carter and his own sister preferred Arthur's society to his, and because Arthur's reputation stood higher in the neighbourhood than his own. I need not linger over this portion of my story — it is undefined, and to you uninteresting — but I will pass on to the time at which Arthur left Cambridge and my brother James was twenty years old. Before this time all that Arthur had foretold had happened. James had proposed to Helen Dallas, and had been definitively refused. Thence ensued the first open disagreement between him and me. He was frantically angry as well as bitterly disappointed, though I could see no reasonable cause for the former feeling. He had never received encouragement; and I told him so, and refused to allow the circumstance of his rejection to have any influence on my relations with Helen. He attempted to insist on my relinquishing the acquaintance, and I quietly but steadfastly refused. A quarrel ensued, violent on his part; and a few days later he left home for London. You must remember that such an expedition meant something in those days, and I had no expectation of his return for some time. He had not been long away when I noticed an alteration in my father's demeanour; he became, for him, much downcast and fidgety; and I observed that he wrote to James frequently, and always appeared disturbed and low after doing so. Helen was very much with me at this time, and we both went frequently to Carters Court; while the Carters visited as often at the Larches. The question of Arthur's future was much debated just then. Mr. Dallas was not a rich man, though he was comfortably off, and he had a number of connections in India, engaged chiefly in mercantile pursuits and very prosperous. It was proposed that Arthur should take the sum of money his father could give him, to purchase a share in a mercantile house in Bombay, and so endeavour to realise such a fortune as would enable him to add to the estate of Woodlee, and reside there in becoming style when it should come into his possession, burdened as it would be with the charge of Helen's fortune. Mrs. Dallas had a sister, many years younger than herself indeed, but little older than Helen; and she had married, a few months before Arthur left Cambridge, a Mr. Hungerford, who had a mercantile house at Bombay, and who was then a prosperous and wealthy man. I think it must have been this marriage which inspired Mr. Dallas with such a plan for the disposal of Arthur, as it was proposed that he should purchase a share in the house of Hungerford and Lewin. My father did not like this plan—he had no great respect for mercantile pursuits—and having lost his own property through sheer neglect, could not perhaps have been expected to recognise the necessity of a young man's going to the other side of the world to enrich himself who had a tolerably comfortable position at this. Arthur, however, had no taste for any of the learned professions, and did not regard his university education as any drawback to his pursuit of commercial wealth. 'I suppose a man will not buy and sell the less skilfully for having a gentleman's education,' Arthur said to me, when I demurred to so much knowledge of science and classics being submerged in foreign trade. The time had now come when my father and Mr. Dallas were to be told of our engagement, and I did not enertain any misgivings concerning the result. One summer evening Helen and Arthur and I lingered long and late upon that terrace,"—she touched the picture as she spoke,—“and now, after all these years, the scene is plain before my old eyes, as I daresay it will be when they are closing for the last time on all earthly scenes. The red gleam in the sky where the sun had gone down was still in the west, behind those tree-tops, and the last twitterings of the birds sang the evening-song. Helen sat reading on that step, and Arthur and I leaned side by side, and with our arms intertwined, over that low wall. We talked, with all the sanguine hopefulness of our youth and dispositions, about the time and the manner of our several disclosures to our respective fathers, and then rambled on to our plans for the future,—the residence in India, which was to be so brief, and the beautiful home Woodlee was to be turned into on our return. I have made some of the smallest of the alterations we then planned, Margaret, wondering sometimes whether Fate would lead his wandering footsteps to the old familiar place again; but it never did, my dear,—it never did.

“Well,” she continued, “we were summoned to the house by a servant, and I found a messenger from the Larches awaiting me. He had brought over a note from my father, containing a request that I would at once return home. I of course complied, and went away in the gig which the servant had brought for me. ‘I will be over to see your father to-morrow, Anne,’ said Arthur, as he arranged my wraps, ‘and will ride your pony. If I am turned out, you know, I can easily walk back,’ he added with a smile. As I drove away, I turned, and saw him standing on the low wide step of the hall-door, his bright brown eyes dancing with gaiety and his black curls moved gently by the evening breeze. I asked the servant as we went along if anything had happened at home; but he said not to his knowledge, though he added, something must be ‘up,’ as the squire had sent him to order a post-chaise for seven o'clock on the following morning. This surprised, but did not alarm me, and I went unconcernedly to my father's study. I found him looking pale, worn, and anxious; and he told me he had sent for me because he was obliged to leave home for London early on the following day on a matter of business.

“Unpleasant business?” I asked.

“‘Yes,’ he said, ‘very unpleasant business;’ but he said no more. I asked him if he were likely to be long away, and he told me he did not know. I then requested him to allow me to accompany him; and he at first demurred, said it would be wretched for me to be alone at a hotel in London, while he should be out; but still I saw he wished to accede to my request; and at length, when I pressed it, he did so. We parted early, and I passed a great part of the night in making preparations for my journey, and in writing long letters to Helen and Arthur Dallas. To the latter I said, than his interview with my father being unavoidably postponed, I thought he had better say nothing to his own, and I promised to keep him advised of our movements from London. The journey was not very cheerful; my father was preoccupied and sad; and as my maid was inside the carriage with us, our conversation was quite general.

"When we reached London, we drove to a grave, dingy, but highly respectable hostelry in Bond Street, and my father inquired for cards and letters. There were several of both; and during the day he saw three gentlemen on business, he said, and of course I was not present. I remained in the house all day, and rested myself; and by the following morning I was in a condition to enjoy the prospect of sight-seeing very thoroughly. You think it strange that I should remember all these small things, Margaret; and so do I, when so many greater ones are utterly faded and gone; but my first visit to this great city was the turning-point in my life, and I remember every hour and every incident, as I should in vain endeavour to remember the hours and incidents of a year ago. I came down in the morning, and found my father even more gloomy and downcast than before; and while we were at breakfast he told me the object of his journey to London. It was connected with my brother James. My father did not tell me particulars, nor have I ever known them. All he told me was, that James had been recklessly extravagant, had involved himself heavily in debt, and had been concerned in some gambling transaction, by which he had lost heavily, and which he, my father, had been obliged to investigate. This was a painful business, and had resulted in even worse consequences than I had anticipated. 'I must pay the money, Anne,' he said, 'to save him from disgrace; ruin he has already incurred, for this is the last money he shall ever have from me. John and you are the sufferers more than I.' He then told me he had been obliged to raise a large sum, and that it was very doubtful whether he should be able to avoid the necessity of selling the Larches. I did not understand money-matters very closely then, Margaret; but my heart sank within me, as a vague fear arose in me that in this calamity an obstacle to my marriage with Arthur might arise. I felt truly grieved for my father, but, with the absorbing selfishness of the young, I brooded over my own part in this misfortune, and magnified its extent. I could get no relief from the constant questioning of my heart—should I indeed lose my fortune? would my father be unable to give me a portion such as Mr. Dallas would think sufficient for his son? would their consent be refused? I remember that my father seemed surprised that I took the bad news with so much composure, while in reality I was almost stunned by the terrible weight of its meaning to me individually. I was still sitting with him when Algernon Carter was announced; and I saw by the embarrassment in the manner of both him and my father, that he was in some way concerned in, or at least cognisant of, what had occurred. Letter-writing was a very different thing in those days to what it is now, Margaret, and we used to take a good deal more pains about it. We did not send off hurried scraps of notes then, half-a-dozen in a day; and when I wrote all my fears and forebodings to Arthur, they made a long history. I think I could repeat the words of that letter now. Well, he answered it; and day after day came and went, and my father and I were still in London; he was still grave and troubled, and Algernon Carter was with him frequently. I saw a little of London, but not much—as much as I cared to see—and my heart grew heavier and heavier. At length one day my father told me that he had concluded the necessary arrangements; and I, who had hardly felt surprised that James had not come to the hotel, ventured to ask him if he had seen my brother. 'Yes,' he replied, 'I have seen him; but I cannot just yet endure his society. Something must be fixed on for his future provision, as soon as I can think of any fresh subject. In the mean time, he is to go down to the Larches, and stay there for the present; and you and I, Anne, will remain in London. We will take cheerful lodgings, and I will try to rouse myself, and let you have a little pleasure.'

"This resolution of my father's filled me with dismay. Deferring our return to the Larches signified a lengthened separation from Arthur, a further postponement of the explanation with my father, and added suspense. But there was no help for it; and even when I had made up my mind to tell my father all about it myself, I recognised that I must put off the revelation until the shock and the anxiety of the late events should have subsided. Then another trouble arose, and confronted me. My father suffered silently but severely; and the impress of sorrow and despondency was fast settling upon him. I had never realised, in the comfortable, indolent, eventless, undemonstrative life we had led together, how much I really loved my father; but I began to realise it fully now, and I began to experience that which is the strangest and most salutary lesson learned by youth, the need for putting aside its own dreams and hopes, and attending to the stern and relentless actualities of life.

"We left the hotel, and were comfortably settled in lodgings at Kensington, where everything was very handsome and very unhomelike, when Algernon Carter came one day, and told me he was going down to Carters Court. I charged him with some messages to Helen and a few presents; and I saw by his face that the commission was a pleasant one. He had a long interview with my father; and that day, after dinner, he asked me, much to my astonishment, whether I was aware of the attachment between Algernon Carter and Helen Dallas.

"I told him, not exactly; that I thought they liked each other, but did not know that it had come to that. Then my father said, 'Carter is a fine fellow; I am sorry I did not know more of him sooner; he has behaved nobly in this matter of James. I hope and believe he and Helen will be very happy.' Then he added, after a pause: 'I have made my will, Anne. I had to destroy one which I had made when I had more to leave; and I have made Algernon Carter your guardian.' I have omitted to tell you, Margaret, that Mr. Carter was by this time dead, and Algernon had become the head of the family, and was then making arrangements to leave the army. I heard this, as as you may imagine, with great surprise; and my father went on to say, that in the event of his death, when it should become necessary to sell the Larches, he wished me to reside with the Carters. 'I have Algernon's promise,' he said; 'and Helen's will not be very difficult to procure, I fancy;' and he smiled. But I could not enter into the matter. I longed to tell him what were my own hopes and plans for a future home, but I refrained—I hardly know why. That night I wrote to Arthur, and told him all that had passed. I mentioned my brother

James, asked if he had yet seen him, and used these words: 'I am very anxious to know how he takes the news of Helen's engagement. I feel uneasy lest he should fix a quarrel upon either Algy or you, and so more trouble should come out of this, and our affairs be unpleasantly complicated.' In the due and then slow course of the post I received an answer which tranquillized me very much. Arthur told me he had seen James, who was reserved and sulky, and had apparently adopted the plan of maintaining silence on the family events in contemplation. He had not made his appearance at Woodlee, and Arthur had not asked him to do so. To this he added intelligence which filled me with gladness. He had spoken with his father on the subject of our engagement, obtained his unqualified approbation, and it was arranged that if my father still expressed a determination to remain away from the Larches, Mr. Dallas and Arthur should come to town to see him, and make, subject to his approval, the concluding arrangements for Arthur's partnership in the firm of Hungerford and Lewin. My satisfaction on receiving this letter was complete. I thought sadly for a while, indeed, whether I could leave my father, to whose shaken state I could not blind myself, and go to India. I doubted whether he would bear to part with me now as resignedly as he would once have borne it; but the indomitable hopefulness of youth came to my aid, and I felt sure that everything would be settled somehow. The next time I wrote to Arthur, it was to tell him that there was no prospect of our returning to the Larches for the present, and to beg him to execute his project without delay. Helen wrote to me on that day, as a young girl writes to her chosen friend and companion on the subject which engrosses all her thoughts and fills all her heart. A few days passed, and I had a note from her, written in great distress. She had met James accidental, and he had renewed his suit in a very offensive manner. She had informed him of her engagement to Algernon Carter, of which she knew, or suspected, he was already aware, and had expressed her indignation at the course he was pursuing. A violent scene ensued, in which he denounced her as a flirt and a jilt, declared she had encouraged and led him on for years, and spoke in a manner at once threatening and contemptuous of Algernon. 'I told him,' said Helen, — 'and, dearest Anne, you must not be angry with me for doing so, — that I regarded him as an unmanly coward to attack me in this way, when I had neither Algernon nor Arthur to protect me; and I said, if Algernon did not exist, nothing would induce me to marry him, and that Arthur had as bad an opinion of him as I had. He went off in a fine rage, and I was sorry I had said that, as he and Arthur are to be so nearly connected: but Arthur does dislike him, and not even his being your brother can reconcile him to him. I wonder what he keeps prowling about the Larches for? I am sure it is lonely enough, now he can neither come here nor go to Carters Court. He has not met Algernon, or I suppose he would contrive to pick a quarrel with him.

"When I read this letter an indescribable thrill of fear passed over me, — a presentiment of danger and calamity seized upon me, and I felt that these incautious words of Helen's were fraught with misery to us all. I knew enough of James to dread their effect with a dread which might have seemed unreasonable to any one who had not seen his character develop itself, as I had done, but which was only too well founded in my knowledge. I perceived by Helen's letter that Algernon Carter had acted with his accustomed high honour and delicacy, and had not revealed my brother's painful secret even to his betrothed wife. So great was my distress of mind, that the concealment of it was impossible; and the moment my father returned from his accustomed walk in Kensington Gardens, I went to him and told him my uneasiness, and its cause. I did not read Helen's letter to him, but I gave him a softened version of its contents, and said nothing of her allusion to me. My father evidently partook of my misgivings, and said that the bitterness and recklessness of James's mood rendered them perfectly just. He could, however, do nothing beyond expediting to the utmost the arrangements he was then making for sending James abroad for a time. He would do this as speedily as possible; in the mean time he would write to James, and tell him his mind concerning his conduct to Helen Dallas, and to Algernon Carter, begging him to avoid any encounter with his unfortunate and misguided son. 'James hates Algernon all the more because he has been forced to acknowledge his obligation to him,' said he; and then left the room. I was forced to be content with this, though I knew I had not told my father that which lay at the bottom of all my fears — the dread of ill to Arthur. I had but half enlightened him, and he had but half reassured me; and thus that night was full of horrid dreams.

"On the following day my father wrote, as he had promised, to James and to Algernon Carter; and I wrote to Helen. I tried to be cheerful and composed; and I read over and over again Arthur's letter, and counted the hours which were to elapse before he and Mr. Dallas would come to London. I did not hear from Helen or from her brother, and their silence made me conclude that I should soon see Arthur. One morning my father received a letter from Algernon Carter, which he mentioned to me casually, remarking that Algernon had taken what he said in good part, and that there was no news, except that the Carters and Dallahs were to dine that day at Mindenham, (Sir Robert Thornhill's place), and that Algernon believed James was to be of the party.

"'It was fortunate I wrote when I did,' said my father. It was just in time, as they were all to meet.'

"Two days had elapsed, and I had gone with my maids for a drive to Richmond, when, on my return, I saw a travel-stained carriage standing before our door. I rushed upstairs with the full assurance that Mr. Dallas and Arthur had arrived; and bursting open the drawing-room door, I found myself in the presence of my father and of Douglas, our Scotch steward — a trustworthy servant, who had been at the Larches in my grandfather's time. My father's face was ghastly in its pallor, and his whole frame was trembling.

"'What is the matter?' I exclaimed, and stopped short just inside the door.

"I cannot tell you how they told me, Margaret, though I seem to have the scene before me; but I think it was Douglas who made me understand that my brother James had been wounded in a duel by Arthur Dallas, and that his life was despaired of. They had met at Sir Robert Thornhill's, had quarrelled, exchanged mutual insults and defiance, and this was the result. The meeting had taken place near the Larches, and thither James had been carried. Arthur Dallas had fled no one knew whither. I tell you all this very calmly, do I not, my dear? and I believe I even heard it very calmly then. Not that I did not know its full meaning at the time; for I did, and I believe that one always does. There is no such thing as 'breaking' evil tidings to any one: these marvellous forecasting minds of ours outrun the present, and see all — that which is, and that which is to be — in one comprehensive glance. I do not believe that any calamity ever brought, in its most lengthened duration, a pang of which the first sting was not in its first moment. I know that before Douglas had ceased speaking, I had seen into the vista of my future life—Arthur had done this, deed which must for ever part us.

“I knew it all—I saw it all: and from that moment the blank began, which has never been brightened since with the old sunshine, though mine has been a prosperous, and not an unhappy, life. My father’s grief was terrible to witness. His indolent nature made it all the more so, as the contrast was more forced upon my attention.

“Of course all was confusion, and our immediate return to the Larches was at once decided upon. But this, I felt, was beyond my powers. I could not return thither; I could not see James, who, if he were to die, was dying by the hand of my betrothed husband; and if he were to live, had, by the provocation he had given, induced the dreadful occurrence which had separated us. I felt I could not be of any use to James; and I more than suspected that he knew what had passed between Arthur and me, and had acted as he had done with a perfect knowledge of what the consequences would be to me. No, I could not and would return to the Larches. The best surgical assistance within reach had been procured for James, and Douglas’s wife was installed at the Larches in attendance upon him. I took courage and told my father I did not feel equal to going home. He was astonished, and I could see disgusted, at my apparent selfishness and disregard of his feelings. I told him how Arthur and I had parted—with what intentions, with what hopes—and how I had had reason to expect that this very day would have brought him and Mr. Dallas to town, to ask his consent and ratify our engagement. I was indeed shocked at what had befallen James, but I acquitted Arthur, and implored my father not to condemn him. The best brother in the world, my dear Margaret, is of very little importance in his sister’s eyes in comparison with her chosen lover, and my brother had been rather less than indifferent. I knew the fault had been his, in this lamentable quarrel. I felt he had been endeavouring to provoke Arthur to anger for some time; and my intuitive conviction was that he had endeavoured to fix a quarrel on Algeron Carter, whose superior sense and added years, together with my father’s letter of warning, had prevented his falling into the snare, only too successfully set for the impulsive and high-spirited Arthur. I felt certain that no degree of anger could have so far obscured Arthur’s judgment as to make him forget me and the consequences involved in any serious breach between himself and James; and I therefore knew by instinct that the quarrel must have been designedly and deliberately pushed à l’outrance by my brother, so that Arthur could not avoid accepting his challenge without positive dishonour. All this I told my father; and no doubt I spoke with the strength and passion which my feelings inspired.

“The position in which my father found himself was a very painful one, and his compassion for me was extreme. The whole thing came so suddenly upon him that he was well-nigh bewildered, and our relations with every one were complicated and changed. He could give me no comfort or advice. He did indeed speak as kindly as he could be expected to speak of Arthur; for, after all, if his son died, Arthur’s hand would have slain him; but he did not say a word like the possibility of my ever again meeting him. As to Helen, we hardly spoke of her, but I felt that she and I were also severed; for if her brother had wounded mine, the provocation had come from James, and my brother had at least banished hers. My feet were indeed caught in a net, and there was no deliverance for me. I have remembered ever since the sickening length and dreariness of that evening, and the torturing wakefulness of the night, which even the faculty of sleeping that youth possesses could not conquer. Early the next morning my father went away, promising to send our old housekeeper up to town to take care of me, and to write to me as soon as possible. I had not had a line from Helen Dallas, nor indeed had I hoped or supposed she would have been permitted to write to me.

“I have hitherto lingered over my story, Margaret; but now there is no need of lingering. James recovered but very slowly, and never completely. For a long time he was in so nervous and shaken a condition that we feared his mind was affected; but this wore off by degrees, and though he was a changed man, he did not display any sort of eccentricity. I remained in London until his recovery had so far progressed that he was no longer in any danger of death. I heard from my father that Mr. and Mrs. Dallas and Helen had removed to Bath before James’s state suffered him to leave the house, so that there had been no danger of their meeting; and a very short time afterwards Helen’s marriage took place. It had been solemnised with the utmost privacy, and Algernon and his bride went abroad for a year. The marriage had taken place so soon after the misfortune which had befallen ourselves and the Dallases, as I understood, in consequence of a wish to that effect expressed by Arthur, who had remained in France a sufficient period of time to enable him to see his sister and Algernon in their early-wedded days, and had then sailed for India. Mr. Dallas had not returned to Woodlee, but had sold the place to General Strickland, from whom I many years afterwards bought it. My father and James were alone at the Larches, and even the resource of Carters Court was cut off from them. The name of Algernon's bride was a barrier between the houses.

"Your eyes are questioning me of Arthur, Margaret. Well, I will tell you of him. He wrote to me from France, whither he had fled, an agonised and agonising letter, which confirmed all that I had conjectured of the circumstances of that fatal day. He said that he knew our separation was inevitable, whether James lived or died; but he solemnly declared that he had never had any intention of harming him, and that the pistol had been discharged accidentally; and I implicitly believed him. To the world this circumstance told against him, as James's second — a young gentleman who had been of the dinner-party — accused Arthur of having fired too soon; and in fact he had accidentally done so. His letter expressed undying attachment and constancy to me, and said something of possible hope in the far future. He was going to India very soon, and so took leave of me in a few lines of passionate grief and valediction."

A MARKET FOR HIGH ART.

MR. PUNCH,

ON the memory of a certain wooden painter, who should have been WEST — a certain joker of jokes joked the following joke, to wit: —

"He died and made no sign."

Sign-painting, Sir, has hitherto been regarded as an inferior exercise of the pencil, and nobody but a shallow jester would say that the elevation at which signboards are generally suspended entitles them to be considered works of High Art. But circumstances have arisen under which any British Artist who has only genius enough might be enabled to paint signboards which would rival the finest pictures of MICHAEL ANGELO.

Let me, Sir, direct your attention to those large public-houses, the vast joint-stock hotels. They are inns whose landlords are lords and dukes and other members of the landed aristocracy. They are kept by the nobility and gentry. In the fine English of these days they are called "palatial edifices." Let these palatial public-houses be embellished with signs. As a palace is to an ordinary tavern, so might the sign of the palatial public-house be to that of a common one; larger and more beautiful.

The sign of the huge hotel should of course be executed in fresco, to stand the weather. The grandest hotels might be adorned with signs of corresponding grandeur. What if the Langham Place Hotel were to be called the Queen's Head? Why, then, any requisite alteration having been made in the architecture of the building, its principal entrance might be surmounted, by way of sign, with the best portrait of HER MAJESTY that could be painted by a distinguished R. A. Or, the sign of the Queen's Head might be a painting commemorative of postage reform. In like manner the Alexandra Hotel might have for its sign a grand historical picture of Her Royal Highness the PRINCESS OF WALES landing in England. For that of the Westminster Palace Hotel no end of subjects might be taken from the History of England for the last eight hundred years. Suppose the new Richmond Hotel were named the Cat and Fiddle, the Dog and Duck, the Goat and Compasses, the White Hart, the Blue Boar, or the Red Lion, its sign might exhibit a masterpiece of animal painting, executed by a LANDSEER or an ANSDALL.

A great advantage of sign-painting, practised as a branch of genuine art, would be the plentiful variety of subject which it would afford the artist. Fruit and flower painters, even, would thus find scope for their speciality in the production of such signs as the Rose and Thistle, or the Bunch of Grapes.

Altar-pieces are no longer painted, because there is nobody to pay for them, all the money that is given for pious use going in church extension, clergy-multiplication, and other means of supplying spiritual destitution with spiritual necessities. Sign-boards for splendid hotels would supply their places in the world of art, and, generally adopted, would create an ample and remunerative market for British Artists. If every great joint-stock hotel displayed a sign that was a first rate painting, it would do no more than its proprietary could very well afford. Rising hotels would encourage rising talent, and redeem this country from the reproach of being a nation of shareholders engrossed in trying to get money, and with eating and drinking.

I offer you the foregoing suggestion, Mr. Punch, in the hope that you will communicate it to the School of Design, and cause the Directors of that institution to begin reducing the notion of High Art signboards to practice, by offering to the competition of British Artists a considerable sum of money as a prize for the best sign of the Marquis of Granby. I love to take mine ease in mine inn, Mr. Punch, albeit I am,

PROPOSED CONGRESS AGAINST PRIVATEERING.

To the Editor of the Living Age.—Although believing with you that no "Maritime Congress of Nations," for the prevention of privateering, as suggested by "The Saturday Review in the article on p. 620 of No. 1126 of "The Living Age," is likely to be held until after the settlement of your "Alabama" claims by England, I have thought that the accompanying letter of the late Honorable Wm. Wilberforce touching this subject, and written 46 years ago, might not be without interest to the general reader, both at home and abroad. The letter, in the handwriting apparently of the author, and bearing his own signature and frank, was addressed to my grandfather, the late Divie Bethune, Esq., then an extensive merchant and ship-owner of New-York City, while the latter was on a visit to England in 1820. About a year since, I found it among Mr. Bethune's papers, bearing in his handwriting the following endorsement: "The enclosed is in reply to a letter wishing a time of general peace to be improved for a general Compact of Nations to prohibit Privateering in future Wars." The following extract from Mr. Bethune's journal dated at Birmingham, July 9th, 1820, discloses the origin of this letter. The entry reads as follows: "In dining with Joseph Reynolds, son of Richd. Reynolds, I suggested to him that now would be a good time for the different Governments of the World to form a reciprocal agreement to prohibit Privateering, this being a time of general Peace. He caught at the idea, and on our talking it over said he would write to Lord Teignmouth on the subject. I think I shall venture to write Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Macaulay on the same subject, and I feel persuaded that the horrors committed lately by the Patriot Privateers of S. America will prepare the minds of a majority of the people of the United States to recommend a similar prohibition to our Government. Oh! may my God grant me grace and wisdom to write judiciously on this important business, and may He incline the hearts of all Rulers to the prohibition of this accursed practise." This entry is succeeded by an interesting account of Mr. Bethune's interview with Mrs. Hannah More, at Barley Wood, near Wrington, Somersetshire, England, in which he says he "was agreeably surprised at the vigor of her intellect and the penetrating brightness of her eye." But this has nothing to do with the subject of this note.

Yours respectfully,

D. BETHUNE DUFFIELD,

DETROIT, February, 1866.

MR. WILBERFORCE TO MR. BETHUNE.

NEAR LONDON, 12 July, 1820.

DIVIE BETHUNE, ESQ.

My dear Sir,—I assure you with truth, that any suggestion from you would be received by me with a prepossession in its favor. But I can also assure you that the subject of your letter, with which I have been recently favoured, is one in which I have long had an opinion, perfectly consonant with your own; and, as you are already convinced, it is unnecessary for me to state the reasons for my own opinion. Parliament, however, is now within a few days of its adjournment, and it is therefore impossible to bring forward such a subject with the slightest hope of success, or even with any probability of its obtaining serious consideration. In another session the question would well deserve attention, and while I assure you, I should feel myself honored in being the introducer of it into the House of Commons, I must say that I should probably recommend for it a younger and less incumbered advocate. Were I not much occupied, I should be tempted to fill my sheet at least, but circumstanced as I am I will only add that I hope I shall have the pleasure of seeing you again, on your return southward, and that I am, with cordial esteem and regard, my dear sir,

Yours very sincerely,

W. WILBERFORCE.

NEW SPANISH GRASS.—THE London Engineer says:—Esparto, the newly imported Spanish grass, is likely to be largely used, with cotton, hemp, and wool, as one of the staples of manufacturing industry, in addition to the valuable resource which it seems likely to prove to our paper manufacturers. About 160,000 tons have already been imported, at an estimated price of eighty-two shillings per ton.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

CANADA is at this moment expecting the end, but hoping for the renewal in some acceptable shape, of the Reciprocity of Trade Treaty between the United States and the British Provinces. As important consequences may arise from either issue of this affair, we give some account of the nature of the treaty, and will look next week at the political questions arising out of it.

For a good many years after their separation from the mother country, the United States were almost entirely isolated from the British Provinces, and though the vigour of the fiscal restraints upon intercourse had been gradually though slightly relaxed, even as lately as twenty years ago there was the very smallest trade between them which can be thought possible between two countries lying in such close proximity. There were duties on each side upon almost every article coming from the other, and in Canada there was a differential duty discriminating against the trade of the United States upon every article whatever which came to it from thence. The first important step in the way of more free intercourse was the passage by the Americans of the Bonding and Transit Law, by which they permitted goods coming from sea to the United States but destined for Canada, to pass through their territory in bond. This concession was made spontaneously, for their own purposes, and, no doubt, at the suggestion of their railway companies, who saw that with such an arrangement they would command the Canadian trade during the months of closed navigation. Canada soon after, upon the completion of its canals, and with an object similar to that of the Americans, passed a Bonding Bill of its own, with a view of enabling its forwarders and shippers to export the Western American cereals. It moreover absolutely removed the duty on wheat; but retained that on flour. Then came our abolition of the Corn Laws, and Canada's loss of favour in home markets, with the consequent abolition of the differential duty against foreigners, which had previously been maintained for the purpose of giving a preference to British exporters.

Under these new forms of fiscal legislation the trade between the two countries began slowly to augment. About 1849, however, the late Mr. W. H. Merritt, to whom Canada is indebted for the project of the Welland Canal, and more recently for that of the suspension bridge at Niagara, began to agitate for a reciprocal free trade between Canada and the United States in agricultural products. He was prompted to this mainly by observing that at certain seasons the prices of provisions were higher in the American sea-board States than they were in England, and that for a large class of agricultural produce Canada had no other market than that of the great continental cities. For some time the Canadian Government of the day, then under the direction of Mr. Hincks, now Premier of Demerara, appeared disposed to slight this project. Eventually, however, they took it up, and having obtained the assistance of the British Minister at Washington, Lord Elgin, succeeded in negotiating with the American Government that Convention, which is now on the point of expiring. Respecting that negotiation we may mention two pieces of history which we believe to be authentic — they at any rate come to us from persons who were actors in the business. While the American Government was being solicited for its assent to the proposals, the Southern members of the Senate — the body whose action on treaties were final — was greatly indisposed to give what was asked; thinking that the advocates of the plan in the Northern States, while imposing heavy duties in favour of Northern manufacturers, at the same time were attempting to get up a little bit of free trade on their own frontier for their own benefit. They had, therefore, in "caucus," to use the technical word, determined to vote against it, and if they had, it would have miscarried. Just then, however, one of them received a letter from a resident in Canada, exhorting him to vote against the treaty, because that would drive the Canadians to ask for annexation in despair of getting by any other means into the American markets. The letter had an effect the reverse of that which was intended. The Southerners did not want the annexation of one or two new free States; and they at once made up their minds to change their intended course. We are told that the ultimate success of the treaty was owing to that accident. In the meantime it had met with a good many obstacles. One was removed in this way. Mr. Hincks, finding that the thing did not go so fast as he desired at Washington, thought he could put a pressure on the U. S. Government, and with that view made it a part of his policy to close Canadian canals against American vessels, and otherwise to legislate against American trade. This policy, however, he very suddenly abandoned, as it was thought at the time, because it had succeeded in driving from office one of his colleagues, the Hon. John Young, who regarded it as suicidal. It is now, however, stated that the British Minister at Washington received a hint that all chance of success would be destroyed unless these menaces were promptly discontinued, and that it was at his instance they were hastily abandoned. It may be added that very considerable sums of money were spent, or alleged to have been spent, by the "officious" Canadian negotiators, some portions of which were not repaid by their Government, though the outlay was plainly authorized, till a few months ago. The destination of this money is still involved in mystery—whether used to influence congressional consciences or not.

The treaty may be shortly described:—It admitted all kinds of raw produce, agricultural and mineral, except hay, salt, and sugar, into each of the two countries from the other free of duty, provided for the free navigation of the St. Lawrence and Lake Michigan to the citizens of both countries, and permitted American fishermen to fish on the British North American coasts as freely as the provincials, but admitted the provincial exports of fish free of duty into the American markets.

The following table is sufficient to show, in the shortest and most comprehensive manner, the results which followed the achievement of this wise convention:

	Ex. to Canada. Dollars.	Impts. from Can. Dollars.
Before Treaty.	1850, 5,390,821,	4,285,470
	1851, 7,929,140,	4,956,471
	1853, 7,829,090,*	5,278,116
	1855, 20,882,241,	17,448,197
Since Treaty.	1856, 16,574,895,	18,291,834
	1861, 14,361,858,	18,645,457
	1862, 12,842,504,	15,253,152
	1863, 19,898,718,	18,816,999
	1864, 16,658,429,	30,974,118
	1865, 18,306,497,	30,547,267

These are the American figures, and there is some discrepancy between them and the Canadian; but none that affects the present purpose of showing the effect of the treaty on the trade of the two countries. To understand their full significance, it must be borne in mind that under the treaty Canadian imports from the United States were almost all required for shipment to England, comparatively little being taken into consumption, whereas in some years all, and on an average of years the major part of the exports to the States went into consumption there. Thus the free admission of American produce nourished

Canada's shipping trade rather than stimulated their production, whereas the free admission of its own produce opened to Canada in the United States a market which it had not before; though of course while the United States were shipping cereals to England, their importations of Canadian cereals were truly as much a transit trade as Canada's importations of the same kind of goods from them.

We may add here that while almost all Canada's exports to the United States were relieved from duty, as it sent them little but raw produce, only about fifty per cent. of its imports from them were affected by the treaty; the official figures for the half-year ending 30th June, 1864, taking that period as an example, showing that the free goods from the States were the whole trade from thence in the proportion of 48 to 104. It is also worthy of notice, that if the operations of commerce could ever be estimated in anything but money, the importance of the free trade of Canada with the States might be said to consist even more in its convenience than in its profit. Since 1854 Canadian farmers, instead of having to send, with much trouble, small parcels of produce to a distant market at great loss of time and with expense in the payment of commissions to merchants, often, moreover, receiving the return in what is called "store pay," have had the American buyers going all through the country buying whatever they had to sell at their own doors, and paying in cash. No doubt some of these advantages are due to other causes than the treaty, especially to the extension of the railway system, which had its great development about the time that convention was made. But much of Canada's recent prosperity is certainly due to the removal of ancient fiscal restrictions between its rural population and the great consuming cities of the Atlantic coast.

IRISH HATRED OF ENGLAND.

THE reason why Dr. Fell was hated could not be fathomed, but hated Dr. Fell was, not a jot the less thoroughly and bitterly. And Dr. Fell's case is the case of England in the feelings of the lower and not a few of the upper Irish. Now a hatred without reason is a hatred the most stubborn and lasting, for nothing that can be done can operate upon it. Not that the Irish hatred of England was originally without cause, as for many years the English yoke was a heavy, galling yoke to Ireland; but the juster rule of the last forty years, which has left few grievances unredressed, has not eradicated the animosity which was provoked by previous misgovernment. The effect survives the peccant cause. But this is not all. There is a want of affinity between Irish and English, and generally they do not like each other. The Irish is a warmer, more genial, more impulsive temperament, and antipathetic to it is the English coldness and phlegm. And the Irish are not singular, it must be confessed, in their dislike of us. Most people have the same prejudice, and call us sullen, proud, and arrogant. If they knew us better they might judge us less unfavourably; but this reminds us of the argument of Charles Lamb, who, when asked how he could hate a people he did not know, answered, "And pray, how could 'I hate them if I did know them?' Ill will is best nursed in ignorance. Sixty years ago how we hated the French; it was a point of patriotism, and the greatest warrior of the time, Nelson, held the then common opinion that we were natural enemies. Wellington, of a later date, and who had more knowledge of the people with whom he had battled in Spain, had none of the national prejudice; and with the improved intercourse between the two people, it may be said to have passed away from us, what lingers yet being on the French side, where it is a tradition kept up by several causes. Our prosperity is resented, and the English demeanour which is supposed to be encouraged by it is exceedingly obnoxious to people whose pride takes another turn, and who revolt against what they call our insular arrogance. That there is some fault of this kind is not to be denied, but for the most part we believe there is more awkwardness than arrogance in the case. As for the highly-bred people, they are much the same of all nationalities.

If in France traditions of hate are kept up by dislike to manners and deportment, the case is different in America, where there is prejudice against the nation, but none against individuals, sure of a warm hospitable reception if they deserve it. Also in Ireland the Englishman who conduct himself well, and gives himself no airs of superiority, is respected, and perhaps something more, though his country is charged with every ungenial, ungenerous, and unjust habit. But is not all this prejudice on the wane? and are we not seeing the flag end of it? Is it not, as it were, going downhill, or, as Sydney Smith said of ghosts, descending from the drawing-room to the kitchen? Hatred of England moved to rebellion in 1798 men of all classes, gentlemen, priests, lawyers, scholars, as well as ignorant peasants. But there is none of this leaven in Fenianism, and the impulse of hatred does not operate above a very low level. And so rebellion seems in process of wearing out, sinking lower and lower, though with an extensive surface. Probably numerically there has never been more disaffection in Ireland, but the stratum is of sand, whose many grains have no cohesion. There are none of the leaders of 1844, much less of '98. The Thanes fly from it.

We are not without hopes, therefore, that the present may be the last occasion for coercion, and it should be followed, as soon as circumstances will allow, by measures for the removal of the few remaining causes of complaint. First and foremost of these stands the Church not of Ireland, and though it is not a practical grievance, nor one much taken to heart by the Catholic peasantry, it is a sign of subjection that ought to be pulled down. Every intelligent Irish Catholic sees written on the Protestant Church Establishment, Sic vos non vobis. It is a standing affront, a memorial of conquest in the shape of the gross injustice that the strong can do the weak.

The land question, however, is the main trouble of Ireland, and it comes not from any fault of the State, but from long habits and usages between owners and occupiers. It lies, therefore, more in the domain of equitable private management than of legislation. Parliament may, nevertheless, with great advantage investigate the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland, and the diverse holdings of land. To bring the facts prominently forward would be a step towards some better arrangements.

Ireland wants industry in two shapes, capital which is hoarded labour, and the regular daily labour which constitutes the profitable industry of a people. She has a great multitude of labourers whose amount of labour is little, partly from the small holdings in parts of the country, and partly from the religion with its many days of fast and festival withdrawn from secular employments. We should like to know how many days are given to labour by the occupier of a small plot of land. How many days his cultivation requires, how many his Church. And what the total of work and of idleness. The North needs no such inquiry.

England is charged with being a cruel step-mother to Ireland, but the tendency is now rather to spoiling the child. The suspension of the Habeas Corpus is no proof to the contrary; it is an exceptional measure for a temporary danger. For the rest, what part of the kingdom is so much coaxed and indulged as Ireland? Could Scotland, for example, have got a Galway contract and subsidy? Can Wales obtain an exemption from the operation of the Cattle Plague Act? When Ireland asked for a prohibition of the import of cattle, was she not instantly indulged? And is it not out of tenderness that she is spared the infliction of the Cattle Extirpation Bill, though localities as free from disease are subjected to it?

After all, we believe that Ireland has more reason to complain of her own sons than of Englishmen, many of whom are her true friends. It is an old saying current in Ireland, that if an Irishman is spitted for roasting, another will always be found to turn him. And this Fenian conspiracy could never have been discovered as completely as it has been unless the conspirators had been false to each other to a great extent. To hold and pull together for evil or good is not an Irish habit, at least not in the South. The usual thing is a game of nine-pins, in which the men are set up to knock each other down.

From the Saturday Review.

RICH UNCLES.

If the rich uncle were only half as common an institution in real life as he is on the stage or in a novel, the world would be a cheerier place than it is, and moralists would be compelled to admit that virtue still was to be found upon the earth, perched happily and pleasantly on one or other of the collateral branches in every family tree. In the pictures they draw of society and its manners, novelists unfortunately are too fond of gratifying, on paper and in fancy, the yearnings of the human heart after the unattainable. The curate whose sermons are never too long, and always make his hearers think; the officer who carries the kid glove of his old garri- son flame for thirty years next his heart, and has it on his person when he falls at the head of the forlorn hope; the self-sacrificing beauty who resigns her lover to a rival; the faithful college chum who has cherished a mutual attachment for his friend's hardly-used wife for half a century, and only mentions it in a whisper on his death-bed—all are so many creations by means of which the sort of people who write romances express their passion for the ideal. But perhaps there is no portrait so completely suggestive of the impossible and the intangible as the portrait of that imaginary uncle who never appears except to make other people happy, and who always dies at the right moment. Our imaginations are fired at a very early age by the description, and we go through life sighing and longing for this noble being who never is, but always is to be. Exoriare aliquis is our constant but fruitless hope. Where, oh where, is that benevolent individual in gaiters of whom we have read so much, whose only anxiety is that we should marry the object of our affections as soon as the license can be procured, who burns to enjoy the pleasures of matrimonial happiness by proxy only, and whose reward is to be allowed in return to kiss his nieces-in-law and their children as often as he pleases when they come down to breakfast in the morning? All of us have learnt to admire the princely munificence of Mr. Peabody. But every time the newspapers present us with a new instance of his liberality, the sad thought cannot but force itself on the minds of many, how it is that there are so few Peabodys in private domestic life, who have been imbued with the sound Scriptural maxim that charity begins at home, and with a proper sense of the privileges and opportunities of those whom Providence has blessed with a lively and varied assortment of nephews and of nieces. The tide of human affairs is influenced, as we all know, by the merest accidents. It seems so hard that what is should have been irrevocably separated by some little trivial barrier from what might have been. If grandfathers and grandmothers had lived long enough to have had one more child before they died, if their supernumerary offspring had been wisely despatched at once to India, had amassed a colossal fortune in the society of Nabobs and of Begums, and had finally come home, after a long absence, with a fatal liver complaint, and with a rooted desire to live in the happiness of his relatives, this might have been a bright and a beautiful world in spite of everything. We can all conceive how pleased we should have been to have smoothed our beloved Peabody's pillow, and to have remembered him in our prayers. Dis aliter visum. There are few of us to whom Providence has not seen fit to deny this harmless gratification; and when we look at life as it is, and turn from the melancholy spectacle to the three-volume novels and the dramas of the day, it is indeed almost exasperating to see how authors and authoresses persist in pouring upon their heroes and their heroines such golden showers of unspeakably precious kindness in weak health.

Regret under such circumstances, with well-regulated minds, ought never to take the lower form of a selfish sentiment, and it is wiser and nobler to be able to base it on a calculation of what the human race loses by the infrequency of such elevating spectacles. If rich uncles were not as rare birds as black swans, the feminine half of the world would not be able to go on saying, with such a terrible show of truth, that a bachelor's life is necessarily selfish. Women constantly complain of the gross injustice of the reproach that rests on the character of an old maid. Old maids are often very charming people, though afflicted perhaps, as a rule, with too absorbing an admiration of popular preachers; and if marriages are made in Heaven, it is not unnatural that Heaven should keep some of the best specimens of womanly virtue for itself. There may, moreover, be rich aunts as well as rich uncles, and it would be improper and imprudent to pass a sweeping condemnation on those who have chosen to play the part of wallflowers at life's festive ball. If celibacy in woman is a fault, it is a fault which may be redeemed by a devoted desire to make the younger members of her family prosperous and wealthy. But, after all that has been said, it is fair to recollect that old maids are not visited with half the reproaches which feminine critics shower on the head of that much-abused being, the irretrievable old bachelor. The irretrievable bachelor is a sort of social Hercules target, the bare existence of which is a slur upon the power and precision of feminine artillery. Something must be done to put a stop to his attitude of offensive impenetrability, and his unpopularity may be taken as a proof that it is as dangerous in some cases to resist successfully as to be gracefully vanquished. The male heart, to start with, is desperately wicked, but its follies and failings are never painted in such gloomy colours as when it has shown an ill-advised intention to lead a single life.

This is why Club dinners and whist and smoking are so generally admitted, by feminine moralists, to be hopelessly prejudicial to the character. They are not only in theory pernicious, but they are the avowed enjoyments of the bachelor. The gallant knight who loves and rides away is in his degree a more admirable creature than the unknighly craven who never falls in love at all, and who provokingly sits still over his Club cigar. The moral indignation he very naturally excites is so considerable that the species would have become extinct long ago if it were not for one redeeming feature in their case. When disapprobation of the bachelor's habits is on the very eve of rising to a storm, there is one saving virtue that interposes and rescues him from annihilation. Unmarried blessedness would be outlawed by the verdict of society if it were not for the fact that the irretrievable bachelor may yet retrieve himself by turning into a rich uncle, and becoming a blessing, if not a credit, to mankind. It is thus—a feminine philosopher will perhaps conclude—that we are brought to see how, in the great economy of nature, there is no such thing as utter ruin and degradation. Fallen as he seems to be at the first glance, the bachelor may live to prove that his career has been in no degree wasted or unprofitable. If there were only more specimens of so creditable a conversion, a bachelor's profession would end by being considered a noble and disinterested one. In answer to the invidious question why on earth he did not marry, the bachelor would only have to reply, "I do not marry because it is my ambition to be a rich uncle."

A rich uncle has this advantage further, that he carries into domestic life an example of unselfishness and disinterested solicitude for the welfare of his kind. In return for the imputation of selfishness that is so freely bestowed upon them, bachelors might with plausibility retort that married life is not, upon the whole, productive of social sympathy and magnanimity. A partnership is not necessarily less egotistical than a single speculator, and self-interest often perambulates the world in couples. Towards their husbands and their children Englishwomen are almost uniformly unselfish, but beyond their husbands, their children, and their own social success, they show commonly a disposition to be indifferent to the outside world; and the result is, that their influence is weakened, and their powers of conversation proportionally impaired. If this be true, domesticity has its drawbacks, as well as its delights. An Englishwoman's pleasures are simple, but possibly somewhat narrow. She is keenly solicitous about her husband's advancement in the world, and measures it carefully by the amount of social consideration bestowed upon herself. She likes her children to be healthy, handsome, and admired, and devotes herself heroically to their best interests. By the time she has got to the extreme edge of her family circle, her enthusiasm is generally exhausted; and literature or politics she cares for so far only as they are likely to affect or interest those in whose welfare she is concerned. A rich bachelor at a domestic fireside is a perpetual protest against this exclusiveness of view, and is in his way less of an egotist than the mother whose absolute devotion to her family he so much admires. Kind as he is, and intimate as he is, his fair protégée would see him broiled alive before she would allow a single hair to be harmed of her husband's or her children's heads; and a soft unutterable sense of contingent benefits sometimes, perhaps, suffuses even her real affection for himself. Considering the nobility of the nature of women, the fact that after marriage they are impregnated with this sort of feeling, for which selfishness is too hard a name, is possibly a discredit rather to their husbands than to their own education. If men sought less exclusively to absorb every thought of the women who are under their control, the character of women would be more chivalrous after marriage than it is. Romance and impulsiveness belong chiefly to unmarried girls. They will enter into and appreciate the not uncommon pride which now and then makes a man abandon fame and fortune sooner than stoop to pick them up. It is equally certain that, when women marry, this kind of enthusiasm sobers down. In the cause of those to whom they are attached they remain as generous as ever; but with all generosity which threatens to interfere with the fortunes of their husbands or their children they have but little sympathy. Humanity and patriotism, and even charity fail in their eyes when contrasted with the ties of domesticity. A being who is content with the private felicity of others, and who looks for no private felicity of his own, would accordingly be a novel sight at a family gathering. He would be entitled to rank as an exception to the law of domesticity, the theory of which is that no ties are permanently strong except the ties of maternity or marriage. Rich uncles are not as easily to be met with as the natural

Adam could wish, but when they do occur they are probably less egotistical than their fortunate nephews and nieces.

The pleasures of benevolence which a rich uncle may be considered to enjoy are indeed compared by a great Greek philosopher to the pleasures of paternity; and it may be that in exceptional cases they even supply the place of the latter. Human nature is in the habit of boasting of its instincts, but a large proportion of the feelings we term instinctive are evidently to be accounted for on a simpler though less flattering theory. That human nature possesses any instincts, properly so-called, has been denied, may be doubted, and certainly never can be shown to demonstration. It is by no means uncertain that, after allowances made for the influence of sentiment, interest, and reason, a father would be naturally drawn towards his son; and the affection of human beings for their offspring is possibly made up of a powerful and perfect union of the three. However this may be, it is tolerably clear that the three are nowhere so completely united as in the case of the relation between parents and their children; and the rich uncle whose mission is to bring prosperity to his belongings can at least enjoy parental pleasures in a secondary and imperfect way. It is, in truth, the only fashion left in which a man can enjoy them without entering into the precarious speculation of marriage, or without sinning against social decorum and incurring the social penalties imposed upon the sinner. The skeleton, however, in every benevolent man's closet is and must be the reflection that it is almost impossible in advanced life, when the power of exciting romantic attachments is gone, to bind others to us, except, indeed, by the glittering but fragile tie of gratitude. That rich uncle is a happy and exceptional personage who can bring those about him to identify their interests with his own, and to feel bound to him by the sentiment that unites children to their parents. To achieve this result, something more than the benefactions of a kind old gentleman are usually necessary, unless accompanied by qualities that command enthusiasm and regard. Even a millionaire cannot take affection by storm, or break through the circle of family reserve, as Jupiter broke through the guards of Danaë, in a shower of gold. Those who wish to live in the affections of others had better not wait to make the effort till they are old and wealthy, but begin betimes when they are young.

FREDRIKA BREMER.

THE recent decease of the celebrated Swedish novelist, Fredrika Bremer, which has already received a passing notice in our columns, affords the occasion of recalling the deep and affectionate interest which she cherished in American affairs, especially since her visit to this country, about fifteen years ago.

Her admirable works of fiction had won for her a host of friends on this side of the ocean. Their fresh and vivid pictures of Northern life were a novelty in literature; they opened a new world to readers who had become weary of the stale incidents and common-place plots of much of the popular fiction of the day; they produced a deep impression no less by the artlessness of their style, than by the fidelity of their portrayures; and for a long time, her name was the subject of universal encomium.

Her purpose of making an American tour was widely announced before her arrival. She was expected with grateful and almost tender interest; her coming was welcomed with eager delight by many who had known her through the medium of her writings; and when she landed on our shores, many hospitable firesides grew brighter at her approach, and in the intimacies of friendship she was never permitted for a moment to feel the loneliness of a stranger. Her frank and cordial manners, combining a simplicity which sometimes amounted to an almost childlike naïveté with a womanly dignity that was never laid aside; her kindness of disposition, and her noble unselfishness of purpose, procured her access to more than one choice family circle, and surrounded her with friends, with whom her cordial relations closed only with her life.

On returning to her own country, she published an interesting record of her experiences in America, showing her appreciation of our national character, and her attachment to our institutions. Her active temperament did not permit her to remain long in the enjoyment of repose. Five years were devoted to extensive journeys in the Holy Land, Greece, Italy, and Germany, the fruits of which appeared in six volumes of travels, which enhanced her high reputation both in this country and in England. She passed two years in the family of the chaplain of the Queen of Greece, in friendly intercourse with the royal family. The King put at her disposal his yacht in which with a party of chosen friends she visited the principal Grecian islands.

Upon the breaking out of the war of the rebellion her sympathies were deeply enlisted in the success of the American arms. With the aid of our leading journals, and a careful study of the map, she kept herself fully acquainted with the progress of the struggle, and never lost her faith in the triumph of freedom and right. In the last edition of her work on America, she has added an appendix, describing the character and effects of the war. Her intelligent and lucid exposition has doubtless had no inconsiderable influence on European opinion, and contributed to a favourable view of the nature of the cause. "The assassination of Lincoln," she says, "opened the eyes of the people of Europe to the serpent nature of the Rebellion, and in the shock and shudder electrically felt from this serpent sting, a pedestal rose under the feet of the victim, raising him and the cause for which he died so that he became visible to all nations."

The latter part of Miss Bremer's life was quietly passed in her old family castle, Arsta. She continued to take a deep interest in public affairs. She felt great joy in the progress of this country toward a high ideal, and watched with anxious sympathies the course of moral and political reform in her own. In a recent letter to an American friend, which we have been permitted to use, she says: "From one of the high windows of this large high room, your Swedish friend sees rise on the western horizon the spire of the parish-church, pointing upwards, and to her telling of the place of repose where the body will in no long time be laid down with those of her parents, brothers, and sisters." She has now passed away in the ripeness of a pure and honoured age, crowned with an abundant harvest of pleasant fruits, and golden grain, and healing leaves, while her memory will long be cherished in gracious esteem by many who were her debtors for the sweet beauty of her character and the reviving influence of her works.

An Analysis of Mr. Tennyson's "In Memoriam." By the late Rev. FREDERICK W. ROBERTSON, M.A. London: Smith, Elder, & Co.

THIRTEEN years ago the clergyman of a proprietary chapel at Brighton died, and was buried with unmistakable demonstrations of sorrow. A ministry of six years had endeared him to his people, and he had taken sufficient part in public and local questions to be recognised beyond the bounds of his congregation. But he had only published one sermon, and so many clergymen had lectured at Mechanics' Institutes, and spoken on Ecclesiastical Titles Bills and early closing of shops, that not much heed was taken of one clergyman more. As for any lasting influence, his life seemed to have ended at the grave abruptly, immaturely, for he died young. As for any mark to be traced by him in the religious thought of England, England had never heard of him. In a year or two a volume of his sermons was published, with the drawbacks inseparable from all posthumous publications. He had not written them before they were preached, but after they were preached he had condensed them for some absent friends —a task which he had imposed on himself with exceeding dislike, and executed with great swiftness and brevity. Other volumes followed, more imperfect, less authoritative, less likely to represent him at his best, to fulfil his requirements of what a sermon ought to be,—too closely packed and merely suggestive, if not skeleton-like, to be popular. Yet their circulation spread with extraordinary rapidity; they ran even with the last novel; they became a staple of the circulating library; Tauchnitz published them, at Leipsic, in his collection of British authors; in America and at home their popularity was unprecedented; and a thirteenth edition, last autumn, proves that it is steadily maintained. Mr. Robertson of Brighton was soon as prominent a name as the Church could point to. People were so ready to catch at almost anything he had said, that there was danger of publishing too much, of letting the world look on his most private and crude thoughts, of trusting to the uncertainty of casual reports by those who had heard him, of being driven by his very fame to be ungenerous to it. There was an eager looking for some particulars of his life, as of a man who had strangely dropped away unknown, though surely among the best worth knowing of his time; and all the while there was a steady growth and penetration of his influence, preparing men to receive his "Life and Letters" with an interest, curiosity, and welcome accorded only to a few.

Some rare and singular power must have dwelt in this modest working clergyman, to account for the story of a fame so unique in our pulpit literature; and whatever may be the secret of his influence, we are not likely to have further means of judging than these now before us in his Life and Works.

Frederick Robertson was born in London in 1816, and passed his childhood in Leith Fort, where his earliest recollections were of "my pony, and my cricket, and my rabbits, and my father's pointers, and the days when I proudly carried his game-bag, and my ride home with the old gamekeeper by moonlight in the frosty evenings, and the boom of the cannon, and my father's orderly, the artilleryman who used to walk with me hand in hand." He spent a happy, bright life between Leith, Beverley, and Tours, and at sixteen entered the Edinburgh Academy. He had an iron constitution, and excelled in all athletic games, and he was at the same time studious, quiet, sensitive, imaginative. His love of truth was intense and passionate, only equalled by his noble scorn for meanness, his purity and courage. After winning distinctions at the Academy, he attended the Edinburgh University for a session, and at eighteen was articulated to a solicitor at Bury St. Edmunds. A year of this work was enough to test its uncongeniality and prevent its becoming his profession. His father was anxious he should enter the Church: he thought it would be natural to the deep religious feeling of his son's character; but at last the army was settled, to Robertson's delight. "I was rocked and cradled," he said afterwards, "to the roar of artillery, and the very name of such things sounds to me like home; a review, suggesting the conception of a real battle, impresses me to tears." His name was placed on the list of a cavalry regiment for India, and he threw himself with his usual energy and passion into the needful preparation, studied Indian politics and peoples, Indian campaigns, and Indian Christianity. He had positively declined the Church, saying, "Anything but that: I am not fit for it." To his father's urging he had returned the final reply, "No, never." But while his commission was delayed, accident threw him in the way of the present Bishop of Cashel, who tried to dissuade him from the army. "If I had not met a certain person," he wrote afterwards, "I should not have changed my profession: if I had not known a certain lady I should not probably have met this person: if that lady had not had a delicate daughter who was disturbed by the barking of my dog; if my dog had not barked that night, I should now have been in the Dragoons, or fertilizing the soil of India. Who can say that these things were not ordered?" He left the decision to his father; was matriculated at Oxford; and a fortnight afterwards he received the offer of a cavalry commission. Characteristically, he never flinched from his new life. He would not have chosen it; but he would not go back from it. "He was the most inflexible person, with all his almost morbid delicacy of feeling, — an iron will, impossible to move when it was fixed by principle."

It must have cost him singular pain: not because he was not a Christian, for his ambition had been to confess Christ and do good in the army; but because his whole life was strung to the calling of a soldier. Until he died the soldier spirit would assert itself. He suggested to his father that he might take a military chaplaincy. He continually borrowed his illustrations from the barrack and the camp, and was afraid "they are too military." He longed "for a soldier's spirit in the Church." "I wish," he wrote, after Chillianwallah, "I had been with my own wondrous gallant regiment in that campaign." Walking home one evening, at Brighton, in his dragoon's cloak, he thought he "ought to be lying in it, at rest, at Moodkee, where the Third fought so gallantly." "Often with most unclerical emphasis did he express his wish to die sword in hand against a French invader." For some time he could scarcely pass a soldier in the street without observing — "Well, so I am to have nothing to do with them;" or, "Poor fellows! Few care for their souls!" To the last he could not see a regiment manoeuvre nor artillery in motion without a choking sensation, and would rather "lead a forlorn hope than mount the pulpit stairs."

It was with a soldier's self-sacrifice to duty that he went to Oxford: it was the spirit of a soldier that he carried there into his life, confessing Christ with a bold and manly fervour. His residence at Brasenose passed simply away. But for his scrupulous modesty he might have taken honours: but for his sensitive reticence he might have made many friends. He read carefully, attended lectures sixteen hours in the week, varied theology with Buckland's geological class, mastered Plato, Aristotle, and Butler, spoke often, though not effectively, at the "Union," noted the drift of the prevailing currents of thought, and recoiled from what he thought the donnishness of University life. The minute detail and technical knowledge asked by the schools seemed to him a waste of time and mental power, yet his Greek compositions evince exquisite taste and grammatical accuracy. If he chafed against the system, it was rather against what he conceived to be its spirit than its requirements. Moral tone and large and comprehensive ideas were what he valued first, and the men he sought were the thoughtful and devout. He felt afterwards that he might have done more. Without yielding his conviction that the prestige of University honours "is forgotten or slightly looked upon by the large world," he advised others that the mental habits they demand "are incapable of being replaced by anything." To choose his own course of reading he felt was "utterly, mournfully, irre-parably wrong. The excitement of theological controversy, questions of the day, politics, gleams and flashes of new paths of learning, led me at full speed for three years, modifying my plans perpetually. Now I would give £200 a year to have read, on a bad plan, chosen for me, but steadily."

His first curacy was at Winchester, where "his way of life was most regular and simple. Study all the morning; in the afternoon, hard sagging at visitation of the poor, in the closest and dirtiest streets; his evenings were spent alone, but very often with his rector." He devoted himself to the Sunday schools, and trained the teachers himself. In his study he applied himself to Hebrew and Biblical criticism, and thought afterwards he had developed his mind with more fidelity at Winchester than anywhere. But he says, "I begin to think and tremble as I never did before, and I cannot live to Christ. My heart is detached indeed from earth, but it is not given to Him. All I do is a cross, and not a pleasure." His morbid self-analysis tormented him with bitter thoughts, for his impulses still sprang more from duty than from love, and his service was measured by law. After a year of this eager, energetic, but unsatisfied life, he was seized with the impression that the consumptive malady of his family was upon him. It filled him with a depressing "lethargy of body and apathy of mind," from which his rector advised him to escape by relaxation from work and change of scene; and having sorrowfully passed his examination for priest's orders, he turned his steps to Geneva. There, after a short stay, he married; and on returning to England, accepted the curacy of Christ Church at Cheltenham, where he remained for almost five years, feeling it "far less satisfactory than Winchester, partly from the superficial nature of the place, partly from the effect of the temptations, and frittering away of time," but bound to it by the most devoted attachment to his rector, Mr. Boyd. Here also his gifts as a preacher came to be recognised, though in no way adequate to their largeness and brilliance. And here the half-morbid sadness of his character burdened his heart with the fear that,—

"As it is, I live and die unheard,
With a most voiceless thought, sheathing it like a sword."

He believed his sermons to be unintelligible. He fancied "duties left undone which others might deem only too well performed." In his diary "there are long lists of poor and sick whom he visited, and accounts of sums paid out of a small income to clear off the debts of struggling workmen;" and in the same diary he writes, "Low and dispirited. I mourn, not that I cannot be happy, but that I know not what to do nor how to do it." He accuses himself of neglect of the poor, and yet a friend of that time recollects "his calling on me just before his going abroad, as late as ten o'clock at night, and taking me with him a distance of three miles, through such a storm as Lear was out in, to visit a poor disconsolate old man who seemed to have shut himself out from human sympathies, and therefore all the more enlisted his." But the conviction of failure pressed too heavily to be shaken off. If men talked to him of the seed he was sowing, he would point to the pavement, and ask "if he might reap a harvest there!" His health suffered; and at last he was compelled to try again the healing and rest of foreign travel. After walking for six weeks through the Tyrol, he lingered for nine at Heidelberg, where he took duty for the English chaplain. From Schaffhausen he wrote to his wife—"More and more I feel that I am not a minister and never can be one." But the resumption of active work and the interest of the congregation restored his mind to a healthier tone. Socinians and Swedenborgians and people who had long been absent from church listened to his teaching, yielded, and besought him to remain. He had resigned his curacy at Cheltenham, and was free to choose, but he recognised that his true work was in England, and, rejecting the pleadings at Heidelberg, he begged his father to look out some country parish, where he could deal with the poor only, and have the work to himself,— "My mind has gone through a complete revolution in many things; I am resolved now to act and feel and think alone."

Not long after his return, he wrote to the Bishop of Oxford, whom he had known at Winchester, asking him for employment. He was at once offered the church of St. Ebbe's, Oxford; and, differing as he did so widely from the bishop's views, with characteristic manliness, he waited on him, and "frankly told him that he did not hold, and therefore could not preach, the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. The bishop replied, 'I give my clergy a large circle to work in, and if you do not step beyond that I do not interfere. I shall be glad, however, to hear your views on the subject.' An hour's conversation followed, and at the close his lordship said, 'Well, Mr.

Robertson, you have well maintained your position, and I renew my offer.' During the three months he served St. Ebbe's, "the rough, poor people of the parish made themselves over to him at once;" though the church was in one of the worst parts of the town, "the undergraduates rushed to hear him in crowds, and hung breathlessly on every word he uttered;" and the depression with which he revisited Oxford, with "its cold, formal, forbidding conventionalisms," yielded a little to these unexpected proofs of influence. He had scarcely begun to feel the brightness stealing over the shadows of his life, when Trinity Chapel, Brighton, was offered to him by the trustees, and out of a chivalrous sense of duty to his bishop distinctly refused. On the offer being renewed, he put aside the treble emolument, the importance of the position, the possible congeniality of the work, and difficulties that had arisen about St. Ebbe's, and left himself entirely in the bishop's hands. "He replied that he thought it my duty to accept Trinity; so I go, reluctantly. The half-way house is behind; and if Brighton be another form of Cheltenham, home cannot be very far off." The incidents of this brief curacy are alike honourable to bishop and curate; refreshing in days when public characters are so hidden by the dust of party strife; yet no more than might be expected from men in whom the feeling of a Christian gentleman is stronger than the narrowness of an ecclesiastic. It is by his work at Brighton that Mr. Robertson will be remembered; it was there that his too brief ministry ripened, his powers were developed, his teaching was enunciated in its fullest form. He entered on it sadly, "with small hope," he says, "and much misgiving:" he writes of "great misgivings as to that kind of success which a proprietary chapel needs:" he felt that he had "only a few years to live." It was a contrast to the enthusiastic and almost fierce energy with which he flung himself into the work at Winchester. His life and mind had each gone through a complete revolution in many things.

All the influences that his early religious life acknowledged were from the Evangelical school of thought. It was the aspect of Christian doctrine and life with which he was familiar which unconsciously worked itself into his mind and stamped itself upon his conduct, the most earnest and the fairest side of the Church to which he could look in his boyish days. The manifold activities, and benevolent and chivalrous enterprises, and warm impulses, and the general play and stir of life in the kingdom of God in the England of the nineteenth century, were associated with the Evangelical party. Its leaders had been real and almost heroic men, of vigorous, true, and healthy natures, thoroughly possessed with the ideas they wrought out, thoroughly simple and direct in their relation to God, honest and loyal and surpassingly earnest in their relations to men. Their influence had passed into the age, and, through it, affected the generation beyond them. Newman and Arnold it affected directly, each in his own way; Robertson indirectly; nay, it would be hard to find any great thinker and leader of opinion among us in these last forty years that it has not affected, and who, from whatever point to which recoil has forced him, would not acknowledge its help as gratefully perhaps as Newman. Two elements of it made a deep impression on Robertson — its unworldliness and spirituality. He learned from it his reverence for the Bible, his habit of Bible study, his conviction of the reality of prayer. When dressing, he was accustomed to commit to memory a certain number of verses of the New Testament, and "said afterwards to a friend, that no sooner was any Christian doctrine or duty mentioned in conversation than all the passages bearing on the point seemed to array themselves in order before him." He liked to mark the incidents of his life, and connect them with the personal watching and love of God. He thought Brainerd's Life stood alone as a specimen of biography, and read in it and Henry Martyn daily. He lingered over books of devotion. He would often retire for prayer, and wrote, "I can always see, in uncertainty, the leading of God's hand after prayer, when everything seems to be made plain before the eyes." He set apart certain subjects to be prayed over on each day of the week. He held the pre-millennial reign of Christ, and interested himself in Jewish missions. As he found this Evangelical system in books, as he saw it in his friends, as he measured it by its great services, he yielded to it without resistance, with the full persuasion of its nobility and worth. He must have felt its intensity of spiritual life, its directness, its sympathy with human want and sorrow, the manly, broad, sinewy individuality of its leaders. But when he went to Oxford, it was the traditional and not the primitive Evangelical school that he found, a party whose life was already entering on decay. The older, and braver, and manlier men had passed away, in whom defects were obscured by great services and self-consecration. In the lesser men the weaknesses and deficiencies were exaggerated and palpable. What had once been a transitory jar and dislocation of feeling was now a perpetual irritant. The Evangelical body was confessedly, and already becoming boastfully, narrow. It had originated a movement of spiritual and moral earnestness, not of intellectual life. Starting from unhesitating and comfortable certainty, certainty that could be grasped in fixed and clearly cut propositions, it had little sympathy with the doubts that weigh heavily on many souls. It would have all things stereotyped and settled as its leaders had left them; it would allow of no advance, no development, no variation. It looked suspiciously on science; was apt to be intolerant, to arrogate to itself the exclusive possession and interpretation of the truth. The sameness of type in it grew to be monotonous: whatever was weak and petty came up to the surface. It was already, as parties will, ringing the changes on phrases of which the full meaning had been lost, that became now party Shibboleths. It had risen up to protest against mere dull orthodoxy and the polished worldliness and heartless Christianity and fashionable Socinianism of the last century. As a movement, it had spent at least much of its force. It was being checked on its way through the Church by friction with coarser and more worldly minds, the less ardent and less holy. A new movement had already risen against it. Keble's Hymns were supplanting Newton's: St. Mary's, at Cambridge, was no longer packed with gownsmen to hear Simeon: but at Oxford, the best intellects of the University were drawn to St. Mary's by Newman. Mr. Robertson encountered the two movements in conflict. He carried to Oxford his instinctive love and passionate desire for truth, a reckless courage in pursuit of it over any new and even perilous ground of inquiry, a mind of great activity and keenness, and a high and chivalrous ideal. Even then he held the truth to be something infinitely higher than systems; and coming in contact with both the religious parties at the University, he committed himself at first to neither. He found good and evil in both; he saw that each was asserting truths that the other was obscuring; he longed to see these truths in unison. Yet he seems to have turned almost fiercely against the "Tracts for the Times:" his copies of "Tract XC." and Dr. Pusey's "Letter to the Bishop of Oxford" are largely annotated by his answers; he formed a society of seven to counteract the tendency of the Tracts by prayer and conversation over the Bible; he called the movement "accursed," because he believed "the curse of God would fall upon it." There was some reason for his strong speaking. Mr. Newman's sermons had exercised their common fascination on his intellect; many sympathies and tastes instinctively led him to the Tractarian party; he was thrown into "a long trance," "a season of utter and inexpressible darkness." He felt the need of a strong recoil. He had calmly examined the Tracts by the help of the Acts of the Apostles; he had convinced himself that their theory of the Church was wrong; it was a conviction for life; and as long as he lived, "the Oxford delusion heresy," as he styled it, had no more determined opponent—when it came in his way. He wrote some severe and impetuous words; but he joined in no cry against the men whose views he loudly condemned, he spoke cordially of their manliness and devoutness. They were in error; but he called them no names, met them without abuse, strove in this, as in all else, to discern and acknowledge the truth that gave consistency and hold to the falsehoods. With the teaching of the Tracts as a system he had no sympathy. In his sermons he opposed Sacramentalism, Apostolical Succession, and the fixed authority of the early Church; and he speaks of Tractarianism as out of date, as the reproduction of a life in death. And the system he had held by seemed to have little sympathy with him. Over a mind so subtle and quick and eager, a nature so sensitive to doubt, it would have but a feeble intellectual hold at the best. It seemed to repress and not to meet such restlessness and vague seeking of human souls. And when this nature was met by the drifting impulses of thought at the University, acted on by the new forces that were moving in the Church, the hold of the system would be feeble still.

At Winchester there was little change. In a prayer written at college there are the touching words, "Father, I am like a child, blown about by every wind of doctrine;" but he soon writes, "Even the Tractarian heresy has vanished from my mind, amid the sterner conflict with worldly passions and pure atheism." It was at Cheltenham that the change seems to have been wrought gradually out, and by such severe pangs and agony of mental conflict as to leave a deep mark upon his life. He was repelled by the superficial nature of the place, and hurt by the sharpness and narrowness of religious party feeling; he found himself "coming into collision with conventional phraseology and several received views." The ideal he had formed of the Evangelical school was rudely shocked; and he says, half bitterly, of some of their newspapers and extreme partisans, "They tell lies in the name of God, others tell them in the name of the devil—that is the only difference." He thinks the state of the Evangelical clergy lamentable. "I see sentiment instead of principle, and a miserably mawkish religion superseding a state which once was healthy. Their adherents I love less than themselves, for they are but the copies of their faults in a larger edition." On the other hand, he thinks Dr. Pusey's doctrine on the Eucharist "just as dangerous, but much more incredible than transubstantiation." "With the Tractarians," he says again, "it is bellum internum." He quite agrees with a correspondent that "we ought to preach the Calvinistic doctrines in the proportion in which they are found in Scripture, connected always with election unto holiness;" but he becomes more possessed of the idea of Christ as, in His life and aspect to humanity, the sum of the doctrine of God. With the progressive development of thought, and a larger reading, questions meet him, some of them no more than new aspects of old and apparently settled questions; and he can find no solution, and is too honest, inquisitive, and loyal to the truth to be satisfied with what may pretend to be solution, and will face any difficulty, pain, or bewilderment, so that truth may be won. Carlyle and German metaphysics come into his reading, detaching him still more from the past and driving him forward. "It is an awful moment," he said afterwards, "when the soul begins to find that the props on which it has blindly rested so long are, many of them, rotten, and begins to suspect them all; when it begins to feel the nothingness of many of the traditional opinions which have been received with implicit confidence, and in that horrible insecurity begins to doubt whether there be anything to believe at all." Clinging to sympathy like a woman, shrinking sensitively like a woman from mental pain and alienation, he found himself becoming a theological Ishmael. His party did not understand him, frowned upon his misgivings, and "profanely bade him stifle doubt;" his teachers terrified him, his friends melted from him; and, hard as it was to break with the past and struggle though the dark with doubt, it was made harder by loneliness, suspicious, and misunderstanding, by the wrenching of affections that had grown into his soul. He seemed to himself insincere; his ministry a vast failure; perpetually bewildering people, and "saying the thing I do not mean—teaching and preaching when my own heart is dark, and lacks the light I endeavour to impart." "The examination of particular forms of belief involved him in the examination of a great deal more. When the rains descended, and the floods came, and the wind burst upon his house, he must needs go down and look at its foundation." Life and work at Cheltenham were no longer possible; for the body craved rest as much as the jaded mind. When abroad, it seemed at first little better; "restless," he writes, "whether I sleep or wake. . . . Take one single night as a specimen—the night before last. I dreamed that some one was telling me that all my friends were mourning over the deterioration of my sermons, &c., their unintelligibility and emptiness. I woke, went asleep again, and then was arraigned for duties left undone—sick unvisited, schools untaught, &c., with a minuteness of detail—names I never heard of, &c., all of which it would be childish to believe." He anxiously insisted that his difficulties sprang up from within, that they were suggested by his own reading and thought, and the freer spirit of inquiry. No man could be unaware of them who had read theological and philosophical controversy, who, "at different times, has lived in the atmosphere of thought in which Jonathan Edwards, Plato, Lucretius, Thomas Browne, Carlyle, Emerson, and Fichte lived,—who has steeped his soul and memory in Byron's strong feelings—who has walked with Newman years ago to the brink of an awful precipice, and chosen rather to look upon it calmly, and know the worst of the secret of the darkness, than recoil with Newman, in fear and tenderness, back to the intallibility of Romanism."

That there was a morbid and undue sensitiveness at the bottom of much that he felt about Cheltenham and the ministry no one can doubt. The habit of introspection, natural to a spirit like his, was as fatal to his peace as the shattering of his previous system of thought; and it was not till he fell into work at Heidelberg that his letters recovered calmness and justness of tone. Nor would that have been possible, even then, had not his intellectual and spiritual ferment been subsiding. He had—

"—fought his doubts and gathered strength;
He would not make his judgment blind;
He faced the spectres of the mind,
And laid them."

The light was breaking more rapidly than he had hoped, and when he entered on his real life-service at Brighton, the old order had already changed—giving place to the new. It was partly the change from passivity to activity of thought. He had held the system he had been taught, but it had never become part of himself. It was ready to his hand, and he had not rejected it; but it was in no way worked up in his own mind. So long as his mind was not deeply stirred, and the problems he had to face had no visible root in his own existence, it seemed to answer, as well at least as he fancied any system could answer. But when his mind was roused and he was driven to grasp the truth directly, and for himself, the system as such gave way. He has sketched the struggle in his sermon on "The Loneliness of Christ:"—"There is a moment in every true life—to some it comes very early—when the old routine of duty is not large enough; when the parental roof seems too low, because the Infinite above is arching over the soul; when the old formulas in creeds, catechisms, and articles seem to be narrow, and they must either be thrown aside, or else transformed into living and breathing realities." Many a young man is passing through a milder form of the same revolution; comes to a crisis when his thoughts elude the control and ordering of the old dogmatic propositions; finds himself drifting rudderless into the dark; if he bares his heart, is shunned or scolded or branded, and is left to seek his own way, or patiently drift somehow into light. Well for those who find some worthier aspect of the Church, whom it does not treat with dogmatic and unphilosophic rebuke, in whom it recognises the effects of a disturbed and inquisitive age, and in its own strength of certainty holds out to them the help of sympathy. Their doubt and temporary bewilderment may not be the fault of the system. They have accepted it as traditionally right, but they have not proved it, are not masters of it, find it to them no better than a cumbrous Goliath's sword that has been hung up unused in the priestly sanctuary. The fault lies in their apprehension of the system, which had never yet been connected in a living way with the strivings and results of their own thoughts. It may be the very system that they will finally embrace; but necessity is laid upon them of finding that out, necessity of active and developed powers, which by the very life that is in them yield pain.

Such development of thought is natural, and to higher minds essential. But circumstances may greatly stimulate it, and to Mr. Robertson the circumstances were not wanting. If the change showed the growth of his powers, and how men "rise on stepping-stones of their dead selves, to higher things" it was also witness to a change in the religious thought of the country. The fixity, and earnestness, and untroubled faith of Evangelicalism had been a welcome rest, and there were many whom, in its narrowest aspect, it continued to satisfy. But it could not stay the rapid advance of thought and scientific culture, nor prevent fresh ideas from entering the domain of theology. Mr. Robertson's mind was one of the likeliest to catch these new impulses; his party in the Church was one of the last to acknowledge them. An insensible alienation sprang up—a feeling of isolation, and afterwards of bitterness. He recognised the need of a wider view of life, a profounder view of revelation, than was familiar to those about him. Starting from the human, he passionately longed to see it, at every point, in harmony with the Divine. The speculations of philosophy, the results of science, the deeper thoughts of human souls, could not belong to a world outside of the Bible, with which it had no concern. They could not be merely a worldly element and obstruction to the truth. If the Bible could find no room for them, the thought and science of the time would march on independent of the Bible, secretly hostile to it. No excommunication and protest of the Church would arrest them. Could the Church be right to exclude them? Was there not something Divine in thought itself—in the effort to arrange and comprehend all outward phenomena, to penetrate through them up to the laws whereby God impressed His will upon the universe? Could all these be set down as merely secular, and was there no clue and place for them in the kingdom of God? "That Christianity is true, that Christ's character is high, that to do good is better than to do wrong, I suppose are axioms. Such points never seemed uncertain to me, except in moments of very bad dyspepsia. . . . But suppose a man puts the question, Who was Christ? What are miracles? What do you mean by inspiration? Is the resurrection a fact or a myth? What saves a man—his own character or that of another? Is the next life individual consciousness, or continuation of the consciousness of the universe?" Those were some of the questions which the time was continually forcing upon the heed of the Church, which, to minds like Mr. Robertson's, demanded a wiser answer and on broader grounds than Church parties were disposed to give. The answer, he conceived, was clear to him now. It had come to him through much darkness, and a long conflict that wore down his spirit. The shock he felt at finding his old system break up had loosened for the time his hold on everything, and left him with only the prayer of Ajax on his lips. When he came to Brighton he felt that his prayer had been answered, that his faith rested on absolutely sure foundations, that the worst of the puzzle was solved, that the revelation of God was hostile to sin alone, that it furnished the true principles for the final development of humanity. His preaching from that time assumed its distinctive features and force; like his own picture of St. Paul, "he had a heart, a brain, and a soul of fire;"* and if ever there was a man whose bearing and character added weight to his teaching, it was he.

His personal qualities were more like those of ideal knighthood than for a busy world in a busy century. His loyalty to truth and honour, and his friends; his absolute, ready, yet often torturing, self-sacrifice; his chastity of heart, from which all impurity seemed to slink away discarded and rebuked; his dauntless courage, his thoughtful and delicate courtesy at whatever cost to himself, his passionate, reverent worship, were features essentially chivalrous. Exquisitely sensitive, he was also widely sympathetic, and those who came in no nearer contact with him than the pulpit felt that he understood their secret, that they could trust and confide in him. His position as a teacher filled him with an awe that passed into his teaching, and made him shrink from anything frivolous and unworthy. His conversation was brilliant, yet intensely modest. "I have seen him," said a friend, "take a flower, and rivet the attention of his listeners with a glittering stream of eloquent and glowing words, which he poured out without premeditation and almost in a soliloquy." But he never spoke for display; and if he was expected to shine, would shrink into the most icy reserve. His features and bearing were marked by exceeding refinement and delicacy. In the pulpit, he was "free from trick and affectation in manner, voice, and gesture. He remained long in prayer during the hymn which preceded the sermon, and then stood up with eyes so closed that they seemed sunk into his head." Mr. Brooke must describe what followed:—

"If the most conquering eloquence for the English people be that of the man who is all but mastered by his excitement, but who, at the very point of being mastered, masters himself—apparently cool while he is at a white heat, so as to make the audience glow with the fire, and at the same time respect the self-possessive power of the orator, the man being always felt as greater than the man's feelings,—if that be the eloquence which most tells upon the English nation, he had that eloquence. He spoke under tremendous excitement, but it was excitement reined in by will. He held in his hand, when he began his sermon, a small slip of paper, with a few notes upon it. He referred to it now and then, but before ten minutes had gone by it was crushed to uselessness in his grasp; for he knitted his fingers together over it as he knitted his words over his thought. His gesture was subdued: sometimes a slow motion of his hand upwards; sometimes bending forward, his hand drooping over the pulpit; sometimes erecting himself to his full height with a sudden motion, as if upraised by the power of the thought he spoke. His voice—a musical, low, clear, penetrative voice—seldom rose; and when it did, it was in a deep volume of sound, which was not loud, but toned like a great bell. It thrilled also, but that was not so much from feeling as from the repression of feeling. Towards the end of his ministry he was wont to stand almost motionlessly erect in the pulpit, with his hands loosely lying by his sides or grasping his gown; his pale, thin face, and tall, emaciated form seeming, as he spoke, to be glowing as alabaster glows when lit up by an inward fire. And, indeed, heart and brain were on fire. He was being self-consumed. Every sermon in those latter days burnt up a portion of his vital power."

In this Brighton pulpit he preached thus at a white heat* for nearly six years to a

* "In December (1850) alone he preached sixteen times—mostly on the Advent of Christ. He delivered to crowded congregations on Friday mornings four Advent lectures on Christianity in contact with the Greek, the Roman, the Barbarian, and the Jew, which were in their way unique. He preached on Sunday mornings such sermons as 'The Means of Realizing the Second Advent,' 'The Principle of the Spiritual Harvest,' and 'The Loneliness of Christ.' In the afternoons he finished his lectures on the Acts of the Apostles, with which he had begun the year. Towards the end of the month he preached—on the day of public mourning for the Queen Dowager—the only sermon published during his lifetime—'The Israelite's Grave in a Foreign Land.'" When it is remembered that these sermons were the purest gold from the mint of his brain; that the Advent lectures were of themselves crowd of thoughtful and earnest men and women, of the lowest class and the highest, a congregation in which each individual was attracted to himself, where some came from infidelity and many from doubt that had not yet become disbelief, and each felt the mysterious attraction of a nature that sympathized with them in their strongest and weakest moods, and that penetrated with friendliness into secrets of their heart they scarcely ventured to breathe to themselves. It was a life of little outward interest. Outside the pulpit, its chief incidents were a lecture or two at the Athenæum and a lecture or two to the working men. Suffering, the torture of a sensitive heart constantly and rudely wrung, intense mental effort, quickly consuming the energy of body and brain, brought it to a premature end. He was in the habit of "burning his own smoke," a dangerous one for a man of his temperament. A melancholy crept over him that sometimes sunk into gloom; partly the melancholy of profounder thought, of a more intense sympathy with men; partly of the shadow of disease. "It is quite heart-aching to hear you preach," an old acquaintance said to him; "it is no longer the bright, happy Mr. Robertson." And, he says, "she was right; that the shadows of life had settled down." "You mistook me," he writes, "in thinking I did not sympathize. A few years ago, when I felt less, you would have been more satisfied. . . . I no longer wear my heart upon my sleeve 'for daws to peck at.' But there is not a conversation, there is not a book I read, there is not a visit I pay, that does not cut deep traces in the 'Calais' of my heart." The Vicar of Brighton, on grounds intelligible only to himself, refused to nominate a curate whom the congregation had pressed their minister to select, and rather than suffer an unwarrantable imputation to rest upon his friend, Mr. Robertson performed the duty himself. For six months he endured the most exquisite torture. The disease was in the brain, and he felt how it would end: "The causes are irremediable, and they must go on working to their consummation." * The manuscript of one of his last lectures is blotted with a solitary tear. He had "scarcely manhood enough to hold a pen." "Life," he writes to another, "has been for a month one long pain and languor. At night sleepless pain, by day change of powerlessness from two chairs to the sofa, and from the sofa to the ground." "But worse to him than the pain was the prostration of all mental force, the obliteration of large spaces from the memory, and the loss of all power of attention. He retained, however, to the last his deep delight in the beauty of God's world. He got up once when scarcely able to move, at four o'clock, and crept to the window, 'to see the beautiful morning.' . . . A night or two before he died he dreamt that his two sisters came to crown him." At last, on a Sunday in August—it was 1853—his old rector at the Edinburgh Academy, who was taking his place at Trinity Chapel, announced to the congregation that their minister was drawing near to death. "That night the pain returned with bitter violence. Feebly crying at intervals, 'My God, my Father—my God, my Father!' he lived for two hours in a mortal agony, during which he never lost clear consciousness. His mother, wife, and one friend, with his physician, watched over him with devoted care. At last they sought to relieve him by changing his position. But he could not endure a touch. 'I cannot bear it,' he said; 'let me rest. I must die. Let God do his work.' These were his last words. Immediately after, at a few minutes past midnight, all was over." He was buried "in a hollow of the Downs he loved so well," where "a careful hand keeps, even in winter, flowers always blooming on his grave." *

There will be no division among men about the rare beauty of his character. Every one who read his Sermons felt the man that spoke in them; and this Life has only lifted the veil to let us see that man a little closer. He will take at once his rightful place in the gallery of English worthies. His extreme sensitiveness may have often weakened and did certainly pain him;

* In the grey dawn of the morning after the funeral, a group was seen weeping over the new grave. It was a mechanic, with his wife and children, dressed in such mourning as they could purchase. The man and his wife had been rank infidels when Mr. Robertson came to Brighton; but changing one day to drop into Trinity Chapel to hear the new preacher, they had been arrested, became regular worshippers, and brought many more. Making allowance for the natural exaggeration of funeral sermons, there must be much truth in Mr. Anderson's statement,—"I cannot count up converts in any place, or by any man, so numerous and vast—converts achieved in so short a period, and in many instances over the hearts and consciences of those whom, from their age or pursuits, it is always difficult to reach."—(Funeral Sermon, by the Rev. James Anderson, then Preacher of Lincoln's Inn.)

sufficient to create a brilliant reputation; and, "to complete this account of one month's intellectual work, that almost every day he was engaged in preparing the pupils of the Training School for examination, it is astonishing that he was not more morbid in feeling and outworn in body."—Life and Letters, i. 228-9.

it crowned his best efforts with thorns, haunted him with magnified views of his failings, and led him more than once into a morbid despondency; but it was only one side of that exquisite purity and delicate feeling which made him shrink with an instinctive recoil from what would scarcely have been thought coarse or mean in another, by which he entered more than other men into the purity of Christ, by which he set forth that feminine side of His character that, as perfect Man, he conceived Him to possess, and apprehended those delicate shades of meaning in His words that make them so vivid and so marvellously touching. The courage with which he forced his horse once to a daring leap, and again, preached with a fixed directness to a congregation of Vanity Fair, because something whispered him — "Robertson, you are a craven; you dare not speak here what you believe!" may have bordered on rashness or defiance, but it was the spirit of a fearless nature, and a moral bravery that dared everything for the right, that prevented him flinching one jot from his convictions, that nerved him, patiently fighting, at tremendous odds, the battle of his life, and when that life was tortured unto death, made him "lie on the rug alone in his room, his head resting on the bar of a chair, clenching his teeth to prevent the groans which the ravaging pain could never draw from his manliness." When he took part with the working men before such sympathy was common; pleaded in 1848 for the true brotherhood and equality of man; spoke to the Chartists against the ballot, and to the infidels against infidel books; and at a time of great class asperity, declared what he conceived to be the mission of a minister of the Church of England;* or when he defended Shelley from the charge of Atheism, rebuked the frenzy that followed the Durham letter, and took up the man who, for the time, was down, it was the assertion of a personal daring and dash which he complained the Church of England would not endure,† the relief of that chivalrous desire to protect the weak and avenge the wronged which had attracted him to the army. The spirit of Christ deepened the courtesy of his nature; he would leave those he liked best to converse with, and sit by the side of the most neglected; his consideration for the comfort of servants was so great that they adored him. In the same spirit his sense of wrong and baseness would sometimes break out with a strength that was terrible. "I have seen him," writes one of his friends, "grind his teeth and clench his fist when passing a man who he knew was bent on destroying an innocent girl." He recalls, himself, how "once in my life I felt a terrible might; I knew, and rejoiced to know, that I was inflicting the sentence of a coward's and a liar's hell."

His nature quivered with force and energy, but he respected the duller intellect; and, setting himself to the lowest and smallest work, he was as patient and earnest, and as eagerly heard, in a Sunday school class as in his pulpit. His earnestness and enthusiasm were intense; he surrendered his heart to a true man and a true thought at once. If he was isolated, lonely, and dwelt apart, it was because his heart had been crushed back upon itself. "Sympathy," he wrote to his wife, "is too exquisitely dear to me to resist the temptation of expecting it; and then I could bite my tongue with vexation for having babbled out truths too sincere and childlike to be intelligible. But as soon as the fit of misanthropy is passed, that absurd human heart with which I live, trusts and confides again; and so I go on — alternately rich and bankrupt in feeling."

For mere popularity he had an invincible contempt. "What is ministerial success?" he asks — "crowded churches, full aisles, attentive congregations, the approval of the religious world, much impression produced? Elijah thought so, and when he found out his mistake, and that the applause in Carmel subsided into hideous stillness, his heart well-nigh broke with disappointment. Ministerial success lies in altered lives, and obedient, humble hearts — unseen work, recognised in the judgment day."* "If you knew," he says, "how humiliated and degraded to the dust I have felt in perceiving myself quietly taken by gods and men for the popular preacher of a fashionable water-to nobleness, not correct expression. I try to judge words and actions by the man, not the man by his words and actions."† Not a very trustworthy principle, but the expression of a generous nature.

† "The Church of England will endure no chivalry, no dash, no effervescent enthusiasm. She cannot turn it to account as Rome turns that of her Loyolas and Xaviers. We bear nothing but sober prosaic routine; and the moment any one with heart and nerve fit to be a leader of a forlorn hope appears, we call him a dangerous man, and exasperate him by cold, unsympathising reproofs, till he becomes a dissenter and a demagogue. . . . Well, I suppose God will punish us, if in no other way, by punishing from us all noble spirits like Newman and Manning in one direction, and men like Kitchener in another, leaving us to flounder in the mud of commonplace, unable to rise above the dead level." — Letters, II. 14.

"I hold," he wrote once, "to heart, to manhood, ing-place; how slight the power seems to me to be given by it of winning souls, and how sternly I have kept my tongue from saying a syllable or a sentence, in pulpit or on platform, because it would be popular!" "Would to God," he says again, "I were not a mere pepper-cruet to give relish to the palate of the Brightonians." And when a subscription list for a testimonial was opened in the Athenæum, he secretly carried off the elaborately bound book and committed it to the flames. His sense and reverence of truth were too deep to be moved by display; but the day after his ordination he looked as if he had been through an illness. Through life his soul yielded up a most awful homage to the Right; and when he found it, he clung to it with a grasp that never faltered. The glimpses of him that we get in letters from his friends have all the same interest and unity. His heart was wrung by slander and misrepresentation, but "no acrimonious expression," says one, "ever escaped his lips." "I never met with any one," says another, "so deferential and gentle in argument." "My friendship with him was directly a clerical friendship: though he was not faultless any more than other human beings, he was, without exception, the most faultless clergyman I have ever known." His care for parochial work, his minute and self-sacrificing discharge of all its duties, were only the expression of his loyalty to his calling, and the Bishop of Winchester held the account of his deaconate so valuable that he was in the habit of giving it to his deacons to study. It was a fidelity that lay in his nature, that the love he bore to his Master had dedicated to Him. "I remember the quiet words of remonstrance when one of the persons staying in the house said that he should 'stay at home, because the preacher was not worth hearing,' and the gentle determination with which he carried his point." And speaking of another side of his character, its manly freshness, and his delight in nature, the same friend says, "If a ray of sunlight came slanting through the trees on the grass—if a bough hung over the green path with remarkable beauty—if an orange fungus made a bright spot of colour in the way, he was sure to remark them. It was wonderful how he made us see. . . . I shall not easily forget his delight when the woodcocks came, nor the way in which he absolutely ran over with stories of their life. He seemed to me to know all the poetry which referred to animals, and quoted Wordsworth till I wondered at his memory." So richly dowered, so sensitive and sympathetic, so righteous, brave, and tender, so modest, pure, dutiful, and courteous, so many-sided yet so loyal-hearted, so utterly a Christian man, his character stands out distinct and beautiful among the highest types of modern English life.

About his teaching there will be, as there has been, much difference of opinion. His way of seeking truth and his way of handling it were his own. His statement of great truths was sometimes at wide and bitter variance with the common statement. He calls the popular system of the Atonement Brahminical. "It has been represented as if the majesty of Law demanded a victim, and so as it glutted its insatiate thirst, one victim would do as well as another—the purer and the more innocent the better. It has been exhibited as if Eternal Love resolved, in fury, to strike, and so as He had his blow, it mattered not whether it fell on the whole world or on the precious head of His own chosen Son."* He speaks of "a kind of acquiescence in the Atonement which is purely selfish. . . . Christ has suffered, and I am safe. He bore the agony; I take the reward. I may live now with impunity."† "Let no man say that Christ bore the wrath of God: God could not be angry with self-sacrificing love. He could not, without denying his own nature, annex hell—that is, an evil conscience and remorse—to perfect goodness."‡ "We are sometimes told of a mysterious anguish which Christ endured, the consequence of Divine wrath—the sufferings of a heart laden with the conscience of the world's transgressions. . . . Do not go to that absurd nonsense of mysterious suffering that cannot be comprehended, a mystery and so forth of which the Bible says nothing. Mysterious enough they were, as the sufferings of the deepest hearts must ever be, but mysterious only in this sense. All that is unintelligible is the degree of agony."§ "He bore the penalty of others' sin. He was punished. Christ came into collision with the world's evil, and He bore the penalty of that daring: not merely the penalty of his own daring—He bore the penalty of our transgressions. . . . Christ endured the penalty of imputed sin, the sins of others. But imputed sin is not actual sin, though constantly we see it bear the penalty of such, that is,

be punished as such. . . . His death was sacrifice, not merely martyrdom." In one aspect "it was a sacrifice for sin;" in another "it was not a sacrifice for a view or a truth, but for the Truth." "We say that God needed a reconciliation. On the other hand, the Unitarian view is, that God requires nothing to reconcile Him to us; that He is reconciled already; that the only thing requisite is to reconcile man to God. It also declares that there is no wrath in God towards sinners, for punishment does not manifest indignation. Nothing can be more false, unphilosophical, and unscriptural."* "The difference between my views and those of the party she expounds (the Evangelical) does not lie in the question of the Atonement, — we agree in this, — but in the question, What in that Atonement satisfied God? They say pain; I say, because I think the Scriptures say so, the surrender of self-will. . . . Indeed this is the whole argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and a glorious one it is. 'He bore my sins,' I am willing to say, and in deep humiliation, in a deeper sense than many mean. . . . It is often said, 'My sins nailed Him to the Tree.' There is a sense in which this contains a deep and extensive truth. Every time I am a sharer in the spirit to which He fell a victim. . . . Does the sacrifice of Christ save me from the consequences of my sin? Does it break the connection between my sin and its natural result — pain, &c.? No. Does it save me from that which is worse than all pain, the feeling of God's wrath, the sense of banishment from the presence of his beauty and his love? It does. You are redeemed by love from remorse, from the disposition to repeat wrong, from the sense of God's displeasure; and the pain you bear is not taken away but transmuted. The spirit in which you bear it makes all the difference; it changes it from penal fire into wise, loving, corrective discipline."† Baptism, he held, "is the grand, special revelation to an individual by name, A, B, or C, of the great truth Christ revealed for the race, that all, Greeks and barbarians, are the children of God." Starting from this, that Christ died for the sin of the world — came to redeem the world — he declared that "man is God's child, and the sin of the man consists in living as if it were false. It is the sin of the heathen, and what is your mission to him but to tell him that he is God's child, and not living up to his privilege? It is the sin of the baptized Christian, waiting for feelings for a claim upon God. . . . Baptism is a visible witness to the world of that which the world is for ever forgetting. . . . It does not create a child of God. It authoritatively declares him."‡ He held that all the knowledge that we have "is properly inspiration, but immensely differing in value and degree, from a glimmering glimpse to infallibility. If it be replied that this degrades inspiration by classing it with things so common, the answer is plain. A sponge and a man are both animals, but the degrees between them are almost incalculable."§ He believed the Bible "to be inspired, not dictated. It is the Word of God — the words of man; as the former perfect, as the latter imperfect. God the Spirit, as a Sanctifier, does not produce absolute perfection of human character; God the Spirit, as an Inspirer, does not produce absolute perfection of human knowledge."* "Inspiration is the deepest question of our day," he said; "the grand question which is given to this age to solve."† He thought of writing a book on it, and translated as a pioneer Lessing's tract on "The Education of the Human Race;" but in the only sermon that bears distinctly upon it he says, "There are many views, some of them false, some superstitious; but it is not our business now to deal with these. Our way is rather to teach positively than negatively. We will try to set up the truth, and error may fall before it."‡

These statements, grouped together from his own words, may set forward clearly enough his divergence from common views, and what he conceived popular theology. §

§ Divergence far enough and unreasonable enough, and suggesting thoughts of exceeding pain. It is not easy to understand this confused, clumsy, illogical theory of the Atonement, if indeed Mr. Robertson had a theory at all. But it is impossible to excuse his misrepresentation of the Evangelical doctrine, — painful to think that the breadth, insight, and fairness so marked in his conduct and opinions were violated so essentially here. It is not the object of this paper to analyse Mr. Robertson's opinions, but to estimate his relation to our modern religious life, to help in some way to account for his wide and enduring influence. The way in which the story of his life is told, leaves the impression that his influence was incompatible with the Evangelical system, — that Evangelical doctrine is necessarily narrow-minded. It is scarcely needful to say that that is a wrong impression; that his influence did not spring from system, or the want of it; that

His conception of Evangelical doctrine was sometimes a caricature. There may be an occasional Mrs. Jellyby; but it is a libel to say that the most narrow-minded Christian woman is like her. There are representations of the Atonement in Mr. Robertson's sermons which no party in the Church would acknowledge for its own. There are saying about "the Evangelicals" in his letters that read like bursts of passion. He connected them inseparably with conclusions that he fastened on their teaching, that to him seemed inevitable; he saddled exaggerations on their school of doctrine — on, take it as a whole, the most earnest and productive party that had sprung up within the Church; he ignored its fertility of works in dwelling upon its sterility of thought; he came in contact with a painful and evil side of it; and constructed something which he called Evangelicalism, which "he abhorred in proportion as he adored Christ." But after making allowance for the strength of his expressions, his divergence is still wide. Yet he reached practical conclusions that were not very different from those of the schools that he opposed. While persuaded that "the Jewish Sabbath is a shadow of things to come," he felt "by experience its eternal obligation because of its eternal necessity. The soul withers without it; it thrives in proportion to the fidelity of its observance." While the law for the spiritual man was the mind of Christ, "it is at his peril that the worldly man departs from the rule of the day of rest." Those who know his writings will find it impossible to hold that he did not believe in Christ the eternal Son of God and the Saviour of men, though they may give up in despair reconciling his faith with his speculations on the Atonement. Had he been thrown among the more liberal and, no doubt, larger section of Evangelical Churchmen, the sundering of his later from his earlier convictions might not have been so complete: his teaching might have preserved more system, and lost its occasional contradiction of statement. There are narrow-minded disciples of every school, who conceive nothing but evil beyond their own scanty horizon; and it would be a shame to say that the spirit men may and ought to wield it within the limits of the soundest orthodoxy. The theological partisan might sketch Mr. Robertson's opinions darkly enough, might also easily refute them; they are often impulsively and fiercely stated, therefore one-sided and contradictory. Such refutation as that will be abundantly done, and for many persons it will be abundantly necessary. It is surely not the less important to separate the secret of his influence from the errors of his teaching.

which repelled Mr. Robertson when living, and reviled him when dead, is the spirit of the great Evangelical party. From the best of them he would have found recognition and sympathy. But society at Cheltenham and Brighton seems to have bristled with the religious polemics of the day. "To speak certain phrases, and feel certain feelings, was counted equivalent to a Christian life," and the loudest voice in party clamour was taken as index of the soundest heart. He was shocked by this bigotry and shallowness, and he shocked them in turn. While partisans assailed each other with hard names, he sought the truth for which they fought. While they were content with their bundles of opinions, he sought to trace up every branch of thought to its issue from the living Vine: while they regarded every step out of the beaten road of phrases with suspicion, he coined the phrases for his own ideas, and taught with a freedom that had no formalism or restraint but the absolute truth in Christ. While such relations subsisted, it was natural that he should "be badgered with old maids of both sexes;" that he should be irritated and repelled by their remonstrance; that his indignation would be kindled by their ignorance and bigotry. They laid down the books he should read and avoid; he quietly persisted in reading his own way. "I don't care," he said at last. "But do you know what 'don't care' came to?" "Yes, madam, he was crucified on Calvary." "God's truth must be boundless," he wrote. "Tractarians and Evangelicals suppose that it is a pond which you can walk round, and say, — 'I hold the truth!' 'What! all?' 'Yes; all. Here it is, circumscribed, defined, proved; and you are an infidel if you do not think this pond of mine, that the great Mr. Scott and Mr. Newton and Mr. Cecil dug, quite large enough to be the immeasurable Gospel of the Lord of the universe.'" He felt that the true Gospel was larger than the party — that the narrower and more minute a creed, it was the more likely to limit some truths and exclude others; he was even prepared to let men look at Christ through different systems, sure that the more they looked at Him the less likely they were to fall into dogmatical enmity with one another. He made it plain that he held this tolerance not from indifference, but loyalty to truth; because he conceived the surest way to dogmatical agreement was to realize the person of the Son of God and man. Men of the profoundest faith have felt and said likewise. He might have been met at this point; and instead, he was opposed. He was sensitively tolerant; respectful to his neighbour's conscience, and considerate of a good man's prejudice. No man could be more gentle, courteous, and careful in stating convictions that were opposed to current teaching. If he spoke hardly of one school of thought, he was partly goaded to it. He read German, and people shook their heads over his Neology. "Unitarianism is false," he held; "Trinitarianism is true;" but a lady came to remonstrate with him for reading Channing's Life, and called him a Socinian. He protested against infidelity with all his might, and fought it out single-handed among the working men of Brighton; but it was whispered he was an infidel. Pantheism he looked on as "sentimental trash;" but because he was "not afraid of any truth in it," he was set down as a Pantheist. He preached once in the same church with Mr. Maurice; and though he differed widely from him, was set down as his disciple. He toiled against the socialism of young France; but he lectured on the obligations of capital, and was made out a Socialist. He was labelled Revolutionist and Tory, Chartist and Aristocrat, Roman Catholic and Sceptic: and there is scarcely a bad word to be found in theology that has not been thrown at his memory.* His brilliant intellect and genius deserve a more patient and generous treatment, not so much in his interest as in our own. For as a man who has left his mark broad and deep on our English religious thought, it is of more concern to know how far he was wrong, and at what point he left the right, than that he was wrong—an inquiry quite beyond the limits of this paper, but in which these elements must be taken into account: his intense realization of the human side of theology, the humanity of Christ, and the message of Christianity to human life; his desire to see into the precise meanings of words and creeds, and to ascertain exactly the value of their thoughts, as one who felt that "true religion is really comprehensible, its dogmas consistent with plain reasoning, its teaching in harmony with our consciousness of truth, justice, generosity;"* his large-hearted and philosophic conviction that there is a truth below every form of error, that the strength of the error lies there, that it is the province of Christian thought to seek out the truth and set it in its right place; † and that he lived during a time of change, always a restless and unsettled time, a change in the complexion of religious life, in the development of religious ideas, and in the character of religious teaching.

* It was not without personal experience that he said, "Infidelity is often among the unmeaning accusations brought by timid persons, half-conscious of the instability of their own belief, and furious against every one whose words make them tremble at their own insecurity. It is sometimes the cry of narrowness against an old truth, under a new and more spiritual form. Sometimes it is the charge caught up at second-hand, and repeated as a kind of religious hue and cry, in profoundest ignorance of the opinions that are so characterized. Nothing is more melancholy than to listen to the wild, indiscriminate charges of scepticism, pantheism, mysticism, rationalism, atheism, which are made by some of the weakest of mankind, who scarcely know the difference between mesmerism and mysticism. I hold it a Christian duty to abstain from this foolish and wicked system of labelling men with names; to stand aloof from every mob, religious or irreligious in name, which resembles that mob at Ephesus, who shouted for two hours, the more part knowing not wherefore they were come together." — Lectures and Addresses, pp. 5, 8, 9.

Whatever conclusion men may come to about his theology, his influence is still to be accounted for, as the greatest of any preacher in this generation, or, indeed, except Chalmers, in this century. It must be traced to many sources,—for one, to the force and reality of his convictions. His sermons were the reflection of his own mind, the fruit of his own thought. There was nothing in them taken for granted; but from the foundation up, the truth he preached had been examined, and jealously, almost morbidly tested by himself. At Winchester he preached what he had been taught, and did not disbelieve: at Brighton he preached what he had learnt by experience, held even through infinite struggle with the powers of darkness, and trusted and felt with all the force of his soul. At Winchester he was simply the exponent of the doctrinal system that had come to him, with a large charity indeed, and an absolute freedom from the cant of phrases ‡—a ground no higher than the pulpit is often content to occupy; theologically safe if the system is theologically sound, but from which there can be won no hold over the thoughtful and eager minds of the age, nor command of more than a decent and commonplace respect. Until the truth he preaches has passed into the very being of the preacher, men will hear him with an ordinary Sunday's respectful indifference. His clearness, facility of illustration, power of defence, eloquence of appeal, are effective : but he stops short of the highest effect. He is describing what he has not yet explored ; asserting problems that, unconsciously to him, are vexing the minds of men ; applying a gauge to truth, which in his hands is trying a spiritual force by a mechanical test. Could Mr. Robertson have remained stationary where he started ; had it been possible for him to accept with a smooth acquiescence whatever he received, or to resist and quench those yearnings after higher things that begot in him the beginnings of doubt ; or had he been less honest to truth and to himself, and refused to follow where his questions led him, deterred by the risk and difficulty of the way, he would have been perhaps popular, would have escaped much misery and party slander, might have lived longer, and would certainly have been forgotten. But before his settlement at Brighton he had learned thoroughly to think for himself, and what he did preach there was his own, as inseparable from his life as his mind or soul. Another source of his power lay in his mode of preparation. The true speaker will always speak before Christ ; will cast himself on Him as the Eternal Word and Truth ; will feel the awfulness of standing as interpreter between Him and men. Mr. Robertson felt this with an intensity that consumed his strength ; but he felt also that his message was for not only dying men, but living men, in a life beset with problems and duties — a life to which, in its endless by varied relations, this message was sent. When he lectured on Samuel, he had recourse to Niebuhr's "Rome," Guizot's "Civilization," and books on political economy ; when he lectured on Genesis, he studied such books as Pritchard's "Physical History of Man," and Wilkinson's "Egyptians." "I read Shakspeare, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Coleridge, Philip van Artevelde," he says, "for views of man to meditate upon, and I go out into the country to feel God, dabble in chemistry to feel awe of Him, read the life of Christ to understand, love, and adore Him, and my experience is closing into this, that I turn with disgust from everything to Christ." His sermons reach the common human heart because they bring the Bible into contact with common human life. Everything — from a jar in the household to a political struggle, the small duties and casuistry of daily life and the profoundest questions of the past and present — was brought to the Bible to have light flung directly upon it there.

There had been a great change in his thought, but there ran through it a clear unity. His first address as a minister was to a dozen rough boys in a Sunday school, whom he urged to live as Christians, concluding, "Believe me, there is nothing else worth living for." In his last address he might have said the same. Christ, and living Christ, was the starting-point and sum and impulse of his teaching. Round the one he clustered his teaching of doctrine, as the sun that pierced it on every side by his rays ; round the other he grouped his teaching of practice. He apprehended Christianity as above all a life. Peculiarly a man of thought, he demanded of it action ; and his very thoughts became living things "with hands and feet." Christ was to him the solution for all problems ; and as each puzzled him, it was to Christ he carried it, to Christ he led others. Christ by his incarnation had connected Himself with all humanity ; and he recognized therefore that everything human must concern Him. He saw and felt Him everywhere, not as a force that had been set in motion, but as a living One among men — Lord and interpreter of men's intellects, and aim and fulfilment of all genuine, pure, and lofty aspirations. Christian life could never isolate itself from human life, nor Christian thought from human thought. Art, speculation, poetry, politics, tastes, and sensibilities of men — Christian life touched upon them all. The aspect of Christ to men, as human beings living in a present world, and working out in it infinite good and evil to one another, made a deeper impression on him than His aspect to so many souls to be saved. Yet if it was the humanity of Christ that most impressed him, — to the Gospel and to Christ's love that he oftenest turned. — he insisted on the Divinity of Christ as the true explanation of His humanity, and anxiously set out the logical proof of it in the Scriptures — "Divine character, that was given in Christ to worship Jesus ;" was "the Human Heart of God." This sympathy — if it may be called — with the humanity of Christ, made itself felt in many directions. A natural gift, it was developed by his struggles, and quickened and purified by his fellowship with God. "My misfortune or happiness," he says, "is power of sympathy. I can feel with the Brahmin, the Pantheist, the Stoic, the Platonist, the Transcendentalist, perhaps the Epicurean. At least I feel the side of Utilitarianism which seems like truth, though I have more antipathy to it than anything else. I can suffer with the Tractarian, tenderly shrinking from the gulf blackening before him, as a frightened child runs back to its mother from the dark, afraid to be alone in the fearful loneliness; and I can also agonize with the infidels, recoiling from the cowardice and false rest of superstition." A power of entering into other minds like that, gave him a sensitive and penetrating knowledge of men. "He seemed to feel character, as if by a sixth sense." No other preacher threw himself so thoroughly into the characters of the Bible. Jacob, Joseph, David, Zachæus, Thomas, Paul, even Nabal and Abigail, live before us as they never did before. Men to whom the Bible was only a book felt it to be a life. If he was unintelligible to those whose hearts were hardened by constant traffic of religious words, or narrowed in and bigoted by party, or who had felt no doubt, save about the respective orthodoxy of their teachers, men of the highest thought were attracted to his ministry, and the poor rallied round him. It must have been this sympathy with men that, during one of his vacations at Cheltenham, filled a rural church with country people, breathless in attention, and that drew so many of the simplest to him. He dealt with doubts and questionings as one who had felt them himself, who knew their pain, and that it must be met and not stifled. He treated them as marks of disease, to be as pitifully dealt with as blindness or palsy. His sermons speak of "mental doubt, that most acute of human ailments," and "the aching of a hollow heart, the worst of human maladies." Tenderly he took up the bruised mind, and with a firm compassion probed the wounds and set forth Christ the healer. He complains of the way in which religious men treat doubt; he contrasts it with the treatment and sympathy of Christ. To these undoubted sources of his influence, two must be added — his gift of teaching and his gift of speech. His sermons are teacher's work. The aptness and profusion of the illustrations, the eloquence and poetry, are subordinated to his exegesis of truth. He enforces it without exhortation, and rarely with appeal, but by making men see that it is true. For this he had the rarest power. And yet over and above his lucid logical arrangement and exquisite analysis, the language makes itself felt by its transparency, fitness, and beauty. He often utters a succession of nervous thoughts, each of which is set to its word like an arrow quivering on the tightened string. Open at random any of his lectures, or of these letters, and you are arrested, passage after passage, by such words as "the dissonant, heavy, endless clang of the sea;" "the recklessness with which the air seems animated," or "cases of persons at Cheltenham, that have come, like the odour of newly turned earth, upon my heart."

Such qualities so combined belong to few; but the best of them may be had by any: his reverence for truth, his depth of conviction, his fearless honesty, his sympathy with men, his handling of the Bible as what it is — the word of God to the wants of men. It is by them that men have felt his influence; and they indicate, clearly enough, the source of power which the Church in these days is saying, with feeble and credulous lament, has fled from the pulpit. The humanity of Christ must be developed without surrendering the authority and stringency of His Divinity; and the humanity of the Word of God, and the humanity of the pulpit, and the religious thought and life of the Bible, shown to encompass and penetrate like an atmosphere all men may think and say and feel and do.

Mr. Brooke has edited these volumes with great ability, yet by no means faultlessly. The tone of the biography is pitched too high, and produces an overstrained effect. There is a vein of quiet sustained panegyric, a more than occasional hero-worship, thoroughly inconsistent with Mr. Robertson's humility, and not justified by his position. A life so simple did not need so elaborate a setting. An impression is sometimes produced not very consistent with the facts. He was not a clerical Crichton; nor need we believe that he had mastered all his theology, nor that parishes yielded to him in a few Sundays. Throughout, too, there is the manifest taking of a side. Mr. Brooke's antipathy to the Evangelical party, and his sympathies with extremely free theology, have the effect of making Mr. Robertson's seem much greater than they were. He is inclined to pit him against "the Evangelicals," and "the Evangelicals" against him; to make the most of their persecution of him; to see in their system of thought only defect, bigotry, and what must pass away. The Evangelical party may have dwindled into a Narrow Church party of late years, bankrupt of scholarship, of high intellectual endowments, and of that higher power which impresses itself upon the time; but its doctrinal and ecclesiastical opinions, its earnestness and philanthropy, are shared by an ever-increasing body, who have no sympathy with its present form, who cordially dislike its bitterness, who are not to be identified with its bigotry, and who must yet pass by its name. It is neither quite accurate nor fair to apply the hard censures of this book to a body at present so variously composed and so loosely held together. They may apply to a body of this body; they are exaggerated and onesided even then. It is easy to fasten on its failings, to rail at its narrowness, to expose its gossip and scandal, its selfish and effeminate policy; but Englishmen owe "the Evangelical succession" too much to speak lightly of its services; and if its leaders have not been replaced, and as a party it has decayed, its impulses as a movement of religious earnestness and truth are still reaching wide, and blessing where they reach. It would have been well to have remembered words that have been fitly applied to another, and which express the temper in which Mr. Robertson taught; that "he felt himself called to bear a continual witness against those who confound the crushing of opponents with the assertion of principles; he believed that every party triumph is an injury to the whole Church, and an especial injury to the party which wins the triumph."*

Moreover, it is provoking to be reminded at every other page that Mr. Robertson was abused by those who did not agree with him; that he was the victim of old maids of both sexes at Brighton; that his life was a tragedy. He was sensitively organized, and felt pain keenly—the pain of loneliness, suspicion, and slander most of all. But there was nothing surprising if those whom he struck at, struck back, or if neither Evangelical nor Tractarian lent him sympathy. His people were sincerely attached to him; he had loyal friends who could appreciate his worth; he had the power of pressing his convictions on an audience that believed him. He kindled opposition; he could have expected nothing less. "It seems to me," he says, "a pitiful thing for any man to aspire to be true and to speak truth, and then to complain, in astonishment, that truth has not crowns to give, but thorns." He gave as well as took, and hotly and rashly enough; in isolation a theological Ishmael, but not without his hand being against every man, when he conceived the truth was at stake. It is a mistake to present him as a pitiful sufferer, desolate, forsaken, victimized to death. He had far too healthy and manly a nature for that. Yet, in judging Mr. Brooke, something must be set down to the difficulty of his task, and he has always written in the spirit of a frank, honourable, highminded gentleman. He had to write a life with little incident, and that was already written in the pulpit; if he sometimes says too much, he says it so well that he may almost be forgiven. From the Brighton Sermons the world had learned the story of the preacher—his solitude, his struggles, his conflict with the religious world, his doubts and certainties, his charity, his passionate love of nature and animal life, his estimate of public events and public men;—nay, they reveal the books he read, and who were his favourite poets; his instincts and tastes, and the complexion of his daily intercourse. For what he said, was said out of himself; and when he had apprehended a truth, he was not satisfied till it was tried in the circumstances about him. This intense and affluent personality only made Mr. Brooke's task the harder. And another difficulty met him. The Letters are the most interesting to Englishmen since Dr. Arnold's; packed with most suggestive and various thought; chiefly ethical and theological, but not without vivid sketches of scenery, and flashes of genial and subtle criticism. Few critics brought such happy insight to their work, or gave such promise of excellence. It is enough to mention his defence and analysis of "In Memoriam," his unfinished essay on Wordsworth, his remarks on Timon of Athens and Shakspeare's use of superstition, his interpretation of single lines from Tennyson and Keble, and the brief notes on books that lie scattered through his correspondence.* But the Letters and the Sermons are of quite different characters. The thinker, with his unresolved questions, and pain of doubt, and weariness, and varying moods, appears in the one as characteristically as the teacher in the other. It is some time before we can feel at home with two such various aspects of the same man. The way in which the letters have been selected and printed adds to our perplexity. Statements in a letter are not as dogmatically exact as statements from the pulpit, nor as dogmatically exhaustive. Half their meaning must be gathered from our knowledge of when and to whom they were written. Many of these letters seem to have been written in time of mental and physical torture; many of them to Unitarians and sceptics. It would have been well if these had been more minutely specified; for the former are naturally morbid, and the latter are naturally deficient in comprehensive statements of truth, and both may be easily misapprehended. By unexplained and unbalanced passages from his letters, it would be possible for men of negative creeds to claim him with triumph; to class him with theologians with whom he had scarcely a common principle; to set him down as querulous, and accuse him of much that he condemned. It is questionable whether Mr. Brooke has not been over-considerate, even one-sided, in what he has excluded. There must have been brighter and cheerfuller words than any in these volumes. There must have been the play of warm, natural affections relieving the sombre history of mental struggle. There are truer, manlier, and happier features of character brought out in the sermons for which the letters, as they stand, afford little counterpart. Yet there are some who will hold it unfair to judge him by expressions wrung out by suffering from a weary brain, who will try rather to understand than to condemn him, who, if they wish that he were more, will be thankful for what he is. They will find variance from received and ancient doctrines, sometimes of the widest and, I think, saddest sort; they will also find that it is often more in the way of putting truth than in the truth itself. They may differ from him widely, but the more thoughtful they are they will find the more points of contact with his writings, the more help from the spirit in which he taught. Archer Butler will always rank far above him for eloquence, and Newman for metaphysical and dialectic power; but such as he was, his time has accepted Robertson with a favour not accorded to any other preacher. For indeed he was more a representative than a creative man: in whom the character of the time at its best is plainly seen, and the movement of theology; and who, if very dear to those whom he blessed, may yet be to all as a sign of a changed religious thought and the necessity of reconstructing a great religious party.

* Preface to Archdeacon Hare's "Charges," p. lxi. There is a hint in one of the last letters Mr. Robertson wrote that might have saved his biographer from his mistake. "In reading lives, the question too often is, whether it be one which in all respects answers our ideal of a life; whereas the question ought to be, whether it has strongly exhibited some side or other of our manifold and many-sided life."—Letters, II. 224.

* "Lectures and Addresses," pp. 125–139, 203–256, 106–7, 167–9. "Letters," I., pp. 208, 250, 279, II., 79–81.

KEARSAGE AND ALABAMA. — "But," said I, "I thought you had been in the Confederate navy?" "I was," said Aleck. "I was with Semmes everywhere he went; I was in the naval brigade and blockade-running, and on the Alabama all the while he commanded her." "But not when she sank I suppose?" I rejoined. "Well, I was, and was picked up with him by the Deerhound." It was a pretty sharp fight, wasn't it," I suggestingly asked. "It was that," replied Aleck, but he didn't care about enlarging. "I suppose it was the eleven-inch shells that did her business?" "Oh, no," said he, coming to a kind of confessional, "we never had any chance; we had no gunners to compare with the Kearsage's. Our gunners fired by routine, and when they had the gun loaded, fired it off blind. They never changed the elevation of their guns all the fight, and the Kearsage was working up to us all the while, taking advantage of every time she was hid by smoke to work a little nearer, and then her gunners took aim for every shot." "Then it isn't true that the Alabama tried to board the Kearsage?" "No Sir; she did her best to get away from her from the time the fight commenced: we knew well that if we got in range of her Dahlgren howitzers she would sink us in an minutes." "But," I asked, "don't you believe that Semmes supposed he would whip the Kearsage when he went out to fight her?" "No: he was bullied into it, and took good care to leave all his valuables on shore, and had a life-preserver on through the fight. I saw him put it on, and I thought if it was wise in him it wouldn't be foolish in me, and I put on one too. When Semmes saw that the ship was going down he told us all to swim who could, and was one of the first to jump into the water, and we all made for the Deerhound. I was a long way ahead of Semmes, and when I came up to the Deerhound's boat they asked me if I was Semmes before they would take me in. I said I wasn't, and then they asked me what I was on the Alabama. Said I, 'No matter what I was on the Alabama, I shall be a dead man soon if you don't take me in.' They asked me again if I was an officer or a seaman, and wouldn't take me in until I told them that I was an officer." "But," said I, "did they actually refuse to pick up common seamen and leave them to drown?" "They did that," replied he wrathfully, and probably not very correctly; "and as soon as they had Semmes on board they made tracks as fast as they knew how, and left everybody else to drown or be picked up by the Kearsage." — Cornhill Magazine.

PART III

CHAPTER X.

AUNT AGATHA had grown into a sweet old lady; not so old, perhaps, but that she might have made up still into that elderly aspirant after youth, for whose special use the name "old maid" must have been invented. And yet there is a sweetness in the name, and it was not inapplicable to the fair old woman, who received Mary Ochterlony into her kind arms. There was a sort of tender misty consciousness upon her age, just as there is a tender unconsciousness in youth, of so many things that cannot but come to the knowledge of people who have eaten of the tree in the middle of the garden. She was surrounded by the unknown as was seemingly to such a maiden soul. And yet she was old, and gleams of experience, and dim knowledge at second hand, had come to her from those misty tracts. Though she had not, and never could have, half the vigour or force in her which Mary had even in her subdued and broken state, still she had strength of affection and goodness enough, to take the management of all affairs into her hands for the moment, and to set herself at the head of the little party. She took Mary and the children from the ship, and brought them to the inn at which she had stayed the night before; and, what was a still greater achievement, she repressed Winnie, and kept her in a semi-subordinate and silent state — which was an effort which taxed all Aunt Agatha's powers. Though it may seem strange to say it, Mary and her young sister did not, as people say, take to each other at that first meeting. It was twelve years since they had met, and the eighteen-year-old young woman, accustomed to be a sovereign among her own people, and have all her whims attended to, did not, somehow, commend herself to Mary, who was broken, and joyless, and feeble, and little capable of glitter and motion. Aunt Agatha took the traveller to a cool room, where comparative quiet was to be had, and took off her heavy bonnet and cloak, and made her lie down, and came and sat by her. The children were in the next room, where the sound of their voices could reach their mother to keep her heart; and then Aunt Agatha took Mary's hand in both of hers, and said, "Tell me about it, my dear love." It was a way she had of speaking, but yet such words are sweet; especially to a forlorn creature who has supposed that there is nobody left in the world to address her so. And then Mary told her sad story with all the details that women love, and cried till the fountain of tears was for the time exhausted, and grief itself by its very vehemence had got calm; which was, as Aunt Agatha knew by instinct, the best way to receive a poor woman who was a widow, and had just set her solitary feet for the first time upon the shores which she left as a bride.

And so they rested and slept that first night on English soil. There are moments when sorrow feels sacramental, and as if it never could be disturbed again by the pettier emotions of life. Mrs. Ochterlony had gone to sleep in this calm, and it was with something of the same feeling that she awoke. As if life (as she thought) being over, its cares were in some sense over too, and that now nothing could move her further; unless, indeed, it might be any harm to the children, which, thank God there was no appearance of. In this state of mind she rose up and said her prayers, mingling them with some of those great tears which gather one by one as the heart fills, and which seem to give a certain physical relief when they brim over; and then she went to join her aunt and sister at breakfast, where they had not expected to see her. "My love, I would have brought you your tea," said Aunt Agatha with a certain reproach; and when Mary smiled and said there was no need for that, even Winnie's heart was touched, — wilful Winnie in her black muslin gown, who was a little piqued to feel herself in the company of some one more interesting than even she was, and hated herself for it, and yet could not help feeling as if Mary had come in like the prodigal, to be feasted and tended, while they never even killed a kid for her who had always been at home.

Winnie was eighteen, and she was not like her sister. She was tall, but not like Mary's tallness — a long slight slip of a girl, still full of corners. She had corners at her elbows, and almost at her shoulders, and a great many corners in her mind. She was not so much a pretty girl as a girl who would, or might be, a beautiful woman. Her eyebrows were arched, and so were her delicate nostrils, and her upper lip — all curved and movable, and ready to quiver and speak when it was needful. When you saw her face in profile, that outline seemed to cut itself out, as in some warm marble against the background. It was not the beauté du diable, the bewildering charm of youth, and freshness, and smiles, and tints. She had something of all this, and to boot she had features — beaux traits.

But as for this part of her power, Winnie, to do her justice, thought nothing of it; perhaps, to have understood that people minded what she said, and noticed what she did because she was very handsome, would have conveyed something like an insult and affront to the young lady. She did not care much, nor mind much at the present moment, whether she was pretty or not. She had no rivals, and beauty was a weapon the importance of which had not occurred to her. But she did care a good deal for being Winifred Seton, and as such, mistress of all she surveyed; and though she could have beaten herself for it, it galled her involuntarily to find herself thus all at once in the presence of a person whom Providence seemed to have set, somehow, in a higher position, and who was more interesting than herself. It was a wicked thought, and she did it battle. If it had been left to her, how she could have petted and cared for Mary, how she would have borne her triumphantly over all the fatigues of the journey, and thought it nothing to take the tickets, and mind the luggage, and struggle with the porters for Mary's sake! But to have Mary come in and absorb Aunt Agatha's and everybody's first look, their first appeal and principal regard, was trying to Winnie; and she had never learned yet to banish altogether from her eyes what she thought.

"It does not matter, aunt," said Mary; "I cannot make a recluse of myself—I must go among strangers—and it is a great blessing to be able to practise a little with Winnie and you."

"You must not mind Winnie and me, my darling," said Aunt Agatha, who had a way of missing the arrow as it were, and catching some of the feathers of it as it flew past.

"What do you mean about going among strangers?" said the keener Winnie. "I hope you don't think we are strangers; and there is no need for you to go into society that I can see—not now at least; or at all events not unless you like," she continued with a suspicion of sharpness in her tone, not displeased perhaps on the whole that Mary was turning out delusive, and was not so interesting as she appeared to be, and was thinking already of society—for which notwithstanding she scorned her sister, as was natural to a young woman at the experienced age of eighteen.

"Society is not what I was thinking of," said Mary, who in her turn did not like her young sister's criticism; and she took her seat and her cup of tea with an uncomforttable sense of opposition. She had thought that she could not be annoyed any more by petty matters, and was incapable of feeling the little cares and complications of life, and yet it was astonishing how Winnie's little, sharp, half-sarcastic tone brought back the faculty of being annoyed.

"The little we have at Kirtell will be a comfort to you, my love," said the soothing voice of Aunt Agatha; "all old friends. The vicar you know, Mary, and the doctor, and poor Sir Edward. There are some new people, but I do not make much account of them; and our little visiting would harm nobody," the old lady said, though with a slight tone of hurry and apology, not quite satisfied in herself that the widow should be able to think of society so soon.

Upon which a little pucker of vexation came to Mary's brow. She saw now what she would have to encounter, and it seemed to her hard that she should have to encounter it while she was but trying painfully to do her duty. As if she cared or could care for their little visiting, and the vicar, and the doctor, and Sir Edward! she to whom going among strangers meant something so real and so hard to bear.

"Dear Aunt Agatha," she said, "I am afraid you will not be pleased—but I have not been looking forward to anything so pleasant as going to Kirtell. The first thing I have to think of is the boys and their interests. And Francis Ochterlony has asked us to go to Earliston." These words came all confused from Mary's lips. She broke down, seeing what was coming; for this was something that she never had calculated on, or thought of having to bear.

A dead pause ensued. Aunt Agatha started and flushed all over, and gave an agitated exclamation, and then a sudden blank came upon her sweet old face. Mary did not look at her, but she saw without looking how her aunt stiffened into resentment, and offence, and mortification. She changed in an instant, as if Mrs. Ochterlony's confused statement had been a spell, and drew herself up and sat motionless, a picture of surprised affection and wounded pride. Poor Mary saw it, and knew it was she who had done it, and was grieved to the heart and yet could not but resent such a want of understanding of her position and sympathy for herself. She lifted her cup to her lips with a trembling hand, and her tea did not refresh her. And it was the only near relative she had in the world, the tenderest-hearted creature in existence, a woman who could be cruel to nobody, who thus shut up her heart against her. Thus the three women sat together round their breakfast-table and helped each other and said nothing for one stern moment, which was a cruel moment for two of them at least.

"Earlston!" said Aunt Agatha at last, with a quiver in her voice. "Indeed it never occurred to me—I had not supposed that Francis Ochterlony had been so much to— But never mind, if that is what you think best for yourself, Mary."

"There is nothing best for myself," said Mrs. Ochterlony with the sharpness of despair. "I think it is my duty—and—and Hugh, I know, would have thought so. Our boy is his uncle's heir. They are the—the only Ochterlons left now. It is what I must—what I ought to do."

And then there was another pause. Aunt Agatha for her part would have liked to cry, but then she had her side of the family to maintain, and though every pulse in her was beating with disappointment and mortified affection she was not going to show that. "You must know best," she said, taking up her little air of dignity; "I am sure you must know best; I would never try to force my way of thinking on you, Mary. No doubt you have been more in the world than I have; but I did think when a woman was in trouble that to go among her own friends"—

"Yes," said Mary, who was overwhelmed and did not feel able to bear it, "but her friends might understand her and have a little pity for her, Aunt, when she had hard things to do that wrung her heart"—

"My dear," said Aunt Agatha, with, on her side, the bitterness of unappreciated exertion, "if you will think how far I have come, and what an unusual journey I have made, I think you will perceive that to accuse me of want of pity"—

"Don't worry her, Aunt Agatha," said Winnie, "she is not accusing you of want of pity. I think it is a very strange sort of thing myself; but, let Mary have justice, that was not what she meant."

"I should like to know what she did mean," said Aunt Agatha, who was trembling with vexation, and with those tears which she wanted so much to shed; and then two or three of them dropped on the broad-brimmed cambric cuff which she was wearing solely on Mary's account. For to be sure Major Ochterlony was not to say a relation of hers that she should have worn such deep mourning for him. "I am sure I don't want to interfere, if she prefers Francis Ochterlony to her own friends," she added, with tremulous haste. She was the very same Aunt Agatha who had taken Mary to her arms the day before, and sat by her bed, listening to all the sad story of her widow-hood. She had wept for Hugh, and she would have shared her cottage and her garden and all she had with Mary, with the goodwill and bounty, eagerly—but Francis Ochterlony was a different matter; and perhaps it was not in human nature to bear the preference of a husband's brother to "her own friends." "They may be the last Ochterlons," said Aunt Agatha, "but I never understood that a woman was to give up her own family entirely; and your sister was born a Seton like you and me, Winnie;—I don't understand it, for my part."

Aunt Agatha broke down when she had said this, and cried more bitterly, more effusively, so long as it lasted, than she had cried last night over Hugh Ochterlony's sudden ending: and Mary could not but feel that; and as for Winnie, she sat silent, and if she did not make things worse, at least she made no effort to make them better. On the whole it was not much wonder. They had made great changes in the cottage for Mary's sake. Aunt Agatha had given up her parlour, her own pretty room that she loved, for a nursery, and they had made up their minds that the best room was to be Mary's, with a sort of sense that the fresh chintz and the pictures on the walls—it was the only bed-room that had any pictures—would make up to her if anything could. And now to find all the time that it was Francis Ochterlony, and not her own friends, that she was going to! Winnie sat quite still with her fine profile cut out sternly against the dark green wall, looking immovable and unfeeling as only a fine profile can under such circumstances. This was what came of Mary's placid morning and the dear union of family support and love into which she thought she had come. It was harder upon Mrs. Ochterlony than if Aunt Agatha had not come to meet her. She had to sit blank and silent like a criminal, and see the old lady cry and the young lady lift up the stern delicacy of that profile against her. They were disappointed in Mary, and not only were they disappointed but mortified,—wounded in their best feelings and embarrassed in secondary matters as well; for naturally Aunt Agatha had told everybody that she was going to bring her niece, Mrs. Ochterlony, and the poor dear children home.

Thus it will be seen that the first breakfast in England was a very unsatisfactory meal for Mary. She took refuge with her children when it was over, and shut up, as she had been forced to do in other days, another door in her heart; and Aunt Agatha and Winnie on the other hand withdrew to their apartment and talked it over and kindled each other's indignation. "If you knew the kind of man he was, Winnie!" Aunt Agatha said, with a severity which was not entirely on Mary's account; "not the sort of man I would trust those poor dear fatherless children with. I don't believe he has any religious principles. Dear, dear, to think how Mary should have changed! I never could have thought she would have preferred Francis Ochterlony, and turned against her own friends."

"I don't know anything about Francis Ochterlony," said Winnie, "but I know what a lot of bother we have had at home making all those changes; and your parlour that you had given up, Aunt Agatha—I must say when I think of that!"

"That is nothing, my love," said Aunt Agatha; "I was not thinking of what I have done, I hope—as if the sacrifice was anything." But nevertheless the tears came into her eyes at the thought. It is hard when one has made a sacrifice—a real sacrifice—with a liberal heart, to have it thrown back and to feel that it is useless. This is hard, and Aunt Agatha was only human. If she had been alone, probably after the first moment of annoyance she would have gone to Mary, and the two would have cried together, and after little Hugh's prospects had been discussed, Miss Seton would have consented that it was best for her niece to go to Earls-ton; but then Winnie was there to talk it over and keep up Aunt Agatha's indignation. And Mary was wounded, and had retired and shut herself up among her children. And it was thus that the most trifling and uncalled-for of cares, came with little pricks of vexation and disappointment, to disturb at its very outset the new chapter of life which Mrs. Ochterlony had imagined herself to be entering upon in such a calm tranquillizing grief.

They were to go to London that day, and to continue their journey to the North by the night train: but it was no longer a journey in which any of the party could take any pleasure. As for Mary, in the great revulsion of her disappointment, it seemed to her as if there was no comfort for her anywhere. She had to go to Earls-ton to accept a home from Francis Ochterlony, whom she had never "taken to," even in her young days. And it had occurred to her that her aunt and sister would understand why, and would be sorry for her, and console her under this painful effort. When, on the contrary, they proved to be affronted and indignant, Mary's heart shut close, and retreated within itself. She could take her children into her arms, and press them against her heart, as if that would do it some good; but she could not talk to the little things, nor consult them, nor share anything with them except such smiles as were practicable. To a woman who has been used to talk all her concerns over with some one, it is terrible to feel her yearnings for counsel and sympathy turned back upon her own soul like this, and to be struck dumb and feel that no ear is open to her, and that in all the world there is no one living to whom her affairs are more than the affairs of a stranger. Some poor women there are who must have fellowship somehow, and who will be content with pity if sympathy is not to be had. But Mary was not of this kind of women. She shut her doors. She went in, into herself in the silence and solitude, and felt her instinctive yearning to be helped and understood come pouring back upon her like a bitter flood. And then she looked at her little boys in their play, who had need of all from her, and could give her back but their childish fondness, and no help, or stay, or counsel. It is hard upon a woman, but yet it is a thing which every woman must confront and make up her mind to, whom God places in such circumstances. I do not know if it is easier work for a man in the same position. Mary had felt the prop of expected sympathy and encouragement and affection rudely driven from under her, and when she came in among her innocent helpless children she faced her lot, and did not deceive herself any more. To judge for herself, and do the best that in her lay, and take all the responsibilities upon her own head, whatever might follow; to know that nobody now in all the world was for her, or stood by her, except in a very secondary way, after his or her concerns and intentions and feelings had been carefully provided for in the first place. This was how her position appeared to her. And, indeed, such was her position, without any exaggeration. It was very kind of Francis Ochterlony to be willing to take her in, and very kind of Aunt Agatha to have made preparations for her; and kindness is sweet, and yet it is bitter, and hard, and cold, and killing to meet with. It made Mary sick to her heart, and filled her with a longing to take up her babes and rush away into some solitary corner, where nobody would ever see her again or hear of her. I do not say that she was right, or that it was a proper state of mind to be in. And Mary was too right-minded a woman to indulge in it long; but that was the feeling that momentarily took possession of her as she put the doors to in her heart, and realised that she really was alone then, and that her concerns were hers alone, and belonged to nobody else in the world.

And, on the other hand, it was very natural for Aunt Agatha and Winnie. They knew the exertions they had made, and the flutter of generous excitement in which they had been, and their readiness to give up their best for the solace of the widow. And naturally the feeling that all their sacrifices were unnecessary and their preparations made in vain, turned the honey into gall for the moment. It was not their part to take Mary's duty into consideration, in the first place; and they did not know beforehand of Francis Ochterlony's letter, nor the poor Major's confidence that his brother would be a friend to his widow. And it was natural that she should go to her own friends. And then Aunt Agatha's parlour, which was all metamorphosed, and the changes that had been made through the whole house! The result was, that Aunt Agatha, offended, did not so much as offer to her niece the little breathing-time Mary had hoped for. When they got to London, she reopened the subject, but it was in an unanswerable way.

"I suppose your brother-in-law expects you," she said. "I think it will be better to wait till to-morrow before you start, that he may send the carriage to the station for you. I don't ask you to come to me for the night, for it would be a pity to derange the children for so short a time."

"Very well, Aunt," said Mary, sadly. And she wrote to Mr. Ochterlony, and slept that night in town — her strength almost failing her at the thought that, in her feebleness and excitement, she had to throw herself immediately on Francis Ochterlony's tender mercies. She even paused for a moment to think, might she not really do as her heart suggested — find out some corner of refuge for herself with which nobody could intermeddle, and keep apart from them all? But Mary had come "home to her friends," as everybody said at the station; and she had a woman's prejudices, and it seemed unnatural to her to begin, without any interposition of the people belonging to her, that strange and solitary life of independence or self-dependence which was what she must decide upon some time. And then there was always Mr. Ochterlony's letter, which was so kind. And she had settled on this, and had not thought about the other, nor did she know where to go to. Thus it was fixed by a few words, and could not be changed. Aunt Agatha had a terrible compunction afterwards, and could not get Mary's look out of her head, as she owed to Winnie, and would have got up out of her bed in the middle of the night, and gone to Mary and begged her to come to the cottage first, if it had not been that Winnie might have woke up, and that she would have to cross a passage to Mary's room; and in a hotel where "gentlemen" were continually about, who could tell whom she might meet? So they all slept, or pretended to sleep, and said nothing about it: and the next day set off with no further explanations, on their way "home."

CHAPTER XI.

EARLSTON is a house which lies in a little green valley among the grey folds of the Shap Fells. It is not an inviting country, though the people love it as people do love everything that belongs to them; and it has a very different aspect from the wooded dell a little farther north, where strays the romantic little Kirtell, and where Aunt Agatha's cottage smiled upon a tufted slope with the music of the cheery river in its ears day and night. The rivers about Earlston were shallow and ran dry in summer, though it was not because of any want of rain; and the greyness of the hills made a kind of mist in the air to unaccustomed eyes. Everybody, who has ever gone to the north that way, knows the deep cuttings about Shap, where the railway plunges through between two humid living limestone walls, where the cottages and the fences and the farm-houses all lead up in level tones of grey to the vast greyness of the piebald hills, and where the line of pale sky above is grey too in most cases. It was at one of the little stations in this monotonous district that Mrs. Ochterlony and her children and her ayah were deposited — Aunt Agatha, with an aspect of sternness but a heart that smote her, and eyes that kept filling with tears she was too proud to shed, looking on the while. Winnie looked on too without the compunction, feeling very affronted and angry. They were going further on, and the thought of home was overcast to both these ladies by the fact that everybody would ask for Mary, and that the excitement of the last few weeks would collapse in the dreariest and suddenest way when they were seen to return alone. As for Mary, she looked grey like the landscape, under her heavy veil—grey, silent, in a kind of dull despair, persuading herself that the best thing of all was to say nothing about it and shut only more closely the doors of that heart where nobody now had any desire to come in. She lifted her little boys out and did not care even to look if the carriage was waiting for her—and then she came to the window to bid her aunt and sister good-bye. She was so disappointed and sick-hearted, and felt for the moment that the small amount of affection and comprehension which they were capable of giving her was so little worth the trouble of asking for, that Mary did not even ask to be written to. She put up her pale face and said good-bye in a dreary unexpected tone that doubled the compunction in Aunt Agatha's bosom. "Oh, Mary, if you had but been coming with us!" cried that inconsistent woman, on the spur of the moment. "It is too late to speak of it now," said Mary, and kissed her and turned away; and the heartless train dashed off, and carried off Aunt Agatha with that picture in her eyes of the forlorn little group on the platform of the railway station—the two little boys clinging close to their mother, and she standing alone among strangers with the widow's veil hanging over her colourless face. "Can you see the carriage, Winnie?—look out and tell me if you can see it," said Aunt Agatha. But the engine that carried them on was too quick for Winnie, and had already swept out of sight. And they pursued their journey, feeling guilty and wretched, as indeed, to a certain extent, they deserved to feel. A two months' widow with a baby and two helpless little boys—and at the best it could only be a servant who had come to meet her, and she would have everything to do for herself and to face her brother-in-law without any support or helper. When Aunt Agatha thought of this, she sank back in her corner and sobbed. To think that she should have been the one to take offence and be affronted at Mary's first word, and desert her thus; when she might have taken her home and comforted her, and then, if it must have ended so, conveyed her to Earlston. Aunt Agatha cried, and deserved to cry, and even Winnie felt a twinge at her heart; and they got rather angry with each other before they reached home and felt disposed to accuse each other, and and trembled both of them before the idea of meeting Peggy, Miss Seton's domestic tyrant, who would rush to the door with her heart in her mouth to receive "our Miss Mary and the poor dear fatherless bairns." Mary might be silent about it, and never complain of unkindness; but it was not to be expected that Peggy would have the same scruples; and these two guilty and miserable travellers trembled at the thought of her as they made their wretched way home.

When the train had disappeared, Mary tried to take a kind of cold comfort to herself. She stood all alone, a stranger with a few rustic passengers and rustic railway officials staring at her as if she had dropped from the skies, and no apparent sign anywhere that her coming had been looked for, or that there was any resting-place for her in this grey country. And she said to herself that it was natural, and must always be so henceforth, and that it was best at once to accustom herself to her lot. The carriage had not come, nor any message from Earlston to say she was expected, and all that she could do was to go into the rude little waiting-room and wait there with the tired children till some conveyance could be got to take her to her brother-in-law's house. Her thoughts would not be pleasant to put down on paper, could it be done; and yet they were not so painful as they had been the day before, when Aunt Agatha failed her or seemed to fail. Now that disappointed craving for help and love and fellowship was over for the moment, and she had nothing but her own duty and Francis Ochterlony to encounter, who was not a man to give any occasion for vain hopes. Mary did not expect fellowship or love from her brother-in-law. If he was kind and tolerant of the children, and moderately considerate to herself, it was all that she looked for from him. Perhaps, though he had invited her, he had not been prepared to have her thrown on his hands so soon; and it might be that the domestic arrangements of Earlston were not such as to admit of the unlooked-for invasion of a lady and a nursery on such very short notice. But the most prominent feeling in Mrs. Ochterlony's mind was weariness and that longing to escape anywhere, which is the most universal of all sentiments when the spirit is worn out and sick to death. Oh that she had wings like a dove!—though Mary had nowhere to flee to, nobody to seek consolation from; and, instead of having a home anywhere on earth awaiting her, was herself the home, the only shelter they understood, of the little pale fatherless children who clustered around her. If she could but have taken possession of one of those poor cottages, grey and homely as they looked, and put the little ones to bed in it, and drawn a wooden chair to the fire, and been where she had a right to be! It was July, but the weather was cold at Shap, and Mary had that instinct common to wounded creatures of creeping to the fire as if there was a kind of comfort in its warmth. She could have borne her burden bravely, or at least she thought so, if this had been what awaited her. But it was Earlston and Francis Ochterlony that awaited her—a stranger and a stranger's house. All these thoughts and many more were passing through her mind as she sat in the little waiting-room with her baby in her arms and her two elder boys pressing close to her. The children clung and appealed to her, and the helpless Hindoo woman crouched at her mistress's side; but as for Mary, there was nobody to give her any support or countenance. It was a hard opening to the stern way which had henceforward to be trodden alone.

Francis Ochterlony, however, though he had a certain superb indifference to the going-out and coming-in of trains, and had forgotten the precise hour, was not a wretch nor a brute, and had not forgotten his visitors. While Mary sat and waited, and while the master of the little station made slow but persevering search after some possible means of conveyance for her, a heavy rumbling of wheels became audible, and the carriage from Earlston made its tardy appearance. It was an old-fashioned vehicle, drawn by two horses which betrayed their ordinary avocations much in the same way as the coachman did, who, though dressed, as they were, for the occasion, carried a breath of the fields about him, which was more convincing than any conventionalism of garments. But such as it was the Earlston carriage was not without consideration in the countryside. All the people about turned out in a leisurely way to lift the children into it, and shouldered the boxes into such corners as could be found for them—which was an affair that demanded many counsellors—and at length the vehicle got under way. Twilight began to come on as they mounted up into the grey country, by the winding grey roads fenced in with limestone walls. Everything grew greyer in the waning light. The very trees, of which there were so few, dropped into the gathering shadows, and deepened them without giving any livelier tint of colour to the scene. The children dropped asleep, and the ayah crooned and nodded over the baby; but Mary, who had no temptation to sleep, looked out with steady eyes, and, though she saw nothing distinctly, took in unawares all the comfortless chill and monotony of the landscape. It went to her heart, and made her shiver. Or perhaps it was only the idea of meeting Francis Ochterlony that made her shiver. If the children, any one of them, had only been old enough to understand it a little, to clasp her hand or her neck with the exuberance of childish sympathy! But they did not understand, and dropped asleep, or asked with timid quivering little voices, how long it would be before they got home. Home! no wonder Mrs. Ochterlony was cold, and felt the chill go to her heart. Thus they went on for six or seven weary miles, taking as many hours, as Mary thought. Aunt Agatha had arrived at her cottage, though it was nearly thirty miles further on, while the comfortless party were still jogging along in the Earlston carriage; but Mary did not think particularly of that. She did not think at all, poor soul. She saw the grey hill-side gliding past her, and in a vague way at the same moment seemed to see herself, a bride, going gaily past on the same road, and rehearsed all the past over again with a dull pain, and shivered, and felt cold—cold to her heart. This was partly perhaps because it is chilly in Cumberland when one has just come from India, and partly because there was something that affected a woman's fanciful imagination in the misty monotony of the limestone country and the grey waste of the hills.

Earlston, too, was grey, as was to be expected; and the trees which surrounded it had lost colour in the night. The hall was but dimly lighted when the door was opened—as is but too common in country houses of so retired a kind—and there was nobody ready at the instant to open the door or to receive the strangers. To be sure, people were called and came—the housekeeper first, in a silk gown which rustled excessively, and with a certain air of patronizing affability; and then Mr. Ochterlony, who had been sitting, as he usually did, in his dressing-gown, and who had to get into his coat so hurriedly that he had not recovered from it when he shook hands with his sister-in-law; and then by degrees servants appeared and lifted out the sleepy, startled children, who, between waking and sleeping, worn out, frightened, and excited, were precisely in the condition which it is most difficult to manage. And the ayah, who could hold no Christian communication with anybody around her, was worse than useless to her poor mistress. When Mr. Ochterlony led the way into the great, solemn, dark dining-room — which was the nearest room at hand — the children, instead of consenting to be led upstairs, clung with one unanimous accord to their mother. Little Wilfrid got to her arms notwithstanding all remonstrances, and Hugh and Islay each seized silently a handful of her black dress, crushing the crape beyond all remedy. It was thus she entered Earlston, which had been her husband's birthplace, and was to be her son's inheritance — or so at least Mary thought.

"I hope you have had a pleasant journey," Mr. Ochterlony said, shaking hands with her again. "I dare say they are tired, poor little things — but you have had good weather, I hope." This he said after he had indicated to Mary a large easy-chair in carved oak which stood by the side of the fireplace, and into which, with little Wilfrid clinging to her, and Islay and Hugh holding fast by her dress, it was not so easy to get. The master of the house did not sit down himself, for it was dreary and dark, and he was a man of fine perceptions; but he walked to the window and looked out, and then came back again to his sister-in-law. "I am glad you have had such good weather — but I am sure you must all be tired," he said.

"Yes," said Mary, who would have liked to cry, "very tired; but I hope we did not come too soon. Your letter was so kind that I thought" —

"Oh don't speak of it," said Mr. Ochterlony; and then he stood before her on the dark hearth, and did not know what more to say. The twilight was still lingering, and there were no lights in the room, and it was fitted up with the strictest regard to propriety, and just as a dining-room ought to be. Weird gleams of dull reflections out of the depths of old mahogany lay low towards the floor, bewildering the visitor; and there was not even the light of a fire, which, for merely conventional motives because it was July, did not occupy its usual place; though Mary, fresh from India and shivering with the chill of excitement and nervousness and grief, would have given anything to be within reach of one. Neither did she know what to say to her almost unknown brother-in-law, whose face even she could see very imperfectly; and the children grasped her with that tight hold which is in itself a warning, and shows that everything is possible in the way of childish fright and passion. But still it was indispensable that she should find something to say.

"My poor little boys are so young," she said, faltering. "It was very very good of you to ask us, and I hope they won't be troublesome. I think I will ask the housekeeper to show us where we are to be. The railway tires them more than the ship did. This is Hugh," said Mary, swallowing as best she could the gasp in her throat, and detaching poor little Hugh's hand from her crape. But she had tears in her voice, and Mr. Ochterlony had a wholesome dread of crying. He gave his nephew a hurried pat on the head without looking at him, and called for Mrs. Gilsland, who was at hand among the shadows rustling with her silk gown.

"Oh!" he said hurriedly. "A fine little fellow I am sure; — but you are quite right, and they must be tired, and I will not detain you. Dinner is at seven," said Mr. Ochterlony. What could he say? He could not even see the faces of the woman and children whom it was his dread but evident duty to receive. When they went away under Mrs. Gilsland's charge, he followed them to the foot of the stairs, and stood looking after them as the procession mounted, guided by the rustle of the housekeeper's gown. The poor man looked at them in a bewildered way, and then went off to his library, where his own shaded lamp was lit, and where everything was cosy and familiar. Arrived there, he threw himself into his own chair with a sigh. He was not a brute, nor a wretch, as we have said, and the least thing he could do when he heard of his poor brother's death was to offer a shelter — temporarily at least — to the widow and her children; but perhaps a lurking hope that something might turn up to prevent the invasion had been in his mind up to this day. Now she was here, and what was he to do with her? Now they were here, which was still more serious — three boys (even though one of them was a baby) in a house full of everything that was daintiest and rarest and most delicate! No wonder Mr. Ochterlony was momentarily stupefied by their arrival; and then he had not even seen their faces to know what they were like. He remembered Mary of old in her bride-days, but then she was too young, too fresh, too unsubdued to please him. If she were as full of vigour and energy now, what was to become of a quiet man who, above all things, loved tranquillity and leisure? This was what Francis Ochterlony was thinking as his visitors went up stairs.

Mrs. Ochterlony was inducted into the best rooms in the house. Her brother-in-law was not an effusive or sympathetic man by nature, but still he knew what was his duty under the circumstances. Two great rooms gleaming once more with ebony gleams out of big wardrobes and half-visible mirrors, with beds that looked a little like hearses and heavy solemn hangings. Mrs. Gilsland's silk gown rustled about everywhere, pointing out a thousand conveniences unknown at the station; but all Mary was thinking about was one of those grey cottages on the road with the fire burning brightly, and its little homely walls lighted up with the fitful, cheerful radiance. If she could but have had a fire, and crept up to it and knelt on the hearth and held herself to the comforting warmth. There are times when a poor creature feels all body, just as there are times when she feels all soul. And then, to think that dinner was at seven! just as it had been when she came there with Hugh, a girl all confident of happiness and life. No doubt Mr. Ochterlony would have forgiven his sister-in-law, and probably indeed would have been as much relieved as she, if she had but sent an apology and stayed in her room all the evening. But Mary was not the kind of woman to do this. It did not occur to her to depart from the natural routine, or make so much talk about her own feelings or sentiments as would be necessary to excuse her. What did it matter? If it had to be done, it had to be done, and there was nothing more to be said. This was the view her mind took of most matters; and she had always been well, and never had any pretext to get out of things she did not like, as women do who have headaches and handy little illnesses. She could always do what was needful, and did always do it without stopping to make any questions; which is a serviceable kind of temperament in life, and yet subjects people to many little martyrdoms which otherwise they might escape from. Though her heart was sick, she put on her best gown all covered with crape, and her widow's cap, and went down to dine with Francis Ochterlony in the great dining-room, leaving her children behind, and longing unspeakably for that cottage with the fire.

It was not such an unbecoming dress after all, notwithstanding what people say. Mary was worn and sad but she was not faded; and the dead white of the cap that encircled her face, and the dead black of her dress, did not do so much harm as perhaps they ought to have done to that sweet and steadfast grace, which had made the regiment recognise and adopt young Stafford's fanciful title. She was still Madonna Mary under that disfigurement; and on the whole she was not disfigured by her dress. Francis Ochterlony lifted his eyes with equal surprise and satisfaction to take a second look at poor Hugh's widow. He felt by instinct that Phidias himself could not have filled a corner in his drawing-room, which was so full of fine things, with a figure more fair or half so appropriate as that of the serene woman who now took her seat there, abstracted a little into the separation and remoteness of sorrow, but with no discord in her face. He liked her better so than with the group of children, who made her look as if she were a Charity, and the heavy veil hanging half over her face, which had a conventual and uncomfortable effect; and he was very courteous and attentive to his sister-in-law. "I hope you had good weather," he said in his deferential way; "and I trust, when you have been a few days at Earlston, the fatigue will wear off. You will find everything very quiet here."

"I hope so," said Mary; "but it is the children I am thinking of. I trust our rooms are a long distance off, and that we will not disturb you."

"That is quite a secondary matter," said Mr. Ochterlony. "The question is, are you comfortable? I hope you will let Mrs. Gilsland know if anything is wanted. We are not — not quite used to these sort of things, you know; but I am sure, if anything is wanted" —

"You are very kind," said Mary; I am sure we shall be very comfortable." And yet as she said so her thoughts went off with a leap to that little cottage interior, and the cheerful light that shone out of the window, and the fire that crackled and blazed within. Ah, if she were but there; not dining with Mr. Ochterlony in solemn grandeur, but putting her little boys to bed, and preparing their supper for them, and cheating away heavy thoughts by that dear common work for the comfort and service of her own which a woman loves. But this was not a sort of longing to give expression to at Earlston, where in the evening Mr. Ochterlony was very kind to his sister-in-law, and showed her a great many priceless things which Mary regarded with trembling, thinking of two small barbarians about to be let loose among them, not to speak of little Wilfrid, who was old enough to dash an Etruscan vase to the earth, or upset the rarest piece of china, though he was still only a baby. She could not tell how they were so much as to walk through that drawing-room without doing some harm, and her heart sank within her as she listened to all those loving lingering descriptions which only a virtuoso can make. Mr. Ochterlony retired that evening with a sense always agreeable to a man, that in doing a kind thing he had not done a foolish one, and that the children of such a fair and gracious woman could not be the graceless imps who had been haunting his dreams ever since he knew they were coming home; but Mary for her part took no such flattering unction to her. She sighed more and more for the cottage and the fire as she went upstairs sad and weary to the great sombre room, in which a couple of candles burned like tiny stars in a world of darkness, and looked at her sleeping boys, and wondered what they were to do in this collection of curiosities and beauties. She was an ignorant woman, and did not, alas! care anything at all for the Venus Anadyomene. But she thought of little Hugh tilting her and her pedestal over, and shook and trembled at the idea. She trembled too with cold and nervous agitation, and the chill of sorrow in her heart. In the lack of other human sources of consolation, oh! to go to that cottage hearth, and kneel down and feel to one's very soul the comfort of the warm consoling fire.

CHAPTER XII.

It had need to be a mind which has reached the last stage of human sentiment which can altogether resist the influence of a lovely summer morning, all made of warmth, and light, and softened sounds, and far-off odours. Mrs. Ochterlony had not reached this last stage; she was still young; and she was only at the beginning of her loneliness, and her heart had not sickened at life, as hearts do sometimes which have made a great many repeated efforts to live, and have had to give in again and again. When she saw the sunshine lying in a supreme peacefulness upon those grey hills, and all the pale sky and blue depths of air beaming softly with that daylight which comes from God, her courage came back to her in spite of herself. She began the morning by the shedding of those silent tears which are all the apology one can make to one's dead, for having the heart to begin another day without them; and when that moment was over, and the children had lifted all their daylight faces in a flutter of curiosity and excitement about this new "home" they had come to,

after so long talking of it and looking forward to it, things did not seem so dark to Mary as on the previous evening. For one thing, the sun was warm and shone in at her windows, which made a great difference; and with her children's voices in her ears, and their faces fresh in the morning light, what woman could be altogether without courage? "So long as they are well," she said to herself—and went down stairs a little consoled, to pour out Mr. Ochterlony's coffee for him, thanking heaven in her heart that her boys were to have a meal which had nothing calm nor classical about it, in the old nursery where their father had once eaten his breakfasts, and which had been hurriedly prepared for them. "The little dears must go down to dessert; but master, ma'am—well, he's an old bachelor, you know," said Mrs. Gilsland, while explaining this arrangement. "Oh, thank you, I hope you will help me to keep them from disturbing him," Mary had said; and thus it was with a lighter heart that she went down-stairs.

Mr. Ochterlony came down too at the same time in an amiable frame of mind. Notwithstanding that he had to put himself into a morning coat, and abjure his dressing-gown, which was somewhat of a trial for a man of fixed habits, nothing could exceed the graciousness of his looks. A certain horrible notion common to his class, that children scream all night long, and hold an entire household liable to be called up at any moment, had taken possession of his mind. But his tired little guests had been swallowed up in the silence of the house, and had neither screamed, nor shouted, nor done anything to disturb its habitual quiet; and the wonderful satisfaction of having done his duty, and not having suffered for it, had entered Mr. Ochterlony's mind. It is in such circumstances that the sweet sense of well-doing, which is generally supposed the best reward of virtue, settles upon a good man's spirit. The Squire might be premature in his self-congratulations, but then his sense of relief was exquisite. If nothing worse was to come of it than the presence of a fair woman, whose figure was always in drawing, and who never put herself into an awkward attitude—whose voice was soft, and her movements tranquil, Mr. Ochterlony felt that self-sacrifice after all was practicable. The boys could be sent to school as all boys were, and at intervals might be endured when there was nothing else for it. Thus he came down in a benign condition, willing to be pleased. As for Mary, the first thing that disturbed her calm, was the fact that she was herself of no use at her brother-in-law's breakfast-table. He made his coffee himself in a pretty glass machine, which he took pains to explain to her, and then he went into general conversation in the kindest way, to put her at her ease.

"That is the Farnese Hercules," he said; "I saw it caught your eye last night. It is from a cast I had made for the purpose, and is considered very perfect; and that you know is the new Pallas, the Pallas that was found in the Sestina Villa; you recollect, perhaps?"

"I am not afraid," said Mary, faltering, and she looked at them, poor soul, with wistful eyes, and tried to feel a little interest. "I have been so long out of the way of everything!"

"To be sure," said the Squire, encouragingly, "and my poor brother Hugh, I remember, knew very little about it. He went early to India, and had few advantages, poor fellow." All this Mr. Ochterlony said while he was concocting his coffee in his pretty machine; and Mary had nothing to do but to sit and listen to him with her face fully open to his inspection if he liked, and no kindly urn before her to hide the sudden rush of tears and indignation. A man who spent his life having casts made, and collecting what Mary in her heart with secret rage called "pretty things!"—that he should make a complacent contrast between himself and his brother! The suggestion filled Mrs. Ochterlony with a certain speechless fury which was born of her grief.

"He knew well how to do his duty," she said, as soon as she could speak; and she would not let her tears fall, but opened her burning eyes wide, and absorbed them somehow out of pride for Hugh.

"Poor fellow!" said his brother, daintily pouring out the fragrant coffee. "I don't know if he ever could have had much appreciation of Art; but I am sure he made a good soldier, as you say. I was very much moved and shocked when I heard—but do not let us talk of such painful subjects; another time, perhaps!"

And Mary sat still with her heart beating, and said no more—thinking through all the gentle flow of conversation that followed, of the inconceivable conceit that could for a moment class Francis Ochterlony's dilettante life with that of her dead Hugh, who had played a man's part in the world, and had the heart to die for his duty's sake. And this useless Squire could speak of the few advantages he had! It was unreasonable, for, to tell the truth, the Squire was much more accomplished, much better instructed than the Major. The Numismatic Society and the Society of Antiquaries, and even, on certain subjects, the British Association, would have listened to Francis Ochterlony as if he had been a messenger from heaven. Whereas Hugh the soldier would never have got a hearing nor dared to open his lips in any learned presence. But then that did not matter to his wife, who, notwithstanding her many high qualities, was not a perfectly reasonable woman. Those "few advantages" stood terribly in Mary's way for that first morning. They irritated her far more than Mr. Ochterlony could have had the least conception or understanding of. If anybody had given him a glass to look into her heart with, the Squire would have been utterly confounded by what he saw there. What had he done? And indeed he had done nothing that anybody (in his senses) could have found fault with; he had but turned Mary's thoughts once more with a violent longing to the roadside cottage, where at least, if she and her children were but safely housed, her soldier's memory would be shrined, and his sword hung up upon the homely wall, and his name turned into a holy thing. Whereas he was only a younger brother who had gone away to India, and had few advantages, in the Earlstoun way of thinking. This was the uppermost thought in Mrs. Ochterlony's mind as her brother-in-law exhibited all his collections to her. The drawing-room, which she had but imperfectly seen in her weariness and preoccupation the previous night, was a perfect museum of things rich and rare. There were delicate marbles, tiny but priceless, standing out white and ethereal against the soft, carefully chosen, toned crimson of the curtains; and bronzes that were worth half a year's income of the lands of Earlstoun; and Etruscan vases and Pompeian relics; and hideous dishes with lizards on them, besides plaques of dainty porcelain with Raphael's designs; the very chairs were fantastic with inlaying and gilding—curious articles, some of them worth their weight in gold; and if you but innocently looked at an old cup and saucer on a dainty table wondering what it did there, it turned out to be the ware of Henri II., and priceless. To see Mary going over all this with her attention preoccupied and wandering, and yet a wistful interest in her eyes, was a strange sight. All that she had in the world was her children, and the tiny little income of a soldier's widow—and you may suppose perhaps that she was thinking what a help to her and the still more valuable little human souls she had to care for, would have been the money's-worth of some of these fragile beauties. But that was not what was in Mrs. Ochterlony's mind. What occupied her on the contrary was an indignant wonder within herself how a man who spent his existence upon such trifles (they looked trifles to her, from her point of view, and in this of course she was still unreasonable) could venture to look down with complacency upon the real life, so honestly lived and so bravely ended, of his brother Hugh — poor Hugh, as he ventured to call him! Mr. Ochterlony might die a dozen times over and what would his marble Venus care, that he was so proud of? But it was Hugh who had died; and it was a kind of comfort to feel that he at least, though they said he had few advantages, had left one faithful woman behind him to keep his grave green for ever. For one thing, her fatigue and excitement were by no means over, although she thought herself quite well and recovered of all that; and perhaps they had more to do than she thought with all those fantastic reasonings in her heart.

The morning passed, however, though it was a long morning; and Mary looked into all the cabinets of coins and precious engraved gems, and rare things of all sorts, with a most divided attention and wandering mind — thinking where were the children? were they out-of-doors? were they in any trouble? for the unearthly quietness in the house seemed to her experienced mother's ear to bode harm of some kind — either illness or mischief, and most likely the last. As for Mr. Ochterlony, it never occurred to him that his sister-in-law, while he was showing her his collections, should not be as indifferent as he was to any vulgar outside influence. "We shall not be disturbed," he said, with a calm reassuring smile, when he saw her glance at the door; "Mrs. Gilsland knows better than that;" and he drew out another drawer of coins as he spoke. Poor Mary began to tremble and had to sit down to steady herself; but the same sense of duty which made her husband stand to be shot at, kept her at this painful post. She went through with it like a martyr, without flinching, though longing, yearning, dying to get free. If she were but in that cottage, looking after her little boys' dinner, and hearing their voices as they played at the door — their servant and her own mistress, instead of the helpless slave of courtesy, and interest, and her position, looking at Francis Ochterlony's curiosities! When she escaped at last, Mary found that indeed her fears had not been without foundation. There had been some small breakages, and some small quarrels in the nursery, where Hugh and Islay had been engaged in single combat, and where baby Wilfrid had joined in with impartial kicks and scratches, to the confusion of both combatants: all which alarming events the frightened ayah had been too weak-minded and helpless to prevent. And, by way of keeping them quiet, that bewildered woman had taken down a beautiful Indian canoe, which stood on a bracket in the corridor, and the boys, as was natural, with true scientific inquisitiveness had made researches into its constitution, such as horrified their mother. Mary was so cowardly as to put the boat together again with her own hands, and put it back on its bracket, and say nothing about it, with devout hopes that nobody would find it out — which, to be sure, was a terrible example to set before children. She breathed freely for the first time when she got them out — out of Earlstown — out even of Earlstown's grounds — to the hill-side, where, though everything was grey, the turf had a certain greenness, and the sky a certain blueness, and the sun shone warm, and nameless little English wild flowers were to be found among the grass; nameless things, too insignificant for anything but a botanist to classify, and Mrs. Ochterlony was no botanist. She put down Wilfrid upon the grass, and sat by him, and watched for a little the three joyful unthinking creatures, harmonized without knowing it by their mother's presence, rolling about in an unaccustomed ecstasy upon the English grass; and then Mary went back, without being quite aware of it, into the darker world of her own mind, and leant her head upon her hands and began to think.

She had a great deal to think about. She had come home obeying the first impulse, which suggested that a woman left alone in the world should put herself under the guidance and protection of "her friends:" and, in the first stupor of grief, it was a kind of consolation to think that she had still somebody belonging to her, and could put off those final arrangements for herself and by herself which one time or other must be made. When she decided upon this, Mary did not realise the idea of giving offence to Aunt Agatha by accepting Francis Ochterlony's invitation, nor of finding herself at Earlstown in the strange nondescript position — something less than a member of the family, something more than a visitor — which she at present occupied. Her brother-in-law was very kind, but he did not know what to do with her; and her brother-in-law's household was very doubtful and uneasy, with a certain alarmed and suspicious sense that it might be a new and permanent mistress who had thus come in upon them — an idea which it was not to be expected that Mrs. Gilsland, who had been in authority so long, should take kindly to. And then it was hard for Mary to live comfortably in a house where her children were simply tolerated, and in constant danger of doing inestimable mischief. She sat upon the grey hill-side, and thought over it till her head ached. Oh, for that wayside cottage with the blazing fire! but Mrs. Ochterlony had no such refuge. She had come to Earliston of her own will, and she could not fly away again at once to affront and offend the only relation who might be of service to her boys — which was, no doubt, a sadly mercenary view to take of the subject. By-and-by she took them home again, wondering a little, with a timidity that did not belong to her character, what arrangement had been made for them by that housekeeper in the rustling gown, upon whom, for the moment, she found herself dependent. This difficulty was so far solved for her by the appearance of the nursery dinner, and an intimation that master never eat any luncheon. "And I was to say, please, ma'am, that the young gentlemen's dinner would be sent up regular at half-past one," said the maid who served. Thus everything was taken out of Mrs. Ochterlony's hands. She bowed her head in assent, but it cost her some trouble, for Mary was not naturally a meek woman who could sit still and let other people decide for her. She stayed beside her children all day, feeling like a prisoner, afraid to move or to do anything, afraid to let the boys play or to give scope to their limbs and voice — terrified to be subject, perhaps, to the housekeeper's suggestions, which had something of the force of orders, or to disturb Mr. Ochterlony. And then Hugh, though he was not old enough to sympathise with her, was old enough to put terrible questions. "Why shouldn't we make a noise?" the child said; "is my uncle a king, mamma, that we must not disturb him? Papa never used to mind." Mary sent him back to his play when he said this, with a sharp impatience which he could not understand. Ah, how different it was! and how stinging the pain that went to her heart at that suggestion! But then Hugh, thank heaven, knew no better. Even the Hindoo woman, who had been a faithful woman in her way, but who was going back again with another family bound for India, began to make preparations for her departure; and, after that, Mrs. Ochterlony's position would be still more difficult. This was how the first day at Earliston — the first day at home, as the children said — passed over Mary. It was, perhaps, of all other trials, the one most calculated to take from her any strength she might have left. And then she had to dress at seven o'clock, and leave her little boys in the big dark nursery, and go down to keep her brother-in-law company at dinner, to hear him talk of the Farnese Hercules, and of his collections, and travels, and, perhaps, of the "few advantages" his poor brother had had: which for a woman of a high spirit and independent character, and profound loyal love for the dead, was a very hard ordeal to bear.

The dinner, however, went over very fairly. Mr. Ochterlony was the soul of politeness, and, besides, he was pleased with his sister-in-law. She knew nothing about Art; but, then, she had been long in India, and was a woman, and it was not to be wondered at. He meant no harm when he spoke of poor Hugh's few advantages. He knew that he had a sensible woman to deal with, and of course grief and that sort of thing cannot last for ever; and on the whole Mr. Ochterlony saw no reason why he should not speak quite freely of his brother Hugh, and lament his want of proper training. She must have known that as well as he did. And to tell the truth he had forgotten about the children. He made himself very agreeable and even went so far as to say that it was very pleasant to be able to talk over these matters with somebody who understood him. Mary sat waiting with a mixture of fright and expectation for the appearance of the children, who the housekeeper said were to come down to dessert; but they did not come, and nothing was said about them; and Mr. Ochterlony was fond of foreign habits, and took very little wine, and accompanied his sister-in-law upstairs when she left the table. He came with her in that troublesome French way with which Mary was not even acquainted, and made it impossible for her to hurry through the long passages to the nursery and see what her forlorn little boys were about. What could they be doing all this time, lost at the other end of the great house where she could not even hear their voices, nor that soft habitual nursery hum which was a necessary accompaniment to her life? She had to sit down in a kind of despair and talk to Mr. Ochterlony, who took a seat beside her and was very friendly. The summer evening had begun to decline, and it was at this meditative moment that the master of Earlston liked to sit and contemplate his Psyche and his Venus, and call a stranger's attention to their beauties, and tell pleasant anecdotes about how he picked them up; which however was the strangest kind of penance to Mary, who was thankful that her children were not there, and yet mortified and vexed that they had not been sent for, and in the most restless state of uneasiness about them. For to be sure it was not a well-regulated nursery under proper supervision, but three little forlorn boys in charge of a speechless Hindoo ayah, and subject to the invasions of Mrs. Gilsland in her rustling gown, whom Mrs. Ochterlony had left. She sat by her brother-in-law's side and listened to his talk about Art with her ear strained to the most intense attention, prepared at any moment to hear a shriek from the outraged housekeeper, or a howl of unanimous woe from three culpable and terrified voices. There was something comic in the situation, but Mary's attention was not sufficiently disengaged to be amused.

"I have long wished to have some information about Indian Art," said Mr. Ochterlony. "I should be glad to know what an intelligent observer like yourself, with some practical knowledge, thought of my theory. My idea is — But I am afraid you have a headache; I hope you have all the attendance you require, and are comfortable? It would give me great pain to think that you were not perfectly comfortable. You must not feel the least hesitation in telling me" —

"Oh no, we have everything," said Mary. She thought she heard something outside like little steps and distant voices, and her heart began to beat. But as for her companion he was not thinking about such extraneous things.

"I hope so," said Mr. Ochterlony; and then he looked at his Psyche with the lingering look of a connoisseur, dwelling lovingly upon her marble beauty. "You must have that practical acquaintance which, after all, is the only thing of any use," he continued. "My idea is" —

And it was at this moment that the door was thrown open, and they all rushed in — all, beginning with little Wilfrid, who had just commenced to walk, and who came with a tottering dash striking against a pedestal in his way, and making its precious burden tremble. Outside at the open door appeared for an instant the ayah as she had set down her charge, and Mr. Gilsland, gracious but formidable, in her rustling gown, who had headed the procession. Poor woman, she meant no harm. She knew that her master did not care for children, but it was not in the heart of woman to believe that in the genial hour after dinner, when all the inner and the outer man was mollified and comforted, the sight of three such "bonnie boys" all curled, brushed, and shining for the occasion, could do Mr. Ochterlony any harm. Baby Wilfrid dashed across the room in a straight line with "dichterin' noise and glee" to get to his mother, and the others followed, not however, without stoppages on the way. They were bonnie boys — brave, little, erect, clear-eyed creatures, who had never known anything but love in their lives, and feared not the face of man; and to Mary, though she quaked and trembled, their sudden appearance changed the face of everything, and made the Earlston drawing-room glorious. But the effect was different upon Mr. Ochterlony, as might be supposed.

"How do you do, my little man?" said the discomfited uncle. "Oh, this is Hugh, is it? I think he is like his father. I suppose you intend to send them to school. Good heavens! my little fellow, take care!" cried Mr. Ochterlony. The cause of this sudden animation was, that Hugh naturally facing his uncle when he was addressed by him, had leant upon the pillar on which Psyche stood with her immortal lover. He had put his arm round it with a vague sense of admiration, and as he stood was, as Mary thought, a prettier sight than even the lovely group above; but Mr. Ochterlony could not be expected to be of Mary's mind.

"Come here, Hugh," said his mother, anxiously. "You must not touch anything; your uncle will kindly let you look at them, but you must not touch. It was so different, you know, in our Indian house — and then on board ship," said Mary, faltering. Islay, with his big head thrown back a little and his hands in his little trousers' pockets, was roving about all the while in a manly way inspecting everything, looking, as his mother thought, for the most favourable opening for mischief. What was she to do? They might do more damage in ten minutes than ten years of her little income could set right. As for Mr. Ochterlony, though he groaned in spirit nothing could overcome his politeness; he turned his back upon little Hugh so that at least he might not see what was going on, and resumed the conversation with all the composure that he could assume.

"You will send them to school of course," he said; "we must inquire for a good school for them. I don't myself think that children can begin their education too soon. I don't speak of the baby," said Mr. Ochterlony, with a sigh. The baby evidently was inevitable. Mary had set him down at her feet, and he sat there in a peaceable way, making no assault upon anything, which was consolatory at least.

"They are so young," said Mary, tremulously.

"Yes, they are young, and it is all the better," said the uncle. His eye was upon Islay, who had sprung upon a chair, and was riding and spurring it with delightful energy. Naturally, it was a unique rococo chair of the daintiest and most fantastic workmanship, and the unhappy owner expected to see it fall into sudden destruction before his eyes; but he was benumbed by politeness and despair, and took no notice. "There is nothing," said the poor man with distracted attention, his eye upon Islay, his face turned to his sister-in-law, and horror in his heart, "like good training begun early. For my part" —

"Oh, mamma, look here. How funny this is!" cried little Hugh. When Mary turned sharply round in despair, she found her boy standing behind her with a priceless Etruscan vase in his hand. He had just taken it from the top of a low, carved bookcase, where the companion vase still stood, and held it tilted up as he might have held a drinking mug in the nursery. "It's a fight," cried Hugh; "look, mamma, how that fellow is putting his lance into him. Isn't it jolly? Why don't we have some brown sort of jugs with battles on them, like this?"

"What is it? Let me see," cried Islay, and he gave a flying leap, and brought the rococo chair down on its back, where he remounted leisurely after he had cast a glance at the brown sort of jug. "I don't think it's worth looking at," said the four-year-old hero. Mrs. Ochterlony heard her brother-in-law say, "Good heavens!" again, and heard him groan as he turned away his head. He could not forget that they were his guests and his dead brother's children, and he would not turn them out of the room or the house, as he was tempted to do; but at the same time he turned away that at least he might not see the full extent of the ruin. As for Mary, she felt her own hand tremble as she took the vase out of Hugh's careless grasp. She was terrified to touch its brittle beauty, though she was not so enthusiastic about it as, perhaps, she ought to have been. And it was with a sudden impulse of desperation that she caught up her baby, and lifted Islay off the prostrate chair.

"I hope you will excuse them," she said, all flushed and trembling. "They are so little, and they know no better. But they must not stay here," and with that poor Mary swept them out with her, making her way painfully over the dangerous path, where snares and perils lay on every side. She gave the astonished Islay an involuntary "shake" as she dropped him in the sombre corridor outside, and hurried along towards the darkling nursery. The little flock of wicked little black sheep trotted by her side full of questions and surprise. "Why are we coming away? What have we done?" said Hugh. "Mamma! mamma! tell me!" and Islay pulled at her dress, and made more demonstratively the same demand. What had they done? If Mr. Ochterlony, left by himself in the drawing-room, could but have answered the question! He was on his knees beside his injured chair, examining its wounds, and as full of tribulation as if those fantastic bits of tortured wood had been flesh and blood. And to tell the truth, the misfortune was greater than if it had been flesh and blood. If Islay Ochterlony's sturdy little legs had been broken, there was a doctor in the parish qualified to a certain extent to mend them. But who was there among the Shap Fells, or within a hundred miles of Earleston, who was qualified to touch the delicate members of a rococo chair? He groaned over it as it lay prostrate, and would not be comforted. Children! imps! come to be the torture of his life, as, no doubt, they had been of poor Hugh's. What could Providence be thinking of to send such reckless, heedless, irresponsible creatures into the world? A vague notion that their mother would whip them all round as soon as she got them into the shelter of the nursery, gave Mr. Ochterlony a certain consolation; but even that judicial act, though a relief to injured feeling, would do nothing for the fractured chair.

Mary, we regret to say, did not whip the boys when she got into her own apartments. They deserved it, no doubt, but she was only a weak woman. Instead of that, she put her arms round the three, who were much excited and full of wonder, and very restless in her clasp, and cried — not much, but suddenly, in an outburst of misery and desolation, and anger and resistance. After all, what was the vase or the Psyche in comparison with the living creatures thus banished to make place for them? which was a reflection which some people may be far from acquiescing in, but that came natural to her, being their mother, and not in any special way interested in art. She cried, but she only hugged her boys and kissed them, and put them to bed, lingering that she might not have to go downstairs again till the last moment. When she went at last, and made Mr. Ochterlony's tea for him, that magnanimous man did not say a word, and even accepted her apologies with a feeble deprecation. He had put the wounded article away, and made a sublime resolution to take no further notice. "Poor thing, it is not her fault," he had said to himself; and, indeed, had begun to be sorry for Mary, and to think what a pity it was that a woman so unobjectionable should have three such imps to keep her in hot water. But he looked sad, as was natural. He swallowed his tea with a sigh, and made mournful cadences to every sentence he uttered. A man does not so easily get over such a shock; — a frivolous and volatile woman may forget or may dissimulate, and look as if she does not care; but a man is not so lightly moved or mended. If it had been Islay's legs, as has been said, there was a doctor within reach; but who in the north country could be trusted, so much as to look at the delicate limbs of a rococo chair?

CHAPTER XIII.

THE experience of this evening, though it was only the second of her stay at Earliston, proved to Mary that the visit she was paying to her brother-in-law must be made as short as possible. She could not get up and run away because Hugh had put an Etruscan vase in danger, and Islay had broken his uncle's chair. It was Mr. Ochterlony who was the injured party, and he was magnanimously silent, saying nothing and even giving no intimation that the presence of these objectionable little visitors was not to be desired in the drawing-room; and Mary had to stay and keep her boys out of sight, and live consciously upon sufferance, in the nursery and her bedroom, until she could feel warranted in taking leave of her brother-in-law, who, without doubt, meant to be kind. It was a strange sort of position, and strangely out of accord with Mrs. Ochterlony's character and habits. She had never been rich, nor lived in such a great house, but she had always up to this time been her own mistress — mistress of her actions, free to do what she thought best, and to manage her children according to her own wishes. Now she had, to a certain extent, to submit to the housekeeper, who changed their hours, and interfered with their habits, at her pleasure. The poor ayah went weeping away, and nobody was to be had to replace her except one of the Earliston maids, who naturally was more under Mrs. Gilsland's authority than Mrs. Ochterlony's; and to this girl Mary had to leave them when she went down to the inevitable dinner which had always to be eaten downstairs. She had made attempts several times to consult her brother-in-law upon her future, but Mr. Ochterlony, though very polite, was not a sympathetic listener. He had received the few details which she had been moved at first, with restrained tears, to give him about the Major with a certain restlessness which chilled Mary. He was sorry for his brother; but he was one of those men who do not care to talk about dead people, and who think it best not to revive and recall sorrow — which would be very true and just if true sorrow had any occasion to be revived and recalled; and her own arrangements were all more or less connected with this (as Mr. Ochterlony called it) painful subject. And thus it was that her hesitating efforts to make her position clear to him, and to get any advice which he could give was generally put aside or swallowed up in some communication from the Numismatic Society, or questions which she could not answer about Indian art.

"We must leave Earliston soon," Mrs. Ochterlony took courage to say one day, when the housekeeper, and the continued taboo of the children, and her own curious life on sufferance, had been too much for her. "If you are at leisure, would you let me speak to you about it? I have so little experience of anything but India — and I want to do what is best for my boys."

"Oh — ah — yes," said Mr. Ochterlony, "you must send them to school. We must try and hear of some good school for them. It is the only thing you can do" —

"But they are so young," said Mary. "At their age they are surely best with their mother. Hugh is only seven. If you could advise me where it would be best to go" —

"Where it would be best to go!" said

Mr. Ochterlony. He was a little surprised and not quite pleased for the moment. "I hope you do not find yourself uncomfortable here."

"Oh, no," said Mary, faltering; "but — they are very young and troublesome, and — I am sure they must worry you. Such little children are best by themselves," she said, trying to smile — and thus, by chance, touched a chord of pity in her brother-in-law's heart.

"Ah," he said, shaking his head, "I assure you I feel the painfulness of your position. If you had been unencumbered, you might have looked forward to so different a life; but with such a burden as these children, and you so young still!" —

"Burden!" said Mary: and it may be supposed how her eyes woke up, and what a colour came to her cheek, and how her heart took to beating under her crape. "You can't really think my children are a burden to me. Ah! you don't know — I would not care to live another day if I had not my boys."

And here, her nerves being weak with all she had come through, she would have liked to cry — but did not, the moment being unsuitable, and only sat facing the virtuosos, all lighted up and glowing, brightened by indignation and surprise and sudden excitement to something more like the former Mary than ever yet had been seen underneath her widow's cap.

"Oh!" said Mr. Ochterlony. He could have understood the excitement had it been about a Roman camp or a newly discovered statue; but boys did not commend themselves in the same way to his imagination. He liked his sister-in-law, however, in his way. She was a good listener, and pleasant to look at, and even when she was unintelligible was never without grace or out of drawing, and he felt disposed even to take a little trouble for her. "You must send them to school," he said. "There is nothing else to be done. I will write to a friend of mine who knows about such matters; and I am sure, for my part, I shall be very glad if you can make yourself comfortable at Earlston — you and — and the baby, of course," Mr. Ochterlony said with a slightly wry face. The innocent man had not an idea of the longing she had for that cottage with the fire in it. It was a notion which never could have been made intelligible to him, even had he been told in words.

"Thank you," said Mary, faltering more and more; indeed she made a dead pause, and he thought she had accepted his decision, and that there was to be no more about it — which was comforting and satisfactory. He had indeed just risen up to leave the room, breakfast being over, when she put out her hand to stop him. "I will not detain you a minute," she said, "it is so desolate to have no one to tell me what to do. Indeed we cannot stay here — though it is so good of you; they are too young to leave me, and I care for nothing else in life," Mrs. Ochterlony said, yielding for an instant to her emotion; but she soon recovered herself. "There are good schools all over England, I have heard; in places where we could live cheaply. That is what I want to do. Near one of the good grammar schools. I am quite free, it does not matter where I live. If you would give me your advice," she added, timidly. Mr. Ochterlony, for his part, was taken so much by surprise that he stood between the table and the door with one foot raised to go on, and not believing his ears. He had behaved like an angel, to his own conviction, and had never said a word about the chair, though it had to be sent to town to be repaired. He had continued to afford shelter to the little ruffian who did it, and had carefully abstained from all expression of his feelings. What could the woman want more? — and what should he know about grammar-schools, and places where people could live cheaply? A woman, too, whom he liked, and had explained his theory of ancient art more fully to than he had ever done to any one. And she wanted to leave Earlston and his society, and the Psyches and Venuses, to settle down in some half-pay neighbourhood, where people with large families lived for the sake of education! No wonder Mr. Ochterlony turned round, struck dumb with wonder, and came slowly back before giving his opinion, which, but for an unexpected circumstance, would no doubt have been such an opinion as to overwhelm his companion with confusion, and put an instant stop to her foolish plans.

But circumstances come wildly in the way of the best intentions, and cut off the wisest speech sometimes on a man's very lips. At this moment the door opened softly, and a new interlocutor presented herself. The apparition was one which took not only the words but the very breath from the lips of the master of Earlston. Aunt Agatha was twenty years older than her niece, but so (almost) was Francis Ochterlony; and such a thing was once possible as that the soft ancient maiden and the elderly solitary dilettante might have made a cheerful human household at Earlston. They had not met for years, not since the time when Miss Seton was holding on by her lingering youth, and looking forward to the loss of it with an anxious and care-worn countenance. She was twenty times prettier now than she had been in those days—prettier perhaps, if the truth were told, than she ever had been in her life. She was penitent, too, and tearful in her whitehaired sweetness, though Mr. Ochterlony did not know why—with a soft colour coming and going on her cheeks, and a wistful look in her dewy eyes. She had left her home at least two hours before, and came carrying all the freshness and odours of the morning, surrounded with sunshine and sweet air, and everything that seems to belong to the young. Francis Ochterlony was so bewildered by the sight that he stepped back out of her way, and could not have told whether she was eighteen or fifty. Perhaps the sight of him had in some degree the same effect upon Aunt Agatha. She made a little rush at Mary, who had risen to meet her, and threw herself, soft little woman as she was, upon her niece's taller form. "Oh, my dear love, I have been a silly old woman—forgive me!" said Aunt Agatha. She had put up with the estrangement as long as ever it was in human nature to put up with it. She had borne Peggy's sneers, and Winnie's heartless suggestions that it was her own doing. How was Winnie to know what made it so difficult for her to have any communications with Earlston? But finally Aunt Agatha's heart had conquered everything else. She had made such pictures to herself of Mary, solitary and friendless ("for what is a Man? no company when one is unhappy," Miss Seton had said to herself with unconscious eloquence), until instinct and impulse drove her to this decided step. The hall door at Earlston had been standing open, and there was nobody to announce her. And this was how Aunt Agatha arrived just at the critical moment, cutting off Mr. Ochterlony's utterance when he was on the very point of speech.

The poor man, for his part, did not know what to do; after the first moment of amazement he stood dumb and humble, with his hand stretched out, waiting to greet his unexpected visitor. But the truth was, that the two women as they clung together were both so dreadfully disposed to cry that they dared not face Mr. Ochterlony. The sudden touch of old love and unlooked-for sympathy had this effect upon Mary, who had been agitated and disturbed before; and as for Aunt Agatha, she was not an old maid by conviction, and perhaps would not have objected to this house or its master, and the revival of these old associations was hard upon her. She clasped Mary tight, as if it was all for Mary's sake; but perhaps there was also a little personal feeling involved. Mr. Ochterlony stood speechless for a moment, and then he heard a faint sob, and fled in consternation. If that was coming, it was high time for him to go. He went away and took refuge in his library, in a confused and uncomfortable state of mind. This was the result of having a woman in the house; a man who had nothing to do in his own person with the opposite half of humanity became subject to the invasion of other women, and still worse, to the invasion of recollections and feelings which he had no wish to have recalled. What did Agatha Seton mean by looking so fresh and fair at her age? and yet she had white hair too, and called herself an old woman. These thoughts came dreadfully in his way when he sat down to work. He was writing a monograph upon Icelandic art, and naturally had been much interested in a subject so characteristic and exciting; but somehow after that glimpse of his old love his mind would not stick to his theme. The two women clinging together, though one of them had a bonnet on, made a pretty "subject." He was not mediæval, to speak of, but rather classical in his tastes; yet it did strike him that a painter might have taken an idea for a Visitation out of that embrace. And so that was how Agatha Seton looked when she was an old woman! This idea fluttered in and out before his mind's eye, and such reflections upon his paper came dreadfully in the way of his monograph. He lost his notes and forgot his researches in the bewilderment produced by it; for, to tell the truth, Agatha Seton was in a very much finer state of preservation, not to say fairer to look upon, than most of the existing monuments of Icelandic art.

"He has gone away," said Aunt Agatha, who was aware of that fact sooner than Mary was, though Mrs. Ochterlony's face was towards her brother-in-law; and she gave Mary a sudden hug and subsided into that good cry, which is such a relief and comfort to the mind; Mary's tears came too, but they were fewer and not by any means so satisfactory as Aunt Agatha's, who was crying for nothing particular. "Oh, my dear love, don't think me a wretch," the old lady said, "I have never been able to get you out of my head, standing there on the platform all by yourself with the dear children; and I, like an old monster, taking offence and going away and leaving you! If it is any comfort to you, Mary, my darling, I have been wretched ever since. I tried to write, but I could not write. So now I've come to ask you to forgive me; and where are my dear, dear, darling boys?"

Her poor little boys! Mary's heart gave a little leap to hear some one once more talk of those poor children as if they were not in the way. "Mr. Ochterlony is very kind," she said, not answering directly; "but we must not stay, Aunt Agatha, we cannot stay. He is not used to children, you know, and they worry him. Oh, if I had but any little place of my own!"

"You shall come to me, my darling love," said Aunt Agatha in triumph. "You should have come to me from the first. I am not saying anything against Francis Ochterlony. I never did; people might think he did not quite behave as was expected; but I am sure I never said a word against him. But how can a man understand? or what can you look for from them? My dearest Mary, you must come to me!"

"Thank you, Aunt Agatha," said Mary, doubtfully. "You are very kind — you are all very kind" — and then she repeated, under her breath, that longing aspiration, "Oh, that I had but any little place of my very own!"

"Yes, my love, that is what we must do," said Aunt Agatha. "I would take you with me if I could, or I would take the dear boys with me. Nobody will be worried by them at the cottage. Oh, Mary, my darling, I never would say anything against poor dear Hugh, or encourage you to keep his relations at a distance; but just at this moment, my dear love, I did think it was most natural that you should go to your own friends."

"I think when one has little children one should be by one's-self," said Mary, "it is more natural. If I could get a little cottage near you, Aunt Agatha" —

"My love, mine is a little cottage," said Miss Seton; "it is not half nor quarter so big as Earlston — have you forgotten? and we are all a set of women together, and the dear boys will rule over us. Ah, Mary, you must come to me!" said the soft old lady. And after that she went up to the dim Earlston nursery, and kissed and hugged the tabooed children, whom it was the object of Mary's life to keep out of the way. But there was a struggle in Aunt Agatha's gentle bosom when she heard of the Etruscan vase and the rococo chair. Her heart yearned a little over the pretty things thus put in peril, and she had a few pretty things herself which were dear to her, and the thought of putting them in daily jeopardy was alarming. Her alarm, however, was swallowed up by a stronger emotion. It was natural for a woman to care for such things, but it went to her heart to think of "poor Francis," once a hero, in such a connection. "You see he has nothing else to care for," she said — and the fair old maiden paused and gave a furtive sigh over the poor old bachelor who might have been so different. "It was his own fault," she added to herself, softly; but still the idea of Francis Ochterlony "wrapped up," as Miss Seton expressed it, in chairs and vases, gave a shock to her gentle spirit. It was righteous retribution, but still Aunt Agatha was a woman, and pitiful. She was still more moved when Mary took her into the drawing-room, where there were so many beautiful things. She looked upon them with silent and reverent admiration, but still not without a personal reference. "So that is all he cares for, now-a-days," she said, with a sigh; and it was just at the same moment that Mr. Ochterlony, in his study disturbed by visions of two women in his peaceable house, gave up his monograph on Icelandic art in despair.

This, it may be said, was how Mrs. Ochterlony's first experiment terminated. She did not leave Earlston at once, but she did so shortly after — without any particular resistance on the part of her brother-in-law. After Aunt Agatha's visit, Mr. Ochterlony's thoughts took a different turn. He was very civil to her before she left, as indeed it was his nature to be to all women, and showed her his collections, and paid her a certain alarmed and respectful deference. But after that he did not do anything to detain Mary in his house. Where one woman was, other women were pretty sure to come, and nobody could tell what unseen visitants might enter along with them, to disturb a man in his occupations, and startle him out of his tranquillity. He never had the heart to resume that monograph on Icelandic art — which was a great loss to the Society of Antiquaries and the æsthetic world in general; and though he had no advice in particular to give to his sister-in-law as to her future movements, he did not say anything further to deter her from leaving Earlston. "I hope you will let me know what your movements are, and where you decide upon settling," he said, as he shook hands with her very gravely at the carriage door, "and if I can be of any use." And this was how the first experiment came to an end.

Then Mrs. Ochterlony kissed her boys when they were fairly out of the grey shadow of their uncle's house, and shed a few tears over them. "Now at least I shall not have to keep my bonnie boys out of the way any more," said Mary. But she caught sight again of the cheery cottage, with the fire burning within, and the hospitable door open, as she drove down to the railway; and her heart longed to alight and take possession, and find herself at home. When should she be at home? or was there no such place left in the world? But happily she had no maid, and no time to think or calculate probabilities — and thus she set out upon her second venture, among "her own friends."

NO MYSTERY.

A stout young tradesman and a slender maid Wedded, and work'd, and saved, and fill'd their home

Of peace with humble comforts. Trials came,
But these were meekly borne, and yielded more

Than golden profit. 'Midst their toils and cares,

Their son grew well — fair form and gentle soul.

His father's bone and muscle gave him strength;
Beneath his smooth, broad brow, serenely full —

Flowing with flexile folds of silken hair —
His mother's eyes, instinct with quicker fire, Sparkled, or, wonder-struck, like lightning blazed.

Love-smiles, kind counsels, God-truths, and sweet prayers;

Trainings to nature's beauty; fit-wit books;
Boy-mates, though rude, with ardent souls;
and girls

Blushing, downcast — but soon soft-voiced and gay:

All inspirations, from live sources, touch'd
His spirit — genius-kindled, glory-crown'd;
And, in due time, by school and college cheer'd,
He stood revealed — the man without a peer!
A rainbow — hushing all-eyed heaven and earth;

A comet — in the evening sky of time!
Whose son was he? Why, that poor couple's son;

His father oft has patch'd my shoe; and she,
His mother, with her milk-can, sought our door.

And who were they? God's angels in disguise;

Choice body-builders; framers of best brains;
Weavers of finest nerves; soul-purifiers;
To whom God gave in charge that spirit-elect,
Winning its happiest entrance to the world.
They lived, and loved, and laboured, not to mend

Old shoes, or sell fresh milk — though blest the day

When highest ranks shall be so well employ'd!
Their work was their disguise: God ruled their life,

And married them to mould their peerless son!

THE ONE GRAY HAIR.

The wisest of the wise

Listen to pretty lies,

And love to hear them told;

Doubt not that Solomon

Listened to many a one —

Some in his youth and more when he grew old.

I never sat among

The choir of wisdom's song,

But pretty lies love I

As much as any king —

When youth was on the wing.

And (must it, then, be told?) when youth had quite gone by.

Alas! and I have not

The pleasant hour forgot,

When one pert lady said,

"Oh, I am quite

Bewildered with affright:

I see (sit quiet now) a white hair on your head!"

Another, more benign,

Drew out that hair of mine,

And in her own dark hair

Pretended she had found

That one and twirled it round —

Fair as she was, she never was so fair!

PART III.

"It was six months after the events I related in the last chapter, when I returned to the Larches. My father wrote to beg that I would do so, for he was ill, and could not come to me. He gave me a painful account of the state in which James then was, and for some time continued to be, and asked me for his sake to conquer my repugnance to meeting my brother. I have told you how I left the Larches, Margaret, now I will tell you how I returned thither. It was on a cold, bleak day in February, and the tall bare branches of the trees looked spectral, as I drove up the long avenue. Away to the left, were the wide-spreading fields, and the woods which lay between the Larches and Woodlee, while, to the right, in the distance, I could see the stately pile of Carters Court. For a while all seemed like a dream to me, and I could not realize that I was never to pass the doors of either of the familiar houses any more. It seemed impossible at that time that I ever should, and yet you know, Margaret, that each, in its turn, became my home for many tranquil years.

"The house was bright and cheerful enough, and I went at once into the library, where the servants told me I should find my father and James. They were there, and our meeting was over in a moment. I had no love for him, but the change in my brother shocked me. He was thin and worn, listless, and stooped, his once bright hair hung down, dank and limp, his once bright eye was quenched and heavy. As he lay on a couch by the fireside, he looked like a man of forty, whose life had been toilsome and hard, and he was not quite twenty-two. And this was Arthur's doing, I was forced to think; and when he rose and moved slowly out of the room, leaning heavily on his stick, I was forced to think so again. My father had told me all there was to be told, and I knew the kind of life which was to be mine at the Larches. I accepted it, and though I was very lonely, I was not very miserable. A long time would have to elapse before I could hear from Arthur, and until then I must bear all that befell as patiently as I could. I never felt young, I think, from the day I had heard the tidings which had parted us, and much of the violence, as well as the hopefulness of my disposition, had vanished with my youthfulness. Time passed on, James began to regain strength, my father continued to lose it, and I did not hear from Arthur Dallas. With my books I held close companionship, and my father and I got on very well together. I never pretended to maintain anything more than civility with James, nor did he desire it.

"Algernon Carter and his wife had returned from the continent a year after their marriage, and were residing in London, whither the old lady and Rosalind had gone to visit them. Helen had not come to Carters Court since her marriage, and I imputed her absence to her reluctance to meet me, under the painful circumstances of the family estrangement. Occasionally, during my solitary rides in the autumn, I had met Meredith Carter, who had come down to the Court for the shooting, and we always had a friendly talk together: once I summoned up courage to ask him if his sister-in-law had heard anything of her brother, and he told me she had — that Arthur had arrived at Bombay, and been kindly received by Mr. Hungerford, but that he was evidently restless, unsettled, 'wild,' Meredith said, and the last they had heard of him was, that he proposed to leave his money in the mercantile house, to pay no further attention to the business himself, but to go into the service of one of the native princes, and that with that view he had left Bombay for Bengal, consequently they did not expect to hear from him for some time. I cannot tell you what I suffered during this time, in suspense, in uncertainty, in the impossibility of giving him up, of placing him in the past of my life, while my common sense told me these things must be done sooner or later. I asked incessantly, and never found an answer, had he forgotten me? was he altogether changed? had he not taken to the new life because I had no place in it? was his restlessness the result and relief of the same sorrow that I had to bear in silence and monotony, as most women have to endure their griefs?

"I never knew any of these things, Margaret, and you would be surprised, and perhaps I, too, if I told you how many years I continued to ask such vain questions. They have ceased to trouble me for a long time now, my dear, for I have learned to await the solution of these and all other mysteries, till the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed, and we shall no longer fret and puzzle ourselves over the enigmas of our fragmentary lives. My story is drawing to a conclusion, though I was only one-and-twenty at the time I am speaking of now. I think it was two years after our great trouble, when one day my father told me he had written to Algernon Carter. James was now entirely recovered, but his nervousness, timidity, and gloom still remained, also the appearance of being much older than he really was. It seemed to be agreed now, that he was never to undertake any profession or occupation, but, at my father's death, was to live on his share of the proceeds of the sale of the Larches, and such other property as my father should die possessed of. My elder brother had married the young widow of a rich Calcutta merchant, a Scotch lady, of good birth, and, I believe, good looks, and had handsomely resigned all claim on my father's estate. John had spoken of coming to England, but, as it happened, he never did come. He survived my father only five years, and left a daughter and an infant son. I believe they were both sent to England, but my brother's widow never sought out any of our family, or held any intercourse with them. The son must be twenty-five, and the daughter a few years older now. But I am wandering from my story, Margaret, though with a purpose. I want you to understand the position of my father's affairs, and my friendlessness when he told me he had written to Algernon Carter, requesting him to come to the Larches at his earliest convenience, after his return to Carters Court, which, as he learned from Douglas, was expected shortly. The letter was directed to Algernon Carter's town address, and mentioned that my father and myself were alone at the Larches. In fact, James had gone to Bath. In about a week after the dispatch of this letter, I observed the smoke rising from the long disused chimneys of Carters Court, and the following day, when I returned from my afternoon's ride, the butler informed me that Mr. Carter was with the squire.

"Algernon went away without asking to see me, and my father and I did not meet until dinner was announced. My father was thoughtful and silent during dinner, and I merely ventured to ask him if Helen were at Carters Court.

"Yes," he said; "and I am sorry to say she is in very bad health. Did you ever hear of her having met with an accident in Paris, Anne, the year after her marriage?"

"I had not heard anything concerning Helen, but in the most general way, of her travels and her residence in London, since the gulf had opened, on one side of which my brother and I stood, and on the other she and hers. I told my father so, shortly and constrainedly, and then a long silence came, which I had not courage to break; but something in his manner impressed me painfully, and I watched him closely all that evening. My father was an old man then, and he did not carry his years well. He had married late in life, and my earliest recollection of him was as quite a middle-aged man. At this time he had passed seventy years, and had long been sufficiently infirm to make it no matter of surprise to me that he should feel and acknowledge the approach of the end. As I sat and watched him slumbering heavily in his chair that evening, I felt that it was drawing near. It was nearly time to separate for the night, when he awoke, and called me to his side. I went at once, and he said to me, very gently, and with the same tone of compassion in which he had spoken on another memorable day:

"Annie, I told you long ago that I had appointed Algernon Carter your guardian. You are now too old to need one, but he will be your protector, and you will reside at Carters Court when I am gone."

"I made some gesture, uttered some sound of dissent, but he continued:

"My dear, here is a letter from Helen Carter. There is no reason now why you should keep aloof from the only friends it is in my power to leave you. I thought it better that you should hear from me, rather than from any other person, that Arthur Dallas is married."

"I do not know now what I said, Margaret, or how I got out of the room; but I remember that, when I found myself in my own apartment, I sat for a long time with Helen's letter in my hand, unable to read it. I don't think I felt any anger or resentment. I am sure I never would have said or thought there was any breach of faith to me in Arthur's marriage, but I was stunned by the sense of strangeness, of something like impossibility. The blank seemed deeper and wider; and I stood within it, more isolated than ever—more mournfully alone.

"Helen's letter was warmly affectionate. She spoke of her health and I was shocked to learn that she was now wholly confined to her sofa, and never likely to be better. She earnestly entreated me to accede to my father's wishes, and sanction any arrangements which might be made between him and Algernon; referred slightly to Arthur's marriage; mentioned that there was no probability of his return to England for many years; and ended by saying that she felt truly happy now that the severance between us was at an end. I pondered over this letter with very mingled feelings, and wondered at the strangeness of my fate. Arthur married and happy. Helen married and happy, and I—but I need not point the contrast, Margaret; it is as plain in all its details before your mind as it then was before mine. You can read the story by the light of your own domestic happiness, my dear. Long may it shine upon you!

"I had but little time to ponder, or to fret, or in any way to think or trouble about myself; for the following day death set his foot within the house, and before the third evening had closed in, my father was no more. We had not time to communicate with my brother James until all was over. He then returned to the Larches, and he and Algernon Carter met, with grave politeness. On the day of my father's funeral, I went to Carters Court, where I was received by Helen, with all her old affection and eagerness. The business matters in which Algernon and James were associated brought them constantly in contact for some time; but my brother and I seldom met. I led a peaceful life at Carters Court, and my double load of grief was not insupportable. I came to feel that a great deal of my life had been gotten through, and gotten over, and was done with; and when one gains that state of feeling, life is very much easier than before. In due time the Larches was sold, and I learned what my future position in pecuniary affairs was to be. At my special request, my father had left James and myself equal shares in the proceeds of his property, and had foregone his resolution of deducting the sums paid in the gambling transaction. No money could lessen or undo the evil which my brother had done me; but it might have the power to keep him out of harm, and I pitied his weak health, shattered nerves, and the regrets for which I gave him credit, very probably undeserved. When, a year afterwards, he married, my own circumstances having undergone a change, I yielded £100 a year of my income to him, and after his death, as perhaps you know, I charged myself with the education of your husband and his brothers, for he had contrived to get through all he had, and his widow was and is dependent upon her own family, and the generosity of her sons. I am looking a good way ahead of my story here, Margaret; but I do so because it is the last I shall have to say of my brother James. We met very rarely after our father's death—not more than half a dozen times in all—and I had the merest acquaintance with his wife.

"Well, I lived on at Carters Court, and the friendship which united me to it was never broken. We formed a quiet household, and the names of Arthur Dallas and his wife were rarely spoken amongst us. I remember to this hour, the thrill with which I once took out of the postbag a letter in his familiar hand, addressed to Helen. His sister heard from him but seldom, and not very satisfactorily. After a time she would read some of his letters to me, and the old cheery, sanguine spirit shone out in them all, sometimes with a touch of recklessness.

"He wrote with the warmest affection to Helen, and once or twice he mentioned me. There was something in the tone of those passages which hurt me. 'If Anne has not long ago forgotten an unlucky dog like me,' he would say, or 'you do not tell me whether Anne is married; I hope she is, and happily;' and again, when writing of my father's death, which he did with much feeling and solemnity, he alluded to my residence at Carters Court. 'So you and Anne are together again,' he said; 'quite a renewal of old times. Only a bad third wanted; perhaps I am not missed so much at grand old Carters, as I should be on the terrace at Woodlee.' That letter made my rebellious heart sore for many a day. After that I avoided hearing of his letters, and I think they became less frequent.

"Helen and Algernon did not say much about Arthur's wife, but I had very early conceived an idea that they did not approve of his marriage. Helen had no children, and Arthur was childless for a considerable time. At length the news of the birth of a son came. I remember that time very well, for it was just then we began to fear Helen was not to be left long amongst us. Another circumstance made the time memorable to me.

"Meredith Carter, who had been much at home of late, asked me to marry him. He was a good, grave, matter-of-fact man, four years younger than Algernon, and who looked ten years older. I liked and esteemed him, and he did not ask, nor desire to receive, nor propose to bestow, any warmer feeling than liking and esteem. Somehow, his proposal gave me a painful shock, not of surprise, for I thought he had cherished such an intention for some time, but I had never realized the idea that I could ever marry, and now, all of a sudden, the extreme advisability of my doing so made it apparent to me that I must. I asked a little time to consider, and I consulted Helen. That was a strange consultation, with all that was in our memories of the forgotten past. 'If you could, Anne, it would be best, I think. You will be very lonely when I am gone, and you could not remain here unless you married either Meredith or Algernon.' I remember the smile on her sweet face, as she spoke, as freshly as if I saw it now.

"We were married, Meredith Carter and I, quite privately and quietly, and we remained at Carters Court, where our presence could not, indeed be, dispensed with. I was still a young woman, when I married my old friend, and he was not a young man; but the difference between us was only nominal, as we were perfectly well matched. Meredith Carter was a lieutenant-colonel when we were married, and shortly afterwards he retired from the service.

"My story is nearly told, Margaret, but the few incidents that remain are full of sorrow. The first news of Arthur Dallas that reached us after my marriage was that his son was dead. They were living in an unhealthy climate, the child was naturally delicate, and it faded and drooped away. There had been plans for sending the little creature home, when it should be old enough to bear the journey, but that time had never come. In the course of the following year Helen died. So gradually, so gently, so happily, with so much resignation and hopefulness, with such sweet Christian peace, that her departure scarcely seemed terrible, and her dead face looked like that of a child-angel. I have seen some mortals, Margaret, who have seemed to put on immortality before their time, and Helen was one of these.

"Algernon Carter wrote to Arthur Dallas, telling him of the affliction which had come upon us all, but he never received a reply. After some time he went to London, and on his return he told Colonel Carter, who very gently and feelingly communicated the intelligence to me, that Arthur's career had been for some time unprosperous, and that his wife had disgraced and left him. We had never learned much about this lady, except that she was very handsome, and about his own age, and that she had met him at Calcutta, but of her family or antecedents we knew nothing. I felt this most acutely, far more than his marriage. All my heart turned to him in his trouble.

"Colonel Carter was not a man of sentiment, but he had honest and kindly feelings, and he sincerely compassionated the 'poor boy,' as he persisted in calling Arthur. And, indeed, I think we all regarded him very much in the same light. I found it hard to picture him to myself as a world-worn, sunburnt man; I always saw the brown eyes dancing with youthful glee, and the black curls stirred with the summer wind.

"Algernon wrote again and again to Arthur, but he never heard from him, and no inquiries which were made prospered. Old Mr. Dallas survived his daughter but a short time, and Algernon brought his mother-in-law to live at Carters Court. When time had softened Algernon's grief, and he felt that he could bear our absence, Colonel Carter and I went into Gloucestershire, to Oakridge, where the property which he had inherited from his mother, was situated. I had never seen this place, but I knew that my husband had bequeathed it to me by his will, which he made when he abandoned the hope of children. I never wished for a child, Margaret, and I have often reproached myself that I sympathised so little with his disappointment, which never exhibited itself in any unkindness or coldness to me. I know you wish to ask me if I was happy, Margaret, and I cannot exactly tell you. Every one forms some particular theory of happiness, and if his life does not exactly fit it, he thinks he is unhappy. But our daily life is a positive thing, and our theories are all unsubstantial, and really affect it or us very little. In every particular, my lot was different to that I had pictured to myself in the waking dreams dreamed on that stone terrace at Woodlee.

"My husband and Algernon were my only friends. My father, my brother John, and Helen were all gone; of John's widow and children I knew nothing, and James was nothing to me. Colonel Carter's ample means enabled me to use my own income as I chose, and I chose to spend a large portion of it on James's children, before and after his death. He never expressed any desire to see me, and we were quite unaware that the effects of his former illness were again manifesting themselves, until his condition had become hopeless. I had not seen him for more than ten years before his death, which, by a strange coincidence, was almost simultaneous with that of his hated rival, and our beloved brother, Algernon.

"I had few intimates in my girlhood, and fewer in my middle age; my husband and I visited our neighbours, indeed, in Gloucestershire, and duly went through the somewhat ponderous hospitalities in fashion in the county, but we were quiet people, and had no intimates but our brother and each other. The years which succeeded our marriage were very peaceful and very lonely, and I do not think I ever felt vividly interested in anything.

"No communication of any kind reached us from Arthur Dallas, we never had any clue to the ultimate fate of his guilty and unhappy wife, and his mother died in the conviction that her beloved son had perished in some unknown region of that foreign land, which seemed doubly strange and distant, even in those little removed days. My nephew James, your husband, was just fifteen when his father died, and the same poet which brought us the intelligence, summoned my husband to Carters Court by the alarming news of Algernon's sudden illness. He had been with us a little time before, and it had been arranged that we should spend the winter at Carters Court. The Carters were a short-lived family, but I had remarked to my husband that I hoped he and Algernon would break the charm or spell, and live to the old age that had been denied to their forefathers — but this was not to be.

"Loneliness had been decreed as my lot, and the last fiat soon went forth. I accompanied Colonel Carter to Somersetshire, and we found Algernon rapidly sinking under a bad type of fever, which had been for some weeks awfully prevalent and fatal in the neighbourhood. He could just recognise us, and died on the third day after our arrival. On the evening of his death my husband was taken ill, and within a fortnight I was alone in the world, and Carters Court had passed into the possession of strangers."

So this was Aunt Anne's story — this was the solution of the mystery of the picture and her emotion. When she had concluded, she sat silent for a time, leaning on the table, and covering her face with her fair slender hands. After a little I said, "And you, Aunt Anne, did you, too, think Arthur Dallas was dead?"

She removed her hand, and turned her placid face to me as she answered, "No, Margaret, I did not. I never had the rest, the inward quiet, which would have come with such a conviction. My dear, one is very peaceful when one's beloved are gathered into the fold; while they are wandering where the wolves may come and the storms must, love is restless and uneasy, separation is torturing, and apprehension terrible. God had given all my beloved sleep but him. I felt that, or I should have mourned for him with a solemn peace and thankfulness, as I mourned for them. I might never have known where his grave had been made, but the whole green earth would have looked like that spot, to me sacred and beautiful,— for that somewhere in its bosom he slept. But I knew he was not dead; and now, since yesterday, all things are changed. I have received his message; I have accepted his trust. His child is my child; my home is hers. I wonder if he knew that I had bought Woodlee; but no doubt Winifred will be able to tell us that."

The practical nature of Aunt Anne's mind was at once beginning to exhibit itself. She did not dwell upon this point, but put it away from her as a matter to be decided in its time and turn, and left it there.

My husband and I sat up very late that night, talking over the story of Aunt Anne's early life, and discussing the strange occurrences of the last few days. Mrs. Carter had given me permission to relate the main incidents of her narrative to James, but she had said with dry significance, "You had better be rather vague about my brother, Margaret. De Mortuis you know in all cases, but particularly where people in law are concerned, is always safe." I acted on the suggestion, and as my dear James is not vehemently curious, and has a lazy liking for taking things for granted, he did not receive any other impression from the story than one of sympathy with Aunt Anne, in her life-long sorrow, and admiration of the tranquil fortitude with which it had been endured.

When we had said our say on all that regarded her, we began to think and talk of Arthur Dallas's daughter, the "Miss Winifred" of Mrs. Devlin, the beautiful young lady who had started up so suddenly and unaccountably, to fill henceforth, no doubt, an important place in our lives, and materially to influence the destinies of ourselves and our children. James asked me to describe her again, and when I had done so, he said, with something rather sad in his tone:

"And what did Aunt Anne exactly say were her intentions with regard to her?"

"She did not exactly say anything, James," I replied; "but the general terms in which she spoke, said much. I have told you her words — 'his child is my child, my house is hers.'"

I watched his face rather nervously; I knew what he must be thinking of; but I did not like to acknowledge that such thoughts were natural, were inevitable even in my James's noble and disinterested heart.

Did I not share them? did I not remember our walk and our talk of the foregoing evening, and the last words my husband had said about taking care of Woodlee, and improving the property for Jamie? To be sure I shared his thoughts. Of course a sharp and unconquerable pang of disappointment passed through my heart as I bade all such hopes and plans a final adieu; but I did not shrink from acknowledging in myself what I could not endure to discern in him. I know myself to be interested and little-minded, and to have a keen eye to the main chance; I am perfectly aware that I regard wealth and good fortune of every kind as the desert of my husband and children; that I consider them a right indeed, only alienable by an oversight of Providence, aided by human injustice, and that I am incapable of anything like large generalizations; but then I am accustomed to my own littleness, and I never expect to be greater. But James—such an heroic being as James—such an entirely exceptional and unheard-of attorney! I watched him, I repeat, nervously, as he gazed out into the summer night, and his fingers moved dreamily upon the table, as though they still held the habitual pen.

"Maggie," he said at length, rather suddenly, "I hope Aunt Anne is not going to do anything foolishly precipitate about this young girl. It would be very sad if any further disappointment were in store for her."

I looked at him curiously, but with a sense of relief. He was not, then, thinking of how this matter would affect us, but of how it might influence her. I could not emulate, but I did admire him.

"Maggie," he said, "I must speak to Aunt Anne myself. This is a case in which she ought to be advised, and when I have ascertained her mind about it, I think I shall propose to go and call on the solicitor who managed Captain Dallas's affairs, and investigate this young lady's position thoroughly, before Aunt Anne sees her, or commits herself in any way."

I agreed with my husband that this would be a fit and proper proposition for him to make, and then I asked him, rather hesitatingly, if he did not feel a little disappointed about the disposition of Woodlee.

"We counted our possessions, in anticipation, a little too confidently, James," I said; "who could have supposed that, so soon after our conversation, all our hopes would have been dissipated by so strange a chance; and that chance brought about, indirectly, by myself, too."

James smiled, and said, quietly, "You are the last person in the world, Margaret, to take a small view of things naturally, and you do so in this instance only because you think I had a hankering after Woodlee, and perhaps I had. But I do not grudge Aunt the first true happiness her possessions have brought her, coming so late, too, at the eleventh hour. And this orphan girl, I could not be envious of her finding a home and a provision, even if it does interfere with our Jamie. We must remember, thankfully, that our children will not need to find a refuge with strangers."

There was something so calm and strong and peaceful in his tone, that I felt almost rebuked and held my peace.

On the following day, James had a long interview with Mrs. Carter, at which I was not present. She deputed him to call on Captain Dallas's solicitor, Mr. Newman, in Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, and promised to dine with us, and receive his report. She had few traces of her illness left, and the weather was exquisitely fine, so there was not risk in her leaving the house. Aunt Anne arrived before James, and she and I had a long talk while we waited for him. Nothing of importance was said, however; we merely discussed over and over again the story she had told me, and I learned the particulars of Aunt Anne's conversation with Mrs. Devlin. Our good little friend had been greatly delighted and affected when Mrs. Carter told her that Miss Winifred's father had been her friend in early youth, and that her young favourite should be in future her especial care. Under the circumstances, Mrs. Devlin had considered herself privileged to add all in her power to Mrs. Carter's sources of information, and had brought her all the books left in her charge by Captain Dallas's daughter, and the photograph which I had seen. The dead man's name was written by his own hand in each of the volumes, and many were enriched with notes also in his writing. These were principally books of Eastern travel, and works on ethnological subjects.

"I could trace a good deal of his life and most of his studies by their silent witness, my dear," said Aunt Anne, "and I am glad to think he liked and took an interest in the distant lands he lived in. It must have been easier for him to bear all the troubles of his life, when he cultivated his mind, and concentrated it upon his business and its associations."

There was "no nonsense" about Aunt Anne. She was capable of entertaining, and indeed had nourished one engrossing and abiding sentiment throughout her life, never suffering it to interfere with her discharge of her duties indeed, but never shaking off its influence. But she did not for a moment imagine, or seek to persuade herself, that Arthur Dallas had imitated her in this respect. They had each married, but under circumstances presumably altogether different. His had been a marriage so imprudent, so ill-judged, that there could be no doubt of its having been a love-match, while in hers, there had been no such sentiment, and no assumption or pretence of it. She endeavoured to read the story of his life, not to find an undercurrent of remembrance of herself in it, not for the purpose of persuading herself that she had had an abiding though unacknowledged place in it; but with a simple, honest, loving purpose, the natural desire of the heart to know all that can be known of the object which has filled it with a vague and dreamy presence, haunting but unsatisfying for so long.

After dinner, James gave us an account of his interview with Mr. Newman. That gentleman had received his communication courteously but cautiously, and had informed him, that his acquaintance with the late Captain Dallas had been of recent date, and had not extended to any knowledge of his family circumstances. There had never been any mention of Captain Dallas's wife, and Mr. Newman had no knowledge of her fate or existence. He concluded, as the will which he had drawn up had made no allusion to her, that she must be dead. He had listened attentively to James's statement of the former relations between the families of Carter and Dallas, and had expressed his pleasure in learning that the orphan girl, for whom he had expressed a strong regard, had found friends whose interest in her would be traditional as well as active. He confirmed the impression which Mrs. Devlin had conveyed of Winifred's destitute condition, informing my husband that there had not been more than twenty pounds remaining of the small sum in the girl's possession, when all expenses had been paid, and her arrangements for taking the situation in which she was now living made. Mrs. Devlin had been quite correct in her supposition that the Captain had no suspicion of the heartless robbery of which his orphan daughter was destined to be the victim, the investigation rendered necessary by his death brought the facts to light. Mr. Newman had taken some trouble to ascertain the eligibility of the position which Winifred had accepted, and had heard from her twice, in pursuance of his request that she would write to him.

"He is a tough, dry old file," said James, not without a lawyer's lurking admiration of such professional toughness and dryness, "and horribly methodical. He had the pretty little letters filed, as if they had been office accounts, and endorsed in red ink. I should have liked to read them, but he made no move that way, merely turned them over with his long pale finger, and mentioned the date of each. I saw the sloping elegant handwriting though, and the violet-tinted paper, with a rationally broad black edge, none of your unmitigated woe advertisements, and I am sure Miss Dallas is a lady."

I smiled. James was growing enthusiastic like myself, and with less reason, for I had really seen her, whereas he had only seen her letters at a distance.

"And now, Aunt Anne," continued her nephew, briskly, "it only remains to be settled how we are to tell the young lady the good news in store for her. My notion is that you should write to her, and let me play postman. I can spare a day very well just now, and I could go down to Leamington by the early train, see Miss Dallas, and get back in the evening. I think this would be less agitating for her than getting a letter from you without any preparation, and would have a better effect on the people with whom she is, of whom I have not formed a particularly high opinion. Will you give me this commission, Aunt Anne?" he said. "I should dearly like to see Miss Winifred when she learns what is the legacy her father has left her."

My husband spoke eagerly, with a heightend colour and animated voice. Aunt Anne watched him with a strange look, as if her mind were less occupied with what she was saying than with some speculative subject. A satisfied assenting smile passed over her face as she said,

"You are right, James; and I will be very grateful to you if you will do as you propose. I will write the letter to-morrow. Could you go to Leamington on the day after?"

"Certainly, Aunt Anne," he answered.

Mrs. Carter's brougham came for her at ten o'clock. The summer night was beautiful. I had not been out all day, so James proposed that we should see Aunt Anne home, and walk back. When we reached Mrs. Devlin's house, she opened the door, and received us with her usual cheery welcome. I exchanged a few words with her, and as she passed in at the door, Aunt Anne said, "Do you know whether any one called since I went out, Mrs. Devlin?"

"Not on you, ma'am," she answered; "but there was a young gentleman here asking for Miss Winifred. I was busy in the shop, and Hannah never came for me, but just gave him her address, and he went off, and said nothing more."

"I wonder who he is," said Aunt Anne. "Did he give his name, Mrs. Devlin?"

"No, ma'am; he did not."

James saw Mrs. Carter the next day, and received the credentials of his mission to Leamington. He and I talked a great deal over its meaning and its manner, and speculated upon the feelings with which Winifred Dallas would receive Aunt Anne's letter. James was rather given to laughing at me for laying what he called an undue stress upon personal appearance, and accrediting persons endowed with beauty with every good and pleasant quality; so I did not say all I thought of what the young girl was likely to prove. All James's quiet ridicule of my weakness in this respect has utterly failed to convince me. I still believe handsome people to be good and amiable, and like them by instinct, while it requires thorough conviction and long experience of the virtues and merits of ugly ones to induce me to receive them into the shrine of my affections. I do not say quite so much about it as I used, but I think the more. We decided that my husband should send in his name on his arrival at Monthermer Park—such was the rather pretentious name of the residence of Miss Dallas's employers—stating his profession, and requesting a private interview with the young lady.

"I am sure Mrs. Montague Vicars is a horrid woman," said James, candidly. "I entirely share Aunt Anne's prejudice against her; and I think the incident of the bird is sufficient foundation for it. So I don't want to have anything to do with her."

"Yes, James," I said; "but do be civil, my dear. We cannot tell how things may turn out yet; and one may as well avoid creating any unpleasantness for the poor girl while she has to stay there—as of course she must for a little, until things are settled."

"Oh, of course," replied James. "I never thought of anything else; and I especially warned Aunt Anne against being too impulsive."

The hours of my husband's absence seemed unusually long. He left London by the earliest train, and of course could not return until late in the evening. We had agreed that it would be better to leave

Aunt Anne to her own society and her own thoughts, and so I did not visit her during James's absence, though I longed to do so, and found the time hang heavily on my hands. I do not think the children had ever been so "fractious" and troublesome as on that particular day, which Nurse also selected for enjoying an incapacitating fit of toothache, so that I had them, in the fullest sense of the term, "all to myself." I was thankful when the evening had come, and they were in their little beds, and I had leisure to sit down and think of James and his mission, and wonder how he had fulfilled it.

When the summer night had completely fallen, I retired to my own room, and seated myself in an arm-chair close to the window, and fell to pondering upon Winifred Dallas and Mrs. Montague Vicars, and thinking whether Aunt Anne and the desolate young girl would get on well together, and how things would arrange themselves. I indulged myself in making a fancy sketch of Mrs. Montague Vicars (of course not in the least resembling that lady), and found that the scene of Tom Pinch's decisive interview with his sister at Camberwell recurred rather forcibly and suggestively to my memory. "If James should find out that this woman positively ill-treats or tyrannizes over the girl he will not stand it," I said to myself. "For all his lawyer-like ways and cautions to Aunt Anne about deliberating well, and not committing herself to any course of action with respect to Miss Dallas, I know very well James will do something impulsive and desperate if he finds her unhappy."

These thoughts were passing through my mind, when a cab rumbled slowly up to the door, with the heavy rumble of a "four-wheeler," not the alert celerity of a "hansom." "Ah!" I thought, "that is not James; he would never come in anything but a hansom." But I was wrong; for after a few minutes' delay I heard his quick step on the stairs, and my husband came hurridly into the room.

"Maggie," he said, "here I am; and I have not come alone."

"Not come alone, James!" I said; "who is with you?"

"Winifred Dallas," he answered. "I have left her in the drawing-room. Come down and receive her kindly, Maggie. Don't look so astonished, dear; it is just what we agreed was not on any account to be done, I know. It is just the impulsive proceeding that was to be avoided; but oh! Mag, if you had only seen Mrs. Montague Vicars — such a tartar. 'Crim,' you know, as McDermott said of his partner's wife, you could not have helped it any more than I could. But come down-stairs. Russell has been told to get the spare room ready; and when the poor tired child is gone to bed, I will tell you all about it."

I was so utterly taken by surprise that I could not give expression to my feelings, and I did not try to do so. I accompanied James in meek silence to the drawing-room, and there, standing by the ottoman, in the full glare of the light, I saw the beautiful young girl of whom I had had a momentary glimpse when she was Mr. Devlin's lodger. Pale, agitated, tired, and evidently frightened, she was yet exceedingly beautiful; and, as the rich crimson colour rushed over her pale face at the sight of me, it lent a brilliance to her appearance which effectually combated the sombre effect of her heavy black dress and the close crape bonnet, which imprisoned her rich dark hair. I took her hand and bade her a kindly welcome, to which she vainly attempted to reply. The next moment she was sobbing on my bosom.

I had seen Winifred safely deposited in her bed; and having positively interdicted all attempts of talking on her part, had returned to my husband, whom I found pacing the drawing-room from end to end, and as impatient to narrate as I was to hear his adventures.

"Well," he said, "is she all right?"

"Oh, yes," I replied, "she is happy, comfortable, and sleepy; and I am in an agony of curiosity to hear how all this happened, and how you came to do anything so imprudent. Do tell me all about it."

"Just what I want to do," said he.

"This affair has a very unexpected complication in it, I assure you, Maggie. I need say nothing about my journey, that was all as usual: the morning papers and the "Saturday" lasted me till I got to Leamington, and there I took a fly and drove direct to Monthermer Park. Such a park, Maggie! You might as well call our back-garden a pleasure-ground, or the mignonette box a conservatory. It is nothing more than a prettyish detached villa, with an acre of brand-new shrubbery, and a great deal of stucco "fixings." I'm particular, because the place is an index to the people. Small, low, vividly green gates, and a curved drive, fondly supposed to represent all the dignity of distance; a monstrously heavy door, studded with nails of the Newgate pattern, and opened by a page who might be own brother to Mrs. Wittitutterly's 'Alphonse.' This young gentleman replied to my request to see Miss Dallas by presenting a salver for the reception of my card, and then ushered me into a back drawing-room. I sat down and looked at the furniture, dirty chintz, and the pictures, dubious water-colour, at the carpet, cheap tapestry; and was contemplating a card-basket, wherein were displayed some very venerable specimens of pasteboard, when I heard a voice in the adjoining room exclaim, in anything but pleasant accents:

"Stay, Miss Dallas; I will see this person." Something was murmured in reply, and then the voice said, 'It was quite understood that I do not allow followers, and Mr. Penniford was made aware of that yesterday. You will remain where you are if you please.'

"The deuce I was," thought I; 'why, how should I know anything about you, or you about me?' Then the door opened, and in walked the owner of the voice. Such a woman, Maggie! I should have run away in four-and-twenty hours if I had been her companion. A tall, gawky, slouching, untidy woman: with goggle-eyes, bleared and blind-looking: with a large purposeless nose and a long upper-lip, and a mouth which expressed brainless egotism, if ever mouth did: with untidy hair rolled into flat curls on each side of her flat unmeaning forehead: with a flat bust, and a flat waist, and flat hands, and, I am certain, flat feet, though I am happy to say I did not see them; — a woman dressed in shabby finery, black flounced silk, rusty and crumpled, with a jacket badly made, and collar crookedly put on."

James always had a marvellous eye for the details of women's dress, and was insufferably quick at finding out if one wanted brushing, or had on cleaned gloves, or a "second best" bonnet; so that I was not at all surprised at the accuracy of his description.

"Charming creature," said I! "Mrs. Montague Vicars, of course; do go on, James."

"She put up her gold-rimmed eye-glass, and looked at me deliberately, with out the slightest sign of salutation; but by degrees, as she mastered the details of my appearance, I supposed, with some surprise depicted in her countenance, which was of a kind that turned every expression into a caricature, I bowed profoundly, and waited for her to speak.

"You are Mr. Penniford, I presume," she said, in a tone which was almost offensive.

"That is my name, madam," I replied, 'and my business here is with Miss Dallas — a young lady who resides with you, as I understand.' I spoke with considerable stiffness, and standing, my hat in my hand.

"I am quite aware of the nature of your business with Miss Dallas," she said, laying an imbecile emphasis on the word; 'but you were informed yesterday that I do not permit my companions to receive male visitors.' I could give you no idea of the impertinence of the tone in which she said this. It concentrated all the petty tyranny of a mean mind — all the low, spiteful envy of a contemptible nature. I gazed at the woman in profound amazement, and said, as respectfully as I could,

"There must be some mistake, madam. I never received any such intimation from you. I have never seen Miss Dallas, and I presume she is wholly unaware of my existence."

"You sent in your card, sir, with the name, Mr. James Penniford, upon it; and I tell you that Miss Dallas had an interview with Mr. James Penniford yesterday, and that I forbade its repetition; and if you are not that person, why do you make use of his name?"

"She was fast working herself into a rage, the bones in her scraggy throat were working, and her unpleasant, bleared eyes assumed an expression of angry spite which you could scarcely have supposed them capable of. I did not in the least understand what she was driving at; but I was determined to see Miss Dallas, and resolved to cut this fury short, so I said, 'as curtly as possible,

"I do not comprehend your remark, madam, but that does not matter. I do not use any one's name but my own. I am James Penniford, solicitor, of Furnival's Inn, and I come here, accredited by the solicitor to the late Captain Dallas, a gentleman from whom you received references on behalf of Miss Dallas, on important and private business concerning that young lady. May I request permission to see her without loss of time?"

"Then, sir," said she, in a weak screech, 'You are not Miss Dallas's lover?'

"Madam," I stammered, 'what can you possibly mean? I am not Miss Dallas's or Miss Anybody's lover!'

"I don't understand this, sir; and my belief is that there is some scheme in progress, and Miss Dallas is no better than she ought to be. When I hired her, I told her I did not allow followers, and she said she had none. She is no great things of a companion, moping when she dares, and giving herself airs, which do not become a dependant; but she never ventured to disobey me until yesterday."

"Madam," I interrupted, 'this is all irrelevant to my business, which has nothing to do with Miss Dallas's "followers," or her qualifications as companion to a lady. I have merely to repeat that I am not the person whose visits you interdicted, but that I am here to see Miss Dallas on important, and permit me to repeat, private business.'

"I could see she was debating with herself whether she could venture to refuse me an interview with Winifred. The mean face had so much candour in it at any rate. So I cut her deliberations short, by drawing out my watch, and saying with perfect calmness, but in a tone which I fancy she did not altogether like, 'I must trouble you to decide, madam. You are aware, I presume, that you have no power to prevent Miss Dallas seeing any one she pleases, and if you will not refer me to her, I must return to my employers, and take steps to place them in communication with this young lady, towards whom you are assuming an illegal position.'

"Ignorant people, and especially ignorant women, are desperately afraid of the law, and of long words. If ever an ignorant woman breathed, it is Mrs. Montague Vickers. She 'caved in' immediately, dashed the door open, and called out, in a voice as musical as a peacock's,

"Come here, Miss Dallas, and let us learn what is Mr. James Penniford's business with you."

"There was no reply in words, but a light step crossed the adjoining room, and Winifred made her appearance. As she stood in the aperture of the folding doors, like a picture in its frame, I felt the truth of your description of her, Maggie. Slight, graceful, beautiful, with a pleading look in the soft, solemn, black eyes, and a gentle gesture with the delicate hands, as if she were depreciating some coarse remark, some harsh rebuke. She looked at me, Maggie, and I looked at her, and her face flushed with surprise and embarrassment. It had struck me that there was something of alacrity in her step, which, when she came in sight, instantly ceased, and I felt there was some mystery, some confession in her mind.

"Miss Dallas?" I said.

"Yes, sir," she replied, with a bow. "I am Miss Dallas, and you — you are Mr. Penniford, are you not?"

"I replied affirmatively, and she then said, timidly, 'You are not the gentleman whom I expected to see.'

"We were all three standing at this time, and the amiable Mrs. Montague Vicars was glaring upon Winifred through her eyeglass. At this point I quietly took the girl's hand and led her to a seat. She trembled very much but did not speak, and I turned to the she-dragon, and said,

"I have already informed you, madam, that I have to discuss private affairs with this young lady. May I request you to permit me to see her alone?"

"Certainly not," she answered, with the grossest rudeness; 'I don't know what girls of her age have to talk about with a gentleman alone, and I don't allow such interviews in my house. I have no reason to suppose Miss Dallas's notions of propriety very exact, considering that I found her yesterday with the other Mr. James Penniford's arm round her waist when I went into the drawing-room unexpectedly.'

"The other Mr. James Penniford! Who on earth can she mean, James?" I exclaimed.

"Wait a moment, Maggie, and you shall hear. Winifred started up, and cried out, 'Oh, sir, do not pay any attention to Mrs. Vicars's opinion of me. I do not know who you are, or why you have come to see me. But if James has sent you, you know how it is with us, and that I have nothing to be ashamed of.'

"James sent me! my dear young lady," I said, 'I have no idea what or who you mean! I come to you on behalf of a lady, who was a dear friend of your father many years ago, before you were born, and who has discovered your existence by the merest accident, but wishes to be your friend too. The explanation of my visit would not at any time have been easy, but there is evidently a mistake somewhere, which renders it more difficult. Who is this James of whom you speak, my dear Miss Dallas, and who appeared to be a namesake of mine?' She looked down, blushed beautifully, then lifted up her sweet eyes, and looked me in the face with gentle, modest composure, as she said:

"James Penniford and I were little children together in India, sir, and some day we hope to be man and wife."

"Well, Maggie, there is no use in prolonging your suspense, and intensifying your astonishment. A little questioning elicited the fact that this James Penniford is my cousin, my uncle John's only son. We have never known anything of my aunt and her children, and Winifred's story has explained the reason. Arthur Dallas had renewed the intimacy which had subsisted between my uncle John and himself in their boyhood when they met in India; and as he and my father had quarrelled, and uncle John and my father had never been attached as brothers, the friends had avoided him, and knew nothing of his family. The traditional estrangement has extended to my uncle's children; they and their mother had no wish to undertake the acquaintance of their unknown relatives, and only this extraordinary succession of chances could probably have made us known to each other. I could not ask any distinct question on this part of the subject, of course, but I fancy that when Captain Dallas's wife left him, my aunt took as much as possible of the charge of the deserted little girl, for it was she who made all the arrangements for sending her home to England, to be educated, at the same time that her own son and daughter came. The love affair seems to have been lifelong, but there was no formal engagement, which is to be regretted, as Captain Dallas would have died more at peace had he known that his daughter's affections were given to the son of his old friend. James Penniford and his mother and sister were not in England during the last months of Captain Dallas's life, and now, Maggie, here is another surprise for you. Do you remember Mrs. Devlin telling us about the young man who inquired for Miss Dallas, and got her address from Hannah?' "

"Of course I do—why it must have been"—

"Just so, Maggie, it was my cousin and namesake, James Penniford."

The unexpected turn of affairs disclosed by my husband's narrative up to this point, had effectually banished Aunt Anne's share in the matter from my memory, but with the mention of Mrs. Devlin, it recurred to my mind. How strange it had all been before anything of this had transpired!—how doubly strange it all appeared now! Through what curious chances and changes had the girl, sleeping quietly, I hoped, beneath our roof, been brought to that refuge, and to the knowledge of her father's faithful friend. That John Penniford's son should become the husband of Arthur Dallas's daughter was a curious turn of fate, and acquired additional strangeness from the probability that she would pass to his home from that of the woman whom her father had so loved and so wronged. The fatherless and motherless girl had been wonderfully guided and guarded by the great Father of orphan children.

"Well, James, but about Aunt Anne," I asked; "what did you tell Winifred, and how did she take it? Did you succeed in seeing her alone, or did that odious woman persevere in staying there?"

"No, Maggie, I saw her alone. When I had discovered for myself, and explained to her the relationship existing between her betrothed husband and myself, Winifred took more courage, and told me that James had visited her on the previous day, and had won her assent to their marriage, though conditional on his mother's consent, of which he had, however, assured her. The young people had arranged that she should remain at Monthermer Park for the present, until, as James hoped, his mother would receive Winifred. 'I had no other friend, Mr. Penniford,' she said, innocently, 'except Mrs. Devlin, at our old lodgings at Knightsbridge; and I knew it would not do for me to go there.' All this time, you must remember, not a word had been said about the friend on whose behalf I had come; my business had been overlooked in the surprise of the discovery that there were two James Penniford's, and that these were cousins. At this point Mrs. Montague Vicars internally assisted our proceedings, and furnished me with a pretext for doing what I had been longing to do from the moment I had first caught sight of the sweet, timid face in the doorway. She had sat down by this time, and was drumming her feet (still happily invisible) upon the floor, and scowling, as only a short-sighted woman, with a bad disposition and a countenance to correspond, can scowl. When Winifred made the avowal I have just mentioned, then she broke out:

"'Soh! Miss Dallas, you condescended to arrange with this gentleman, about whom you tell us such a very proper and probable story, that you would make a convenience of me and my house! I am deeply indebted to you, I am sure, but two words go to that bargain. I know nothing of the person who visited you yesterday and the person here now, who call themselves by the same name; and I don't mean to keep such a romantically-circumstanced companion. You will please leave my house as soon as you can make it convenient. I will send my maid with your money, and write to the person to whom you referred me.' So saying, she stalked out of the room, and Winifred turned a horrid face towards me.

"'Don't be frightened, my dear.' My dear," I said, "it is only a few hours sooner, only a little less courteously than I had intended, for I came to offer you a home, Winifred — a home where you are wanted, and will be welcome; but you shall hear nothing more until you have turned your back upon this place. So run and pack your belongings, my dear, and I will sit in the carriage which brought me here until you call me."

"'But, Mr. Penniford,' she stammered, 'I — I —'"

"'Don't be egotistical,' said I; 'you shall know all about it when we are in the train, and if you are not satisfied, we will send for the other James Penniford and explain matters to him, and I daresay he will contrive a way of overcoming your scruples. In the meantime, you are coming home to my wife, and I don't doubt you will find her infinitely more agreeable than Mrs. Montague Vicars.'

"At this moment a grim-looking woman, in a dirty cap, came into the room, laid a small parcel on the table, and said, in a tone of intolerable insolence, "'Missis says here's your wages, and you're to let her have a receipt.'

"Winifred turned pale, and looked at me, but smiled, and desired her to count the money. She did so.

"'Was your agreement for quarterly payments and a quarter's notice, my dear?' I asked.

"'Yes,' she said.

"'Then that is right. Draw out a receipt and sign it.' I handed her a receipt stamp from my pocket-book, watched her affix her signature, gravely folded the paper, and handed it to the woman, whose unconcealed astonishment at the whole transaction was very comical. 'Have the goodness to hand that to Mrs. Montague Vicars,' I said. When she had left the room, Winifred said,

"'But am I to take the money? I don't like that. I don't think I can take it.'

"'Certainly, you must take it,' said I. 'She calculated upon your refusal, and taking it is the very best way in the world to punish her. Now, she must either do without a companion or victim until the end of the quarter, or pay twice over for the luxury. So it strikes me she has paid too dear for her whistle, and also that we are the winning party in this game of cross-purposes.'

"She was soon ready, and I obeyed her signal, and emerged from the fly. 'I cannot carry my box down-stairs,' she said, in a tone of distress. 'I have managed to pull it outside the door of my room, and none of the servants will help me.'

"'I will then,' said I; 'show me the box.'

"She led me to a landing-place behind the sitting-rooms I had seen, and there, by the closed door of a back room, stood a neat black trunk. I am strong, Maggie, and would have made a decent railway porter; so I hoisted the box on my back without more ado, and in a few minutes we had left the Brummagem splendours of Monthermer Park behind us, and were on our way to the Leamington station. I did not speak to Winifred for some time. She was crying, partly I suppose from the excitement of her feelings, and partly because the rudeness and grossness of the treatment she had received, ludicrous and contemptible as was the woman who had inflicted it upon her, was sufficient to wound her sensitiveness and offend her delicacy.

"I procured a carriage to ourselves at Leamington, and on our journey I told her all, and heard all she had to tell me. She was deeply affected, and indeed amazed at the revelation of Aunt Anne's history, and she perused her letter with tears of the warmest emotion and gratitude. All that I have been enabled to perceive of her disposition confirms the impression you have received from Mrs. Devlin. Her chief fear and anxiety is, lest Aunt Anne should fail to like her, should not 'take to her,' as she expressed it; but I have no fear of that. It is, however, a great relief to me to find that the girl's future is already disposed of, independent of Mrs. Carter; for though the dear old lady is thoroughly true and earnest in all her intentions and wishes, and faithful to the sentiment which has been, I verily believe, the only one by which her life has been swayed, she is an oddity, and it is rather late for her to assume the maternal role in the drama of life. This unexpected appearance of our cousin James makes everything easy, however, and for my part I see everything couleur de rose."

"Did Winifred tell you much about herself, James; about her father and her childhood? Of course she did not mention her mother?"

"No, she said nothing about her; and though she did tell me a good deal, of course it was all in a very desultory kind of way. But, Maggie, do you know what hour it is? past two o'clock in the morning, and I am so tired."

James slept very soundly until long past his usual hour of waking, but I slept little on that memorable night; and though I chiefly thought and pondered and wondered about our young guest, and speculated about her meeting with Aunt Anne, and the effect they were likely respectively to produce on one another, I caught myself thinking several times, and with remarkable distinctness, "I wonder, as Winifred is to be so well married, whether there is any chance that Aunt Anne will leave Woodlee to my James."

My husband thought it well to apprise Mrs. Carter by letter that he had brought Winifred Dallas to our house, and to leave it to her to select a time and place for their meeting. The letter had been despatched as soon as he rose, and he then told me that he intended to make his cousin's acquaintance without delay.

"Winifred shall write to the young man," he said, "and I will play Mercury. But this must not be until after I have fulfilled Aunt Anne's wishes. I am retained in her service, and must not let it be made second to any other, however interesting. I dare say the youth has written to his lady-love at Monthermer Park to-day; but it does not matter. No greater harm will come of that than Mrs. Montague Vicars perusing the effusion, which I have no doubt she will not hesitate to do. I suppose he will not write more than once a day, and we shall get at him before to-morrow."

We found Winifred in the breakfast-room, looking very pale but very beautiful. She met us nervously, and was silent and embarrassed, until we three found ourselves alone in my husband's study; then she became calm and cheerful, and the bright intelligence for which her countenance had led me to give her credit, asserted itself. While I was relating to her, at greater length than James had been able to do, the strange sequence of events which had led to Mrs. Carter's discovery of her father's identity with the lover of her own early youth, and listening with pleased attention to her sweet sorrowful talk about that beloved father, Mrs. Carter's brougham stopped at the door, and the next moment Mrs. Devlin was in the room.

The good little Irishwoman was in a state of wild excitement and delight. I had never seen Honor Devlin off her balance before, but she made up on this occasion for all the constraint of her previous self-possession. How she kissed "Miss Winifred" and cried over her, and how she talked incoherently of "the Captain" and of Ally, of Mrs. Carter, of Joan, and of Corporal Trim. How Winifred clung to her, and thanked her, and insisted that she owed all her good fortune, all the thick-thronging consolation that had come to her orphaned life, to her kind humble friend.

"All but one, miss," said Honor, with a aly smile, "if you insist upon it; but I don't think the young gentleman who asked for your address the other day would have been balked of it if I had not known it, itself." And that was the only time I heard Honor Devlin relapse into so broad a Hibernianism.

Winifred was pale and silent as we drove from Bedford Row to Knightsbridge, and I saw a large tear occasionally steal down her cheek and drop unheeded on her mourning-dress. The tide of memory and association was sweeping over the orphan girl, about to find a new friend where she had looked her last upon her dead father's face. I saw the quiver of her lips and the pallor of her cheek increase as we drew near to the house, in which she had passed so many happy, dutiful, mournful hours, and when the carriage stopped she was trembling violently. I had been considering on the way whether I should accompany Winifred to Mrs. Carter's presence, or should suffer their first interview to take place without witnesses, and I decided on the latter course.

"Go up-stairs with Mrs. Devlin, dear," I said; "I will wait here for a little."

She obeyed silently, and I went into the small sitting-room occupied by Mrs. Devlin. There that good woman joined me almost immediately.

"I just showed her in, ma'am," she said, "and Mrs. Carter came up almost to the door, and she was as white as a sheet, and she put her arms round her, and said, 'My dear child!' and then I shut the door and came down to you. And I have told them they must go on as well as they can in the shop and in the work-room without me, for I'm not fit for business, and that's the truth."

There were tears in the good little woman's voice as she spoke. The next moment they made their way to her eyes, and Mrs. Devlin enjoyed that favourite feminine luxury, "a good cry." When she had recovered her composure we fell to talking of the strange train of circumstances which had led to the present happy result.

"If the Captain could only have known," said Mrs. Devlin, "that within so short a time his orphaned child would find a home and friends, and be brought to them in the very house in which he left her so desolate, so much more desolate than he thought, poor gentleman, he would have died more peacefully."

"Yes," I said, "that is true; and it seems strange to us that so much sorrow and uncertainty concerning those we love should be a portion of the cross we must carry all through this mortal life. But I believe he knows that the woman who so faithfully loved him will be henceforth the mother of his child. It is a stranger question than any other in my mind whether her own mother, the false wife who betrayed her husband and deserted her child, knows it also; whether she knows that the woman, forgotten for her sake, is repairing the evil and misery wrought by her."

"Oh," said Mrs. Devlin, thoughtfully, "how many things we want to know, not only about the next world, but about this. At all events, I shall never forget this time, and the story of my lodger in 1862. I used to think nothing stranger than the adventures of the lady and the child in Wilton Place could ever happen in this house, but all this has been far more wonderful."

"Except that you will see this out," I said, "and the other ended, as it began, in mystery. We shall never find any clue to the identity of the dead woman."

"No, I fancy not, ma'am," she replied. "As for the house in Wilton Place, I have quite taken an interest in it since; it has been let several times since the people Mrs. Hungerford was staying with went away. I know a new family came in a short time ago."

"Indeed!" I remarked, rather idly, for my mind was straying from the subject. "What is the name?"

"I don't know, ma'am," said Mrs. Devlin, "but I will ask the postman. I always like to know who is living in that house."

At this moment Mrs. Devlin was called out of the room by one of the workwomen. She remained away about a quarter of an hour, and when she returned, her face bore an expression of surprise.

"Oh, ma'am!" she exclaimed, "what do you think has happened? The postman came into the shop just now, and I asked him the name of the new people. Fancy my astonishment when he told me it is Penniford! I'll be bound they are Miss Winifred's lover, and his mother and sister."

"And my husband's aunt and cousins!" I exclaimed, in astonishment equal to her own.

My simple story has reached its conclusion now. All that ensued was so much a matter-of-course that it would not interest you to hear the details. Aunt Anne had no reason to regret the precipitancy with which her intentions with regard to Winifred had been carried out, in consequence of the accommodating insolence of Mrs. Montague Vicars. That amiable lady had not even an opportunity of annoying Winifred and her lover by the suppression or detention of a letter, for within an hour of the discovery of the near neighbourhood of the Pennifolds, our happy party in the drawing-room was reinforced by the appearance of a tall, handsome young man, remarkably like my husband, though not at all as good-looking, whom Winifred blushing presented to us as James Pennifold.

I think it possible that Aunt Anne may have felt a little pang of disappointment when she found that the future fate of the fair young girl in whom she had found an object for the dormant affection and benevolence of her brave old heart was fixed, beyond her control and without her interference. But if she felt any such pang, she hid it, even as she had hidden many another, and was satisfied. We found much to like in Mrs. Pennifold, and there was no difficulty in obtaining her consent to James's marriage with Winifred Dallas. Aunt Anne and her stranger sister-in-law suited each other remarkably well, and as the long previous estrangement had arisen from a feeling of friendship towards Arthur Dallas, and condemnation of my husband's father, common to both in different degrees, it made, when it no longer existed, an additional tie between them. How Mrs. Pennifold would have received the announcement of her son's engagement with the penniless daughter of her dead friend, had there been no Mrs. Carter in the case to play the part of fairy godmother, was a question unnecessary, and therefore unasked. I sometimes speculated upon this point a little, however, and I confess the previous departure from England, the long stay on the continent, and the absence of all communication (owing, of course, entirely to the exigencies of foreign travel), guided me on my way to a conclusion. All was, however, under present circumstances, perfectly couleur de rose, and Winifred the happiest of the happy. My part in the family proceedings at this time was chiefly that of an impartial looker-on, and I saw one thing which gave me unlimited satisfaction. This one thing was the regard, affection, and confidence with which my dear James inspired every one. His cousins declared him the finest fellow in existence; Winifred regarded him as a sort of embodied providence; and Aunt Anne said to me, one day, when he and she had been closeted for the discussion of business,

"Margaret, I congratulate you upon your husband. Most women are inclined to meanness, not on their own account perhaps, but to a kind of magnanimous meanness, full of sharp interested motives for the good of those they love. With such a husband as James, I don't think you could retain such a weakness; he is the most perfectly disinterested human being I ever met. Absolute absence of self-interest is so natural to him that he is not aware that he is more disinterested than other people."

The marriage of James and Winifred took place at Woodlee in the early spring days of 1863. As the carriage which conveyed the bride and bridegroom away from our sight, to an accompaniment of vociferous barking from Corporal Trim, disappeared beyond the laurel hedges which had long been familiar to me, before I saw them elsewhere, in the memorable canvas water-colour drawing which had played so large a part in this little drama, Mrs. Carter said to me, very softly,

"I stood here just on this flagstone, Margaret, when her father spoke to me for the last time. As she kissed me just now, his spirit looked at me from her eyes through all those years. I am content, my dear; I have buried my dead."

That evening James and I walked in the cool bright moonlight by the side of the terrace, where a carefully-kept, sufficiently wide walk lay between the stone wall and the smooth flower-decked lawn. We had been talking of the wedding and of all that preceded it, and a short silence had ensued, which James broke by saying,

"You have never asked me anything about Aunt Anne's arrangements with regard to Winifred in money matters, Maggie; do you not care to know?"

"Oh yes!" I said, turning rather red as I spoke. "I would like very much to know; but the truth is, I did not like to ask because I fancied Aunt Anne suspected that I do not take the loss of your chance of Woodlee quite so cheerfully as you do."

"My dear Maggie," said my husband, gently, but somewhat seriously, "I had indeed lost my chance of Woodlee; I had, however, exchanged it for a certainty. Aunt Anne has settled one half of her property upon Winifred, and the other half, including Woodlee, which she has moreover strictly entailed, upon me!"

I have one more circumstance to relate, a circumstance hitherto confined to the knowledge of Mrs. Devlin and myself, and which is not the least remarkable link in a curious chain.

Winifred had been married nearly a month, and I had returned to our house in Bedford Row, and was expecting to hear of the arrival of the young couple in town, when Mrs. Devlin called on me one day and told me she had received a note from Mrs. James Penniford, whom, however, she invariably called "Miss Winifred."

"She writes from Paris, ma'am," said Mrs. Devlin, "and it seems they have found out a photographer there who makes beautiful copies of portraits of any kind, and Miss Winifred desired me to open the small box still in my charge, and take out a sealed parcel, and bring it to you. She says, 'Tell dear Mrs. Penniford to send me, at once, all the portraits on ivory, and the two photographs of my father, and ask her to keep the others for me.'"

Mrs. Devlin produced the parcel, and I opened it. It contained some pencil likenesses, evidently sketches taken by Captain Dallas, three of the number being of Winifred herself, and three finely-executed miniatures on ivory, without cases and unset. At the back of each of the latter a small strip of paper was pasted, and on them was written respectively "Archibald Hugh Dallas," "Isabel Marion Dallas," and "Eleanor Hungerford." The miniatures were beautifully painted, and Mrs. Devlin and I scanned them attentively. Two were evidently likenesses of Arthur Dallas's father and mother; and Mrs. Devlin told me that, but for the difference of dress, the first might have been taken for a portrait of the Captain himself. The third represented a tall, fine-looking woman, who bore a strong likeness to the portrait of Mrs. Dallas, but whose features were much finer and more expressive. This, then, was Mrs. Hungerford, Captain Dallas's aunt, the wife of the rich Calcutta merchant, to whose care Arthur Dallas had been confided when he left England, at the crisis of his life. This, then, was the only relative, on her father's side, who remained to Winifred. But did she remain? If she yet lived, Winifred would have sought her,

Captain Dallas would have communicated with her. I told Mrs. Devlin that I had heard from Aunt Anne of the relationship subsisting between Captain Dallas and the original of this portrait, and asked her if she had ever heard him make any mention of his aunt.

"Oh, no! ma'am," she replied; "he distinctly told me there was no one living with whom Miss Winifred could claim kindred."

As she spoke, Mrs. Devlin was looking earnestly at the miniature, which she held in her hand, with an air of dawning recognition. Suddenly she turned it round, and read the name upon the back.

"Marion Hungerford! Hungerford!" she said, in a puzzled tone. "I seem to know the face indistinctly, as if I had seen it in a dream. The name, too; what is it that it reminds me of?" She paused a moment and thought deeply, then exclaimed,

"Why, yes, ma'am, to be sure; Hungerford was the name of the lady in Wilton Place, the lady who came to the shop and ordered the things for the little girl; the lady whom our stranger lodger followed. And this picture is her face. I only saw her twice, but I remember the face perfectly. Yes, indeed, Mrs. Penniford, that Mrs. Hungerford and this Eleanor Hungerford are the same."

"And Eleanor Hungerford was Winifred's aunt, Mrs. Devlin," I said, grasping her arm, in the excitement of a sudden idea which had struck me with all the vividness of an irresistible conviction. "Did you not me that Winifred said she liked to go to St. Paul's because she had been used to go there as a child, when she had stayed for her holidays with her aunt in Wilton Place?"

"I did," she replied; and her hesitating voice and changing colour showed me that the same idea which had taken possession of my mind had entered hers.

"Your mysterious lodger was Winifred's guilty, wretched mother," I exclaimed, "and to you she owes her last embrace of her child, as her child owes to you all the happiness of her life."

CITIES WHICH EMBRACE ALL NATIONALITIES. — London is a world in itself. The last English census develops the curious fact that there are more Scotchmen in London than in Edinburgh, more Irish than in Dublin, more Roman Catholics than in Rome, and more Jews than in Palestine. Next to London perhaps

New York is the most cosmopolitan of cities. It has not so many Scotchmen as Edinburgh, but according to the census it has nearly as many Irish as Dublin, while as a German city, it is probably the third in the world, ranking next to Berlin and Vienna. — Evangelist.

WHETHER CHOLERA IS CONTAGIOUS.

BY JACOB BIGELOW, M. D.

WITHIN the present century, cholera, a disease indigenous in hot climates of the East, has, at various intervals, made its appearance in the temperate latitudes of Europe and America. It is now again exciting interest from its possible and perhaps probable approach to this country.

The experience of the last thirty or forty years has led a majority of medical men who had observed the disease to believe that, as a general law, it is not contagious. In this belief I must individually remain, until evidence more satisfactory than any which has yet appeared shall justify an opposite conviction.

The great epidemics of 1830 and 1847 had a remarkable coincidence in the path which they pursued, and in the order and dates of their arrival in different cities. They seem to have followed certain great routes of travel, and to have avoided others equally frequented. According to Leségué, they both visited consecutively, and in corresponding months, Tiflis, Astrachan, Moscow, Petersburg and Berlin. In 1831, cholera did not take the most frequented route from Berlin to Paris, but passed along the shores of the Baltic, crossed over to Sunderland, went down to London, and again crossed the channel and arrived in Paris about six months after its appearance at Berlin. A disease propagated by contagion of any kind would hardly have avoided the most frequented thoroughfares from Berlin to Paris, while it occupied half a year in going round by England.

The epidemic now or lately prevailing in Europe appears to date back at least nine months, at which time it existed among the caravans of pilgrims visiting or returning from the city of Mecca. In the middle of May last it was at Alexandria and Cairo, in June at Constantinople, Ancona and Marseilles, and in November at Paris, Havre and other European cities.

Thus it appears that cholera has now existed in Europe from three to eight months, among cities having constant commercial intercourse with seaports of the United States, during which time thousands of passengers and tens of thousands of bales and packages have been landed in our maritime cities. If cholera were as contagious or portable as many believe it to be, it ought to have begun and perhaps finished its work in many of our seaports before this time.

Epidemics require two things for their introduction and extension: These are — first, predisposition in the inhabitants of the place visited; and, second, the arrival or presence of an exciting cause. This cause in some epidemics, such as small pox, is contagion. In others it is an occult influence, not yet discovered nor understood, nor known to be controlled, except in some instances, by hygienic agencies. No country, I believe, has succeeded in keeping out cholera by quarantines, and no country, as far as we know, can produce it artificially or retain it after the predisposition has disappeared. In its own time it moves on thoroughfares where men are travelling, and spreads into cities where they are stationary, for no better known reason than that mankind are its necessary food, and that where there are no people there can be no cholera. But why, of two frequented roads or cities, it selects one and avoids the other, investigators have not yet been able to satisfy us.

The credit of having introduced the present epidemic into Europe is by a sort of popular acclamation assigned to the hosts of squalid devotees who perform an annual pilgrimage to Mecca. Yet we are told that "the cholera exists every year among the caravans of Musselmans arriving at the holy cities," so that their supposed mission of forwarding the cholera to Europe in most years fails to be performed.

Cholera, like influenza and some other migratory diseases, has usually but not always advanced from east to west. Of the vehicle in which it travels, or the course it is next to take, we know about as much as mankind knew of the cause of lightning before the discovery of electricity. Its conveyance and propagation have been ascribed to air, to water, to material foci, to electricity, to ozone or to the want of it. Of late, in consequence of the vast development by the microscope of the existence everywhere of minute living organisms, it has become more common to ascribe the arrival of this and other like epidemics to certain unseen "germs" which are called seeds or ova, cryptogamic or animalcular, according as the fancy of the theorist inclines him to adopt a vegetable or an animal nomenclature.

But in this, as in many other cases, it is easier to trace an analogy, or to assume a cause, than it is to prevent an effect. Although inquirers have been indefatigable in their attempts to enlighten the world on the means of ridding ourselves of the presence of the various offensive co-tenants of our globe, yet no crusade has yet succeeded in banishing from our fields and houses the unwelcome swarms of mosquitoes, worms, grubs and flies, which molest us with their annual presence; nor in suppressing the blight of grain, the potato rot, or the peach tree disease. Happily some if not most of these have their periods of abatement or disappearance, and this rather through the order of Providence than the agency of man. Cholera seems to abide in the same category. We know little of its exciting cause, and not much of its prevention, except, that by following in our personal habits the dictates of reason and experience, we diminish both the frequency and danger of its occurrence.

Whatever may be the cause or vehicle of cholera, credulous and excitable personal are impatient of suspense, and are prone to cut a knot which they fail to untie. When an epidemic disease first appears, some coincidence is always brought to light which is supposed capable of accounting for it. The arrival of a ship, the opening of a trunk, or the washing of a garment, are among the most frequently accepted causes. But as these events have happened a thousand times before, and apparently under like circumstances, without any known results, it has been thought necessary by some of our later writers to narrow the compass of actual exposure down to the reception of the morbid excretions of one individual into the digestive canal of another. The first impression made by this announcement must, if true, be one of relief, the danger not seeming likely to happen very often. But to the possibility of such danger we can never oppose an absolute negative, so long as we persist in eating smelts and flounders caught about the mouths of our drains, or even turnips, salads, and strawberries raised at Brighton. The risk, however, is so small, that most persons will prefer to take it rather than to deprive themselves of food or luxuries. Of the many sensation tales printed and reprinted about cholera, and the supposed instances of remarkable communications or arrestation, it is sufficient to say that they are frequently interesting, being fully as dramatic as they are probable.

In the same regard we cannot help noticing that credulity, and perhaps private cupidity, have caused much stress to be laid on the supposed preventive efficacy of what are called "disinfectants," a mysterious word which implies a thing assumed but not proved to exist. We have deodorizers, such as chlorine, charcoal, &c., which by their combinations render certain effluvia imperceptible to our senses. But that these are not disinfectants, there is most abundant evidence. The narrative, then, of the physician at Malta, who covered certain surfaces in vessels with oil, and had them "disinfected by chlorine gas," after which "no new cases occurred," is to be classed with other like results, with which the medical press always abounds at the close of epidemics.

In clean and well-regulated cities of temperate climates, cholera is far from being the most formidable of epidemics. A greater part of its victims are the miserably poor, the worn out, the ill provided, and the intemperate, in whom this disease only anticipates the date, but does not greatly increase the annual or biennial number of deaths. Its mortality in our northern Atlantic cities rarely amounts to one per cent. of the population in a given place or year, so that a man may reside through an epidemic in one of these cities with less risk than he can take a pleasure voyage to Europe. After having witnessed many cases of cholera in this and other cities, I am farther satisfied that it affords one of the easiest modes of exit from the world.

People who would avoid or prevent cholera should cultivate equanimity, regularity of life and habits, cleanliness, salubrious exercise, temperance, and avoidance of all excesses. When they have done their duty in providing for the care of the sick, allaying public panics, and abating public nuisances, they may safely dismiss their apprehensions. Little good and some harm is always done by the indiscreet agitation of a subject which is to a great extent beyond our control. A single or sporadic case of cholera occurring in a village of a thousand inhabitants may attract little notice, and perhaps pass without record; but a hundred cases in a city of a hundred thousand inhabitants make an aggregate which generally causes some panic, though the proportion is exactly the same, and the panic equally unnecessary. It is possible that the supposed immunity of country districts in comparison with cities may be accounted for by the fact, that in the sparse population of country towns cases are less liable to be detected and published.

I may be excused for repeating the following remark from among some "Aphorisms" published by me about thirty years ago, when the disease was new and little known among us. "Should the cholera continue to prevail for three years throughout this continent, it would cease to interrupt either business or recreation. Mankind cannot always stand aghast, and the wheels of society at length would be no more impeded by its presence than they now are by the existence of consumption, of old age, or of drunkenness."
